It’s been a long time with no word. Even between good friends, it’s been too long without contact. Between a husband and wife, it really marks the end of the marriage. I was prepared to go on in this relationship, at least a little while longer. However, when I read in Parsons’ column that you were back with Helen Menken, it was all too much. The bitch even referred to Helen as your wife and not ex-wife. It is as if I didn’t even exist. I know that many people still think of Helen as your wife. That’s because we did not have a marriage.

As you well know, during the first days of our marriage, I made love to Kenneth far more frequently than I did with you. It may be too late for us, but I realize now that I should have married Kenneth instead of you. He writes every other day, at least, and it is through him that I have had any news of you at all. Of course, Kenneth is a gentleman and leaves out all the bad stuff about you.

I’m sure you’ve had many affairs in Hollywood with beautiful women, actresses far more beautiful than me. There’s even talk in New York about you and Barbara Stanwyck, although I find that hard to believe. Unlike you, I’m no good at playing the field. I’m no saint but I do tend to focus on one man at a time. His name is Roland Young, and I’m sure you know who he is. He’s living with me, even though he’s married to Marjorie Kummer. He married her in 1921, but I have persuaded him to get a divorce and marry me. That means, of course, that I will soon be filing for a divorce from you. Let’s call it the marriage that never was.

Mary

“Roland Young,” he said out loud, carefully folding the letter. “A God damn limey.” He fully intended to show this letter to Kenneth. The way he saw it, if Mary still felt that she should have married Kenneth, it might affect his imminent plan to marry Kay Francis.

Maybe Kenneth should break off his engagement to Francis and marry his “true love” after all. After reading that letter, Bogie felt that he’d welcome the divorce, and he was ready to tell Kenneth that he didn’t have to hold back any longer, and could move in on Mary if he wanted to. But then his old jealousy of Kenneth came back again.

Unaware until he read her letter that Mary even knew Roland Young, Bogie had vaguely followed the actor's career. In the movies and in the theater, other actors kept tabs on their fellow thespians, never knowing when they would become a major competitor for a part.

Young had only recently starred in two films for Cecil B. DeMille—first Madam Satan, which co-starred Lillian Roth and Kay Johnson, and The Squaw Man with a big-name cast that included Warner Baxter, Lupe Velez, Eleanor Boardman, and Charles Bickford.

Bogie couldn't help but compare himself unfavorably with Young. He'd read in Parsons' column that Young was due back in Hollywood where a string of pictures was being lined up for him. Bogie himself, on the other hand, was facing unemployment in a Depression.

Stepping across the hallway, Bogie knocked on Kenneth's door. When he came to open it, he handed him a letter. "It's from New York. Your girl friend."

"My girl friend?" Kenneth asked, looking astonished. "I no longer have a girl friend in New York."

"You do now," Bogie said, handing him the farewell letter from Mary.

When he went back into his apartment, he decided to return Bette Davis's call. When she came onto the line, she told him that she was organizing a cocktail party for some co-workers. "I'm going to kick everybody out by seven-thirty, and I want you to stay on so we can talk privately. It's about our film future."

Roland Young

She'd said the right words, "film future," and he told her he'd be at her house within the hour. He took a wild guess that Davis had come up with a script that would save their fading careers, and he wanted to see what that New Englander had in mind.

As he arrived at the door to the Davis home, it was opened by her mother, Ruth. The look on her Puritanical Yankee face told him that she didn't approve of his coming to her house. To him, she was a& tenacious shrew who unduly fussed over her daughter, who was also her meal ticket. He'd heard that she was the stage mother to end all stage mothers.

In a fairly low-cut dress and with no makeup except a "slash" of lipstick, Davis greeted him in her living room. It was a unique party. In her devious mind, the actress had thrown a party for "Hollywood losers," a grouping that included herself. She'd invited some male stars she'd appeared with in unsuccessful films for "tea and sympathy." The sympathy was genuine, but the "tea" was actually whiskey.

She kissed Bogie lightly on the lips. "I think we should celebrate failure this afternoon," she said, appearing a bit unbalanced and giddy. "All of us are being referred to as box-office bombs."

She introduced him to Walter Byron, Pat O'Brien, James "Junior" Durkin, and a very handsome young actor, Frank Albertson.

Bogie found himself standing on the Davis back porch talking to Albertson. He'd appeared with Davis in Way Back Home, which had been directed by William Seiter. Originally entitled Other People's Business, the film had starred Phillips Lord, who was known across the country for the Seth Parker character he played on his regular radio show for NBC.

“I have to admit it,” Albertson said to Bogie, “I’m still carrying a torch for Bette. During the filming, I fell hook, line, and sinker for her. I’ve asked her to marry me. She’s going to give me her answer this weekend.”

“Good luck, pal,” Bogie said, not really meaning it. For some reason, he felt jealous.

Albertson soon drifted off, his tongue wagging in hot pursuit of Davis. Bogie couldn’t believe that Davis would return this young man’s affection. And she didn’t.

As Bette Davis’ star rose in Hollywood, Albertson’s twinkled out.

The next failure Bogie tried to engage in conversation was another handsome actor, Walter Byron. He’d appeared opposite Davis in The Menace, directed by Roy William Neill. The picture had initially been entitled The Feathered Serpent, then The Squeaker.

“It should have been called The Stinker, ” Byron said, deep into his booze.

It seemed only months ago that Walter Byron had been hailed in the press as “Hollywood’s new John Gilbert.” He had landed the male role of the year when he was cast as the roistering German prince opposite Gloria Swanson’s shy little Irish girl from the convent in Queen Kelly.

“Swanson told me I stood to be the next great male star of Hollywood,” Byron said. “Imagine my disappointment when Swanson and Joseph Kennedy pulled the plug on Erich von Stroheim. That film will never be finished. If that nutbag Austrian had had his way, the movie would have been nine hours long and cost millions.”

She introduced him to Pat O’Brien. O’Brien would join that exclusive club of James Cagney and Edward G. Robinson as one of Bogie’s most frequent co-stars in the future. O’Brien seemed to be a hard-drinking, witty Irishman with an insouciant charm.

As Bogie chatted amicably with O’Brien on that fading afternoon of long ago, the actor told him that he’d been very disappointed with his role in Hell’s House with Davis and Junior Durkin. “Bette is referring to it as the nadir of her career,” O’Brien said, “even before her career gets started.”

“Sounds like a great picture, pal,” Bogie said. “Remind me to save my quarter and not see it.”

As O’Brien drifted away, Davis herself came back, positioning herself next to him. He was having a difficult time getting used to her. She wasn’t the mousy actress he’d encountered on the set of Bad Sister. This was a new Davis with bleached blond hair. Somehow the new hair made her sexier and more alluring, although Jean Harlow would never have to fear competition.

She held Bogie’s hand as she told him, “For about an hour after I saw myself in that horrible movie you and I made, I contemplated suicide. Makeup tried to compensate for my small mouth by exaggerating its size with lipstick. My mouth looked like a tunnel. Crawford can get away with those ridiculously exaggerated lips. I can’t. Also, when I’m embarrassed or insecure, and I was both of those things, I smile crookedly.”

“My, oh my, aren’t we a litany of complaints today,” he said.

“That’s not all. My outfits stunk. It was obvious I didn’t have a hairdresser. Sidney Fox got all the attention. In Way Back Home, I looked a little better. I learned that Universal was ready to drop me until Berman—that’s Pandro Berman, the producer over at RKO—wanted to borrow me for that cornspun role. A guy named J. Roy Hunt, the cinematographer, actually made me look good for the first time ever on film.”

“You’re a regular femme fatale,” he said.

“Don’t you put me on, Bogart,” Davis said. “But actually, I did look rather pretty. A lot of directors in New York called me pretty. Maybe I am a femme fatale and don’t know it. Carl Laemmle—Junior, that is—thinks I have no sex appeal, but all my leading men fall in love with me.”

After her other guests—all losers—had left, Davis invited Bogie to remain behind for “some private conversation.”

He'd noticed that she'd become more self-assured and poised in the wake of having so many handsome young men, all of them co-stars, falling in love with her.

He too found her the most attractive and alluring he'd ever seen her, which was in direct contrast to his first impression of her. Even so, with her whitened hair and pop-eyed look, she still, at least to him, evoked a dime store Harlow.

It was as if she were still searching for a face and a look but hadn't found it yet, whereas Garbo had burst on the screen, even though very young, with a look and a poise that she'd always keep.

Meanwhile, both Barbara Stanwyck and Joan Crawford, after some awkward beginnings, were finding their "look" and their screen presence. Davis seemed on a desperate and roughly equivalent search, and even without a camera, her intensity to find a screen persona filled the air with electricity.

After the departure of her other guests, when she came out to visit with him on the back porch, she turned off the overhead light, claiming it attracted bugs. But he knew the real reason.

Thankfully, the Wrath of God, Ruth Davis, had gone to bed early, complaining of a headache. For all this stage mother knew, each of her daughter's guests had left. Bogie suspected that Ruth disapproved mightily of the opposite sex, viewing men as "the enemy." She seemed so fiercely protective of her daughter that her behavior reminded him of a butch lesbian, guarding a prized nymphet from the menace of preying seducers.

Once they were seated on the porch swing, and with the warm night air blowing about them, Bogie was in the mood for romance.

Regardless of the outcome of the evening, he'd have a tale to tell Kenneth in the morning. In this case, he no longer cared if Kenneth reported his seductions to Mary. In some perverse part of his mind, he wanted Mary to know that many women, including stars, found him an attractive and a desirable bed-mate. Even if he returned to New York, and he was most definitely headed back there, he'd ride the train back East with a proven record of having seduced some of the biggest stars in the movies, even Marlene Dietrich.

On that back porch and to his unpleasant surprise, Davis didn't want to talk about their relationship or even their future career in films, assuming they had one.

She focused her talk on one beau back East, Harmon Oscar Nelson. "I call him Ham," she said, "and he calls me Spuds."

"Ain't that cute?" he said, slightly softening the sarcasm in his voice.

"He wants to be a musician," she said. "He's equally good at playing both the piano and the trumpet. But he'll never become a star doing either. He's also talking about becoming a radio singer like Bing Crosby."

"If he doesn't knock Bing down from the mike," he said, "maybe he'll become the next Rudy Vallée. But what about us? What's gonna happen to Miss Bette Davis and Mr. Humphrey Bogart? Or have you already told me what you think of me by inviting me to this party of losers?"

"Perhaps," she said. "My career seems to be collapsing. So does yours. Stanwyck and Crawford are moving up in Hollywood. You and I seem to be headed the same direction as those silent screen stars. Did you know that Louis B. Mayer was quoted as saying that at least one-third of the stars of 1928 are washed up, and he predicts that in the years to come, even more will fall by the wayside. I think he's right. Look around you. Vilma Banky, John Gilbert, Ramon Novarro, Bill Haines, Gloria Swanson, Pola Negri. Mayer has hated Chaplin since they got into a fistfight at the Hollywood Hotel, and he thinks Chaplin will never really make it in Talkies either."

"So, what are we going to do?" he asked. "I think we're stage actors. Both of us should return to Broadway. Maybe we'll take the train back East together."

"Is that a proposal of marriage?" she asked.

“I’ll soon be available. Mary has written that she plans to divorce me. She’s fallen for Roland Young.”

“I know of him,” she said. “From what I hear, if a woman manages to keep him close to her bed for three months straight, she’s set a world’s record.”

“I’m not broken up about it,” he said. “It wasn’t much of a marriage. My friend, Kenneth MacKenna, is in love with her.”

“The one marrying Kay Francis?” she said.

“One and the same.”

“I’ll never comprehend why men out here marry women like that,” she said.

Bogie lit a cigarette for her and one for himself, as they sat on that swing going up in smoke, the same way both of them would do later on the screen.

“Ham wants me to give up my career and marry him,” she said. “He claims he can support the both of us, and I should be a housewife.”

“And how do you feel about that?” he asked.

“I’m not sure what to do,” she said. “I’m very confused. I met Ham at the Cushing Academy. He was one year ahead of me. He is a very shy boy, awkward, gangling. I think he brings out my maternal instinct. He’s pleasant looking. He’ll never be handsome. He has a large nose.”

“That can be a promising sign in a man,” he said.

“What in hell does that mean?” she asked.

“I’m sure it’s not true in all cases, but Joan Blondell told me that a big nose or big feet on a man is a good barometer that something else is big on the man too.”

“Really?” she asked skeptically. “I’ve never heard such nonsense. I note that you don’t have a big nose. Nor do you seem to have particularly large feet.”

“There are always exceptions to the rule, as I’ve noted,” he said, smiling. “You can put me to the test anytime.”

“Ruthie still thinks I’m a virgin,” she said. “You know better.”

“Not from first-hand experience,” he said, putting his arm around her. “Poor Ham. Gilbert Roland is a tough act to follow.”

“Roland’s taken,” she said. “I’m all that Ham has in the world. Ruthie wants me to marry Ham and surrender my so-called virginity to him.”

“Too late for that now,” he cautioned.

“Indeed. I’ve already surrendered my virginity to Ham. It wasn’t a successful mating.”

“How so?”

“It seems that Ham has been a chronic masturbator since he was six years old. He’s given to premature ejaculation and can’t satisfy a woman. If I marry him, I’ll have to work for months—maybe more than a year—to train him.”

“I’m already trained,” he said. With an arm still around her, he began to feel her right breast. She did not object or pull away.

But she did take note of it. “I’m deliberately letting you have your fun,” she said. “I’ve been told that to be sophisticated, I've got to take up smoking and drinking, which I've done. Apparently, letting a man feel your breasts is another way to be sophisticated. I went to a party the other night. No men clustered around me. I felt like the wallflower I did when I attended Newton High. Even the lesbians in the room were clustering around Kay Francis, paying me no mind. Suddenly I looked up into the face of the most beautiful young man I've ever seen. Douglas Fairbanks Jr. I knew I could fall in love with him at once. I've heard that he's breaking up with Crawford. I've also heard he's a great lover. What a headline I could make if he dumps Crawford, divorces her, and marries me. I would install myself at Pickfair with the cream of Hollywood society."

"At first I resented you talking about other men when you've got me," he said, "but I want to hear the outcome of this."

"Oh, he chatted briefly with me. Offered me a cigarette. I was wearing my most low-cut gown. Suddenly, he reached into my dress and fondled one of my breasts. I couldn't believe what was happening. Just like that he did it. The way you're feeling me right now tells me you're not disappointed. Mr. Fairbanks must have been used to bigger and better things. He withdrew his hand rather quickly. He told me I should put ice on my nipples the way Crawford does. And that was that. He just turned and walked away. I've never felt so humiliated."

"I think I can relate to that," he said. "From a man's perspective, it would be like a woman unbuttoning your fly, reaching in to measure the goodies, and then walking away after saying, 'Not enough there to mess up my mouth with.'"

They both laughed at that. "What say we forget the Fairbanks boy, Roland, Ham, and God knows who else?" he said. "You've got a man once billed as the next Valentino, even the next Clark Gable, and you're not taking advantage of the situation. You said yourself, you want to become sophisticated." He took her in his arms and kissed her deeply before reluctantly breaking away. "If you give me a chance, you'll find I don't suffer from Ham's problem. I also find your nipples divine. In fact, I wish to suck both of them."

She offered absolutely no resistance as he moved in on her. He wanted more. He pulled her as close as he could to him, as his hand traveled from one breast to the other. With his other hand, he began the glide up her leg, past her garter belt and along her creamy thigh. He was heading for homeport.

Just before he reached the honeypot itself, the porch light was switched on. In the harsh, unforgiving glare stood Ruth Davis, looking ferocious and clad in her bathrobe.

"Get out of my house!" she shouted at him. "How dare you fondle my daughter like she's some bitch in heat. The loss of virginity before marriage will ruin a woman's life."

He pulled away from Davis but hesitated to get up. His hard-on had risen.

Davis looked down, burying her head on her chest. She began to whimper.

"Get out!" Ruth commanded.

In defiance of her, he rose from the swing with an erection tenting his trousers.

His tumescent state was not lost on Ruth. "You're a slave to your genitalia, Bogart," she said. "A disgusting, perverted creature. My daughter is going to marry Ham Nelson, not you. I'm not going to let her surrender her most prized possession, her virginity, to a sexual predator. I hear you've had half the women in Hollywood. You offer nothing to my Bette but venereal disease and unwanted pregnancy."

"Good night, Bette." he said, adjusting his shirt in his trousers and heading to the door that Ruth held open for him.

Angered and humiliated, he walked rapidly through the living room. He vowed never to see Bette again. The way he figured it, a relationship between the two of them was out of the question.

How wrong he was.

He couldn't believe it, but here he was in the Villa Carlotta apartment of Louella Parsons. She'd decided that trying to interview him was too difficult at Hollywood parties because of all the distractions. When she'd invited him over, she'd promised to give him her undivided attention.

Fearing that she might remember his offer of seduction, he could only hope that her husband, Dr. Harry Martin, was home that night. But when he got there, he learned that the doctor was administering to two of his patients, Lew Ayres and Douglas Fairbanks Jr., both of whom had come down with severe cases of the clap, according to Parsons.

"Docky," as Parsons called her husband, had launched his career as a urologist, but Bogie had heard that he was now known as "doctor for the clap" around Hollywood, having treated everybody from Gary Cooper to Tallulah Bankhead. In their case, there was an ongoing disagreement about which party had infected the other. Docky was also the "house doctor," or so it was said, for Lee Frances, one of the reigning madams of her day. Parsons' husband was said to have had more frequent and more intimate contacts with the genitals of stars, both male and female, than any other person in Hollywood.

Inspecting penises and vaginas didn't occupy all of Docky's agenda. Parsons saw to it that he was hired frequently as a technical adviser on films such as Doctors' Wives that required some very limited medical expertise. Parsons would then plug the film in her column, lavishing special praise on the technical direction. She'd even gotten Governor Clement C. Young to appoint Docky to the California State Boxing Commission "just for the hell of it."

At this point, a Boston bull terrier came into the living room and immediately jumped up onto Bogie's lap, practically knocking his drink from his hand.

"That's our adorable Pansy Parsons," she said, ordering the dog to get down from the sofa. The dog obeyed her but anchored itself close to Bogie's feet, eyeing him suspiciously as if he might make a tasty snack.

As Bogie sat across from Parsons, enjoying some of Docky's good whiskey, she told him about a startling new development in broadcasting that she and "my Docky" had seen in New York. They'd gone East for a gala dinner, where he'd been awarded an honorary degree at the American College of Surgeons. Bogie was later to learn that William Randolph Hearst and the power of his newspapers were instrumental in securing the undeserved award for Docky.

It seemed that Parsons had been asleep at her typewriter at the advent of the Talkies, and had written that, "Flickers that talk will soon shut up—a mere passing fad."

She didn't want news of such a misguided opinion to ever tarnish her reputation again, so she aggressively embraced the new technology. During their visit to New York, Docky and she had been invited to a television broadcast. "Television is sort of like radio, but with a big difference," she said. "A picture is projected."

"You've got to be kidding," he said.

"It'll be the death of the movies," she predicted. "One day people will sit in their homes watching a moving picture the way they gather today around their radio sets. It'll be like bringing a movie into your own home."

"I don't want to get into an argument with you over this, but, trust me, that day will never happen."

"It's gonna happen sooner than later," she said. "I predict that by 1935 half the homes of America will have a television set. They even told me in New York that it's soon going to be possible to show films on television in color."

"Hey, you're getting carried away. The idea of sitting at home watching a movie is hard enough to take. Watching a color movie on television—that's a bit much."

"No, I mean it," she said, "and they'll do more than just present light entertainment on a home screen," she said. "Football games will one day be broadcast live. Newsreel cameras will photograph late-breaking events and flash them into your home. Presidential inaugurations will be televised. In fact, the whole presidential race will one day be decided by television."

“I don’t get that,” he said.

“The two candidates will square off on television. The one who photographs best and handles himself better will win the race.”

“That means that an actor wanting to be president will have a better chance of becoming that than a non-actor who might be a great politician but lousy in front of a camera,” he said.

“Well,” she said, signaling him that she wanted a refill of her liquor. “I wouldn’t go that far. No actor I’ve ever known could possibly become president of the United States.”

At the urgent ringing of the phone in her library, she excused herself and heaved herself up from her armchair. When she returned, she told him, “It was from Docky. He went with Jack Dempsey and some other friends to Santa Barbara to see a boxing match, and later, Docky and Dempsey had a few drinks together in a tavern. Then Docky and the champ got into an argument. Before it was over, my Docky knocked Dempsey on his ass. What a man!”

Bogie would never know the true circumstances of this barroom brawl, or if Docky had indeed knocked out Dempsey.

“This will show that SOB, Benny Rubin, that low-rent vaudevillian, what a man my Docky really is.”

Born the same year as Bogie, Rubin was a famous stand-up comedian and fim actor whose career would span fifty years.

“I guess I don’t get it,” Bogie said. “Why would your husband need to prove his manhood to Benny Rubin?”

“Rubin and Docky were standing next to each other in the bathroom of a hotel at a party we attended recently. Rubin later spread the word around town about Docky. Rubin said he knows why Louella has a constant smile on her face. He claimed that thing hanging out of Docky’s fly looked like a baby’s arm with an apple in its hand.”

“Why did that make you mad?” he asked. “Docky should be flattered.”

“A baby’s arm,” she sputtered, practically spitting out her words. “He could have said a man’s arm. I can assure you that Docky, unlike Paul Bern, is a fully grown man.”

“We can assume that when your husband put on that show for Rubin, he was soft. I’m sure that when it’s hard, a man’s arm would be a more appropriate comparison.”

“Don’t try to pacify me,” she warned him. “I’ll see that Rubin is finished in this town.”

Ever since the episode of Docky vs. Rubin at the hotel urinal, Parsons had been running attacks on Rubin in her column. During his filming of Marianne with Marion Davies, Parsons printed the untrue allegation that Rubin got drunk and broke a violin over his wife’s head. On the set the next day, Hearst told Rubin that he would “call Louella and dress her down if you want me to.” Gallantly, Rubin told the newspaper czar that Parsons’ attacks kept his name in front of the public, and that the publicity would boost ticket sales.

Parsons tried to interview Bogie that night, but appeared far too drunk. He was explaining how helpful showman W.A. Brady Sr. had been during the launching of his Broadway career, and how he’d been directed by John Cromwell.

“I know those people,” she said, “and even wrote about them a few weeks ago. I said Helen Gahagan, the star of many a Brady play, was visiting Hollywood with her new husband, Douglas Melvyn. I also claimed that not so long ago Miss Gahagan was married to John Cromwell.” She held up her drink and looked at him imploringly. “Now what was wrong with that?”

“I don’t think Helen appeared in any Brady production,” he said. “I know she wasn’t married to John, and I think her husband’s name is Melvyn Douglas, not Douglas Melvyn.”

“Silly me,” she said. “I refuse to look anything up. I rely on the old bean. Basically, I was right, though. If it wasn’t actually Helen who appeared in Brady plays, it was someone like her. And Cromwell should have married Helen. She should never have married this Douglas or Melvyn, whatever in hell that one calls itself. He has no sex appeal whatsoever.”

“Gloria Swanson must disagree,” he said. “I read she’s cast him in her film, Tonight or Never.”

“Gloria also thought that that drunk, Walter Byron, was going to become some big shit in Hollywood when she cast him opposite her in Queen Kelly. What does she know? I also happen to know that she’s trying to hide her pregnancy from the camera. She has to bind herself into elastic underwear.”

As the evening and the drinking progressed, it was obvious to him that she wasn’t going to write a column about him. She was all too familiar with his lackluster films, and his “Tennis, anyone?” career on Broadway clearly bored her.

Throughout the evening she seemed obsessed with the phone, which never rang again. It was as if she were waiting for some late-breaking story about to happen. Finally, he found out what it was.

“I know the Lombard and Powell marriage is on the rocks,” she said, “but I’m after a bigger story that will shake up the world.”

“What might this earth-shattering news be?” he asked.

“It’s a double story,” she said. “The break-up of two marriages, the uncrowned king and queen of Hollywood and Tinseltown’s uncrowned prince and princess.”

“Who else?” she said, seemingly impatient with him. “How clearly do I have to spell it out?”

As Parsons got drunker, she ranted about various brush-offs she’d received. She claimed that she’d told both Mayer and Irving Thalberg to send Garbo back to Sweden and to cast Jeanne Eagels in her roles. She’d also demanded that the studio give all Jean Harlow parts to Clara Bow, and she’d lobbied to have Blanche Sweet cast in the role of Diane in Fox’s Seventh Heaven instead of Janet Gaynor. Parsons seemed infuriated that the studios were not heeding her casting advice.

It was after midnight when she, on wobbly legs, rose from her chair. “You’ve been drinking,” she said to him, stating the obvious. “Since Docky won’t be home tonight, after having beaten the shit out of Dempsey, I suggest you stay over here at my apartment. Otherwise, I might have to write about your arrest for drunk driving.”

His worst nightmare had come true. She’d remembered his invitation to seduction. He’d challenged her to put his manhood to the test.

Faced with the horrific possibility of having to have sex with her, he evaluated her carefully, wondering if he’d be able to get it up.

He’d read somewhere that she was claiming that she was born in 1893,& which would make her only about six years older than him. He’d also heard that she’d been born in 1880, maybe even in the late 1870s. That would put her in her fifties.

Figuring that an actor had to do what an actor had to do, he braced himself for the challenge.

She took his hand, leading him to her bedroom.

“I have stage fright,” he whispered into her ear.

“What’s the matter?” she asked. “You already told me you weren’t some lisping faggot. Here’s your chance to prove it to America’s top newspaper-woman.”

“I mean if you objected to Rubin comparing your Docky to a baby’s arm—and that was when he was soft—I don’t know if I’ll measure up to your expectations.”

“Don’t worry,” she said. She suddenly lunged toward him, locking him in a tight embrace. Her lipstick-slashed mouth descended on him, and her tongue darted out like a rattlesnake’s. Her alcohol-tainted breath was foul, and he prayed for the strength to get through the evening.

When she finally broke away, she placed her bejeweled hand at his groin. “So, I didn’t get a rise out of you yet. I’ll have to revert to more drastic measures.” She took his hand again, leading the march to her bedroom. “I’m sure you’ll please me. Besides, you couldn’t possibly be any worse than Clark Gable—and no one could possibly fuck as badly as him.”

Through Spencer Tracy, Bogie learned that Basil Rathbone had been secretly meeting with Helen about reprising his stage role in The Captive if the film, based on the Broadway play about lesbianism, ever made it in a watered-down version onto the screen.

Bogie was doubly hurt that he wasn’t being considered for the role of the male lead in The Captive. The way he figured it, it would be a cake-walk for him to play the role of a man who falls for a lesbian. He’d had so much experience with that in real life that the part wouldn’t be difficult for him at all. He felt that he needed a controversial film to call Hollywood’s attention to him, now that Fox was about to dump him.

Helen hadn’t been returning his calls, as she perhaps feared that he’d ask her to cast him in her film.

Bogie feared that he might encounter Parsons again. After the previous evening, he wasn’t too eager to run into the gossip columnist, and he never intended to have a repeat performance of their sexual marathon at the Villa Carlotta. On the other hand, he didn’t have to be ashamed of his performance. If he had to admit it to himself, he’d acquitted himself very well. He didn’t know if he were any better than “Baby’s Arm,” her husband, Docky, but he felt that when he’d left her bed, Parsons was one satisfied woman. After giving her multiple orgasms, he’d shown her what a man he really was.

At a Hollywood party, he encountered Tallulah Bankhead again.

“Hump, my darling, I think you and I both are getting a little long in the tooth for Hollywood,” she said. “It’s for kids in their twenties, not mature adults in their thirties.”

“You look more beautiful than ever,” he said to reassure her.

“Don’t kid a kidder, darling.” She brushed back her hair and theatrically gazed at the fading sunset. “The bloom is off this big waxy magnolia. Somehow, film doesn’t capture my electrifying personality that I can convey on stage. The critics may be right. On screen, I’m just a pale imitation of Garbo. My face doesn’t seem to move right. My eyes don’t come alive. I’m not made for the movies.”

“Then let’s you and me hook up, go back to New York, and become Mr. and Mrs. Broadway,” he said, only partially joking.

“That’s the best offer I’ve had all day,” she said. “I might take you up on that. But I’ll have to get back to you.”

“What’s holding you back?” he asked, bending over and kissing her lightly on her scarlet-painted lips.

“Since one of my goals—the one about fucking Coop—has already been achieved, I have set two other goals for myself—and two more candidates to fuck before I leave Hollywood.”

“Since you’ve already had me, the best,” he said, “who else is there?”

“Garbo, of course. You’ve not plowed her yet, have you, darling?”

“No, but I got a blow-job from Marlene Dietrich.”

“That’s no distinction,” she said. “Marlene has sucked all of our cocks. My second goal is to bed Johnny Weissmuller with his ten uncut inches.”

“The Olympic swimming champ?” he asked. “I didn’t think he was your type. I hear he’s gonna become the new Tarzan.”

Basil Rathbone

“A darling Ape Man if ever there was one,” she said. “I met the film’s director, W. S. Van Dyke, the other night. Charles Bickford wanted the part but was turned down. Too old. Spencer Tracy’s latest flame, Johnny Mack Brown, lost because he’s not tall enough, although he seems to satisfy Spence just fine. You won’t believe this, but Clark Gable tried out for Tarzan too. Van Dyke decided that Gable wasn’t muscular enough and didn’t have Weissmuller’s inches. Weissmuller is the Ape Man, Gable more a chimpanzee.”

She excused herself. “Keep my bourbon chilling for me, darlings. I’ve got to take a& horse piss. Care to watch?”

As he was pouring himself a drink, he turned around to greet Kenneth MacKenna and Kay Francis. “My soon-to-be best man,” Kenneth said, kissing him lightly on the lips. Since “going Hollywood,” Kenneth had become very theatrical. No sooner had those lips left Bogie’s than they were replaced with those of Francis.

“Let’s get this God damn wedding over with and soon,” Bogie said. “These pre-wedding parties are beginning to wear me out.”

“Mr. Humphrey Bogart, of New York, meet Miss Ann Dvorak, also New York born.”

He was at George Raft’s party, and the chorus girl standing in front of him couldn’t be more than nineteen years old. She had a lean, sharp face, not altogether to Bogie’s liking, yet he was immediately attracted to her. In a red silk gown that clung to her body like a Jean Harlow dress, she was one of the sexiest women he’d ever seen. The cleavage of that gown went virtually to her hips. With the wrong movement on her part, one of her breasts might pop out.

She took his hand and expertly guided him through a sea of gangsters assembled by Raft for the party where the liquor and champagne flowed.

In a corner at a small table, a waiter in a red jacket served them drinks, although Dvorak looked as if she’d consumed far more than her share for one evening. In the dimly lit room, she put one leg up over his. Her gown was split up to a creamy thigh, and he was certain she didn’t have on one stitch of underwear. He practically wanted to seduce her on the spot.

As they talked, he found her very direct and outspoken. Even though only a teenager, she didn’t seem to embarrass easily. He was convinced that Dvorak had been seducing men at least since the age of fourteen.

Ann Dvorak

The way she kept moving that creamy leg over his thighs was giving him an erection, a movement not lost on her. “So how are things?” he asked rather awkwardly.

“You tell me first,” she said.

“Marriage falling apart, career going nowhere,” he said. “The usual. What about you?” He’d no sooner asked that question than he wished that he hadn’t.

Dvorak revealed a ferocity of ambition matched only by Stanwyck herself. “I’m hot and getting hotter,” she said.

At that remark, he put his hand on her thigh and began a massage. “I’m convinced of that.”

“I don’t mean that way, silly,” she said. “I& mean, my career, Stud. I owe it all to Joan Crawford. When I was one of the hoofers in Hollywood Revue of 1929, I met Crawford. She fell for me in a big way. Howard Hughes had been calling her for a date, and she came up with this idea. Since she didn’t want Hughes, she took his call one day and agreed to go over to Hughes’ mansion. But instead of Crawford, it was me who arrived on Howard Hughes’ doorstep. And the rest is history or will soon be.”

“Well, pal,” he said, “so you fucked Hughes. What’s he going to do for you?”

“He put me under contract,” she said.

“He did the same with Harlow, but since then, he seems to be doing nothing for her,” he said, deliberately wanting to prick her bubble.

“I know that!” she said, a slight anger flashing. “With me, it’s gonna be different. He’s putting together this film called Scarface. It’s based on Al Capone, and Ben Hecht himself is writing the screenplay. Hughes wants Paul Muni to play Capone.”

“An Austrian-born actor from New York’s Yiddish Art Theater?” he asked in surprise. “Not Cagney, not Edward G. Robinson? What about George Raft himself—even me?”

“Oh, George is in the film. He plays my love interest, Guino Rinaldo. I play Muni’s sister, Cesca. I’m told that the scenes between Muni and me will border on incest. There’s even a role for Boris Karloff in the film. Hughes wants a lot of sex and violence.”

“Sounds like it’s headed for trouble with the censors,” he said.

“Hughes expects that,” she said. “And so does the director, Howard Hawks.”

“Two Howards working together,” he said. “Which Howard has branded you?”

She giggled and leaned over to whisper in his ear. “I’m balling both of them. To get ahead in Hollywood, Crawford told me it’s necessary to fuck both the producer and the director.”

“I wish I could fuck someone to get cast in a picture,” he said.

“Don’t worry, sugar,” she said between bouts of tonguing his ear. “When I become the biggest star in Hollywood, I’ll insist that you be my leading man.”

“Thanks, pal,” he said, his hand starting to travel up her thigh to his target of the evening.

She slapped it down and jumped up. “Let’s dance.”

He didn’t want to get up because of his erection but decided what the hell. The room was not well lit, and no one seemed to be paying attention to him.

In the center of the room, she moved her body into his so closely that they seemed to melt into each other. The way she was rubbing up against him, he thought he’d cream in his trousers.

After dancing around, he came face to face with Howard Hawks.

After a rather inauspicious introduction, Bogie sat in the same far corner of the room where he’d previously played seductive games with Dvorak. Across from him sat Hawks, who would play such an enormous role in both his professional and personal life in the years to come.

“Keep your mangy hands off Ann,” Hawks was telling him. “She’s already got Howard Hughes and Howard Hawks. She doesn’t need another ‘H’ in her life.”

“We were just getting acquainted on the dance floor, pal,” Bogie said. “Nothing more.”

“Don’t come within ten feet of her,” Hawks said threateningly.

“I’ll stay at least twelve feet away,” Bogie said jokingly, not taking Hawks’ anger too seriously.

I’m balling her,” Hawks said. “I find that teenage girls are the only thing that holds my interest. Don’t think I’m a pedophile. I only go out with girls in their late teens. No fourteen-year-olds.” He paused. “Maybe once or twice, but it’s definitely not a pattern with me.”

“Glad to hear that,” Bogie said. “If I ever have any daughters, I’ll keep them far away from Mr. Howard Hawks.”

“Listen, I’m not mad at you for trying to move in on Ann,” Hawks said. “You’re still green in Hollywood. You don’t know the ropes yet. I’ve issued my warning. If after you’ve been duly warned, you still cross Hughes and me, then I’ll cut off your nuts, assuming a little lisper like you has a pair.”

“Yeah, I’ve got a pair,” Bogie said. “They’re big enough, too. My problem is that I haven’t learned how to clank them like you’re doing. Or like Hughes is doing. And don’t let my lisp fool you.”

“You should be flattered by such attention,” he said. “That means you’re a real man. Queens go just for the big studs.”

“That’s one way to look at it,” Hawks said. “Nearly everyone I meet in Hollywood is a dirty little homosexual. There are a few bonafide heterosexuals out here, but not many.”

Film director Howard Hawks

“Name three,” Bogie said, challenging him.

“I’ll name three guys who’ve never had their dick sucked by a man,” Hawks said. “In order of importance. Howard Hawks, Howard Hughes, Spencer Tracy. The rest I'm not so sure about."

"No contest there," Bogie said. "You're far more of a Hollywood insider than I am."

Hawks surveyed the party of gangsters. "I accepted George's invitation because I knew a lot of New York gangsters would be here since Owney Madden and his boys are in town. I'm soaking up atmosphere for my picture, Scarface, that Hughes is producing. I think the film is& going to be a big success. At least three of my actors are gong to be billed above the title."

"Call me Louella," he said. "I'd really like to know who they are. It's interesting to hear that somebody's making it out here on The Coast."

"Paul Muni, George Raft, and Boris Karloff," Hawks said.

"The fourth?" Bogie asked.

"Ann Dvorak herself," Hawks said. "I've got this incredible instinct for casting. I have a feeling that a lot of movie plots in these Depression days will be about life's losers, and she's perfect for roles like that. After Scarface, I think she'll have cornered the market on the portrayal of doomed gangster molls with prolonged death scenes."

"Sounds like a great career," he said. "Since I'm about to be dropped by Fox, what role have you got coming up for me? I'm gonna be in need of a job pretty soon."

" Scarface is already cast," Hawks said. "I think my next movie is going to be The Crowd Roars. I'm thinking of casting Ann in that movie, too, although I rarely work with the same pussy twice. She might play the second female lead. I want Joan Blondell to play the lead. The second male lead will be played by this faggot kid, Eric Linden."

"I've heard of him," Bogie said. "You said nothing about the male lead. I haven't read the script, and don't even know what the picture is about, but I think I'd be ideal."

"It's not set yet," Hawks said, "but I'm thinking of casting James Cagney."

"I knew Cagney back in my New York days," Bogie said. "He got his start appearing in drag."

"Bullshit!" Hawks said. "You're making that up. If I had to name three men in Hollywood who will never appear in drag, I'd cite Howard Hawks first, Howard Hughes second, and James Cagney third."

"Maybe I was mistaken about Cagney," Bogie said. "Too much rotgut whiskey out here in Hollywood pickles the brain."

"I don't know about you, Bogart," Hawks said. "When I was in New York, I saw you on Broadway in Cradle Snatchers. I wasn't impressed. I guess you noticed that when I made Cradle Snatchers for Fox, I didn't cast you in your stage part as Jose Vallejo. I cast Joe Striker in the part and changed his character's name to Joe Valley."

"I couldn't help but notice," Bogie said. "Don't judge me by those Broadway days. I've grown a lot as an actor since then. I need one big role and I'll hit it big. A part like Scarface, which could make a big name for Paul Muni, as you said. He's playing Al Capone, isn't he?"

"Yeah, but that's not the official word," Hawks said. "I was visited recently by a couple of Capone goons who insisted on knowing who Scarface was based on. They'd heard that it was based on their boss."

"How in hell do you get out of that one?" Bogie asked. "I mean Capone has a scarface. I heard someone tried to slit his throat."

"That's right, and the film is based on him," Hawks said. "But I convinced them that Scarface has nothing to do with Capone. I told them we're just calling it that to fool the public into thinking it might be about Capone. I said that's known as showmanship. The Chicago boys left me alone with my body intact and went away feeling like Hollywood insiders. Hughes was afraid the boys would go after him, but I assured him that I'd taken care of that too. I told the Capone goons that Hughes was 'just the sucker with the money.'"

Dvorak approached them and reminded Hawks that they had another rendezvous that evening. She smiled at Bogie. "Maybe you'll be my leading man one day in a picture."

Hawks looked back at Bogie. "I don't see that ever happening." A frown crossed his brow. "On another point, I can assure you I'll never cast you in a film I'm directing."

"Sorry to hear that, pal," Bogie said. "Now you two love birds have a good night."

Bogie floored the accelerator of his car, heading for the Malibu retreat of Spencer Tracy and his newly acquired friend, the matinee idol, Johnny Mack Brown.

It had been a night he didn't want to remember. Smoking incessantly and badly hung over, he found himself shaking uncontrollably. He felt that he was coming apart. He rarely thought about his wives (former and current), as he was caught up in a whirlpool with an eccentric cast of characters, most of whom he was meeting for the first time.

At Tracy's cottage, he pulled into the driveway. Emerging from the beach in a skimpy, form-fitting bathing suit was one of the handsomest men he'd ever encountered. He figured it could only be Johnny Mack Brown.

After Johnny had shown Bogie to his bedroom overlooking the ocean, and after he'd showered, Bogie joined the actor for a walk on the beach. Tracy was in the bedroom across the hallway recovering from a massive drunk.

Plopping down right on the sands, Bogie accepted a drink from the flask Johnny carried in his beach bag. "Spence told me that you and he have become asshole buddies and that I could tell you anything," he said in a slow Southern drawl.

"I love the man," Bogie said, "but asshole buddies is a bit much. We're more into the handshaking stage."

"Asshole buddies is just a Southern expression," Johnny said. "Let's drop that subject and talk of loftier matters. Like what ol' Spence did yesterday."

"If this is gonna be about what you guys do in bed, pal, I think I'll skip it," Bogie said.

"Nothing like that," Johnny said. "It was at the studio. As you know, Spence is battling Fox about the roles he's been assigned. I mean, a dreadful piece of shit like Six Cylinder Love, co-starring that queen, Edward Everett Horton. What a turkey! Yesterday, on the set, Spence had had his fill of the studio and probably the entire film industry as well."

"I don't think I want to hear the rest of this story," Bogie said. He closed his eyes and lay back to get sun. To his surprise, Johnny lit a cigarette for him and placed it in his mouth. "Thanks," Bogie said. "I don't usually let men light my cigarettes, though."

"You'll get used to it," Johnny said enigmatically. "Anyway, Spence showed up on the set of She Wanted a Millionaire in evening clothes. He'd been out drinking all night. He was taking out his frustrations with Fox by acting like a rebellious child. He didn't know his lines and he'd have been too drunk to say them even if he had. He went around making lascivious remarks to all the gals on the set, pretty or otherwise. He even went up to the fluttery Una Merkel and asked her if he could play with her pussy. Later he came up to the star of the picture, Joan Bennett, and bluntly asked her, 'Do you want to fuck?'"

"That's understandable," Bogie said. "I'd like a piece of Miss Joan myself. She's even younger and prettier than her older sister, Constance."

"It's more complicated than that," Mack Brown said. "The plot thickens. First, Spence was already furious that Joan got all the best lines in the flick. He told the press he's Bennett's prop, with dialogue best reserved for a wooden Indian. To make matters worse, the director, John Blystone, is in love with Bennett himself."

“God damn it,” Bogie said, sitting up and inhaling deeply on his cigarette. “This sounds like a more interesting plot than any of his movies.”

“That’s not all. Bennett slapped his face. When Blystone rushed over, Spence said to him, ‘The script is dishonest.’ Then he passed out.”

“No wonder our boy is part of The Irishmen’s Club in Hollywood,” Bogie said. “Those boys sure know how to drink. I drink all the time but I moderate it. Spence, I’ve noticed, either drinks or doesn’t touch the stuff. But when he drinks, he empties the equivalent of Lake Michigan. My father’s a doctor. He calls men like Spence a spasmodic alcoholic.”

Football hero and Hollywood actor Johnnie Mack Brown

“Well, he’s in one of those spasms this weekend,” Johnny said, “so be duly warned. I don’t know what Fox is going to do with him. When the crew revived Spence about an hour later, he immediately barged onto the set again, took out his dick, and pissed on an expensive sofa they were using in a scene. The same sofa where Bennett was supposed to sit.” He leaned back and eyed Bogie carefully. “There’s more. Then he went on a rampage. He turned over lamps, sending them crashing to the floor. There was this bookcase with glass doors. He picked up an ashtray and broke its windows. Finally he stood on an armchair and lunged for the crystal chandelier. He was swinging on the chandelier when he fell off, hitting his head against something. That caused him to bleed profusely. The big man himself, Winfield Sheehan, Fox’s director of production, had been called to the set. He saw it all.”

“Sheehan’s gonna can Spence,” Bogie predicted. “I just know it. Spence is gonna be on that train back to New York with me. We’ll start a club. Two former Fox stars pounding the pavements of Broadway looking for work.”

“Maybe Sheehan will tolerate that kind of behavior in a big star cleaning up at the box office,” Bogie said. “Someone up there in the Garbo league. But you can’t make potboilers that lose money and pull such crap.”

“I don’t know why Fox hasn’t kicked him out on his ass by now. If I acted like Spence, I would have been canned long ago. To make matters worse, Spence will disappear for weeks at a time. He’ll lock himself up in a hotel suite and stage a big drunk.”

“I hate to see the guy suffer,” Bogie said. “He’s a real pal of mine, but he seems possessed by some hidden devil that’s got his soul.”

For the rest of the afternoon, Bogie was content to lie on the beach, drink, smoke, and listen to the sound of Johnny’s Southern drawl, which he’d come to find rather soothing. He needed this rest.

Hours later, Johnny said that Tracy had awakened and wanted to see him.

He found Tracy sitting on a narrow balcony overlooking the ocean. He looked sad and depressed.

“Good to see you again, pal,” Bogie said, giving him a warm handshake. “I hear you pulled a big one last night.”

“I’m glad you could come out,” Tracy said. “With all the assholes out here in Hollywood I’ve been dealing with, you’re the only pal that seems real.”

“I’m real all right, and fucked up too, but not quite as fucked up as you are,” Bogie said, sitting down beside the actor and lighting up another of his cigarettes.

“You’ll get no argument with me about that,” Tracy said. He looked at the evening waves washing up on the beach. “I don’t think I’ll ever be at peace with myself until I go to my grave.”

“That’s a pretty gloomy forecast,” Bogie said.

“There’s this thing inside me that’s like a demon tearing my guts apart,” Tracy said. “I can’t get rid of it. The only way I can keep it under control is to drink so much I temporarily drown it. But it always comes back. I think this beast within me will live there until my body dies, and then the God damn thing will move into someone else’s body.”

“If you don’t start taking better care of yourself, pal, the morticians will get you sooner than later.”

“Sometimes I wish that was true,” Tracy said.

The following night, after he’d driven back to his apartment and had visited with Kenneth for an hour, relating all the events of the weekend, Bogie felt tired and retreated to his apartment. He planned to cook himself some ham and eggs, but was too short on energy.

No sooner had he stripped off his clothes and piled into bed than the telephone rang. Wearily getting up to answer it, he knew he wasn’t interested in accepting any invitations, even if Dietrich herself had called.

It was Helen, filled with remorse about her refusal to take his calls. “I was humiliated at seeing you with the most glamorous women in Hollywood. I felt old and ugly. I felt you didn’t love me or need me any more in your life and that you could have your pick of some of the most beautiful women in the world.”

“Your beauty is timeless,” he said. “Theirs is only of today.”

“Thank you, dear heart,” she said. I’m sorry I didn’t call back. Please forgive me.”

“We’ve done worse things to each other,” he said.

“Please come right over” she said, a sudden urgency in her voice.

“At this hour?” he asked. Even for Helen and a reconciliation, he wasn’t that interested.

It’s only ten o’clock,” she said. “Early for Hollywood.”

“You’re on the west coast now, not New York,” he said. “Stars have to go to bed early so that we can look gorgeous on camera.”

“Please,” she said. “Tonight is so important.”

After hours spent with Helen, Bogie drove back to his apartment, expecting an early morning call from Fox, announcing that he was needed that day. When no call came in, he showered and dressed, deciding to drive to her apartment since she was not answering her phone. He feared that something might be wrong.

At the Garden of Allah, a young man at the reception desk told him that, “Miss Menken checked out this morning to return to New York.” Bogie asked if she’d left a message for him, but was told there was none.

Their night had gone so successfully that Bogie was absolutely shocked at Helen’s abrupt departure. Nothing in their time spent together suggested that she was going back to New York so suddenly.

Obviously, she'd decided that she didn't want to wander back into their old relationship, and decided she'd cut it off before it had a chance of growing again. He could never be certain about Helen. She was a woman of impulses, and obviously had acted on her impulse.

Nonetheless, he was angry at her. "After all that love-making," he said in a call to Kenneth MacKenna, "not even a god damn note. Men like us should never marry actresses."

"Maybe she got the part of a lifetime." MacKenna said.

"Maybe." Bogie put down the phone.

Just as he was about to leave, he heard the sound of loud, raucous laughter in the foyer. He spotted those two madcap Alabamians, Tallulah Bankhead and Anderson Lawler, asking the doorman to call them a taxi. Both of them had more in common than a birth state, having just survived separate affairs with Gary Cooper.

Tallulah seemed delighted to see him. "Hump, darling," she called to him. "We're going to Jimmy's Backyard tonight. If you'll go with us, I'll fuck you later and let Andy suck you off."

"An invitation like that sounds irresistible," he said, shaking Lawler's hand and kissing Tallulah on the mouth, feeling the serpentine darting of her tongue.

"Before she checked out," Tallulah said, "I ran into your adorable wife. Helen was furious. She told me about the double-cross. The producers want Barbara Stanwyck to costar in the film version of The Captive. They should have asked me." She laughed hilariously at something she was about to say. "Of course, I understand why they didn't consider me. No one would believe me in the role of a lesbian."

"You are the true epitome of ladylike refinement," Lawler said.

"You bet your cocksucking lips I am," she said. She leaned her head over to get a better view of Bogie. "We must get together soon and catch up on the latest Hollywood gossip. I'll tell you my tales. You can tell me your tales. Later, I'll show you my tail, and you can show me your tail. Not that I haven't seen it before, darling."

It was late at night as Bogie wandered slightly drunk and alone on the hotel grounds in the aftermath of Kenneth's wedding to Kay Francis. He looked up several times at the windows of their bridal suite. He could only envy Kenneth the wedding bliss he was enjoying with the woman known for some reason as "the trapeze artist" in bed. He wondered if Kenneth would ever fall in love with Francis as much as he loved Bogie's own wife, Mary. Thoughts of her crossed his mind. He imagined that at this very late hour in New York his wife was in the arms of that "God Damn actor," Roland Young.

Bogie looked up one final time at the Francis/MacKenna wedding suite and headed off by himself into the night.

He could not have imagined that within a year Young would be at Warner Brothers appearing opposite Francis in Street of Women, and that Young and Francis would be engaged in a torrid romance.

In Joan Blondell's dressing room at Warner Brothers, Bogie had just finished showering after he'd bedded her on the carpet in front of her vanity table. She was his kind of broad. He liked her tremendously, although he wasn't in love with her. She was loyal, dependable, and always there for him when he needed a woman's company. She was warm, loving, and forgiving, and he felt that he could confide anything to her and she'd protect his secrets or else overlook his weaknesses.

He suspected that this former clerk at Macy's Department Store would never make it as a big star, but as an actress she'd always show up for Warner Brothers, taking any part offered, never complaining, never going on suspension, even if they worked her into dizziness, even to the point of making four films at once.

She brought the same vitality to sex that she did to the gold-diggers she played on screen. She was brazen and fun to be with, and she didn't take herself too seriously. After bedding Blondell, he felt ten feet tall. He couldn't understand why James Cagney had dumped her.

After they'd dressed, he drove her over to the first screening of Night Nurse, the movie she'd recently made with Barbara Stanwyck and Clark Gable.

On the way to the screening, he asked Blondell, "After we've each gone through two or three more spouses, do you think we'll get married and settle down somewhere in Ohio, growing old and gray together sitting in our rockers on the front porch, watching people go to Sunday morning services?"

"I can see it now," she said. "Right before noon, I'll rise from my chair if my rheumatism will allow it, and head back into our little kitchen with its wood-burning stove. Ham and eggs for you, and rutabagas mixed with mashed potatoes for me. Those will be the diets we'll live on."

As Bogie sat in the theater holding Blondell's hand, he'd seen only fifteen minutes of the 72-minute film when he realized that Night Nurse, in spite of its stellar cast, was not going to win Oscars for anybody. Playing a tough, scheming chauffeur, a character called Nick, Gable manhandles the cast, including Stanwyck, but the female members of the audience seemed to like his testosterone-driven violence. He wondered if most women secretly wanted a man to beat them up.

Unlike her usual screen portraits, and in spite of Blondell's appraisal, Stanwyck played her typical dancehall gal on one note throughout. Blondell had exaggerated. Stanwyck not only didn't eat up the scenery, she seemed strangely subdued in her role of Lora Hart, a young woman hired by a rich, drunken widow to act as a private nurse to her children. Bogie felt that Blondell brought the only life and humanity to the film.

There was only polite applause at the end of the film. As the manager of the theater slipped the stars of Night Nurse out of the rear door, Bogie felt that that was an unnecessary precaution. He thought that Stanwyck, Blondell, and Gable could easily have walked out the front door without being overpowered by screaming fans demanding autographs.

Knowing it was going to be his last day on the Fox lot, Bogie arrived three hours before his scheduled meeting with Winfield Sheehan, head of production. He was going to miss his paycheck of $750 a week. Although he'd meant to save most of it, he never got around to doing that, seemingly thinking the money would last forever.

He could only hope that his meager savings would tide him over in Depression-riddled New York until he found a job in the theater.

Maybe once again the Brady family might come to his rescue, as they had when he returned from his term of duty in the Navy. Bill Brady Jr. had been his best friend for many years, and before he left for Hollywood, Bogart had sincerely intended to write to him frequently. But in Hollywood Bogie had turned to Kenneth as his confidant instead. Those letters to family and friends back in New York were meant to be written but never were.

Bogie was uncertain where he would even stay in New York. It seemed hardly likely that Mary, as she prepared to divorce him, would want him living with her and that actor, Roland Young.

Bogie was sitting outside a sound stage on the edge of a curb, his face buried in his hands. He must have looked a pathetic sight when Herb Gallagher approached him. Bogie had seen the elderly man puttering about the studios, but had never spoken to him.

"Everybody knows Winnie is going to fire you this morning," Gallagher said. "But you're a young man. You'll find work at other studios. Maybe Warners. I'd have said Paramount but the smart money says that they're about to go belly-up."

Bogie looked up at the man, squinting his eyes to blot out the morning sun. "You're the janitor, right? I mean everybody here, even the janitor, is in on the details of my getting the boot?"

“I don’t mean to get you riled up,” Gallagher said, “but your pictures have bombed. You’ve bombed. Frankly, you were lucky to get that $750 a week. I don’t know how you conned them into that.”

“Hell, you even know what salary I was drawing,” Bogie said. “Are there no secrets in Hollywood?”

“You know the answer to that,” Gallagher said, spitting out some tobacco juice only three feet from Bogie. “I was fired myself by Winnie.”

“Then why are you still here?” Bogie asked, standing up in hope of avoiding getting hit with the next stream of tobacco juice.

“I was the chief script reader back in 1924,” Gallagher said. “When I turned down three scripts that later became hits at other studios, I was canned.”

“As I said, why are you still here?” Bogie asked.

“I know too much about Winnie to get the final boot like you’re about to get this morning,” Gallagher said. “Winnie let me stay on. Instead of reading scripts, I get to sweep up the sound stages. It’s a living.”

“I once thought Sheehan was going to be my big white hope,” Bogie said. “In spite of all the trouble he causes, Spencer Tracy still has a contract, and I don’t.”

“Maybe Winnie’s judgment about you is all wrong,” Gallagher said. “From the looks of you, I don’t see it, but you could go on to become a big star in spite of your ugly mug, puny body, your lisp, and that scar on your mouth.”

“You sure know how to make a guy feel good on the day he’s about to be kicked out in the midst of a Depression.”

“I know, I know,” Bogie said impatiently. “I’ve read their biographies in the fan magazines.”

“In two, maybe three years, Winnie himself will be out the door when a better, more aggressive, and more talented producer comes along. Winnie doesn’t know that much about film-making any way. William Fox gave him the job because Winnie blackmailed him.”

“What sort of blackmail?” Bogie asked. “Sexual?”

“Nothing like that,” Gallagher said. “At one time, Winnie was the secretary to the police commissioner in New York. Fox Studios routinely violated the bylaws of the Motion Picture Patents Company. Somehow, and I don’t know how he did it, Winnie covered for them, keeping them two feet in front of the law during their time in New York. When Fox pulled up stakes and headed west, their boy Winnie came with them.”

“So that’s how you became head of production at a major studio,” Bogie said.

“Winnie didn’t know a fucking thing about movies when he got to Hollywood,” Gallagher said. “He was just a teenager when he joined the Army to fight in the Spanish-American War. After he came back to New York, he was a cub reporter and then a police reporter. He gave that up to work for the police commissioner. Now he’s making and breaking stars. In with Spencer Tracy, out with Humphrey Bogart.”

Gallagher was called back to duty, and Bogie wandered alone into the Fox commissary where only three tables were occupied. He decided to drink a half-dozen cups of black coffee before facing Sheehan.

In time, Bogie would realize that the janitor knew exactly what he was talking about. By 1935, when the Fox Film Corporation merged with Twentieth Century Pictures, Sheehan was out, having been replaced by a far more talented and brilliant producer, Darryl Zanuck, who had managed to get rid of Sheehan for $360,000 in severance pay.

As he sat drinking those endless cups of coffee, Bogie came to realize that his whole attempt to become a movie star was a bit ridiculous. At that very moment, he felt that he was the least likely candidate in Hollywood to ever become a movie actor.

When he'd made Up the River with Tracy, Bogie had had high hopes of stardom, but it had been a downward spiral ever since. He believed that he was better looking than Tracy, but his friend could act, and Bogie wondered if he even knew what acting was all about. Bogie could snarl and hiss, or even look vapid, but he couldn't be as natural or as convincing on screen as Tracy was. As the director, Raoul Walsh, had once barked at Bogie on the set of Women of All Nations, "Footage of actors like you end up on the cutting-room floor."

At eleven o'clock that morning, Bogie, jittery from too much coffee, was ushered into the office of Winnie Sheehan. The studio chief was known for his gregarious style and for some degree of charm, but Bogie found his dapper boss with his "black Irish features" and his legendary "ol' baby blues" rather dour today. At that time, Sheehan was known for chasing skirts and throwing the best parties more than he was celebrated for making great movies. Without looking up at Bogie, he sat at his desk going over some papers, not bothering to greet the actor or shake his hand. Sheehan routinely fired stars, directors, and studio executives every day.

"Bogart," he said in a sharp voice, looking up at him for the first time as he signaled for him to take a stiff armchair in front of his desk. "You're not only untalented, but you're in violation of your contract's morals clause."

"I've bedded a few dames since coming out to the West Coast," Bogie said. "Any law against that?"

"Not against that," Sheehan said. "If there was, I'd be locked away in the dankest cell. No one fucks higher on the list than Winnie Sheehan. Only A-list pussy. When I want a piece of ass, I go only for stars: Jean Harlow, Sally Eilers, Joan Crawford, Elissa Landi, Joan Bennett, Ann Dvorak, Myrna Loy, Sidney Fox. Even Helen Twelvetrees."

" Even her ?" Bogie said, rather mockingly.

If Sheehan knew he was being ridiculed, he gave no indication of it. "It's this panz stuff I'm concerned about." He reached into his top drawer and removed a candid eight-by-ten snapshot which he handed to Bogie.

Bogie studied the picture carefully. He was drunk at the time, and hardly remembered the photograph being taken. It was either at The Fat Black Pussycat or Jimmy's Backyard. In the picture Bogie sat between Edmund Lowe and Lilyan Tashman, with his arm around each of them. Also in the picture was Billy Haines, with his arm around Anderson Lawler. At the far left of the picture Charles Farrell was paying more romantic attention to Kenneth MacKenna than he was to the actor's new bride, Kay Francis.

"You not only go to panz clubs," Sheehan charged, "but I heard you attended an all-male lingerie party Richard Arlen threw for Kenneth MacKenna."

"That's true," Bogie said with candor. "I was seen there running around in my Skivvies." He handed the glossy photograph back to Sheehan. "For your bathroom wall," he said, a bite of sarcasm in his voice.

"That overseer of Hollywood morals, Will Hays, has been warning me about using dual-sex boys and lesbos in Fox films," Sheehan said. "If directors like George Cukor had their way, all men in film would be effeminate, flaunting their perversions on screen. I've had a study made of all Fox pictures by my assistant, Sidney Kent. His conclusion is that the sooner we get away from fairies and degenerates in our scripts, and the more family-oriented we become, the bigger the profits for Fox." He picked up a letter on his desk. "Here's what Kent wrote. 'The fairies must be sent packing back to New York where they belong.'"

"Unless I misread the scripts, I wasn't aware that I'd been playing flaming pansies on the screen," Bogie said.

"It's implied in your performances," Sheehan said. "Up against real hemen on the screen, guys like Victor McLaglen or Spencer Tracy, you come across like a lisping queen. I know you played all those faggot juvenile roles on Broadway, coming out in fancy sports dress with a tennis racket and cruising all the handsome men on stage, inviting them for a game of tennis. What the smart people in the audience realized was that you really wanted one of them to join you in the showers after the game."

Bogie chuckled at that preposterous summation of his stage career. “Hey, let’s don’t get carried away here. I never played any such part. Ask the directors like John Cromwell. And playwrights like Maxwell Anderson.”

“It was a subtle thing, and you were able to get away with it on the New York stage,” Sheehan said. “But the camera picks up the slightest nuance. For example, Variety a few months ago ran an article about all the pansy dancers and chorus boys used in musicals. It demanded that from now on, every studio cast real he-men as chorus boys. During the casting of musicals in the 30s, if a boy is too dainty and pretty, he’s going to be out on his ass. And fussy, over-marcelled hair is out too. Film-goers, especially male film-goers, resent seeing effeminate men on the screen. I’ve seen all the footage you’ve shot for Fox at the ridiculously overinflated salary of $750 a week. There must have been a typo in your contract. It should have read $75 a week, and even then you would have been overpaid. Let’s face the truth: You’ve got some effeminate mannerisms, and they’re even more intolerable because of your lisp.”

“So, you’re saying that I’m getting kicked out on my ass because I act like a pansy on the screen?” Bogie asked, not concealing his anger, which had flared suddenly.

“You amaze me with your perception,” Sheehan said sarcastically. “I think my point is obvious. My recommendation is that you give up acting. You and that co-star of yours in Bad Sister, Bette Davis, have no talent. Neither of you have presence on the screen. She looks like a little lost wren, and you look like a sneaky rat. You’re not ugly enough to play a villain like Edward G. Robinson, nor handsome enough to be a leading man like Joel McCrea. You’ve made your last picture for Fox.”

“I think I figured that out even before I came into your office today,” Bogie said.

“The camera, my boy, is an amazing thing,” Sheehan said in worshipful tones. “It creates an illusion of reality so great that it can surpass reality. All studios, not just Fox, have got to show a greater respect for the camera and not parade freaks of nature before it. Guys like John Gilbert, Billy Haines, Ramon Novarro.”

“And you’re adding the name of Humphrey Bogart to that list of queens?” Bogie asked in astonishment.

“If the shoe fits, wear it,” Sheehan said harshly. “Tomorrow’s screen belongs to the Clark Gables and the Gary Coopers. You won’t find those two out sucking dick or taking it up the ass any more. We’ve also got to have real he-men directors like Raoul Walsh, not fancy-pantsy George Cukor, directing real men like my latest discovery, Marion Morrison. For The Big Trail, I had him get rid of that pansy name and call himself John Wayne. Back in the Twenties, just as a means of getting ahead, Wayne occasionally let one or two of the male stars of his films suck his dick, hoping for a big break. And Clark Gable did the same thing. So did Gary Cooper. Wayne confided to me the names of guys who had gone down on him: Billy Haines in Brown of Harvard, John Gilbert in Bardelays the Magnificent, Richard Barthelmess in The Drop Kick, George O’Brien in Salute and again in A Rough Romance, and your faggot buddy, Kenneth MacKenna in Men Without Women. And now, like Cooper and Gable, Wayne is a star. He won’t have to drop his pants ever again for a Hollywood cocksucker.”

“When history books are written years from now, I’m sure they’ll credit Winfield Sheehan with bringing masculinity to the movies,” Bogie said bitterly.

Sheehan took him seriously. “And they’ll be right. I did pretty well with George O’Brien in The Iron Horse. George is one he-man. I nicknamed him ‘The Chest.’ In fact, I did all the publicity for The Iron Horse in 1924. I came up with the line, ‘George O’Brien is not a sheik or a caveman or a lounge lizard. He’s a man’s man and the idol of women.’ Not bad, huh?”

“That sure would have lured me into a movie house,” Bogie said, still amazed that Sheehan was taking his sarcastic remarks seriously.

“Just between you and me, Fox is on the verge of bankruptcy, and I’ve got to save the studio,” Sheehan said. “Lisping fairies on the screen won’t do the job for us.”

“You’re telling me that in the new Hollywood big-dicked studs will direct only big-dicked studs. Balls will be clanking so loudly technicians will have to tone down the sound track. John Wayne will come across like a giant phallus spewing semen into the audience.”

“Don’t disgrace yourself in front of me by getting carried away with too many of your sexual fantasies,” Sheehan cautioned.

“Okay,” Bogie said, wondering why Sheehan was prolonging this firing. “I’m out the door. Who’s next on your list? After you kick out the pansies on their ass?”

“I met with Joseph Breen yesterday,” Sheehan said. “As you well know, he works hand-in-glove with Will Hays to safeguard the industry from perversion. Breen is not only against sexual perverts on the screen but lousy Jews like Louis B. Mayer, too. Breen calls Jews the scum of the earth. A Jew will do anything for money. They’ll agree to any sexual taboo on the screen if they feel it’ll turn a fast buck. These money-grubbers will depict the vilest of scenes. Breen thinks the ultimate aim of the Hollywood Jew is to undermine Catholic morality.”

Bogie stood up abruptly. I’ve heard enough. I’ll be off the Fox lot in fifteen minutes. Watch me go. I’m not going to sit here any longer listening to your shit.” He actually used the word “shit,” which he detested when other people said it. But no word other than shit seemed to describe the garbage pouring out of Sheehan’s mouth.

“I’m one cocksucking pansy faggot queer lisping queen, one slimy sissy—a bumbling fluttery butterfly, lipstick-wearing, take-it-in-the-ass, dithery, unmasculine fruit.”

“That’s how I’d describe you,” Sheehan said. “And let me congratulate you on the honesty of your self-portrait. The most accurate I’ve ever heard.”

Bogie walked rapidly toward the door, opened it, then slammed it in Sheehan’s face as he headed down the corridor and off the Fox Studio lot.

Amazingly, when Bogie appeared to accept the Oscar as best actor for his role of Charlie Allnut in 1951’s The African Queen, he singled out Winfield Sheehan specifically for a special thank you for launching him into motion pictures.

Bogie walked out onto the rooftop of his apartment building, watching the dawn break across the Los Angeles skyline. As he smoked his tenth cigarette since coming up to the roof, he pondered the Hollywood madness that had driven him here, where he’d actually considered, however briefly, taking a jump off that roof.

Kenneth was due back at his apartment that morning after a short honeymoon with Kay Francis. He too was moving out of the building to live with his new bride under whatever marital arrangements they’d worked out together.

In lieu of Kenneth, he thought he’d call Spencer Tracy and expose himself as a failure, but decided against that. He didn’t want Tracy to know how vulnerable he was and preferred for his newly acquired actor friend to maintain the illusion that Humphrey Bogart was tough like Tracy himself.

Back in his own apartment, and safe after his lonely walk on the roof, he received a phone call from Bette Davis, who was demanding to see him. She’d been fired from Universal. Her party for losers had been completely accurate as a harbinger of events to come.

Although within the recent past, he had vowed never to see her again, he invited her over anyway, hoping that two actors, each of them kicked out of Hollywood, might be able to console each other.

The pain associated with his having been fired from Fox was enormous.

Opening the door, he took in the vision of a very distraught Davis, who had been crying. She immediately fell into his arms, sobbing more intensely and violently than she ever would on the screen.

She sat on the sofa across from him, as both of them enjoyed booze and cigarettes, two narcotics that would become lifelong addictions for each of them. Since storming into his apartment, she had talked incessantly about her career, offering only minor condolences about his own dismissal from Fox.

“When I came to Hollywood,” she said, “America was in a great depression. It still is. Garbo had learned to talk, and the first thing she said was ‘ Gimme a viskey.’” Her imitation of Garbo was right on the mark. “Garbo is still talking. Dietrich had arrived to appear in high heels and expensive gowns running around in the sands of Morocco. She’s still dressing up, still running around. Norma Shearer had won the Oscar. Norma Shearer is still getting Oscar-winning roles. Hollywood is virtually intact. And it certainly won’t miss Bette Davis.” She looked over at him. “I’m not movie star material. Like you, Bogie, our faces weren’t meant to grace the silver screen.”

“If only we’d gotten the right parts,” he said defensively. He didn’t like admitting failure.

“As far as I’m concerned, both Carl Laemmles, Senior and Junior, can take their so-called 230-acre film factory and give it back to the mustard farmers from whom they took the land in 1915.”

“Considering the films those two creeps turn out,” he said, “maybe mustard greens would be easier to swallow.”

She seemed not to have heard his remark. “‘Bette from Boston,’ they called me. All the good parts went to that whoring bitch, Sidney Fox. She spent more time fucking Laemmle Jr. than she did on camera. Frumpy they called me. Odd-looking. Sexless. Somewhat ugly. Christ. Somewhat!” She virtually spat out the word.

“Look at all the guys who’ve fallen for you,” he said. “You’re hardly sexless. Why, all the losers at your party had the hots for you. Even me.”

She smiled at the remark. “If only that were true.”

As he got up to pour her another drink, she too rose to her feet and pranced around the apartment, with the same kind of stalking movement she’d demonstrate in several films. She was a woman with a violent temper and filled with turbulent emotions. “I’ve failed miserably in films. I can’t even stand to see myself on the screen. I’m that bad.”

“You came close to getting roles here or there that could have launched you,” he said, reminding her.

“Close,” she said with a certain contempt. “But miles from the goal. My one hope was that William Wyler would cast me in A House Divided. It was my last chance for success at Universal. Even though the women in wardrobe objected, I found this dark plaid cotton dress. The bodice fit real low, and I definitely showed cleavage. After all, let’s face it: My breasts are my most alluring physical asset. I’m sure you’ll discover that for yourself later.”

This was his first indication that he was going to get lucky.

“When I came onto the set showing my major assets pre-packaged in that dress,” Davis said, “Wyler took one look at me and dismissed me. I heard him tell his assistant, ‘Who in hell do these ingénues think they are? They think that if they show off a big pair of tits, they’ve got the part. Fuck! Hollywood is just one big tit.” She sighed before taking a deep drag on her cigarette. “I was so upset by him that I was tongue-tied during the screen test.”

Ironically, Wyler would become not only “the love of my life” for Bette, but her best and most favored director, guiding her through her classics, such as Jezebel, her consolation prize for not getting cast as Scarlett O’Hara in Gone With the Wind, and in Lillian Hellman’s The Little Foxes, a role that had been created on the stage for her arch rival, Tallulah Bankhead.

“Laemmle Jr. called me into his office to fire me in person,” she said. “I think he enjoyed humiliating me, telling me that I had no future in films. After seeing us together in Bad Sister, he predicted the same fate for you.”

“I know that,” he snapped at her. “We’ve been over all that before.”

“I don’t know about you,” Davis said, “but I’m going to return to Broadway and become the next Lynn Fontanne.”

“Can I be your Alfred Lunt?” he asked. Although he’d meant his remark to be facetious, by the time he came to the question mark, it had become serious.

She looked over at him as if sizing him up. “You’re not homosexual enough to replace Lunt.”

“I’ll take that as a compliment,” he said. “Maybe we’ll be the next Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne, but we’ll be more virile. Not as fey.”

“Maybe that’s not such a bad idea,” she said, her pop eyes widening as if the revelation just might be possible. “I could see the names of Bette Davis and Humphrey Bogart in lights.”

“We could become the new king and queen of Broadway,” he said, daring to hope that such a dream might actually happen.

“You and I are not film people,” she said. “We belong on the stage. The theater is in our blood. We’ll get the right properties. Get Maxwell Anderson to write a play tailor-made for us. Maybe even Ben Hecht. He’d be great. We’ll become the next legendary acting team in Broadway history.”

He held his glass up to hers, and she toasted him back, saying, “Of course, your talent will never be as great as mine. But I think you can develop a real stage presence. Sometimes having a distinct personality is more important than acting talent. In my case, I was blessed with both talent and a personality.”

He listened patiently, though rather disdainful of her proclamations of her own greatness.

By ten o’clock that night, she’d agreed to go onto the roof with him for his final look at Los Angeles at night.

A wind was blowing in from the ocean, and the night had turned suddenly cold. Wearing only a thin cotton dress, she was shivering. “Hold me!” she commanded. There was desperation in her voice. Without her bravado, she appeared strangely weak and vulnerable, in need of a man’s protection.

“I’m here for you,” he said, moving toward her. He took her in his arms and kissed her passionately, feeling her quivering response. So great was her need for him that she was moaning softly. She knew that he knew that she was his for the taking, at least for the night.

“I need to feel like a woman again,” she whispered seductively in his ear. “Take me downstairs and make me feel like that woman I long to be, but never was.”

“You’ve got yourself a date, lady,” he said, kissing her once more. With one arm around her waist, he guided her toward the lone door on the roof, leading down the iron steps to his apartment.

Once inside the apartment, she appeared talked out. There would be no more need for words.

By four o’clock that morning, he’d made more passionate love to her than he had any other woman in his life. He’d made Bette Davis his woman. She hugged him with the kind of desperation a couple faces when they stagger blindly but bravely into a new but uncertain future. Throughout the night they’d clung to each other like two people& who, when dawn came, would face the gallows together.

On the air:
Humphrey Bogart with Bette Davis

Both of them had convinced the other that their future careers were entwined. Together they could make it as a team, or so they’d told themselves.

Before the night ended, she had begged him to marry her as soon as his divorce from Mary came through. “I didn’t know what love-making was until I went to bed with you. I thought sex was something that men did to please themselves with women. Hop on, hop off. You taught me what a thrill it can be for a woman. You've taken me to another dimension, a place I didn't think I could find with any man. You've awakened a desire in parts of my body that I thought& were incapable of a sexual response."

She had obviously regained her articulation. He buried the sound of her voice when he'd moved over her again, giving her a deep, impassioned kiss. Even though he thought his entire body had been fulfilled as never before, he found himself hardening again.

After he'd finished both of them off for the last call of the evening, he urgently pleaded with her, "Get on the train in the morning with me," he said. "Let's go back to New York." Kenneth had agreed to drive him to the depot for his final good-bye to Hollywood.

Like a good New England housewife, Davis rose from his bed and began packing his luggage. But she turned down his invitation to leave with him that morning because, "It's impossible—that's why."

She did commit to him, though, claiming that when, "Ruthie and I shut down our house in the Hollywood Hills, I'll be on the next train east. It'll take about six weeks, but you can count on me to be there. In the meantime, you've got to search for a suitable apartment for us. In New York, we'll pound those sidewalks of Broadway together."

"I'll be in New York keeping the sheets warm," he said, "until your train pulls into Grand Central station." He kissed her on her nose as he headed for the bathroom.

Over breakfast, which included ham and eggs, Davis proved herself to be a capable cook. "You've liberated me as a woman," she claimed to him, her wide eyes popping with a new kind of joy and a dawning reality. "I'll be a better actress because of this night we spent together."

"The first of many such nights," he assured her.

She stood up to pour him some more coffee. "Miss Bette Davis, formerly of Universal Studios and now a Broadway star, will become the third Mrs. Humphrey Bogart. It is her first marriage. For Bogart, it is his third. He was previously married to Broadway actresses Helen Menken and Mary Philips."

"This past night in bed with you will have to last me for several weeks until we're together again in New York," she said. "There can be no other man for me but Humphrey Bogart."

He kissed her one final time, holding her long and close. He made a parting remark before rushing down those stairs where an impatient Kenneth was waiting to drive him to the station.

He turned back and looked with a nostalgic regret at the apartment house where he'd lived during his brief, ill-fated Hollywood career. All he could think about was Davis up there in his bathroom, applying lipstick to her face before she too left the building forever to return to her own home.

Each day for him would be a long one until she was with him in New York and cuddling him in that ample bosom that William Wyler had rejected.

All the way to the station, he wasn't really in the car with Kenneth, but remained still back in that apartment with Davis. His good-bye to her would stab at his memory forever.

CHAPTER FIVE

It was a dismal New York that greeted Bogie upon his arrival in 1931. Unemployment was at an all-time high, and the gaiety of Broadway in the Roaring Twenties had roared out. For every acting job, there were more than 3,000 hopefuls who showed up, trying out for a meager part to keep them out of the breadlines.

The great theatrical entrepreneurs, the Schuberts, had gone into receiver-ship. In 1929, two years before, some 250 theatrical productions had been launched for the then-prosperous audiences of Broadway. But in 1931, with America in the throes of a Depression, many of these legitimate theaters had been converted into movie house showcases for hastily produced Talkies being churned out by Hollywood.

The first person he called upon was Mary Philips. Unlike the woman who had written the "Dear John" letter she'd sent him in California, she now seemed to want to save their marriage. At least some of her change in heart derived from the fact that she'd caught Roland Young, her lover, involved in not one, but two affairs with other actresses and had left him.

"I'm just as much to blame for the failure of our marriage as you are," he confessed to her.

"I think we owe it to each other to give it one more try," she told him.

Against his better judgment, he agreed. That night he wrote Bette Davis in Hollywood, telling that he had reconciled with Mary.

Furious at his rejection, she did not respond. "I will never speak to Humphrey Bogart again as long as I live. He treated me like a Saturday night whore." She relayed her feelings to Kenneth MacKenna, hoping he would convey her fury to Bogie back in New York.

Her mother, Ruthie, praised Bette Davis' decision to have no further contact with Bogie. "The man gives me the creeps. He always looks dirty." It would be at the urging of Ruthie that her daughter, with some reluctance, eventually married Harmon Nelson Jr., a no-talent musician, in Yuma, Arizona, on August 18, 1932.

Even though he'd been separated from his family for sixteen months,& Bogie did not want to confront them again, yet nevertheless felt that he had to. He called first on Belmont, whose life had continued down a stairway to some dark gulf. Belmont was paralyzed and had been bedridden for the past four months in a dingy apartment at Tudor City in Manhattan.

His father told him that Maud was living upstairs, within the same compound but in another apartment. The ill-fated couple had not divorced. Instead of functioning as a wife, she'd become a caretaker, providing a hot cooked breakfast for him every morning. Each night at seven, she brought down a nutritious dinner.

After his visit with his father, Bogie called on Maud upstairs. She was living in greatly reduced circumstances, paying her own bills and Belmont's too with the meager earnings from her art work.

During the time Bogie had been away, she seemingly had aged ten years. Her face was drawn and bitter. She was chilly with him, not even extending her hand when she allowed him into her apartment. She didn't want to hear about any of his adventures in Hollywood, and had seen none of his movies. After about forty-five minutes, she asked him to leave because she had developed a migraine headache.

Before he left, she mentioned his sister, Kay (Catherine), whom she claimed had become "a hopeless alcoholic and the town whore."

Kay's drinking led to a rapid deterioration of her health. She died in 1937 of peritonitis after being rushed to the hospital when her appendix ruptured. Before an ambulance arrived, she was screaming in pain.

Frances Rose, his other sister, was in equally bad shape. Ever since she'd suffered through a painful childbirth, the delivery lasting almost 30 hours, she'd become a manic-depressive. She'd been in and out of asylums, and regularly subjected to electric shock treatments.

When Frances was left penniless after her divorce from Stuart Rose, with a young child to care for, she had no one to turn to but her brother. Throughout the rest of her life, Bogie would support her "emotionally and financially."

"The Bogarts are in great shape," he told Mary upon his return to their flat that night. "Each one, in very separate ways, is on the way to hell. Maybe I'm next. It's a family curse."

"We'll make it," she said. "Just you see. It's always darkest before the dawn."

"Stop it!" he shouted at her. "I told you to quit going through life spouting clichés."

Bogie and Mary, "along with the rats and roaches," had moved together into a dismal apartment at 434 East 52nd Street. At night they spent their time listening to the radio and finishing off a bottle of booze. There was nothing else for them to do.

On this marriage's second time around, sex did not emerge as a vital part of their relationship. "I'm too depressed to get it up," Bogie told his friend, Bill Brady Jr.

Even after the first week's anniversary of his reunion with Mary, he had serious doubts that their second attempt at marriage would work out.

One afternoon, he came home to find her writing a letter to Kenneth, now married to Kay Francis. He asked her if he could read it before she sent it, and she refused, tearing the letter into shreds and throwing them into the wastepaper basket.

Not finding any regular work, he sometimes earned as much as five dollars a day playing chess for two bits a round on Sixth Avenue, and bridge at the Players Club, a venue frequented mostly by recently unemployed actors, of course.

After pounding the pavement, Bogie landed a small part in a British comedy called After All. It opened to lackluster business at Broadway's Booth Theatre on November 3, 1931.

Helen Haye, who was often confused with Helen Hayes, was the star of this ill-fated play.

Wearing a fake mustache, as required by the role he was playing, Bogie encountered After All's British playwright, John Van Druten, who invited him to a tavern on 46th Street, Bogie thought it was to talk about the play, but after a drink or two, Van Druten felt his crotch. Bogie turned down the playwright's offer of sex.

Van Druten, of course, would go on to dazzling success in the theater and in film adaptations, striking gold with such hits as The Voice of the Turtle and Bell, Book, and Candle. He was not as successful with Hump's play. After All closed after only twenty performances.

On the last night of the show, Elliott Baker came backstage. He was one of the many talent scouts working for Columbia, among other studios. He was looking for young actors for talking pictures.

Playwright
John Van Druten

He had seen one of Bogie's pictures and had been impressed with his role in After All in which he played an architect married to an invalid.

Invited out for a hamburger, Bogie was expecting another proposition like he'd received from Van Druten. To his shock and delight, the agent offered him a six-month contract at Columbia for $750 a week, a dream salary back then.

Once again, Bogie found himself on the Santa Fe Chief, traveling west across the vast expanse of& the American continent. This time he knew he was going to make it big.

The big difference was that Mary now sat beside him. In spite of her "beak" nose, she was hoping to get cast in movie roles herself.

Kenneth had secured modest lodges for them at a pretentiously named apartment complex, The Château Elysée. Meeting them at the train station, Bogie appeared dismayed at the extended kiss Kenneth delivered to his wife.

Early in 1932, Bogie was awarded the second lead in a romantic comedy produced by Columbia entitled Love Affair.

An English beauty, Dorothy Mackaill, four years younger than Bogie, had been cast in the lead. Bogie found her "a stunner, with skin like polished porcelain." A former Ziegfeld Follies dancer, she'd been a bosom buddy of Marion Davies, mistress of William Randolph Hearst.

Mackaill had made silent films with Bogie's pal, George O'Brien, and had even co-starred with John Barrymore. She told Bogie that she was delighted to have him as a leading man, since the studios wanted young, fresh talent.

Humphrey Bogart in a starring role, at last....with Dorothy Mackaill

"My contract with First National wasn't renewed, and I'm free-lancing. I think if I don't build up a new following in Talkies, I'm through. Help me!"

He didn't know how he could help her exactly. He'd already told friends, "I'm hanging on as an actor by the skin of my left nut."

He worked closely with the director, Thornton Freeland, of North Dakota, who'd started out at Vitagraph back in 1918. "He was more a cameraman than a director," Bogie said, "but he claimed he'd photograph me so I'd look like a matinee idol. That's okay with me, if that's what was needed and wanted. I'd flunked as Fox's answer to Clark Gable, so I needed a new persona."

Love Affair is significant today only because it marked Bogie's first starring role. In it, he played an aeronautical engineer. His& lisp is more pronounced in this picture than in later films.

At the end of filming, Mackaill told Bogie, "Here I am, not even thirty years old, and my career is fading fast. Perhaps we'll have a bit hit with this."

They didn't.

Back at their apartment, Mary was often gone until late at night, and he suspected she'd resumed her affair with Kenneth. For some reason he didn't feel particularly jealous. Kay Francis often wasn't home with Kenneth, who was pursuing various affairs with other women, or so Bogie had heard.

Bogie's next job came when Columbia lent him to Warner Brothers, which would eventually become his signature studio. He was given a small part in Big City Blues (1932), which "pissed me off—I'm a leading man, not a bit player." The only good news was that he could resume his affair with the star of the film, Joan Blondell.

On the set of Big City Blues (1932), Bogie found Joan making two films at a time. She'd have to complete twenty movies before the studio allowed her to take a vacation. Even though both of them remained free agents, Bogie fitted comfortably into the relationship with her as if he'd never left it behind.

Cast as a New York gold digger, Joan had thrived as a Depression-era Showgal. "Chorus girls used to get pearls and diamonds," she wisecracked. "Now all they expect is a corned beef sandwich."

She told Bogie, "My dad always complains about my playing low-life gals of the night, but I seem to fit into those roles better than nun parts."

The San Francisco director assigned to the picture, Mervyn LeRoy, was A-list. His film, Little Caesar (1931), had started the gangster craze that Bogie would soon be cashing in on.

Eric Linden was the film's male star. He'd be a leading man in minor Hollywood fare from 1931 to 1941. In Gone With the Wind, he'd be cast in a small role.

When he met Bogie, he was cornering the Tinseltown market in portraying artistic, sensitive, smart but weak-willed juvenile males, those who hovered between boyhood and manhood.

"The first time I saw you in Up the River, I was totally captivated by you," Eric told Bogie. "You remind me of my father."

"I guess I must be getting old, kid, and I've been told a lot of things in Hollywood, but never that I reminded someone of their father. And, by the way, kid, I'm not an adoption agency."

"I didn't mean it that way," Linden said apologetically. "I hope we can become close friends."

"I've got a lot of bad habits," Bogie said. "Drink too much. I fart in bed. I leave skid marks on my underwear." He lit a cigarette. "And I'm a skirt chaser."

"With all your faults," Linden said, "I want us to become very close friends."

After talking with him for a while, Bogie became dismissive. "It's just not going to happen, kid. You're awfully cute, but it's not for me." He turned and walked away.

There would be a third film before Bogie returned to Broadway. Mervyn LeRoy liked working with Bogie so much he also cast him in Three on a Match (1932). Bogie found himself working in a movie that starred four women he'd seduced—Joan Blondell, Ann Dvorak, Glenda Farrell, and once again Bette Davis.

He felt awkward encountering Bette again after dumping her so ungallantly. But when he met her, she shook his hand, "Welcome back to Hollywood, Mr. Bogart." She made no mention of their brief affair, and for that he was grateful.

"I had these big pictures like Cabin in the Cotton," she said, complaining to Bogie. "Now I'm the third female lead, working with those two whores, Blondell and Dvorak." She seemed unhappy and couldn't wait for the movie to end.

When her short shooting schedule came to an end, Bogie told her, "I hope we work on another picture soon."

At the wrap, LeRoy told her, “I predict stardom for Blondell, success for Dvorak, and unemployment for you, Bette.”

Still in California, before he returned to New York, Bogie appeared in a Broadway-bound comedy, The Mad Hopes. It starred Billie Burke, who would later gain screen immortality as the Good Witch Glinda in The Wizard of Oz (1939), with Judy Garland. Years before, in 1914, she had generated newspaper headlines thanks to her marriage to the theatrical impresario Florenz Ziegfeld.

The comedy with its giddy goings-on had been specifically written for Burke, but after its run in California, she wisely abandoned it as a means of avoiding the cynical scrutiny of Manhattan audiences. When it finally opened& on Broadway on May 28, 1932, it starred Violet Kemble Cooper, and no Bogie. It ran for only twenty performances.

At the end of his stage appearance with the ever pleasant Burke in California, he learned that Columbia was not going to renew his contract. Since there was absolutely no work in Hollywood film studios, he opted to return to his native New York City to see what his chances there might be.

After the train deposited him at Manhattan’s Grand Central Station, he headed back to the sleazy apartment he shared with Mary. Relations between them had became increasingly tense. During their obsessive search for work, they had each been leading separate lives. She would often come home late and had little to say. He noticed, however, that she still had time to write one letter a day to Kenneth back in California.

Many Broadway theaters had closed. Most former theater patrons couldn’t afford a ticket. Movie tickets were a lot cheaper. Amazingly, Bogie managed to secure roles in five plays in a row, each with long rehearsal periods. Once the plays opened, each of them flopped. He would later remember performances where there were no more than twelve to twenty people in the audience.

His first job came when he was cast as the third lead in a play called I Loved You Wednesday, which opened on Broadway at the Sam H. Harris Theatre on October 11, 1932. He was cast as a "sybarite with the morals of a tomcat."

The star of I Loved You Wednesday was Frances Fuller, who played Bogie's lover. This Charleston-born actress from a fine American family was related to Secretary of State and U.S. Supreme Court Justice James Francis Byrnes (1882-1972). Frances later became the director of the American Academy of Dramatic Arts and was instrumental in developing the acting style of such& stars as Grace Kelly and Anne Bancroft.

She was strictly business with Bogie. "No hanky-panky with that stuck-up bitch," Bogie told another young actor in the play, Henry Fonda, who appeared briefly in a non-speaking part which called for him to sit onstage at a bar, wordlessly enjoying cocktails with another future star, Arlene Francis.

Henry Fonda had married Margaret Sullavan in 1931, but his marriage seemed as much a failure as Bogie's marriage to Mary. The two young actors shared their marital and career woes.

Bogie told Fonda one night, "I can play this aging juvenile just so long. My voice is deeper. My beard is darker. Makeup can hide only so much. If I don't get a good role soon, I think I'll be washed up."

"I don't think so," Fonda said reassuringly. "Once you get the right part, you'll be the biggest thing on Broadway, except for me, of course."

Sullavan showed up backstage one night, spending more time checking out Bogie than Fonda.

"I can't stand a man who's lousy in bed," she told him. "Fonda's a fast starter and a lousy finisher."

Bogie had never heard a woman talk in such graphic terms describing her husband. She seemed like such a castrating female that he shied away from her. He liked his women a bit more demure. Sullavan was far more aggressive, with a more pronounced streak of malice, than Barbara Stanwyck. Bogie genuinely liked Fonda and would encounter him on and off over the years.

Unhappily married: Margaret Sullavan (top photo), and Henry Fonda

Years later, in the early 1960s, when Edward Albee wrote the play, Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?, he had Fonda in mind when he crafted the character of George, the Milquetoast husband who comprised half of an corrosive marital relationship in an outwardly genteel college town.

Fonda's agent arrogantly rejected the choice role without consulting him. When Albee's play became the hit drama of 1962, Fonda was furious.

Before the 1930s came to an end, Fonda would join the A-list of stars in Hollywood, fathering Jane Fonda and seducing Bette Davis, his co-star in Jezebel.

It came as a total surprise, a ironic shock really, when Bogie found himself cast with Margaret Sullavan in his next job, a Broadway play called Chrysalis, which opened on November 15, 1932, running for twenty-three performances at the Martin Beck Theatre.

Bogie's role was defined as "a patent-leather parlor sheik."

The play was a commercial disaster, even though it was cast with some of the most talented actors on Broadway, including Osgood Perkins, a famous actor of his day. He would become the father of an even more famous actor, Anthony Perkins of Psycho fame. He and Bogie shared long talks about the theater.

Bogie also befriended Elia Kazan, another actor in the play. He told Bogie he'd rather be directing the play instead of appearing in it.

Elisha Cook Jr., who would appear years later with Bogie in The Maltese

Falcon and The Big Sleep, was also one of the actors in Chrysalis.

Cook told Bogie, "When a director wants to cast a cowardly villain or a weedy neurotic, he calls on me."

On opening night, one critic blasted Bogie, calling him "an oily insect, who gets Sullavan drunk and instructs her, through many long and monotonous kisses, in what he refers to as 'the joys of propinquity.'" Brooks Atkinson found the play "astonishingly insignificant" and claimed, rather enigmatically, that "Bogart plays the wastrel in his usual style."

Mary Orr, an actress/writer whose short story, The Story of Eve, would eventually evolve into All About Eve, Bette Davis's most famous movie, also appeared in Chrysalis.

"While the plumbing was being fixed, I had to share a dressing room with Sullavan," Orr later recalled. "What a bitch! She claimed she was going to seduce Bogie that weekend. Sullavan told me, 'He's become a friend of Henry, and I always make it a point to seduce Henry's friends, especially James Stewart. Of course, in the case of Stewart, Henry does far more seducing of him than I do. My husband tries to make it with women, but he's basically a faggot.'"

One night, Sullavan asked Bogie to walk her home, and he reluctantly escorted her. She complained to him that she'd appeared in four Broadway flops in a row. "But I got great reviews," she hastened to add.

She invited him up for some "bootleg hootch," and he readily accepted. He warned her, however, that the U.S. government was deliberately poisoning some bootleg liquor to frighten the public away from alcohol.

She was angry that Fonda had gone off with James Stewart that night. "I can't be tied down to one man, especially a husband that's inadequate."

Before the night ended, Sullavan seduced Bogie. Shortly thereafter, she told Mary Orr, "Bogie's okay in bed. I mean, I've had better. But he's got the proper technique. He makes sure the woman is satisfied before he pulls off her."

Later, Bogie told Osgood Perkins that Sullavan was "one of the Red Hot Dames of 1932 Broadway."

Bogie's next Broadway play was a romantic comedy set in Paris, Our Wife. This time, Rose Hobart was the star, with Bogie playing her lover.

A stunning-looking actress, Hobart evoked Marlene Dietrich in appearance and dress. When on occasion Bogie took her out, fans often came up to her table, asking, "Miss Dietrich, may I have your autograph?" She always obliged, signing, "Love, Marlene."

Born into a family of musicians, Hobart had starred opposite Fredric March in his legendary Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1932). Although he found her an attractive woman, Bogie did not put any moves on her, because the talk of Broadway was that she was involved in a torrid lesbian romance with a big Broadway star, Eva Le Gallienne.

Regrettably, Our Wife opened at Manhattan's Booth Theatre on March 2, 1933, the day President Franklin D. Roosevelt declared an emergency bank holiday. Only ten people showed up, each a member of the press. One newsman wrote that the play "is tamely acted and meagerly directed," a blow against Edward Clarke Lilley who helmed it.

Bogie earned fifty-six dollars the first week of the show. Even though the play lasted for twenty performances, the producers ran out of money and couldn't write any more checks after that.

After that, Bogie played a supporting stage role in an Italian comedy, The Mask and the Face, which opened on May 8, 1933. Produced by the Guild Theatre, it ran for forty performances. The farce was by Luigi Chiarelli as translated by W. Somerset Maugham. It had first been performed in 1916.

The play also starred Shirley Booth with whom Bogie had had a brief fling back in 1924 during the Broadway production of Hell's Bells. The two former lovers worked well together, never mentioning their previous tryst.

Judith Anderson

During rehearsals for The Mask and the Face, Bogie came into conflict with the formidable Australia-born lesbian, Judith Anderson. She would make a name for herself playing cold, imperious, or sinister women. When he met her, Anderson was years away from her Oscar-nominated performance as the lesbian housekeeper, Mrs. Danvers, in Rebecca with Joan Fontaine. Exasperated during rehearsals when Bogie had not memorized his dialogue, she made a& suggestion, "You should seek another profession, perhaps ladling soup to the poor in the breadlines."

The cast also included Leo G. Carroll, who would later appear with Bogie in both All Through the Night and We're No Angels.

Critics referred to the The Mask and the Face as both "a dubious graveyard lark" and "a grisly farce." Bogie felt lucky that no reviewer mentioned him.

When he thought he'd never see his mug on a movie screen again, a call came in from director Chester Erskine, who was casting Midnight (1934) to be distributed by Universal. There was a small role in it for Bogie, and he gladly accepted when he heard it was to be filmed in New York and not on the West Coast. He was familiar with Midnight 's star, Sidney Fox, with whom he and Bette Davis had appeared in Bad Sister.

This 80-minute film, which also co-starred Henry Hull, would mark Bogie's first appearance on the screen as a gangster.

In the wake of Midnight, Bogie returned to the stage once again for a less-than-memorable role in Invitation to a Murder.

This play, a melodrama in three acts by Rufus King, opened on May 17, 1934 at Broadway's Masque Theatre, running for only thirty-seven performances.

Bogie played Horatio Channing, a member of a southern California family whose fortune was created by piracy. It was an old-fashioned mystery melodrama, featuring "the usual suspects"—trapdoors, ghosts, and all the other clichés. Critic Pollyanna Garland wrote, "Humphrey Bogart Humphrey-Bogart's his way through the role." The New York Post referred to it as "high-voltage trash."

This was Bogie's first stage interpretation of a villain, a part he later referred to as "a gruesome little mishap."

Sidney Fox with Humphrey Bogart in Midnight (1934)

In this murder mystery, Gale Sondergaard was the star, with support from Jane Seymour and veteran character actor Walter Abel.

Bogie admired Sondergaard, who would go on to a Hollywood career as one of the era's most formidable bad women. She became the first winner in the newly established Best Supporting Actress category in the lavish costume picture, Anthony Adverse (1936). Her promising career was later derailed when she became one of filmdom's& blacklist victims during the Red Scare of the Joseph McCarthy era.

Even though Bogie did not impress the critics in this play, he did attract the attention of Arthur Hopkins, the film's producer and director. A year later, when it came time to cast The Petrified Forest, Hopkins would remember Bogie's performance in this otherwise forgotten play.

When Bogie couldn't find work as an actor, he was offered a job as a chess player at the sleazy Sportsland on Sixth Avenue in Manhattan's West Forties. He would sit in the window, taking on any member of the public who wanted to challenge him, for a fee of fifty cents, to a game of chess.

When he saved up enough money, he would go over to the "21" for a drink. The owners liked him and let him run up a big tab, which he could not pay until he was cast on stage in The Petrified Forest in 1935.

In September of 1934, Mary Philips appeared at the Sportsland Arcade to interrupt Bogie's chess game. She ran up to him. Her message was brief. "Belmont is dying."

At the hospital, Bogie stayed in the same room with Dr. Bogart, watching his life wane. He lived for another forty-eight hours, dying in his son's arms at Manhattan's Hospital for the Ruptured and Crippled on September 8, 1934, at the age of 67.

Belmont expressed no particularly articulate last words. He was unable to speak. However, he did seem to hear his son's last words to him. "I love you, Father." Bogie would tell Mary, "I should have told him that years ago, but I never could."

There was no one to accompany Bogie to Fresh Pond Crematory in Long Island. Mary was auditioning for a Broadway show, and Maud made it clear that she found the idea of cremation, as requested by her husband, "quite ghastly."

After his father was buried, Bogie returned to Maud's apartment. She was going through his papers. "He left $10,000 in debts and $35,000 in uncollected doctor's fees."

She handed him his father's old-fashioned ruby ring. He would wear it until his death, and it can be seen in his films over the years. He told Maud that as a point of honor, he would work to pay off the entire $10,000.

"Then I suggest you find some more profitable line of work than the stage and or B-list movies that no one wants to see."

After a string of failures, with a career going nowhere, the "chess player, sometimes actor," as he called himself, had a change of luck. He was plucked from oblivion. Had fortune not shone on him— finally —he'd have joined the hundreds of actors, male and female, who enjoyed brief fame in the Silents or had their fifteen minutes of fame in the Talkies during the 30s.

"I would have become a footnote in the history of the theater or the movies," he said. "I would make it as a footnote if that history were summed up in ten volumes. If only one volume, I would have been such an insignificant flea, I would not even have made it as a footnote."

When its producer and director Arthur Hopkins asked Bogie to audition for the coveted role of Duke Mantee in The Petrified Forest, Bogie renewed his friendship with Robert Sherwood, who wrote the play. Sherwood actually didn't want him to play Duke, preferring instead that he be cast in another role. Hopkins stood his ground, however.

At Bogie's audition sat Leslie Howard, the English actor, who was to become his friend. Howard agreed with Hopkins. Bogie would be perfect for the part.

After the audition, Sherwood changed his point of view. In The Worlds of Robert E. Sherwood, John Mason Brown wrote, "He thought of more than Bogart's masculinity. He thought of his driven power. His anguished eyes, dark eyes, the puffs of pain beneath them, and the dangerous despair which lined his face."

The character of Duke Mantee was inspired mainly by bank robber John Dillinger. Bogie actually resembled the real-life Dillinger.

Cast as an escaped convict, Bogie threw himself into the role and tried to live up to Sherwood's description of the character. "He is well built but stoop shouldered, with a vaguely thoughtful, saturnine face. He is about thirty-five and, if he hadn't elected to take up banditry, he might have been a fine left-fielder. He is unmistakably doomed."

During the course of the play, Duke holds its main characters hostage, including Leslie Howard, who played Squier, the romantic intellectual who believes that "my ilk" is becoming as ossified as the petrified forest in the Arizona Desert. Hostages are held at the Black Mesa Bar-B-Q.

Preview audiences in Hartford gasped at their view of the "new" Bogart. He was no longer a sprig with a tennis racket, but a gangster with a prison pallor and a three-day growth of beard.

Opening on Broadway at the Broadhurst Theater on January 7, 1935, The Petrified Forest starred Leslie Howard and Peggy Conklin, who portrayed Gabrielle Maple, the waitress heroine.

At last, praise came from Brooks Atkinson of The New York Times, who asserted that Bogie "does the best work of his career as the motorized gorilla."

In a strange coincidence, Kenneth MacKenna had migrated back to New York to pursue his own luck on Broadway. Ironically, he was eventually hired as Leslie Howard's understudy in the Broadway version of The Petrified Forest.

Bogie's marriage to Mary Philips continued dysfunctionally, as each pursued his or her respective career in the theater. It was increasingly obvious that their link was held together by a not very sticky glue.

One late afternoon, Bogie told Mary that he was going to stay in the Broadway area for the three hours leading up to the show and wouldn't return home until after curtain.

But when he discovered that he'd either lost or misplaced his wallet, he called her to see if it were left in the apartment. There was no answer, so he made his way back to their apartment. On the floor of the living room, Kenneth was screwing his wife.

Bogie took one look at the coupling and then shouted into the living room. "Carry on, guys. Don't let me stop you." Slamming the door on his way out, he headed back to the theater.

At the theater, he reported the details of the seduction scene he'd just witnessed to Leslie Howard.

Right before the curtain went up that night on The Petrified Forest, Bogie received devastating news.

On September 26, 1935, his long-time best friend, Bill Brady Jr., had burned alive while drunk in his country cabin at Colts Neck, New Jersey when the building caught on fire. Ironically, Bogie had been invited to spend that weekend with Bill in his bungalow. “I could have been burned to death along with Bill,” he said.

Unusual for him, Bogie burst into hysterical sobs. Howard was going to ask his understudy to go on in Bogie’s place. But he pulled himself together in time to face the audience. Howard later asserted that “Bogart gave the best performance of his career.”

At Bill’s funeral, Bogie stood next to his mentor and long-time friend, Bill Brady Sr. He was now seventy-one years old. The two men embraced, as both of them sobbed for their loss.

Mrs. Brady came up and embraced Bogie. Before leaving that day. Mr. Brady turned to Bogie. “I always knew you’d be a great actor. I was the first to believe in you. I wish to see you return to Hollywood and make your greatest films.”

Mr. Brady’s wish came true. He sat through a showing of Casablanca three times. He saw each and every film Bogie made until 1950, when he died at the age of eighty-six.

With all the rave notices the Broadway version of The Petrified Forest received, it was only natural for Hollywood to take notice. Agents for Warner Brothers purchased film rights for the play, with the contractual obligation to cast Leslie Howard in the lead.

In spite of the rave notices generated by his performances in the play, Bogie was not rewarded with a firm contract to play Duke Mantee in the film. Instead, Warner Brothers took an “option” on his services, paying him a small fee to either cast him or not cast him, according to their perceptions and whims, into the movie role. “I was left dangling in the wind,” Bogie later said. “Am I getting the part or not?” he kept asking Mary. “According to this god damn option deal,” Mary told him, “they can drop you at the last minute and bring in George Raft or Edward G. Robinson. Your option deal means shit.”

The play could have run for at least another three or four months but Howard had grown tired of the part. He also nixed a road tour, feeling that an extension might hurt the eventual box office receipts of the movie. Thanks to his role as one of the play’s co-producers, along with Gilbert Miller, Howard had such power, and he ordered that the final curtain come down after 181 performances.

During the run of The Petrified Forest, Bogie had paid off all of Belmont’s debts, and still had two thousand dollars left in the bank.

Since he wanted to save his bankroll, he looked for a job in summer stock. Based on the reputation he’d built on Broadway, he was hired after only two weeks’ search, signing a commitment for a series of performances with Will Seabury’s Repertory Theatre Company in Skowhegan, Maine.

In Skowhegan, in 1935, it was understood that he would appear that summer as a character within three separate plays.

The first was entitled The Stag at Bay, a cloak-and-dagger melodrama about the theft of a formula for poison gas. In it he also starred with Keenan Wynn, whom he would often encounter in later years in Hollywood. Keenen was usually seen in the company of Hollywood star Van Johnson, his long-time lover.

Ceiling Zero came next. A drama by Frank Wead, it was said to be the first play ever produced revolving around the life of a commercial airport as its theme. It had starred Osgood Perkins when it was first produced on Broadway in 1935. Bogie’s appearance in this summer stock production went unnoticed. But the Wead drama had legs. Warner Brothers optioned it for its 1936 film, also called Ceiling Zero, but Bogie wasn’t offered any role, the honors going to James Cagney and Pat O’Brien. Just a few years later, in 1941, Warners remade it. Re-titled International Squadron, the lead went to the up-and-coming Ronald Reagan.

For his adieu to summer stock and to the stage in general, Bogie found himself cast opposite the notorious fan dancer, Sally Rand, in Rain. Far more famous as a coyly erotic dancer than as an actress, Sally was noted for her flirtatious ostrich feather dance and her balloon bubble dance.

It was Cecil B. DeMille who had assigned her the name "Sally Rand" years before, back when the now-aging star had first appeared in silent films. DeMille took what became her surname from the Rand McNally Atlas.

Rand became infamous throughout America thanks to the 1933 Chicago World's Fair, an event also entitled Century of Progress. She was arrested four times in the course of a single day, charged with "indecent exposure" while imitating a provocatively dressed impersonation of Lady Godiva riding a white horse down the streets of the city.

When she met Bogie, he found her a "stunner," as he later told his pals at Tony's in New York. At the time she was described as a "diminutive (5' 1") damsel with a knockout (35-22-35) figure."

She told Bogie she was tired of burlesque and that "the stage is my destiny."

"It's my destiny, too, when I can find a job that pays at least fifty bucks a week."

Rand had recently agreed to play W. Somerset Maugham's prostitute, Sadie Thompson, in his play Rain. A 1928 silent film entitled Sadie Thompson had starred Gloria Swanson. In 1935, Tallulah Bankhead had brought the character to Broadway in a revival.

Actually Rain was first seen on Broadway in 1922, starring the legendary Jeanne Eagels in a box office success. June Havoc, sister of Gypsy Rose Lee, the stripper, starred in a 1944 Broadway musical, Sadie Thompson. In 1932, Joan Crawford appeared in the film version. In 1953 Rain would be taken out of mothballs, the character interpreted once again by Rita Hayworth in the film Miss Sadie Thompson.

What happened that summer between Bogie and Rand remains a mystery. When he returned to New York, Bogie told his cronies that he had seduced her. "She was my steady piece up in Maine." Later, Rand denied that she'd had an affair with him. Simultaneously, however, she claimed that the impotent Paul Bern, husband of Jean Harlow, was "great in bed." So much for her honesty in reporting.

As far as it's known, there has been only one printed romantic link between Bogie and Rand. A long-ago article claimed, "After the curtain went down on Rain, the real action began with the young actor Humphrey Bogart and the aging Sally Rand, the famous fan dancer."

Even that was wrong. Bogie was born in 1899, Rand in 1904.

After his immersion in Maine's world of summer stock, Bogie returned to New York City and Mary. She did not ask him what he'd done for private pleasures during his absence. And he chose not to grill her either.

Despite his many previous successes on Broadway the previous season, there were no immediate job offerings. On the slim chance that Jack Warner might take up his option and cast him as Duke Mantee, Bogie decided to take the train to the West Coast.

He asked Mary to go with him. She adamantly refused, devoting her attention instead to starring in a Broadway play, A Touch of Brimstone. "My career's about to take off—it's getting hotter and hotter," she told him. "What would I do in Hollywood? Sit around for three weeks waiting for you to finish the shoot? That is, if you even get the role."

Bogie decided to take the train by himself. Incidentally, Mary's co-star was none other than Roland Young. Still sexually involved with Kenneth, she resumed her affair with Young—and "his cheating heart," as she put it.

As Bogie entered the Garden of Allah Hotel in Hollywood, he picked up a copy of Variety. Later, by the pool, he read that Edward G. Robinson, a Warner Brothers contract player, had been signed to play Duke Mantee in the film version of The Petrified Forest.

Bogie was crestfallen and got horribly drunk that night. Leslie Howard had been vacationing in Scotland when he received a cable from Bogie. “Robinson set to play Duke Mantee. Help me!”

Immediately Howard notified Warner Brothers that if Bogie could not retain the role, that he was also pulling out of the cast. Jack Warner caved in.

Even with Howard as his champion, Bogie still had to get involved in more than a dozen screen tests before he was finally signed to the part.

Bogie was given only a three-week contract at $750 per week. This was the same wage he’d been paid in 1932. Bette Davis agreed to get involved with the film for $9,000, Howard taking in $62,500.

On the first day of shooting, Bogie once again encountered Bette Davis, and once again, previous intimacies seemed to have been forgotten, at least by her.

Smoking a cigarette, she came right up to him and didn’t welcome him to the studio. “I was rather looking forward to working with Eddie,” she said, referring, of course, to Edward G. Robinson. “I think he would have made a great Duke Mantee.”

“What am I?” he asked. “Chopped liver?”

“The trouble with you, Bogart, is that you cannot portray menace on the screen,” she said, blowing smoke in his face.

“Since I last saw you, I’ve learned menace.”

She looked at him skeptically. “That’s good,” she said in a voice already famous to movie audiences.

She told Bogie, “Leslie and I really didn’t get along when we made Of Human Bondage (1934). But now he’s very affectionate. I can show you my arms and shoulders.” She pulled back her dress to reveal bite marks across her skin. “At times I think he’s a dog. Did you know that he actually enjoys biting women?”

“As you well know, I prefer to plow into them instead.”

“No, I don’t know that,” she said with an imperial air. “You see, I’ve forgotten all about that.”

Her acknowledgment of these bites and nibbles was an odd admission from Bette. She told several friends, “Did you know that Leslie screwed every female star on every movie he was ever in, with the exception of me? I told him that I was not going to be plastered on the end of a list of his conquests.” Of course, what Bette sometimes said and what she did were two different things.

Bogart as Duke Mantee in The Petrified Forest

The director of The Petrified Forest was Archie Mayo, who on film more or less shot the play as it had been presented on Broadway. He detested “that limey bastard,” Leslie Howard, but had praise for Bogie.

With Bette Davis, Mayo established an uneasy truce, having directed her in Bordertown in 1935. “I believe in giving that bitch wide berth,” Mayo told Bogie.

Ironically, both Bogie and Mayo would work together again on the film, They Drive by Night, in 1940, a movie that was inspired by Davis’ Bordertown.

“Davis and Howard had egos bigger than their talents,” he said. “Actually, Bogie was the only actor in a starring part in the film that did what I asked him to do. Later, of course, he became an S.O.B.”

Mayo said, “Bette seemed pissed off throughout the movie. She constantly complained that she was playing some little field mouse while Howard and Bogie were ‘eating up the scenery.’ She said she longed for a strong part like the one she’d played in Of Human Bondage with Leslie Howard.”

At the end of the shoot, Bogie gave Howard his warmest embrace, thanking him for all his support. The two actors agreed to “become friends for life,” although for Howard, that would be defined as only a few short years to& come.

The Petrified Forest

Before saying goodbye to Leslie Howard on the set of The Petrified Forest, Bogie and his mentor had made a vow. Bogie agreed to follow Howard’s precedent and seduce each of his upcoming leading ladies. What he didn’t know was that he’d occasionally be cast opposite a lesbian. These actresses were certainly beautiful and desirable, but many of them preferred not to share their charms with men.

Bogie would later name his second child Leslie in honor of Howard, who had given him his first big break. A baby daughter was born to Bogie and his fourth wife, Lauren Bacall, on August 23, 1952. Time magazine reported that the six-pound, five-ounce baby girl was a boy. But such was not the case.

Movie critics and fellow stars agreed that no man in the history of movies had turned the act of smoking a cigarette into such high drama. The juvenile sprig had become a Hollywood tough guy.

In spite of rave reviews, Jack Warner wasn’t all that impressed. He didn’t think Bogie had broad appeal.

At the time, Warner Brothers was in the throes of releasing a wave of& gangster films, and the studio decided that Bogie would be in a lot of them. There were, in fact, some twenty-nine films released in the five-year span between The Petrified Forest (1936), and High Sierra ( 1941). Often he played a jailbird. He died in eight of them, once in an electric chair and once by means of a hangman’s noose.

Nine days after shooting on Petrified Forest ended in 1936, Jack Warner signed a forty-week contract with Bogie for $550 per week. In signing the contract, Bogie agreed not to “offend the community or ridicule public morals or decency.”

The contract contained a complicated series of options, with the understanding that if all of them were activated before the end of 1941, Bogie conceivably could make as much as $1,750 a week.

The moment he signed the contract, Bogie became a tenant along what the studio referred to as “Murderer’s Row.” Fellow residents included Edward G. Robinson, James Cagney, George Raft, Paul Muni, and John Garfield.

Eventually, Bogie became beloved by the press because he was one of the few actors in Hollywood who spoke what he felt. “Everybody else out here is hiding behind some fake image,” he said. “Nobody likes me on sight. There must be something about the tone of my voice, or this arrogant face—something that antagonizes everybody. I can’t even get into a mild discussion that doesn’t turn into an argument.”

Meanwhile, Mary’s star as a Broadway actress had dimmed, her latest play not attracting the audience that its backers had anticipated. After it closed after ninety-six performances, there were no more offers. She accepted her husband’s invitation to take the train to Los Angeles.

Once there, she spent Christmas of 1935 at the Château Elysée, where they celebrated Bogie’s birthday. Her first question upon arrival was, “Which stars have you fucked?”

“No one! I’ve been celibate. How about you?”

“Just the usual suspects,” she said frankly. By that, he knew that she meant Roland Young and Kenneth MacKenna.

Bogie seemed to want to assert his manhood now that he was a contract player, and she was an out-of-work actress. Before, he’d been married to an actress more famous than himself. After The Petrified Forest opened to big box office, “I started to clank my balls,” he told Spencer Tracy.

A few weeks later, Mary received an offer to return to Broadway to star in The Postman Always Rings Twice, adapted from the James M. Cain novel. The property was considered too hot, too steamy for Hollywood. Later it would become one of Lana Turner’s most sensational movies. Mary had been cast opposite Richard Barthelmess, the silent screen star who would be making his Broadway debut.

Eager to “return to glory,” as she put it, she told her husband that she could never settle down, become a housewife, and have children. “I’m afraid, dear, that if that is what you want, you should not have married a Broadway star.”

Long after The Petrified Forest was distributed and screened around the world, the drama still had “legs.” Bogie himself would appear in future manifestations of this play.

In years to come, Bogie contracted to perform in a radio version of The Petrified Forest. Produced by the Screen Guild Theater, it was aired on January 7, 1940, starring himself alongside Joan Bennett and Tyrone Power.

The Petrified Forest would also be remade in 1944 as a retitled film called Escape in the Desert. This was a second-rate movie, with Philip Dorn in the Leslie Howard role. The gangster role of Bogie was reconfigured into that of an escaped Nazi POW, with Helmut Dantine taking the part.

In a touch of irony, The Petrified Forest would be performed again on live television in 1955, with a cast of Bogie and Henry Fonda. The Bette Davis role was played by a young actress named Lauren Bacall.

When& Hollywood& director William McGann called Bogie to tell him that he had been cast as the lead in a 1936 film Two Against the World, he was at first delighted. But delight turned to disappointment when he learned that he was actually making a B picture reprise of a five-year-old A-list film, Edward G. Robinson’s Five Star Final, first released in 1931.

Two Against the World (1936)

The original 1931 version of Five Star Final had been based on a play by Louis Weitzenkorn. But in Bogie's recycled and "watered down" version, scripter Michael Jacoby wrote a much weaker role for Bogie, a role utterly lacking any of Robinson's "fire" from the the original film The setting was switched as well: What had been a newspaper office in the original, became a radio station in Bogie's version. As part of the plot motivation, the radio station is hell bent on increasing the number of its listeners by any means it can conjure. Bogie never liked his role.

After Bogie rehearsed his first scene under the scrutiny of director McGann, he was not impressed. "The fucker spent more time watching the clock than in directing me."

Even though the director was aware of his schedule's time restraints, it was still not enough to appease top management.

Hal Wallis was the studio's chief honcho, but Bogie's boss was Bryan Foy, "The Keeper of the Bs," as he was known on the Warners lot. Bryan was the eldest son of vaudeville star Eddie Foy, and he had appeared on stage with his father as one of "The Seven Little Foys." From 1924 to 1963, he produced 214 films, one of which was the distinguished Guadalcanal Diary in 1943.

The first time Bogie met Foy, he rushed onto the set accusing McGann of running overtime and over budget. McGann protested that he had forty more pages to shoot. Foy grabbed the shooting script from him and, without reading it, ripped out twenty pages. Before storming off the set, he said, "Now bring this stinker in on time . . . or else!"

That's why Two Against the World ran for only sixty-four minutes.

Later, while analyzing that period of his life, Bogie claimed that in a lot of films during the late 1930s, "I was assigned one of two different types of leading ladies—either a star who'd arrived in Hollywood via the casting couch, or else a card-carrying lesbian."

When he met Beverly Roberts, his Two Against the World co-star from the latter of those two categories, he immediately recognized her as "one of the boys," from the latter of those two categories. Bogie liked this "tough-talking broad."

Roberts had been spotted singing in a New York City nightclub by a Warner Brothers talent agent and sent to Hollywood to appear with Al Jolson in the 1936 film, The Singing Kid, which was followed by her star part with Bogie.

She was signed on at Warner Brothers the same day Errol Flynn became a member of the troupe. Flynn met her that day and also became friends with her. Flynn later told Bogie, "Beverly and I have a lot in common. We both know how to take care of a woman."

Roberts became known for playing "tough-edged dames" on the Warner lot, mainly potboilers. In one film she played it particularly butch during her portrayal of a woman who's running a lumber camp. In another movie, she operated a fleet of buses. "I was women's lib before the term was invented," she said.

Later, Bogie asserted that “Beverly Roberts had more cojones than I did.”

When Roberts met actress Wynne Gibson during their filming of the 1938 feature film, Flirting with Fate, she met “the love of my life,” as she told Bogie. She meant that.

Gibson herself was one of the “lovelies” who appeared in the 1930s, making mainly B movies between 1929 and 1956. Roberts and Gibson would live together until Gibson’s death in 1987.

Also cast in Two Against the World was an actor named Carlyle Moore, Jr. Bogie in the future would appear with the same actor in both Bullets or Ballots and in China Clipper.

“The last time I encountered this Moore kid, sometime in the late 1930s, all he could talk about was ‘Ronald Reagan, Ronald Reagan, Ronald Reagan—he’s the handsomest man in Hollywood. He’s got a great physique, and he’s not stuck up at all. He’s the nicest guy.’ I let him blabber on. Moore did end up in Reagan’s Knute Rockne — All American. On Moore’s part, I think it was more than puppy love. Good luck to that kid if he thought he was going to get Reagan out of his pants.”

When Two Against the World was released, none of the cast, including Bogie himself, was pleased with the way the film had been ruthlessly shortened. Beverly Roberts and Carlyle Moore Jr. were among those who complained about how their roles had been cut.

Two Against the World was such a bad picture that Jack Warner delayed its release for months. “We’ll release it one day when every newspaper in America is on strike,” the studio chief said. “That way, no one will review it.

When the film was finally released, critics slammed it. For television, the movie was more temptingly re-titled One Fatal Hour. Today, Two Against the World is recommended “Only for diehard Bogie fans.”

As author Jeffrey Meyers put it, Bogie in the mid-Thirties began a new phase of his career where he’d be “slapped, muddied, shaken, submerged and drenched; bitten, choked, cut, thrown, singed and burned.”

He reported early to work to a studio, Warner Brothers, that evoked a prison, with tough security guards at the gate. When he first arrived, he didn’t even own a car, so he showed up at the gate in a taxi.

His packed lunch was always the same every day—two cheese and tomato sandwiches, one hard-boiled egg, and a bottle of beer which he had to drink warm.

Unlike plush Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Warner Brothers was cost-conscious. In his first year under contract, Bogie would make four films back to back for release in 1936. Each was a B picture, with a minor director. Shooting schedules were tight, sometimes with as little as three weeks allotted.

Bogie often regretted that he’d arrived in Hollywood after the self-regulating Production Code came into effect on July 15, 1934. Strictly forbidden was subject matter which included “profanity, nudity, drug trafficking, sex perversion, white slavery, miscegenation, sex hygiene and venereal diseases, scenes of actual childbirth, children’s sex organs, ridicule of the clergy, and offenses against a nation, race, or creed.”

Edward G. Robinson with Bogart, and Barton MacLane

Jack Warner was terribly disappointed with Bogie's performance in Two Against the World, but decided to give him another chance since he already had him under contract. "Cast him in Bullets or Ballots," he ordered Bryan Foy. "Make Edward G. Robinson the star and give Bogart fourth billing. That way, no one will notice the fucker. Throw in Joan Blondell for the floozy sex appeal."

Bullets or Ballots marked the first picture Bogie made with Robinson, but it was the fourth picture in which he was cast opposite Joan.

Joan Blondell had heard that this hardboiled drama had encountered problems with the Production Code. Joseph Breen, the censor, sent Jack Warner a warning, suggesting that Bullets or Ballots was the kind of movie we had "agreed not to make."

Joan introduced Bogie to their director, William Keighley, who had helmed her in Penny Arcade. This Philadelphian in Bullets or Ballots created a role model of the kind of fast-paced, tightly made film of which Warners would specialize in the next few years.

Bogie never liked phonies, and he was put off by what he viewed as the director's "continental manners," perhaps acquired during his tenure on Broadway in the early 20s.

Whenever his name came up in the future, Bogie would mock him, mainly when he cast James Cagney as the lead in the Technicolor epic, The Adventures of Robin Hood (1938). Of course, Keighley came to his senses and later cast Errol Flynn instead. Keightly himself was replaced by Michael Curtiz when Robin Hood, Warner's most expensive film of all time fell behind in production.

Bullets or Ballots marked the first of several films Bogie would shoot with Barton MacLane, a native of South Carolina. When directors wanted a furrow-browed tough guy, MacLane was on call. Cameras would move in on his squinty eyes and tightly clamped mouth. He seemed to pose a menace to whomever he encountered.

MacLane's character was modeled on Dutch Schultz, the notorious gangster and main patron of Polly Adler, America's most famous madam.

One afternoon between filming, on a particularly hot day, MacLane went to his dressing room and brought back a violin, and played it for Joan and Bogie.

“Not bad, not bad at all,” Bogie said. “For my next party, I’ll hire you for a sawbuck.”

Bogie was cast as “Bugs” Fenner a mobster. Before the film ends, he will kill a crusader against vice; MacLane’s character, and finally Johnny Blake (Robinson). In the final reel, Robinson, wounded by Bogie, finally guns him down.

When Bogie came up to greet Robinson, the shorter man studied him skeptically. Before their careers were over, they would make five films together, with Bogie eventually assuming the lead in Key Largo (1948). “I keep reading that you created the movie gangster. I guess you didn’t see Little Caesar. I do believe that I have become the prototypical movie mobster, and let’s get that straight. Did you hear my dying line?”

To Bogie’s astonishment, he delivered it again. “Mother of Mercy, is this the end of Roco Bandello?”

Born in Bucharest, Rumania, Robinson was no gangster, but a Renaissance man of great cultivation, a devotee of art and music. He would later collect some $3 million worth of art. At first he didn’t want to go to Hollywood, holding movies in disdain, preferring the stage. But after he hit the jackpot as the vicious gang leader in Little Caesar, he thought he could put up with all those orange and palm trees after all.

In spite of his charm, Bogie remained leery of him. “Let’s face it:& Robinson is the guy to beat.”

This good, tough gangster film more or less holds up today. In it, Robinson leaves the police force to crack a city-wide mob run by MacLane.

On April 17, 1939, Bogie signed with the Lux Radio Theater to broadcast a one-hour radio play of Bullets or Ballots. Both Robinson and Bogie reprised their roles, but Mary Astor stood in for Joan Blondell.

After his watching himself in his latest film, Bogie said, “I owe it all to Clark Gable with those big ears. Dames go crazy over him. He paved the way for all of us with ugly mugs—Robinson, James Cagney, and my dear friend Spencer Tracy.”

With Mary still in New York, Bogie resumed his on-again, off-again affair with Joan. She told him she was tired of these dumb, wise-cracking roles and wanted to make it in drama. He worked closely with her and helped her through her scenes. She played a shady Harlem nightclub owner and gave an admirable performance when stacked against Bogie and Robinson.

When Bogie saw how Joan’s household was being run, he said, “Hot damn, woman. You’ve become a movie star at last. Do you need someone to look after your fan mail?”

“Joan was at the peak of her beauty, during the making of this film,” Bogie said. “In her wardrobe, she became a fucking garden of flowers. I didn’t know whether to water her or not. In spite of Dick Powell beating down her door, she threw me a few mercy fucks so I wouldn’t be so tense.”

After Bullets or Ballots, Bogie was cast as the fourth lead in China Clipper, a 1936 release from Warners directed by Ray Enright. Bogie played Hap Stuart, a daredevil pilot and wartime buddy of Pat O’Brien, who had been cast as the lead. The screenplay by Frank Wead focused on the creation of the famous China Clipper, the plane that made the first passenger run from San Francisco to the Orient. The plot was inspired by Eddie Rickenbacker, the World War I aviation hero who went into the commercial flying business, a career move evocative of Howard Hughes.

Once again, Bogie was cast with Beverly Roberts, who played the female lead.

“We spent a lot of time in my dressing room having a drink,” he said. “Beverly could hold her liquor as well as I could. I told her that I hope in the future we wouldn’t compete for the same dames.”

Ross Alexander and Marie Wilson rounded out the cast. Also appearing in the movie was Wayne Morris, who would go on to greater glory, if that was what it could be called. In China Clipper, he had only a bit part.

The son of Irish immigrants, with an ugly mug, O'Brien was an unlikely candidate to become a leading movie star in the 1930s. A friend of both James Cagney and Spencer Tracy, he never bonded as well with Bogie, although they worked together fairly smoothly.

Bogie called him "Hollywood's walking embodiment of Ireland." He once studied to become a Roman Catholic priest, but gave that up, although he often performed as "Father This" or "Father That" in films. If not a priest, he wore a cop's badge in movies. Politically, O'Brien and Bogie were oceans apart. Because of his extreme Right Wing views, Bogie called him "a near Nazi."

In the role of Dave Logan, Barton MacLane played a character inspired by Charles Lindbergh's conquest of the Atlantic on his history-making flight to Paris. In the movie, Logan plans a trans-Pacific airline.

In her usual "Dumb Dora" role, Marie Wilson pursued Ross Alexander. Bogie wasn't living up to Leslie Howard's challenge of seducing all his leading ladies. He found the well-stacked Wilson a sexy number with her ultra-blonde locks, her generous mouth, and her great big eyes.

Wilson had appeared in Satan Met a Lady (1936), starring Bette Davis. This was the second film adaptation of the detective novel, The Maltese Falcon. Davis would later say, "Marilyn Monroe's on-screen persona was a complete rip-off of Marie Wilson." Wilson would go on to gain national prominence with her hit interpretation of My Friend Irma on radio, TV, and film.

Wilson only looked innocent on the screen. In private she wasn't adverse to going to bed with a nice-looking man. Bogie took her out on two dates,& and perhaps he scored. He obviously told Leslie Howard, but didn't share much information with any of his pals.

At long last Bogie came face to face with Ross Alexander, a young actor whose reputation had preceded him. Bogie already resented him for getting star billing over him as the third lead.

Standing 6' 1", he was hailed as the most promising young player at Warner Brothers. With his wavy brown hair and penetrating eyes, the Brooklyn-born actor seemed ideal for those romantic juvenile roles.

Although he'd never met Alexander, he was well known on Broadway. He was what Bogie called a "star fucker" and had seduced several famous actors or directors. He'd been the kept boy of a series of wealthy men, including the renowned John Golden, age 54, producer, playwright, actor, and songwriter.

Alexander was tormented about his homosexuality and tried to conceal it by marrying or else pursuing female stars. His marriage to Aleta Friele in 1934 had ended disastrously. In 1935, despondent over her marriage and career as an actress, she killed herself with a .22 rifle outside the Hollywood home she shared with her husband.

Alexander was also known to many of Bogie's friends or acquaintances, notably Henry Fonda. In fact, other than James Stewart, Alexander was Fonda's best friend. The two actors had met when performing in summer stock together, and on and off had lived together. On the Warners lot, the rumor was that they had been lovers.

It was said that Alexander had caught Fonda on the rebound while still carrying a torch for his former wife, Margaret Sullavan. "I'll always be grateful to Ross Alexander," Fonda said. "He restored my confidence in myself as a man after Margaret de-balled me."

Ross Alexander

"Ideal for those romantic juvenile roles"

Alexander was often photographed with Errol Flynn and his wife, Lili Damita, at swank Tinseltown soirees. The Flynn/Alexander affair intensified when Alexander was cast in Flynn's film, Captain Blood.

When Bette Davis heard that Bogie had been cast with Alexander in China Clipper, she called Bogie and reported an alarming story.

According to Davis, Alexander had developed an obsession about her. Although married, he& kept bombarding her with love letters. "He's not really in love with me," Davis said. "I heard he really wants both of us to divorce our spouses and marry each other. I am told he thinks I'm going to become queen of the Warners lot, and that I'll let him be my co-star in all my future movies."

"Jack Warner may have something to say about that," Bogie told her.

To confirm what Davis had said, Alexander asked Bogie to use his friendship with Davis to advance the actor's cause. "I desperately want to get cast in her next movie," he said. "We'll have a love scene together. Once I get her in my arms, I know she'll respond like a wildcat."

"Probably so," Bogie said. "Claws and all. That's Bette."

Every day a love letter was slipped under Bette's door. She didn't bother reading them, tossing them in the wastepaper basket.

When Davis was filming Satan Met a Lady, her husband, Ham Nelson, arrived at the studio for a rare visit. Attached to the door to her dressing room was one of Alexander's latest letters to Davis. It was addressed in large letters "TO MY BELOVED ONE, BETTE." Nelson ripped it off the door, opened it, and read it.

Storming into his wife's dressing room, Nelson confronted Davis, accusing her of having an affair with the young actor.

"That queer is having pipe dreams," Davis shouted at her husband. When she was called before the cameras, Nelson went to find Alexander, discovering him in the studio men's room, where he attacked him, slugging him repeatedly.

In spite of that, Alexander with a black eye did not stop writing love letters to Davis, posting one the very next day.

On the set of China Clipper, Bogie met a Boston-born actress, the dark-haired, rather beautiful Anne Nagel. He decided to pursue her only to find that his major competition was& Alexander himself. Privately, Bogie confronted him. “What’s& between this Nagel dame and byou?” he asked.

“Anne and I are falling in love, and I plan to marry her,” Alexander said.

“What about Bette? Bogie asked. “I thought you were in love with her.”

“You of all people should know that it’s possible to love two women at the same time,”& Alexander said. “If Bette responds to my love letters and divorces that monster, Ham Nelson, I will get a divorce from Anne, assuming we go through with the marriage.”

“That makes perfect sense to me,” Bogie said before walking away to have a drink with Pat O’Brien in his dressing room. “Losing a gal to a bonafide queer,” Bogie told O’Brien. “That doesn’t say much for me as a man. Of course, Ross is sorta cute. If I get desperate one night, I might ask him to give me a blow-job.”

“You’re kidding, of course,” O’Brien said.

“That’s me. Bogart the kidder.”

Right after the release of the film, Nagel and Ross were married. Even so, he continued to write those love letters to Davis. His wife discovered some unfinished letters under his desk blotter. He told her, “I can’t help myself.”

Around Christmastime in 1936, Alexander picked up a handsome male hitchhiker and had a sexual encounter with him. Recognizing him from the movies, the hobo threatened to blackmail him if he weren’t given $10,000.

Alexander didn’t have the money but persuaded producer Bryan Foy to secure that amount from Warner Brothers. Alexander agreed to pay it back by having the studio deduct it from his future salary.

Growing increasingly despondent, Alexander on January 2, 1937, picked up the same .22 pistol that his former wife, Alete Friele, had used to commit suicide. He went to his barn and shot himself in the temple.

Warners reacted quickly to Alexander’s death and within a few weeks had signed another young actor to a seven-year contract. This former sports announcer was to be cast in the roles that the studio had intended for Alexander.

On the studio lot one day, Bogie was introduced to this affable newcomer who spoke in the same clear baritone that evoked Alexander’s voice.

“So, you’re the new kid on the block,” Bogie said. “Welcome to the prison.”

“Hi,” the young man said, extending his hand. “I’m Ronald Reagan.”

“I’m sure we’ll be co-starring together very soon,” Bogie said.

He never pretended to be a prophet, but in this case he was right.

CHAPTER SIX

Beginning in the mid-1930s, Bogie would establish his professional movie home at Warner Brothers, with whom he'd be associated for most of the rest of his life. He stayed with the studio until the late 1940s. Even after he formed his own production company, Santana, he continued to arrange for his films to be released through Warners, alternating them with less frequent releases through Columbia Studios.

"At Warner Brothers in the 30s, I became a one-man film factory," Bogie later recalled. "I turned out movies so fast that even today the plots are a big blur in my head. Sometimes, I went from one film into another so fast, I forgot what character I was playing. I figured the best way to deal with that was to play Humphrey Bogart, meaning play myself."

During his filming of The Petrified Forest for a 1936 release, the Hollywood press once again began to take notice of him. Louella Parsons had already discovered him during his first stint in Hollywood during the early 1930s.

Throughout the 30s, Daniel Mainwaring operated as Bogie's press agent, also functioning privately as both a novelist and screenwriter. His pseudonym was "Geoffrey Homes." With that name, he began to create myths and legends about Bogie, many of which got printed in newspapers as truthful and accurate facts. Perhaps as a means of getting tongues to wag, even though Bogie was playing a tough guy on screen, Homes claimed that during his spare time, the actor painted floral designs on teacups.

Homes continued to pile one myth atop another for processing by the gullible press of the mid-1930s. He spread the word to the press corps that Bogie slept only in Palm Beach suits, never pajamas. Other falsehoods he spread included stories about how Bogie would frequently slip away for late-night music gigs. According to one of Home's PR campaigns, Bogart was said to play the bull fiddle at a roadhouse in the San Fernando Valley, disguised with fake whiskers to avoid recognition from his fans.

When he had any free time from Warner Brothers, which was rare, Bogie, or so said Homes, retreated to an worm farm in Eastern Oregon. Homes told Bogie, "I'm amazed those dummies in the press actually go ahead and print all that shit."

One morning over coffee, Bogie read that "Geoffrey Homes, the noted author, is en route to the Mojave Desert to inspect the rattlesnake farm that he and Humphrey Bogart, the actor, recently purchased.

If Bogie believed that he'd be offered another role as meaty as that of Duke Mantee in The Petrified Forest, he was sadly mistaken, at least for the moment. He was ordered to report to work on a movie called Isle of Fury, a movie so horrible that Bogie would later deny any involvement in making it.

Jack Warner, on seeing the final product, also realized how truly awful it was, and delayed its release until Bogie had shot two more movies for the studio.

It was only during the first week of shooting that Bogie learned that Isle of Fury was a remake of The Narrow Corner, which had been a vehicle, released in 1933, for the showcasing of then up-and-coming star Douglas Fairbanks Jr. In some respects, Isle of Fury evoked Clark Gable's Red Dust (1932).

Released by Warners late in 1936, the sixty-minute tale of tropical adventure co-starred Donald Woods and Margaret Lindsay. With a fake, pencil-thin mustache, Bogie played the lead in a script which was loosely and awkwardly based on W. Somerset Maugham's novel, The Narrow Corner.

Its director was Frank McDonald, who had been born only a month before Bogie. A former railroad worker, McDonald seemed nervous and unsure of himself. Actress Evelyn Keyes once said, "I've never seen anyone as terrified of directing as Frank McDonald."

Isle of Fury
Its props and its octopus inspired ridicule

In spite of his fears, McDonald churned out more than 100 pictures during the course of his long career, achieving his greatest success at Republic, grinding out popular westerns starring Roy Rogers and Gene Autry.

In a moment of candor, McDonald confided to Bogie, “Let’s face it: Both you and me are hacks turning out shit.”

“Don’t use that word around me,” Bogie said. “Why say shit when crap will do?”

Actually, from its inception, the script of Isle of Fury had been tailored for Pat O’Brien, who& dropped out three days before shooting began.

One scene in Isle of Fury got Bogie virtually laughed off the screen. The plot called for him to be attacked by a giant octopus created by the props department. It was suggested that McDonald should have made it a shark attack instead of some ridiculously artificial-looking octopus. The scene just didn’t work on screen, and the octopus was such an obvious fake that it provoked ridicule.

Years later, when asked about Isle of Fury, Bogie said, “I don’t recall making such a movie. Perhaps you’ve confused me with someone else. If I recall, that movie starred Errol Flynn.”

Months before, when shooting had ended on The Petrified Forest, Bogie and Leslie Howard had made a bet to see which of them could seduce a greater number of their respective leading ladies. Bogie felt that he was at an unfair advantage since he was often being cast alongside lesbians. An example included the picture-pretty brunette Margaret Lindsay, of Dubuque, Iowa. She was Bogie’s love interest in Isle of Fury, but her eye was trained on women, not at any man.

Bogie knew that Lindsay had starred on Broadway with Roland Young in Another Love Story, and he was interested in picking her brain for any information he could about Young. After all, rivaled by Kenneth MacKenna, Young was a contender for the love of Bogie’s wife, Mary Philips. Bluntly, Bogie asked Lindsay, “Is this Roland Young creature still banging Mary?”

Lindsay was equally blunt in her response. “Almost every night from what I hear. You’d better get back to Broadway soon if you expect to hold onto Mary.”

Meanwhile, Lindsay was playing an equivalent game of musical chairs. Before filming Isle of Fury, she’d been engaged in a torrid romance with actress Janet Gaynor. But when& Mary Martin took Gaynor from her, Lindsay turned her romantic affections onto another& actress, Mary McCarty.

Isle of Fury–a "tropical stinker" Bogart tried to forget.

This time the girl-on-girl romance worked, and Lindsay and McCarty became longtime companions.

Bogie never understood the long enduring success of his co-star, Donald Woods, who was born in Manitoba. “Now I know why he's named Woods,"& Bogie told McDonald. "Donald is the most wooden actor on the screen."

Yet, in spite of that assessment, Woods would have a career that encompassed 75 films and 150 TV shows over forty years. He became known as "King of the Bs."

In the 1950s, long after his appeal as an actor had faded, Woods became a successful real estate broker in Palm Springs, where he tried to sell Bogie a weekend vacation home. His pitch was that Clark Gable had once used the retreat for secret trysts with beautiful young women or—get this—handsome young men.

"That's about the best sales pitch I've ever been offered in my life," Bogie said, facetiously, "but I must turn it down. Gable, huh? Who would have thought that?"

During the spring of 1936, Mary was still on Broadway, appearing in The Postman Always Rings Twice, which was doing lackluster business. In marked contrast, Bogie was getting roles in one film after another, and working so hard his friends decided he needed some female companionship to take him out of his frequent dark moods.

Producer Walter Wanger, with some involvement from Henry Fonda, planned a party for Joshua Logan, and he invited Bogie and some actresses from the studio. At the time Wanger was shooting Vogues of 1938, a film whose plot revolved around eight of the supposedly most beautiful "models" in the world.

At the party, the girls imported from the cast of the movie looked like cheap hookers, not the "lovelies" that Wanger had promised. Except for a few private talks with Fonda, Bogie sat by himself, although on occasion a gum-chewing cutie encouraged him to join the party, even visit one of the bedrooms upstairs.

At the end of the party, after the models had been driven home, Fonda asked Bogie why he didn't want to "roll in the hay" with one of them.

According to Fonda's biographer, Howard Teichmann, Bogie responded, "Anyone that would stick a cock in one of those girls would throw a rock through a Rembrandt."

The next day, at the Garden of Allah, Bogie paid a visit to the small writing studio of the corpulent Robert Benchley, the actor/humorist who'd been a founding member of the celebrated and gossipy Algonquin Roundtable in New York. Bogie had long been a fan of his, taking special interest in Benchley's sardonic theater reviews.

Through the open door of Benchley's studio walked a slim, panther-like woman with a seductive gamine face. Thanks partly to her distinctive, helmet hairdo, she was as alluring as when he'd seduced her long ago as part of an arrangement set up by his first wife, Helen Menken.

"Brooksie," he said, rising from his chair and giving Louise Brooks a lingering kiss.

"Your lonely nights are over," Brooks said, "at least temporarily." Then she gave Benchley a peck on the cheek.

"Here I am back in Hollywood, a has-been at twenty-nine," she said. "Got anything to drink, fellows?"

Benchley had three bottles of Scotch resting temptingly on his bar. As Bogie remembered it, at least two of those bottles would be finished off "before we heard the wild cackle of Tallulah Bankhead chasing a nude John Barrymore around the pool at three o'clock that morning."

It was at that very moment, 3am, that Bogie and Brooks staggered out of Benchley's studio. They were just in time to see Barrymore and Tallulah jump into the pool, splashing around as if trying to drown each other. Although in need of assistance himself, Bogie half supported Brooks as they made their way back to his own rental unit.

Since he didn't have an early morning call, Bogie slept soundly until eleven o'clock. When he woke up "with the worst hangover of my life," he found a note on the counter from Brooks.

"You're slipping, Bogie boy," it said. "You didn't even fuck me before you passed out last night."

When he encountered Benchley by the pool later that afternoon, his neighbor asked him. "How did it go? I'm all ears."

Not wanting to ruin his reputation, Bogie said, "It's always fun seducing my former wife's girlfriends. I feel closer to Helen that way." He looked over toward Benchley's studio. "Didn't we leave you with one bottle not emptied last night?"

"We did indeed," Benchley said, heaving his heavy body from its position deep within a chaise longue. "I'd always dreamed of becoming a bartender for the great Humphrey Bogart."

Brooks called later that evening to thank Bogie for his hospitality. She was mysterious about her whereabouts, refusing to tell him where she was, even when pressed. "An emergency came up, and I can't explain." He would never learn the reason for her sudden departure.

"You should have stuck around," he said. "I'm much better in the morning."

"I'm sure you are," she told him. "I was tempted to pursue what we never finished in New York, but I decided against that."

"Why?" he asked. "I didn't plow deep enough."

"It's not that, Bogie boy," she said. "I decided we are too much alike. Going to bed with you would be like fucking myself."

In the years to come, he was saddened to see the star of Pandora's Box, where Brooks played Lulu, the nymphomaniac, reduced to appearing as a chorus girl in a 1937 Grace Moore musical, When You're in Love.

In 1974, Brooks would share her memory of Bogie in her published memoirs Lulu in Hollywood. The most controversial piece of her Bogie portrait involved remarks she made about his lips. She alleged that he referred to them as "nigger lips." Instead of viewing his lips as a handicap, Brooks claimed that Bogie decided to take advantage of this "unusual feature," his observations being based on how much publicity Clark Gable had garnered from his big ears.

"Over the years, Bogie practiced all kinds of lip gymnastics, accompanied by nasal tones, snarls, lisps, and slurs," she wrote. "His painful wince, his leer, his fiendish grin were the most accomplished ever seen on film. Only Erich von Stroheim was his superior in lip twitching."

From a successful stint in the 1920s on the stages of Broadway, Mayo Methot arrived at Union Station in Los Angeles in 1930, loudly describing her plans to "put the tinsel in Tinseltown." Humphrey Bogart lay in her future, but she had no memory of ever meeting him during the 1920s in New York. That was odd, as she'd previously been introduced to him in the presence of "Mr. Broadway," George M. Cohan, along with Bill Brady Jr.

Years later, defending herself for not remembering her inaugural meeting with the man who eventually became her husband, she said, "With Cohan checking me out, perhaps for a future stage role, how in hell could I remember a two-bit actor with a lisp? The town was full of them in those days."

This Oregon-born actress became known as "The Portland Rosebud," after she became famous for introducing the Broadway show tune, “More Than You Know,” which became a standard across the country. She’d introduced the song in the musical Great Day, produced by Billy Rose and Vincent Youmans. In Hollywood during the 30s, she would never achieve the celebrity she’d known in New York.

When she arrived in Hollywood in 1930 and signed with Warner Brothers, Jack Warner didn’t know quite what to do with her and cast her within roles as either tough-talking dames or as unsympathetic second leads in crime melodramas such as Jimmy the Gent ( 1933).

Directed by Michael Curtiz, who would later helm Bogie in Casablanca,& Jimmy the Gent starred Bette Davis and James Cagney. “Thanks to those two super-egos, I broke into Hollywood the hard way,” Methot ruefully claimed. “They didn’t make it easy for me.”

In Los Angeles’ Biltmore Hotel in 1936, at the Screen Actors Guild annual dinner, Bogie arrived stag, without an escort. He kept looking at the familiar face of a blonde-haired woman in a scarlet red dress with plunging décolletage. She smiled back at him several times. Finally, he realized that he’d met her before. She was none other than Mayo Methot, the former Broadway star.

Impulsively, Bogie rose from his chair. Plucking a small plaster nude from a nearby decoration, he made his way to her table. “Madam,” he said, “I hereby present this Oscar to you as the Most Beautiful Woman in the Room.”

It was the beginning of Bogie’s most turbulent relationship with any woman. He invited her to dance. As Mayo later related to Bette Davis, “We danced the night away. By two o’clock that morning, I found myself drinking& a nightcap in his bedroom at the Garden of Allah.”

Since Mary was in New York at the time, this tryst was easy for Bogie, but not necessarily for Methot: At the time, she had a husband, Percy T. Morgan, the owner of the popular Cock & Bull, a restaurant and bar on Sunset Boulevard much frequented by the movie crowd.

Soonafter, Methot began spending many of her nights with Bogie, much to the annoyance of Mr. Morgan, who knew his wife was having an affair. But with whom?

Prior to Morgan, Methot had had an earlier husband. At the age of 19, she’d married Jack La Mond, a cameraman for Cosmopolitan Productions. Divorcing him in 1927, she migrated to Hollywood in 1930 and soonafter, she’d married Morgan.

It quickly became obvious to Bogie that Methot was not a fragile and demure hothouse flower. At a bar in Santa Monica, she ordered a vodka and tonic. After the waiter served it, she tasted it and spat it out. This is gin and tonic, you fucker!” she shouted at him.

“It’s vodka,” he said. “I poured it myself. I’m not taking it back. You can drink it since you’re paying for it.”

“I hate women who are spineless, brainless, clinging vines,” Bogie told Edward G. Robinson. “You know the type. They open their eyes wide and their mouths still wider and sigh, ‘Oh, you great big wonderful man.’”

On the Warners lot, Methot became known for her heavy drinking. Alcohol had begun to tarnish her former beauty.

“By the time she met Bogie, she was looking the worse for wear,” said Bette Davis.

One day, during lunch on the Warners lot, Davis said, “Bogart, you’re out of your mind. Mayo is insane. She and her husband staged a knock-out, drag out fight at the Cock & Bull that brought out the police. She was about to kill him.”

He smiled. “I adore take-charge women. Whenever I do something wrong, she tells me so. In case I don’t listen, she packs a good wallop. I’ve already nicknamed her Sluggy.”

“You know what I’ve decided,” Davis said. “You’re as much of a lunatic as Methot is.”

A few weeks later, at a Hollywood party, Louise Brooks sat in the corner, skeptically eyeing the drunken antics of Bogart and Methot. In her memoir, Lulu in Hollywood, she wrote: “He found her at a time of lethargy and loneliness, when he might have gone on playing secondary gangster parts at Warner Brothers for years and then been out. But he met Mayo and she set fire to him.& Those passions—envy, hatred, and violence, which were essential to the Bogie character—which had been simmering beneath his failure for so many years—she brought to a boil, blowing the lid off all his inhibitions forever.”

During the 1930s, Eric Hatch was a well-known writer of screwball comedies, including My Man Godfrey. Released in 1936, it starred Carole Lombard and William Powell. That same year, Eric and his wife, Gertrude Hatch, threw a party for Mayo and Bogie.

Suddenly, during one of the party’s particularly manic moments, the Hatch family’s maid came in to warn that Percy Morgan was at the front door, trying to retrieve his wife.

In her stocking feet, Mayo ran out the back door with Bogie in hot pursuit. They made their getaway. There was a rumor that Morgan was carrying a gun.

The next day, Bryan Foy heard the story and quizzed Bogie about it.

“I want the word to get out,” Bogie said. “Tell ‘em Humphrey Bogart is in town, and that the only way a man can know that his wife is safe involves strapping a chastity belt on her and locking her in a dungeon.”

During the days and weeks ahead, despite her status as a married woman, Bogie openly escorted Methot to private parties and frequently appeared in public with her.

“The final straw came when I invited Bogie to have drinks with me in the bar of the Cock & Bull,” Methot told friends. “It was a deliberate attempt to let my husband know that I had moved on, and that Bogie was my new love.

Percy sat at the far end of the bar staring at us, but he never came over. I think that signaled him that it was all over except for the actual filing for divorce."

On Broadway, fading screen star Richard Barthelmess and Mary Philips, cast into a role as a "gas station strumpet," couldn't generate& enough magic to sustain box office for The Postman Always Rings Twice. The show closed after its move in April of 1936 to a smaller theater, the Golden. Throughout the run of the play, however, reports filtered through to Mary about how her husband was having a torrid romance with Mayo Methot, whom Mary knew from her Broadway days.

Uncharacteristically jealous, Mary opted to take the difficult air route to Los Angeles instead of traveling by train. That involved several refueling stops across the vast American continent, but she was in a hurry to get to the West Coast.

She notified Bogie that she was on her way, but her plane did not show up on schedule on April 26. He feared it had crashed somewhere. Finally, news reached him that the small aircraft had been grounded somewhere in Oklahoma because of a dust storm.

On the afternoon of the following day, Mary finally landed on the ground in Los Angeles, where Bogie was waiting to meet her.

Only the day before, out of respect for Mary's upcoming arrival, he had gathered together Methot's cosmetics and clothing from his studio, where they had been living together, and sent her packing.

It was not sunny California that greeted Mary as the plane set down. It was one of those cold, windswept days in Los Angeles that sends locals desperately searching for a coat of some sorts.

He embraced her on the runway and kissed her warmly. She would later tell her lover, Kenneth MacKenna, "The kiss was without passion, more like what a brother would give his sister."

Bogie moved Mary into his rented studio at the Garden of Allah, which Methot had vacated a day or two before. Even though Mary was temporarily back with Bogie, Methot began divorce proceeding against Percy Morgan. He'd been the ideal husband, yet she charged him with mental cruelty. The only cruelty she could cite in her petition involved his refusal to allow her to rearrange the furniture in their living room.

During the first week of Mary's return to Hollywood,& Benchley, now one of Bogie's close friends, decided to give a welcome-to-Hollywood party for Mary. She wanted to seek work in films at Warner Brothers, and Bogie had set up an appointment for her with Brian Foy, chief of those B movies he'd been making.

Three early views of Bogie's wife #3, Mayo Methot

"I'm a big Broadway star from a big town hoping to get work in B-pictures in a small town," she told Benchley. "But if I don't stay in Hollywood this time, I know my marriage to Hump is over. Hell, I'm still going to call him Hump. I can't get used to this Bogie shit. And, by the way, don't tell my husband I ever used the word shit."

Mary was not accustomed to the casual style of Hollywood parties, especially on a hot day. Those overcast skies had faded. At three o'clock that afternoon at the Garden of Allah, she emerged from their bungalow on the arm of her husband. As Benchley later reported to Tallulah Bankhead, "Mary looked like she could have headed the Easter Parade along Fifth Avenue. A vision in pink."

At about four o'clock, the thirty-odd guests of the party turned to witness the sudden emergence of Methot, who had appeared suddenly and without warning, seemingly out of thin air. Her hair and clothing were in disarray, and she looked angry and distraught.

Seeing her, Bogie moved to prevent her from entering the pool area, but she slugged him in the face, bloodying his nose. He struck her, knocking her onto the tiles surrounding the pool. She picked herself up and stood before him. Then, she kicked him in the balls. He doubled over in pain.

While he was trying to recover from the agonizing assault, Methot headed toward Mary, who was standing near the edge of the pool.

"We meet again, you little whore," Methot shouted at Mary. Sensing a catfight, the guests moved back. Benchley, as the host, did not intervene. "I only engage in verbal assaults, nothing physical," He later told Bogie. "I long ago learned not to come between two jealous women who are about to beat each other up."

"I am Mrs. Humphrey Bogart, and I plan to continue to be Mrs. Humphrey Bogart for many years to come," Mary said defiantly.

"He loves me—and not you," Methot shouted. "He told me himself that you're lousy in bed. I can satisfy a man. You can't. Maybe Kenneth MacKenna. But he's mostly faggot anyway."

"Get away from my husband," Mary shouted at her. "I forbid you to see him ever again."

"Forbid me?" Methot said. "Am I hearing right? I can chew a bitch like you for breakfast and spit her out." In an impulsive move, she moved toward Mary and pushed her into the deep end of the pool. In all her New York finery, Mary seemed to be drowning. One of the male guests stripped off his jacket and jumped in to rescue her.

Methot stormed away toward the entrance. Bogie had recovered in time to kick her in the ass as she made a rapid retreat. He rushed over to comfort Mary, who was lying soaked and gasping for breath on the tiles.

“You know how to pick ‘em, Hump,” she said before Bogie carried her back to his studio.

Bogie turned around and surveyed the astonished guests. “Party’s over!” he shouted. “I want each of you to leave a dollar in the kitty. We Broadway actors sure know how to put on a show for you Hollywood types.”

The next morning, the manager of the Garden of Allah rapped on the door of Bogie’s bungalow. Mary was still in bed when Bogie in his underwear answered the summons. “Yeah, what is it?”

“Mr. Bogart, we want you to check out of our hotel as soon as possible,” he said. “We’re a happy family around here. If you aren’t gone by tomorrow morning, I’m summoning the police to have you and Mrs. Bogart evicted.”

Thanks to a recent salary increase of fifty dollars a week, Bogie moved Mary into a small Mexican hacienda-style adobe house on 1210 North Horn Avenue, overlooking Sunset Boulevard. It was to be his first real home in Hollywood.

Their marriage was rocky, but both Bogie and Mary seemed to want to give it one final chance. Both of them understood that if they failed this time, their relationship, except for a divorce, would be over.

Enjoying a break before shooting on his next picture, Bogie was called to Warners for a script conference. When it was over, he retreated to his dressing room for a Scotch and soda. There was a knock on his door. He opened it to find Methot.

Despite their recent and very public fistfight, Bogie let her in.

“I don’t know what went on inside that dressing room that afternoon, but the bitch was in there for four hours,” Bryan Foy said. “A grip spilled the beans. They came out looking like lovebirds. We can call that a reconciliation. Where was Mary Philips while all this was going on? No doubt slipping away to fuck Kenneth MacKenna.”

Foy revealed to associates that at Bogie’s request, he’d arranged a screen test of Mary. “She’s awful. She also photographs rather ugly, although she’s pretty enough in person. I’ll never understand why the camera favors some dames—and not others. My advice to her was to go back to Broadway.”

With Mary’s career at a standstill, Bogie for the first time became the family’s only breadwinner. He was elated to learn that he’d been cast as the star of a new movie, a drama, Black Legion, to be released in 1937, with co-stars Dick Foran, Erin O’Brien-Moore, and the fast-emerging Ann Sheridan.

Archie Mayo, who had directed Bogie in the film version of The Petrified Forest, was the director. This time he'd cast Bogie as Frank Taylor, an embittered factory worker who joins the Black Legion, a Ku Klux Klan-inspired terrorist organization.

Black Legion was a grim picture, marking the first time Bogie played the lead in what eventually evolved into an A-list feature which showcased his talents. Erin was cast as his wife, Foran his best friend.

The same year, Erin O'Brien-Moore, a fetching beauty from California, appeared opposite Paul Muni in The Life of Émile Zola.

Two years later, tragedy struck when she was seriously burned in a restaurant fire. Her recuperation took years of surgery and rehabilitation. When she came back in 1948, she was assigned character roles, her chance for major stardom a forgotten dream.

Ann Sheridan was cast in a small and rather thankless role as the fiancée of Dick Foran, Bogie's co-star in the film. A New Jersey crooner, Foran was known around the lot as Warner Brothers' answer to Gene Autry, the singing cowboy. But occasionally Foran was cast in mainstream dramatic parts, as he was in Black Legion.

Bogie had worked with Foran before when he'd been cast as the athlete, Boze Hertzlinger, in the film version of The Petrified Forest. He had taken the role that Robert E. Sherwood had originally intended for Bogie (i.e., the role of the athlete, not the Duke Mantee part.)

Meeting him again on the set, Bogie told Foran, "You're much too good-looking and wholesome to have played Duke, although you could have livened that dismal drama by singing 'Home on the Range.'" Foran knew when he'd been insulted.

To complicate his life even more, Bogie, "torn between two lovers," had yet another woman enter his life. She was Ann Sheridan, the so-called "Oomph Girl."

Down to earth and ever so friendly, she approached Bogie on the set of Black Legion and introduced herself with, "How in the fuck are you, Mr. Humphrey Bogart?"

"You wanna feel it and find out?" he shot back.

She laughed hilariously. Like Carole Lombard, Sheridan was known for her potty mouth. In fact, around the Warners lot she was called "the hash-house version of Carole Lombard."

When Bogie met Sheridan, she, like Bogie, was struggling through a long involvement in Warners B pictures. There was something so frank and honest about her that he fell for her almost immediately.

"She has this come-hither look," he told Archie Mayo. "Show me a real man who can resist that deep, suggestive voice. I've got the hots for her."

"By the way," Archie responded, "isn't it a coincidence that your girlfriend's first name, Mayo, is my last name? And, come to think of it, how's your wife, Mary Philips?"

Bogie got the point and walked away.

During their first luncheon together, Sheridan described her philosophy of life. "What's the use of living if you can't have fun?"

Bogie later said, "There's one thing that dame isn't, and that's a phony. It's well known in Hollywood how I hate phonies, and the town reeks of them."

The following afternoon, when they weren't needed on the set, he invited Sheridan for a drink in his dressing room. Seated across from her, he studied her figure. "I hear you Texas gals are great in the haystack."

"Why don't you find that out for yourself?"

"No more B pix for Bogart!"
The New York Post

"I just might do that," he said.

"I can be had." As he later related to Mayo, she stood up and began to remove her dress.

At the time, Sheridan was married to an actor, Edward (Eddie) Norris. But, as she claimed, "Why should having a husband prevent a girl from workouts on the side?"

"Why indeed?" Bogie said. "Both of my wives played around on me. Why shouldn't I?"

"If we play this right, we can both have the security of marriage and a lot of fun whenever we're not with our devoted spouses."

"My sentiments exactly. You know what really attracted me to you?" Bogie said. "You smoke three packages of cigarettes a day. My kind of woman."

His meeting with Sheridan that day would mark the beginning of a long friendship, both on and off the screen.

Black Legion remains one of Bogie's best early films. Upon its release, The New York Post proclaimed, "No more B pix for Bogart!"

He came to believe the press reports affirming that indeed Black Legion would make him a star. Although Bette Davis warned him not to get his hopes up—she'd been disappointed too many times herself—Bogie believed great scripts were on the way. A critic writing in the New York American even suggested that "the dynamic Humphrey Bogart would be ideal for the role of Rhett Butler in the coming Gone With the Wind, to be produced by David O. Selznick."

Black Legion generated a solid box office return, but not in the league with The Public Enemy (1931) which made James Cagney a superstar, or Paul Muni's I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang (1932).

Nevertheless, Jack Warner was not impressed. His publicity department promoted the film by saying, "There's no Paul Muni in Black Legion, but there's Humphrey Bogart."

When the Black Legion was released, the KKK sued Warner Brothers, not for libeling their hate organization but for copyright infringement. The studio had used their symbol of a white cross with a black diamond in its center, positioned against a circular red background. The judge wisely tossed the case out of court, but not before ordering the KKK to pay legal costs.

Back at Bogie's house in West Hollywood, Mary was sometimes there, but more often not. During extended periods when she was missing, he called Mayo, who was beginning to frighten him by ratcheting up the pressure to divorce Mary and marry her.

Ann Sheridan was the first to hear the news. She and Bogie had been cast together in The Great O'Malley, a police drama slated for direction by William Dieterle. The movie would star Pat O'Brien in his familiar incarnation as a cop. "We get third and fourth billing," Sheridan told him.

"Who got the second lead?" Bogie asked.

"Sybil Jason," she said.

He'd heard of this child star. Born in Cape Town, South Africa, she was being groomed by Warner Brothers as a rival to the box office champ, Shirley Temple.

On the set he met this child prodigy, who had learned to play the piano at the age of two. "Would you like to see me do my impression of Maurice& Chevalier?" she asked Bogie.

"Later, kid," he said.

Sybil didn't achieve the success at Warners that Jack Warner had hoped for, and the following year, he didn't renew her contract.

Ironically, her last two films were for Darryl F. Zanuck at Fox. He cast her opposite her rival, Shirley Temple, in The Little Princess (1939) and The Blue Bird (1940). Sybil abandoned the screen after that. “I had my fifteen minutes of fame,” she later recalled.

Born in the Rhineland of Germany, director William Dieterle was stiff and formal with Bogie when they first met on the set. He wore a large hat and white gloves. Throughout the entire course of the shoot, he would remove neither of them. His striking good looks had earned him roles in German films during the 1920s. He’d directed his first film in 1923, Der Mensch am Wege, which had co-starred a young Marlene Dietrich.

In 1930, he emigrated to Hollywood, where he took a job directing German versions of American films. His first movie, The Last Flight (1931), is today called “a forgotten masterpiece” by critics.

During the span of his long career, he would direct five different actors in Oscar-nominated performances, including Paul Muni, Brian Aherne, Walter Huston, Jennifer Jones, and Joseph Schildkraut. Alas, Bogie would not be a member of that distinguished list.

The Great O’Malley would be one of Dieterle’s less distinguished efforts. Bogie wasn’t impressed with the script, calling it “another cop picture for Warners. It was terrible, just& another of those dramas we turned out at that goddamn sweat-shop. Pat O’Brien was very good.& But then Pat is never bad.”

The Great O'Malley (1937)

“My fucking role’s too small,” Sheridan told Bogie. “Jack Warner said he cast me as a schoolmarm because I’d once studied to become a teacher. My Southern Baptist parents, real zealots, still want me to become a school teacher. They warned me that I’ll perish in hell if I play bad women on the screen.”

In the film, Bogie played a jobless veteran driven to crime to feed his family. His most dramatic& scene occurs when he tries to pawn his war medals for money to buy food. The surly pawnkeeper says, “Ten dollars for this junk? Why don’t you go on relief?”

Exploding in fury, Bogie responds, “The only things left to remind me I was once a man and you call them junk!” This is but a prelude to robbery and a vicious attack on the pawnbroker.

Later, the Warners publicity department got it all wrong when they advertised the film as AN IRISH COP VS. A GUN-MAD KILLER!

During the course of the filming, Bogie slipped away with Sheridan for “some Texas gal loving,” as she called it. In just a short time, she’d become his confidante.

He told her, “My marriage is all but over. Mary can’t find work in Hollywood, and she’s returning to New York to look for work on Broadway. But the die is cast. Guess who I’ll be working with in my next film? Mayo Methot herself. Oh, yes, and the star of this thing is what’s her face?”

Jack Warner claimed that Bette Davis went too far in realistic makeup when she appeared on the set playing an abused woman. "We're selling glamor, Bette. You look like shit!"

"Bette Davis," Sheridan said. "I heard the news this morning."

Ever since his childhood days on Lake Canandaigua, Bogie had been devoted to sailing. With his increase in salary, he was able to purchase a 36-foot cruiser that he docked at the Newport Beach Yacht Club.

His "first mate" on these weekend trips, most often a sail to Catalina Island, was Methot. She talked often about marriage, urging him to file for divorce against Mary the way she'd filed for divorce against Percy Morgan. Finally, during a drunken sailing expedition heading back to Newport Beach, Bogie broke down and agreed to marry her.

Just before Christmas in 1937, shooting began on Marked Woman, directed by Lloyd Bacon, with Bette Davis getting star billing followed by Bogie in the second lead. The film also starred Lola Lane. Methot was cast into the small role of Estelle Porter, getting seventh billing. Even in such a small role, Marked Woman would remain her most famous& film appearance.

After reading the script, Bogie told Bacon, "This movie is about a bunch of whores."

"I know," Bacon said. "But because of the Production Code, we have to call them hostesses at a shady nightclub. But the plot is based on a notorious prostitution ring run by Lucky Luciano, the Sicilian gangster."

For greater verisimilitude, Bacon hired one of Luciano's henchmen, Herman (Hymie) Marks, to play the bit part of a gangster named Joe. Hal Wallis, the producer, objected, claiming that no one would believe Hymie as a hood. "He looks like a Presbyterian deacon."

San Jose-born Bacon was one of the Warners' "work horse" directors during the 1930s. As an actor, he had been known for supporting Charlie Chaplin in such films as The Tramp (1915).

Between 1920 and 1955, he directed more than 100 films, and would helm Bogie again in the immediate future.

Bacon is known today for directing Knute Rockne—All American, starring Ronald Reagan as "The Gipper."& Even& during the Depression, Bacon was the highest paid director at Warners, pulling in $200,000 annually when many Americans were in breadlines.

Thomas Dewey, as District Attorney for Manhattan, became a household word in the 1930s when he tackled organized crime in New York City. His greatest achievement was the conviction of Charles ("Lucky") Luciano, the boss of organized crime throughout the entire city. On the side, Luciano ran one of the largest prostitution rings in American history.

Born in Sicily in 1897, Luciano became the father of modern organized crime in America and the first official boss of the modern Genovese crime family. Deported from the United States, he died in 1962.

In the wake of Luciano's conviction, Dewey became more deeply entrenched in national politics. In 1944, he ran as a candidate for U.S. president against Franklin D. Roosevelt, as he did again in 1948 against Harry S Truman.

Audiences who knew Bogie because of his role as a brooding gangster in The Petrified Forest were shocked to see him cast as a district attorney modeled on Dewey in Marked Woman. Viewed today, one scene is particularly laughable, when Bogie lectures one of the "hostesses," (in this case, Bette Davis) about what a bad girl she is.

In Marked Woman, t he role of Johnny Vanning, the pimp, was portrayed by Eduardo Cianelli. In his role, he terrorizes the women who work for him, forcing them into submission at his nightclub.

Ciannelli had a brilliant career in films, some 150 cinematic appearances. In time, he would work with major stars, including Cary Grant, Ginger Rogers, Gary Cooper, Rita Hayworth, Orson Welles, Anthony Quinn, and Marlon Brando. Bogie and he would eventually team again for Passage to Marseille (1944).

Meeting Bogie on the set, Davis was eager to tell him about her ongoing lawsuit against Warner Brothers, in which she'd protested the inferior quality of scripts she'd been assigned. In court, Davis had testified that her seven-year contract with Warner's was "a form of slavery."

In fighting the suit brought by their major star, the attorneys for Warner Brothers told the judge that Davis "was a naughty, overpaid young woman."

Even though she eventually lost the lawsuit, she was promised better scripts. The first of these was Marked Woman, whose dramatic possibilities appealed to her.

In Marked Woman, a young Jane Bryan was cast as Davis' kid sister. As the plot unfolds, Bryan is killed by the mob, which incites Davis to swear vengeance.

During the making of the film, Davis adopted Bryan and protected her as if she was her own daughter. She was worried that a "wolf-like Bogart" might attempt to seduce Bryan. Davis spent all her time with her between shots, talking, eating, or having a smoke. "I have made her my new discovery," she announced to Bogie, "and I want you, and all the other horny bastards on the set, to keep away from Jane."

So mesmerized was Davis by Bryan that she used her influence to secure future roles for her in Davis' upcoming films, including Kid Galahad, The Sisters, and The Old Maid.

"What? Saving her for yourself? So, those rumors about Barbara Stanwyck and you are true?"

"You are a slimy beast, Bogart," Davis said. "But we have to get through this picture together."

"Your little sister is safe with me," he said. "She's far too demure for my taste. Besides, I have Methot to keep me company."

"Yes, a broken-down old hag with a drinking problem," Davis said. "Just your type. Now get out of my dressing room, I've got to make up my face."

"That should take all day," he said before she shoved him out the door.

Bryan had had a brief fling with Ronald Reagan when they made Girls on Probation (1938). But when she met Jane Wyman and they worked together on Brother Rat (1938), "I surrendered him to Wyman. They made an ideal couple."

After Bryan met and married the love of her life, Justin Dart, the head of the Rexall drug empire, she left films. Dart made his first million during Prohibition by cornering the market in bourbon and selling it as "prescription whiskey."

Both Bryan and her husband were instrumental in getting Ronald Reagan, the aspirant politician, to run for governor of California and later President of the United States. An ardent Republican, the drug king in time became one of the most trusted members of President Reagan's "kitchen cabinet."

For an actress who once thought of herself as young and beautiful, Mayo Methot in Marked Woman was assigned an unattractive role. In the film, the boss of the nightclub where she wants to work eyes her up and down, and is most skeptical. "Kind of old, ain't ya?" he asks her.

Methot's appearance in the film came across as hard and crass, and she looked particularly whorish. She earned $2,500 for five weeks of work on Marked Woman, with Bogie, a salaried player, taking in about $3,200.

Davis, in her role of a beaten-up whore attacked by a gangster's goons, decided to make herself look grotesque. She went to her doctor, F. Le Grand Noyes, and asked him to bandage her as if she'd been brutally beaten.

Swathed in bandages, she showed up at Bogie's dressing room. "How do I look, Bogart?"

He looked at her abrasions, swollen black eyes, horribly broken nose, and miles of bloody gauze. "Didn't you used to be the glamorous Bette Davis?"

"Even playing a whore, Bette comes off as a lady," Bacon told Bogie. "Now take your bitch, that Mayo Methot—she's one dame who could play a whore."

Bogie slugged Bacon, but since the two men were under contract, they made up the next day so the picture could continue.

In the film, as a crusading District Attorney, Bogie persuades clip-joint party girl (Davis) to testify against her mobster boss after her innocent sister is accidentally murdered during the course of one of his unsavory "parties."

There is a memorable scene at the end of the picture when Bogie, just for a moment, shows that he might be interested in pursuing Davis's character.

BOGIE: Where will you go?
DAVIS: Places.
BOGIE: But what will you do?
DAVIS: I'll get along. I always have.

When she saw the movie, Davis told Bogie, “I’m the one to watch. I go full throttle in this one. Frankly, I think as the DA you were a little slow and more than a little dull.”

Bacon fell ill during the shoot, and Jack Warner called in Michael Curtiz to fill in. After watching Curtiz at work, Bogie told Davis, “That illiterate is one hell of a pain in the ass to work with. He devours actors and spits out the bones.” Unknown to him at the time, Bogie was talking about the future director of Casablanca.

One of the stars of Marked Woman was Lola Lane, of the famous Lane sisters. Years later at his favorite Hollywood watering hole, Romanoff’s, Bogie told Peter Lorre that, “My claim to fame one day will be that I seduced each of the Lane sisters.”

Since Bogie was a kidder, he perhaps exaggerated, though Ann Sheridan later claimed that he “might have gotten around to at least Lola and Priscilla.” He made pictures with all of these Lanes.

Three of the Lane Sisters—Lola, Priscilla, and Rosemary—achieved success in the 1920s and 30s as a singing act. They later made a series of successful films, including Four Wives in 1939.

In Marked Woman, Lola played the role of Gaby, a prostitute in a clip joint working alongside fellow prostitutes Davis and Methot.

Lois Lane, the comic book and TV character who evolved into Superman’s girlfriend, was inspired by the name of the real-life actress Lola Lane, who played “Torchy Blane,” a fictional reporter in one of her 1930s films for Warners.

Although Davis consistently praised Marked Woman, particularly her performance within it, Bogie referred to it for years after as “just another Warners potboiler.”

Bogie put through an early morning call to Bette Davis after he’d received the script for the boxing movie Kid Galahad, s cheduled for direction by the ferocious Michael Curtiz and starring Edward G. Robinson.

“Have you read this piece of crap?” Bogie asked. “It’s a joke. You’re to play a woman called Fluff, and I’m to be a guy named Turkey.”

“At least I know how to make a silk purse out of a sow’s ear,” Davis said. “That’s something that can never be said for you, Mr. Bogart.” She abruptly put down the phone.

Bogie read the script one more time. It was a totally unsympathetic role for him, that of a crooked promoter in the boxing game. To make matters even more difficult for him, word was spreading that Jack Warner did not plan to renew his contract.

Budgeted at $416,000, Kid Galahad went into production on January 25, 1937. Robinson had agreed to do the picture for $50,000, with Davis taking home $18,000. The scandal involved the size of the paycheck that went to Wayne Morris.

Desperate for a movie role, Morris accepted a fee of only $66 a week for his appearance in the film, even though he’d been cast into the title role. For the entire picture, he was paid $396. When fan letters started pouring in, he immediately demanded that a raise in pay accompany whatever new roles he’d be assigned. “In Kid Galahad, I was green to the business. Back then, even a fifty dollar bill looked like good money to me. But I was a fast learner in the ways of Hollywood. And even though we didn’t particularly like each other, Bogie gave me some good advice about money.”

On the second day of the shoot, Bogie approached Curtiz and complained about the character he was playing. He felt that as the part was written, it was one dimensional. “Who gives a fuck?” Curtiz said. “I make this film go so fast nobody will notice character.”

Later, over coffee with Robinson, Bogie said, “I’ve got to learn to shoot better.”

“Exactly what do you mean?” Robinson asked.

“You see, it’s like this,” Bogie said. “We kill each other off in another shootout. I die right away, and they put a blanket over me. But my bullet didn’t go right into your heart, and you survive for a curtain speech in the arms of Bette Davis. You get to deliver this big Pietà-like death scene, while I’m covered up with a flea-infested blanket.”

“Thank God for that,” Bogart quipped, getting up. “If you had, I’m sure your fade-out would have been a fifteen-minute monologue.”

Later, as he met Davis going into her dressing room, she said, “I make it a point never to agree with you. But I’ve read the script. You are right. Warners has recycled the usual clichés of its boxing movies. Except for a few scenes in the ring, we can expect yawns—not excitement, except for what I’m able to generate.”

He noted that Davis would at least have cozy company on the set. She’d managed to secure a role for Jane Bryan, her pet. Tired of Davis’ barbs, he decided to get even with her.

During a conference with Curtiz, Bogie made a revelation. “You know, of course, that Davis is having a lesbian relationship with Jane Bryan.”

“Whatever gets to you, man” Bogie said. “Whatever.”

“You look like a smart ass,” Curtiz said. “You think you know fuck everything. You think I know fuck nothing. Listen to this: I know fuck all!”

“I’m sure you know how to fuck,” Bogie assured him.

“Just ask Lili Damita,” Curtiz continued. He was referring to the actress wife of Errol Flynn. Curtiz had married her in 1925, the union lasting only a few months. “She told me I was best in the fuck, best than Flynn.”

“An impressive credential,” Bogie said. “Top of the morning to you.”

In Kid Galahad, super hunk Morris was being groomed on the Warner lot to become “the next Errol Flynn.” Morris welcomed the chance to appear with big stars in his role as a young bellhop transformed into a boxing champ. Many of the women working on the picture, especially extras, made themselves sexually and emotionally available to this blonde Adonis. He didn’t seem to want any of them, as he seemed fully booked up when he left the studio to wherever he was going that night.

Morris was the kind of California-born stud that Bogie generally detested. Standing 6’2”, he towered over Bogie. Morris was remarkably handsome by the standards of the day and had gone through the usual macho roles—football player, forest ranger.

After their initial handshake, Bogie had little to say to him. “Kid, how’s it hanging?” Morris looked shocked.

Davis came up to Bogie and looked disappointed that Morris had fled so quickly. Although she almost constantly attacked Bogie, she became solicitious of him whenever she needed an ally. For now, at least, their shared Enemy No. 1 was their director, Curtiz himself. Over drinks in her dressing room, she related to Bogie the real reason Curtiz hated her so much.

During the early 1930s, Curtiz had tried to seduce her. “I was going through with it,” she said, “until he pulled off his pants. I mocked him like Mildred in Of Human Bondage. ‘A little piece of okra,’ I told him. He’s hated me ever since.”

“Bette, men do not like you to attack their manhood,” he warned her. “Fortunately, I never had any complaints from you.”

She just couldn’t resist delivering another dig. “I was very inexperienced when I first met you. But after I was worked over by Franchot Tone, I know what a real man feels like. There are so few of them around Hollywood. At night, most of you guys are out screwing each other.”

Before he could get into a full-fledged bitchfest with Davis, Jane Bryan arrived at the door with tea. “Don’t touch the stuff,” Bogie said, walking out.

Bogie did not come into conflict with Curtiz during the shoot, because all of the director’s ire was directed at Davis. He’d directed many of her pictures and still considered her “a dumb bitch, ugly as shit.” He’d even objected to her being cast in Cabin in the& Cotton.

Davis’ animosity against Curtiz was so pronounced that she turned down Mildred Pierce (1945), the role and the Academy Award eventually going to Joan Crawford. At the time, Davis had said, “I absolutely refuse to do another film with Curtiz.” But on Oscar night, watching Crawford,& Davis’ curses and screams went on until morning, and could be heard down the block from her home.

During the peak of Bogie’s lesbian rumors about Davis, she fell big for the muscular Morris, who would later go on to become a naval hero in World War II.

Davis kept inviting Morris to her dressing room, and he kept declining. At one point, he asked Bogie, “How can I get this hot-to-trot mama off my back? I’m not into mothers this year.”

Morris was only 23 at the time, Davis 29.

“I get it up only for teenage gals,” he said. “Once I get going, I can go all night. Also, I like my gals weak and submissive. That hardly describes Bette Davis.”

“You got a point, kid,” Bogie said.

In her effort to get to Morris, Davis even went to Curtiz and asked him to write in a love scene between them, which he refused to do.

When Davis called in sick on February 18, Curtiz told Bogie, “She’s no good actress. Not really needed on this picture. Maybe with the big hen not protecting the chick, I will get to fuck the chick.” He no doubt was referring to Jane Bryan.

Curtiz and Davis weren’t the only members of the crew who did not like each other during the period when Kid Galahad was being shot. Both Davis and Edward G. Robinson held each other in contempt. She referred to Robinson as “mush mouth” and asserted, loudly and frequently, “pity the poor girls at Warners who have to kiss his ugly purple lips.”

Robinson was equally disdainful of Davis, complaining to Curtiz. “This hysterical broad is hopeless. She doesn’t belong in the picture.” Even though she’d been an Oscar winner, Robinson called her “an amateur.”

“I’m this torch singer, the mistress of Robinson,” Davis said. “Could any of my fans believe that I’d go to bed with Robinson? It’s another cardboard character. I told Jack Warner this morning that he’d better come up with a better script—or else!”

Robinson particularly objected to Davis’ hysterics during his death scene. He called a halt to shooting and asked Curtis, “Don’t you think Bette is crying too much?”

Robinson saved his final evaluation of Davis for his autobiography. “Miss Davis was and is every inch a lady—polite, mannerly, gracious, even self-effacing. But by today’s standards she could never have gotten a job in a high school production of East Lynn. I know it’s goatish of me to say it, but Miss Davis was, when I played with her, not a very gifted amateur and employed any number of jarring mannerisms that she used to form an image. In her early period Miss Davis played the image, and not herself, and certainly not the character provided by the author.”

In contrast, Robinson had a begrudging respect for Bogie and more than a touch of jealousy. “Bogie had a manner, a personality—yes, an immense talent—that has made him almost immortal. Working with him, I think I understood it better than his fans. For all his outward toughness, insolence, brag-gadocio, and contempt (and those were always part of the characters he played, though they were not entirely within Bogie), there came through a kind of sadness, loneliness, and heartbreak (all of which were very much part of Bogie the man). I always felt sorry for him—sorry that he imposed upon himself the façade of the character with which he had become identified.”

When the film opened to generally respectful reviews, many critics got it wrong. They predicted major stardom for Wayne Morris.

If Bogie ever wished to forget about his appearance in Kid Galahad, he would not be so lucky. In 1941, he’d be handed another script entitled The Wagons Roll at Night. After reading only ten pages of it, he said, “My God, this is a remake of Kid Galahad. The only joy that the remake brought Bogie was that this time, he’d be cast as the lead, playing the role formerly played by Robinson instead of his former supporting part.

As if these rehashes and reprises weren’t enough, Elvis Presley starred in a musical remake of Kid Galahad in 1962.

Robinson later commented on his shoot-outs with Bogie. “Almost inevitably both of us would get killed at the end of the films in which we worked together. Because we were both rotten, we had to get our just desserts. Will Hays and his successors said so in the motion picture code. The charade followed a precise pattern. When I was the reigning star, Bogie would be slain first, and I’d live another reel before I got it. As the years passed and Bogie became the reigning star and I was demoted to character roles, I’d get the bullet first and Bogie would live out another reel before he was struck down for his sins.”

“Bogie,” came the distinctive voice of Ann Sheridan over the phone. “I’ve just met with Lloyd Bacon. He’s cast us in another movie together. It’s called San Quentin. ”

“I bet it’s a pip,” Bogie said. He got quickly to the point. “What is it for me? Fourth billing?”

“No, the second lead,” she said. “Pat O’Brien is the star, and I’m the love interest.”

“That you are, kid,” he said. “Don’t tell me: I’m a convict and I get shot and killed at the end.”

“You’ve already read the script,” she said.

“I didn’t have to. What’s the name of my character?”

“Joe Kennedy.”

“How original,” he said. “I think that name has already been used. Any nude love-making scenes between us?”

“Hell, no!” she said. “It’s not that kind of picture. You’re my kid brother in this flicker.”

“Then we’ll have to confine our love-making to the dressing room.”

“Fine with me,” she said. “You know I’m a gal who never turns down a deep dicking. I might as well warn you, though, I’m seeing another actor on the side.”

“David Niven.”

“The limey import.” Bogie said. “Frankly, I think all British actors should be banned in Hollywood. There aren’t enough jobs for home-grown actors.”

“Don’t send him back home to London yet,” she said. “I haven’t worn him out yet. There’s still life in the old boy.”

“He strikes me as a prissy Englishman,” he said. “Not my type.”

“I know what you mean,” she said. “But all Englishmen sound like faggots. In bed, it’s another story. His gals have nicknamed him ‘beer can.’”

“Don’t make me jealous,” he said. “See you on the set.”

“Incidentally, Barton MacLane has the fourth lead,” she said.

“That’s the first good news I’ve had all day,” he said. “The last time we appeared together, he was billed over me, and I’m the pretty one. What woman would want to go to bed with MacLane?”

“Actually there are some,” she said. “Regardless of what you look like, there’s always someone out there salivating over you.”

He hadn’t seen Bacon since he’d helmed Bogie in Marked Woman. On the first day on the set, Bogie came up to greet him, noticing how depressed he looked.

“This is not going to be the film that Marked Woman was,” Bacon warned his star.

“Let’s go for it,” Bogie said. “As long as they keep those paychecks coming in, you’ll continue to direct, and I’ll get by on what is called acting.”

Upon the film’s release, it was MacLane, in his role as a tough prison guard, who attracted the most attention, some critics calling his performance memorable. One reviewer wrote, “Humphrey Bogart gives a lackluster performance as a con in a lackluster Warner release, another one of the studio’s formula prison movies.”

Bogie took Sheridan to see the film. At the end and on the way out, she said, “there’s one real problem with this stinker other than the obvious. You’re playing my kid brother. Don’t forget that in real life you’re eleven years older than this cutie walking beside you.”

Long after his intimacy had ended with Bette Davis, she still retained a surface friendship with Bogie, no doubt fearing they’d be cast in another movie together at Warners. Even so, he was surprised when she called him and invited him for lunch on the Warner lot.

She was already at table when he came rushing in. Sitting down beside her, he asked, “To what do I owe this honor, Miss Davis? I assume you don’t want to take up where you left off?”

“Count yourself lucky that you were so rewarded,” she said. “I’m sure it’ll rank as one of your all-time peak experiences.”

“My, aren’t you self-confident today,” he said.

“Today and every day, but that’s not why I’m here. I want to talk to you about a script. It’s a story set in Africa by C.S. Forester. Jack Warner has acquired it as a vehicle for me. My role is that of a prim, repressed missionary spinster. The male role is that of a Cockney River Rat. Henry Blanke is talking about giving the role to David Niven. When I heard the role called for a River Rat, one who hasn’t shaved in days, one who always looks unkempt and maybe a bit dirty, I thought of you.”

“I always like to be in the thoughts of a beautiful woman,” he said.

“Let’s get serious here. I could walk away with an Oscar for this role. The River Rat isn’t bad either—in fact, it’s perfect for you. Niven is too much of an English gentleman to handle the role. He belongs in a Victorian parlor, not on an old piece of junk sailing along a river in Africa battling the Germans. Let’s face it, Bogart. You need a meaty part. So do I, of course. We might eat up the screen with these roles. Will you allow me to advance you as a candidate for the male lead?”

“I’ve always wanted to play the captain of my own boat,” he said, “if that’s what the part calls for.”

“Of course, your boat is nothing but a piece of shit, hardly able to stay afloat.”

“That makes the story all the more intriguing,” he said. “I’ll keep the old tug floating with spit and guts.”

“That’s it exactly. If we play this right, I can begin preparing another speech to give on the night of the Academy Awards.”

“What about me?” he asked. “Don’t I deserve something?”

“That you do. If the competition isn’t too rough that year, river rats might be in.”

In the weeks ahead, the Warner producer, Blanke, and Bette did not agree on the film. Her major objection was to being photographed outdoors. “But, Bette,” he protested, “much of the action takes place outdoors.”

In the spring of 1947, Blanke, forgetting their past differences, once again presented her with the script for The African Queen. At this point her star was falling, and she had no objections to being photographed outdoors.

“I love the script,” she said, “and I want to do it. Do you still have David Niven in mind?”

“Not at all,” he said. “I’m pitching James Mason.”

“Mason is a fine actor, of course, but what about Bogart? He gets rattier and rattier-looking every day.”

“No, he’s totally wrong for the part.”

Mason may have gone before the cameras in 1947 opposite Bette had she not given birth to a baby girl, Barbara Davis Sherry, and felt in a weakened condition. She also feared location work in a remote corner of Africa, and the actual physical dexterity needed to pull off this role.

The film had not gone into production by the time Davis was kicked out of Warners, a reaction to the dismal box-office receipts generated by her disastrous Beyond the Forest.

That summer, Bogie learned that he was one of twenty-one members of the Screen Actors Guild listed by the FBI as having “strong Communist Party leanings.” He became worried that such a listing would harm his career, as there was no basis for that charge. Although he viewed himself as an outspoken liberal, He had never been a member of the Communist Party and had no leanings in that direction. His appearance on that FBI list did not seem to affect his career.

In summer of 1937, for a change of pace, he agreed to perform a work by Shakespeare, but only on the radio, for the CBS Shakespeare Theater. Along with veteran actor Walter Huston and Brian Aherne, he appeared in Henry IV, Part One.

From New York, Mary Philips no longer wrote any letters. He inquired of actors returning to California from Broadway, but no one seemed to have any knowledge of her private life.

He told Ann Sheridan, “My marriage to Mary just needs a divorce.”

He continued to see Mayo Methot three and sometimes four nights a week, but he complained to Sheridan that “she’s too jealous, too possessive. I’ll never marry her in spite of my promises to her.”

On Broadway, Samuel Goldwyn had seen Bogie perform as Duke Mantee in The Petrified Forest. But when he acquired the rights to Dead End, the film adaptation of Sidney Kingsley’s Broadway hit play, he told his director, William Wyler, that George Raft would be perfect as the gangster, Baby Face Martin. The romantic leads and the star parts would go to Sylvia Sidney and Joel McCrea.

Raft, however, kept putting off a decision about whether he’d become involved, and he went around town asking other actors, directors, and producers, “Should I take this role—or not?”

When Goldwyn heard about this, he called Wyler. “Get Bogie on a loan-out from Warners. Jack wants Miriam Hopkins for a role at Warners. We want Bogie. Do a trade-off.”

Raft’s indecision about whether to accept the starring role in Dead End would mark the beginning of a series of ill-advised decisions on his part. In every case, Bogie was ready, willing, and certainly able to fill in for his rival. “I took Raft’s rejects, and they turned me into a movie star, strictly A-list. Poor, stupid George Raft.”

“Who’s there to fuck in this movie?” Bogie asked Ann Sheridan in a call to her. “You know everything’s that going on.”

“I don’t know about Sylvia Sidney,” she said, but I do know there are two hot little numbers appearing—Wendy Barrie and Claire Trevor. Of course, you could always settle for Marjorie Main, but she’s lez.”

Wyler, who was roughly the same age as Bogie age, was definitely an A-list director, and Bogie feared he’d be too demanding. He began his career working in the Silents, launching a career that would span nearly half a century and see a record twelve Oscar nominations as Best Director, of which he would win three.

Firmly established as Goldwyn’s director of choice, Wyler tore into the script of Dead End, demanding dozens of changes. Bogie had been warned that he might be asked to shoot a take over and over again, as the director was known as “One More Wyler.”

Bogie was expecting fireworks on the set with Wyler, but the director reserved his fury for epic battles with Goldwyn. They disagreed over several key scenes.

Once, when Wyler saw Goldwyn coming onto the set, the director said, “Here he comes, clanking balls he doesn’t have.”

Years later, Wyler recalled his experience of working with Bogie on Dead End. “I found him very professional, very easy to work with. His acting was never hammy. It was very simple. Unlike Bette Davis, he also underplayed a scene. I think that’s the reason why his films stand up so well today. As an actor he obviously was limited. His range wasn’t great, but if he stayed within a certain range he was the best actor around.”

Bogie was less eloquent in recalling his work with Wyler. “He directed some of the best pictures ever made in Hollywood, especially if they starred Bette Davis. He did such films as Wuthering Heights, Roman Holiday, and The Best Years of Our Lives. He even directed Ben-Hur. When film fans gather to watch Wyler movies, Dead End is hardly the first must-see& on their list."

Although Joel McCrea became one of the great stars of American Westerns, Bogie remained unimpressed with him. But he did like McCrea's self-appraisal of his own abilities—in fact, McCrea spoke of his modest talents with a certain soft contempt for himself.

And although Bogie did not admire McCrea's acting, he admired his thrift. He told Bogie that Will Rogers once told him, "Save half of what you make, and live on just the other half. I do that and more. I never carry around more than a buck in my pocket. I recommend you do the same. Buy property and more property. Go out into the unincorporated areas. One day that land will be a city suburb of L.A."

That was good advice, although Bogie never took it. "McCrea became a multi-millionaire in the late 40s," Bogie once said at Romanoff's. "My God, didn't he at one time own Thousand Oaks?"

When Bogie met Sylvia Sidney, the female star of the picture, he remembered her for "having the saddest eyes I've ever seen." She was just recovering from a failed marriage to Bennett Cerf, the famous publisher of Random House. Bogie remembered her sitting on the set between takes working on her needlepoint. Her marriage to Cerf technically lasted only three months.

"One should never legalize a hot romance," Cerf later said.

Referring to this Bronx-born actress, Bogie remembered that "her big, beautiful eyes looked like they were always on the verge of tears. In fact, she jokingly told me that Paramount paid her for every tear shed. Behind that small, vulnerable, long-suffering façade was a tough little number. She practically had 'survival' written on her forehead."

In later life, film critics have cited Sidney's role in Dead End, as the best movie& role she ever played. She was cast as Drina, a shopgirl, striving to fight her way out of the slums and into a respectable life. She would work again with Bogie in the circus melodrama The Wagons Roll at Night.

Playing Bogie's slum mother was Marjorie Main, the daughter of a minister. In the 1920s she had been a hoofer on Broadway. She was to achieve screen immortality in later years as Ma Kettle.

In Hollywood she was repeating her stage role in Dead End. "You're good," he said after watching her work.

“Too good,” she said, accurately predicting that Dead End would lead to a number of slum mother parts.

Bogie had already been made aware of Main’s lesbianism as the long-time companion of actress Spring Byington.

In spite of this, she had some deep emotional attachment to her late husband, Stanley LeFevre Krebs, who had died in 1935. The relationship struck Bogie as spiritual, not sexual. In the middle of a scene with him, she stopped and seemed to go into a sort of meditation.

When she’d come out of it, she turned to director Wyler. “It’s okay, I can go on.” She whispered to Bogie, “I don’t want to piss off Wyler, but Stanley was telling me from heaven how to play this scene with you.”

A British actress born in Hong Kong, Wendy Barrie was, in the words of Bogie, “a hot tamale, but she didn’t inspire lust in me. I held her off. She really wanted my body, though.”

Spencer Tracy, still one of Bogie’s best friends, had told him to “keep it zipped up” when he starred with Barrie. Tracy had begun an affair with her when they appeared together in a romantic comedy, It’s a Small World (1935).

“I’m still balling her,” Tracy told Bogie. “When I’ve had it, I’ll pass it on to you. Nothing wrong with sloppy seconds—nothing at all.”

“You and Claire Trevor are my kind of dames,” Bogie told Ann Sheridan. “She doesn’t believe in locking up her pussy like some dames,” he said. He loved talking dirty to Sheridan, since she seemed to get off on that. “Trevor is also a solidly professional actress, not great, but way beyond competent.” In fact, in all the cast of Dead End, Trevor would be the only one who would receive an Oscar nomination.

The Dead End Kids

Cast as Bogie’s ex-girlfriend, Trevor had a scene-stealing encounter with him. It is clear to Bogie’s character that she has become a prostitute, and a& sickly one at that. Some film critics claimed that it was that scene alone that earned the Oscar for Trevor.

He may have avoided Wendy Barrie, but “I scored a home run with Trevor,” Bogie later claimed. “It was in my dressing room. I made friends with some of the grips who promised to alert me if Mayo arrived on the set, especially if she was carrying a gun.”

At the end of the shoot, Trevor said she wanted to throw him “one goodbye fuck.” She suspected they’d work together again one day. “Any time some director needs a floozy, call me. I play floozies in my sleep.”

When she was eventually cast as Edward G. Robinson’s floozy in Key Largo (1948), Bogie and Trevor would meet again. But before that, Trevor, playing a “fence to a gang of safecrackers,” would team up with both Bogie and Robinson in The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse (1938).

Bogie would also get to know Huntz Hall, a dopey-looking fidgety teenager, during the shoot. He, along with fellow actors Leo Gorcey and Billy Halop, would become famous as the Dead End Kids (also known as The Bowery Boys), and would continue to work with Bogie in future pictures.

When Bogie last encountered Samuel Goldwyn, he was preparing his acceptance speech for Dead End, almost certain that it would win an Oscar as Best Picture of the Year. He was terribly disappointed when the Oscar went instead to Warner Brothers’ The Life of Emile Zola.

Mary Philips drove up to their house late one night after he'd gone to bed. When he heard her turning on the lights, he got up. In his underwear, he confronted her in the living room.

"I've come for my things," she said. "I'm moving out for good."

"Who is the lucky man?" he asked. "Kenneth MacKenna or Roland Young? Perhaps someone else."

"It doesn't matter now," she said, as she headed for the bedroom to start removing her clothing. In the bedroom, she turned to face him. "Don't try to stop me. It's over."

"Who's stopping you?" he asked. "Move out if you want to. I don't believe anybody should stay where they don't want to."

"Let's face it," she said, throwing three dresses on the unmade bed. "Ours was not a real marriage. If we ever had a marriage at all, it was in the 20s in New York."

"We had some good times," he said.

"I remember a few, too, but we've spent most of the 30s in the arms of other people. So it's time for me to move on. I'm very much in love."

"You won't tell me if it's Ken or Roland Young?" he said. "You owe me that."

"I owe you nothing," she said rather harshly. "With me out of the way, you'll be free to marry Mayo Methot, although God knows why. She's an old drunk. She's completely lost her looks."

"She isn't exactly a spring chick if that's what you mean," he said.

"I've got a great idea," she said. "While I finish packing, why don't you go sit out on the patio, breathe the night air, smoke a cigarette, and think about what might have been but can never be."

"I wish you luck," he said. "I know you haven't made the greatest films of all time, but back on Broadway you'll be the brightest star."

"That's very comforting," she said. "I guess I'll return the favor. I know you're getting a bit long in the tooth for a Hollywood matinee idol. As for looks, you're not the romantic type like Errol Flynn, Tyrone Power, or Robert Taylor. But keep at it. When the 1940s roll around, and you're in your own 40s, I think you'll become one of the biggest character actors in Hollywood. I really believe that. It's not bullshit."

"Well," he said awkwardly, "guess it's time for that cigarette."

"When you come back in, I'll be gone," she said.

"I'll miss you," he said, a forlorn quality to his voice. "You were—and are —a great gal."

"I'll miss you, too. I'm sorry our marriage didn't work out. Perhaps you'll find someone some day. Ann Sheridan. Claire Trevor. Anybody but Mayo Methot. Please, Hump, reconsider. She's psychotic. If you go on with her, I think she'll kill you one day."

"If that's my fate, so be it." He smiled. It wasn't quite a smile but not a frown either. His face reflected a sense of loss and yet an eagerness to move on into the next adventure. "Good night, sweet Mary."

"Good night, Hump."

He turned and walked toward the patio. The day had been hot, but a sudden chill had come over Los Angeles. The winds were blowing, and there seemed to be crystals of sand in the night air. Surely that's what it was. It must be the sand tearing his eyes.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Spencer Tracy called Bogie to relate details about the latest public opinion poll about the casting of the leading roles in Gone With the Wind, the upcoming film adaptation of the best-selling novel by Margaret Mitchell about America's Civil War.

"That big film role you've been dreaming about may actually come true," Tracy said. "Read Lloyd Pantages column, I Cover Hollywood."

Over coffee, Bogie smoked a cigarette and read the following item:

"An opinion poll about how Gone With the Wind should be cast focuses on the following movie stars: For the role of Scarlett O'Hara, the major contenders include Miriam Hopkins, Bette Davis, Katharine Hepburn, Margaret Sullavan, Claudette Colbert, and Jean Harlow. And for the role of Rhett Butler, Clark Gable is the top choice, and, after that, in rapid succession: Cary Grant, Warner Baxter, Ronald Colman, Edward Arnold, Alan Marshall, Humphrey Bogart, and Basil Rathbone. As for the part of Melanie Wilkes, the unanimous decision falls into the lap of Janet Gaynor."

After reading it, Bogie called Tracy back. "I don't know what the debate is about. The choice is obvious: Jean Harlow for Scarlett O'Hara, Bogie for Rhett Butler."

"Have you actually read Gone With the Wind ?"

"Not a page, but I hear Gable's a shoe-in."

"Clark told me that he won't accept the role," Tracy said, "so you'd better start practicing a Southern accent. And don't forget to lose the lisp."

A few weeks later, over drinks and dinner, Leslie Howard and Bogie had a Hollywood reunion, thanks to director Tay Garnett having cast them in a Walter Wanger Production, Stand-In (1937), a romantic comedy about Hollywood. Joan Blondell would play the female lead. Behind a pair of spectacles, Howard had been cast as a straight-arrow financial analyst who winds up running a movie studio. Bogie, as "Douglas Quintain," plays a boozy producer trying to save a picture called Sex and Satan.

Over drinks and dinner, when it came time for the actors to tally their score of conquests of their respective leading ladies, Howard won. Bogie protested that he would have won if some of his leading ladies hadn't been lesbians.

Having just made It's Love I'm After, a zany comedy with Bette Davis and Olivia de Havilland, Howard amused Bogie with the details of his campaign to woo both ladies into his much-used bed.

In 1982, when Davis was asked to comment on Howard's pursuit of her, she said, "Leslie Howard was definitely a great ladies' man. His wife used to say that the only leading lady he hadn't gone to bed with was Bette Davis."

"Don't see It's Love I'm After," cautioned Howard. "I only made that picture because I wanted to show Warners and its director, Archie Mayo, that I had a flair for comedy. And they paid me $70,000 to make it. I hope to get the same for Stand-In."

"Don't ask me what I'm taking home," Bogie said. "Small potatoes."

Howard amused Bogie with the details of his seduction of Merle Oberon, his co-star in The Scarlet Pimpernel (1935). "We were in my dressing room having sex, and my wife walked in on us. Seeing us in white heat, she indignantly asked me what I was doing. I blithely replied, 'Rehearsing.'"

Not wanting to be outdone, Bogie related escapades associated with his long-time girlfriend, Joan Blondell.

"I plan to seduce her," Howard said. "Hope you don't mind."

“We don’t have any exclusive rights to each other’s panties,” Bogie said.

Later, during the second week of the shoot, Blondell told Bogie that she found Howard adorable. “He’s just a little devil and just wants his hands on every woman around. He would hold your hand while looking into your eyes and rubbing his leg on somebody else’s leg at the same time, while having the gateman phone him before his wife arrived on the lot.”

As always, Bogie worked smoothly with Howard, as he had in both the stage and screen versions of The Petrified Forest. “We both shacked up with Joan,” Bogie said. “She’s got such a good heart about men and their desires.”

In recalling his late 30s films, Bogie said, “Tay Garnett put Joan, Leslie, and me through our paces more or less well. He’d been an aviator in World War I and a gagwriter for Mack Sennett and Hal Roach. He’d been directing films since 1928. The list of his credits would stretch around the block, yet he’s a name almost no one remembers, except when he directed Lana Turner and John Garfield in The Postman Always Rings Twice. Garnett did on film what my dear wife, Mary Philips, failed to do on Broadway in the stage version. But, then, Lana Turner’s a tough act for any woman to follow.”

During the production of Stand-In, Howard seemed primarily obsessed with the formation of his own theatrical troupe. Using it as a vehicle, he was planning a new film production of Pygmalion, a 1938 adaptation of George Bernard Shaw’s play.

Howard was bursting with ideas and creativity, making Bogie slightly jealous, even though he was devoted to the actor. Throughout the shoot, Howard kept urging him to get better roles before he turned forty. “You’re a marvelous actor, but they’re putting you in crap.”

During the course of the shoot, Howard invited Bogie to join him for a screening of a Swedish film, Intermezzo, the story of a romantic melodrama about the affair between a famous but married violinist and a student of the classical piano.

“It stars a young actress named Ingrid Bergman,” Howard said. “She’s the next Garbo. Exquisitely beautiful, soft spoken, intelligent, and sexy in a way that show-gal types like our dear brassy friend Joan Blondell can never duplicate. She brings to the screen a raw emotional power that’s hard to find. I’m campaigning to have Intermezzo made into an English-language film, with me playing the violinist, Ingrid repeating her role as the pianist. What did you think of her?”

“I’m in awe,” Bogie said. “But more than that, I’m in love. Get her to Hollywood as soon as possible. When you finish seducing her, give her to me. Instead of Mayo Methot, I want Ingrid Bergman as my next wife.”

“Back in the 1930s and 40s, or even today, it was not unusual for a man to fall in love with a screen image,” said Claire Trevor. “Bogie talked about this Swede so much I think he was hopelessly smitten. He knew nothing about her. Maybe she was a lesbian for all he knew. I just knew that Leslie Howard, who screws every woman he meets, would get into& Bergman’s panties first. Bogie was waiting in& the wings, his tongue hanging out like a panting dog. That poor Swedish girl just wouldn’t have a chance when faced with those two.”

Joan Blondell
“Here’s looking at you, kid.”

In later years, perhaps to cover her infidelity, Blondell claimed that, “I did not warm to Mr. Bogart. He wasn’t a man one ever felt close to—nobody did. But I liked him.”

In private with trusted friends, she changed the scenario. “I liked him more than a lot. Perhaps he should have married me instead of Mayo Methot. Of course, there was that problem I was having with Dick Powell. I loved him too.”

In many scenes from Stand-In, Blondell stole the picture from Bogie and Howard, especially when she performed a savage travesty of Shirley Temple singing “On the Good Ship Lollipop.” She had snappy dialogue, as when she told Howard, cast as a visitor to the studio, that the star must never be “fatigued or mussed and above all she must never be so vulgar as to perspire. Her stand-in does her sweating for her.”

After all his heavy emoting on the stage and screen, Howard was praised by some reviewers for his attempt at comedy. Bogie, to his fury, was completely left out of many reviews. “I might as well have landed on the cutting room floor,” he told Mayo Methot.

“I believe you would,” Bogie said, cautioning her. “But that might be taking it a bit far.”

“Then I’ll break a beer bottle over your head for accepting such a dumb role,” she threatened.

When Stand-In opened, because of its all-star cast, it drew a moderate box office but did little to advance the careers of any of its stars. Bogie told director Tay Garnett, “Every day I go to the mirror and notice another line under my eye. When will that big break come for me?”

“You have to remember that for much of the world there’s no such thing in life as the big break.”

“Yeah, don’t remind me,” he said. “See you& on our next picture, if there’s ever going to be one for me.”

“There is,” Garnett said, smiling.

“Wipe that smile off your face.” Bogie said. “Don’t tell me. I know already. I’m not even sloppy seconds, but the fourth lead once again.”

“No, you have the leading role this time,” Garnett said.

“Now you’re talking my language,” Bogie said.

“Not so fast,” Garnett said. “I hear it’s a hillbilly musical set in the Ozarks.”

“Don’t kid a kidder like me,” Bogie said, walking away. He’d traversed less than a block on the studio lot before he came to a standstill and lit a cigarette. “Could it be true?”

He put through a call to Joan Blondell. She had a friend in the script department who told her everything going on at Warners.

But when he finally reached Blondell, he found her in the hospital where she was on the verge of a nervous breakdown and also suffering from neuritis. She did indeed know about Bogie’s upcoming picture, Swing Your Lady, because she’d already been contracted for the role of the romantic female lead.

“It’s crap,” she said. “Some hillbilly romp. You’re supposed to be some low-rent wrestling promoter in the Ozarks. I don’t think it’s a good idea to jeopardize my health for this cornpone hee-haw.”

He agreed with her, remaining with her that afternoon. When she fell asleep, he read the script, detesting his role as the barnstorming promoter Ed Hatch interacting with a dim-witted wrestler, “Joe Skopapoulos,” to be played by Nat Pendleton.

Bogie lied to Methot, claiming that he was escorting his mentally ill sister Frances on a boat trip to Catalina Island. Instead he invited Blondell for a short recuperative holiday. It was while staying in a hotel in Avalon, on Catalina Island, that she sent a telegram to Jack Warner, asserting that she was not willing to jeopardize her health by appearing in Swing& Your Lady.

She also objected strenuously to working again with director Ray Enright, who’d helmed her in a string of pictures that began in 1933 with Blondie Johnson. More recently, Enright had directed her alongside Pat O’Brien in Back in Circulation. “I didn’t like the picture, and I didn’t like Enright,” she said. “I’m letting Jack Warner know that I’m tired of getting lousy parts in lousy pictures.”

Although shortly after that, the studio placed Blondell on suspension without pay, Bogie showed up on the first day of shooting ready to take the lead. Nagging doubts hung over his head. Several people—not just Blondell— had already told him, “It’s a lousy picture—it shouldn’t even be made.”

Like Blondell, Bogie wasn’t impressed with the picture’s director, Enright, who had once been a gag writer for Mack Sennett comedies. Three years older than Bogie, this Indiana-born director helmed 73 films between 1927 and 1953. “Fuck,” he told Blondell, “Enright first directed Rin-Tin-Tin. From the Wonder Dog to me.”

“Don’t make an enemy of him,” Blondell said. “If I know Jack Warner, Enright will be directing you again.” Bogie found that out for himself when he showed up to shoot The Wagons Roll at Night.

When Jack Warner asked Enright how he thought Bogie was doing as the lead in Swing Your Lady, the director replied, “He shows up on time.”

“Talk about damning with faint praise,” Warner said. “I’d give Bogie better parts, but what beautiful gal would want to end up with his ugly kisser in the final reel?”

Bogie was shocked to learn that his leading lady was Louise Fazenda, whose husband, Hal B. Wallis, was the top producer at Warners. Behind his back, Wallace had become known as “The Prisoner of Fazenda.” He’d married Louise in 1927.

Cast into a comic role in Swing Your Lady, Louise had worked with Mack Sennett and had been a rival of silent screen comedienne Mabel Normand. Fazenda created the archtypical country bumpkin, with multiple pigtails, spit curls, and calico dresses, later inspiring both Minnie Pearl and Judy Canova.

Bogie met her near the end of her long and distinguished career. “I found her plain-looking, but a highly gifted performer,” he said. “Let’s face it: Wallis has his pick of the most beautiful women in America, but for some reason he chose Louise—you figure.”

In Swing Your Lady, Louise was cast as “Sadie Horn,” a mountaineer Amazon who plies the blacksmithing trade.

Based on the script, Bogie interpreted the film as a vehicle for the showcasing of Louise. In one hokey scene, she misunderstands him, thinking he’s asking her if she wants to wrestle him. As part of a deft physical assault, she throws him to the ground. Looking down at him, she says, “Now say Hootie Owl.”

In the second lead, the always-reliable character actor, Frank McHugh, was cast as “Popeye Bronson.” Coming from a theatrical family, this Pennsylvania-born actor, only a year older than Bogie, could always be counted on to deliver a standard but competent performance.

Often cast as a sidekick, providing comedy relief, he would eventually appear in some 150 films and TV productions and work with nearly every major star on the Warner lot. Bogie had worked with him previously in Bullets or Ballots, where he’d been billed right after Bogie.

After Blondell turned down the role of Cookie Shannon, the part was shortened and assigned to perky Penny Singleton.

Bogie told McHugh, “To judge from her pictures, she’s the only one who looks good enough to fuck on this stinker.”

In a previous incarnation of her career, back when she’d been billed as “Penny McNulty,” Singleton sang and danced with Milton Berle and Gene Raymond.

Bogie knew that Singleton had recently married. One day on the set, he took a bad fall and chipped his tooth. Singleton drove him over to meet her dentist husband, Dr. Laurence Scogga Singleton.

The much married Penny Singleton (top) also had eyes for Ronald Reagan

The following week on the set Bogie doubted how strong her marriage was. He spotted her with a handsome young actor who had been cast as Jack Miller in a minor role in Swing Your Lady. Recognizing him, Bogie walked over to shake his hand.

“Mr. Bogart, we meet again,” said the fresh-faced Ronald Reagan.

“I don’t mean to interrupt you two love-birds,” Bogie said, “but I wanted to say hi and wish you well.”

Reagan had been cast as a fast-talking sports reporter, which he’d been in real life. He told Bogie, “I don’t have much to do but make dumb wisecracks.”

“Don’t worry, kid,” Bogie said. “This is Hollywood. By 1940 you’ll be taking home your first Oscar. The good roles will come your way.”

“Thanks, Mr. Bogart. Or do you want me to call you Bogie.”

“Mr. Bogart will do,” he said. He turned to walk away. But he decided to make one final comment. His provocative remarks were already known on the Warner lot as “pulling a Bogie.”

As Reagan seated himself, Bogie looked him over carefully and then checked out Singleton as if appraising a heifer on the block. “Look, Penny, if this young and inexperienced guy can’t satisfy you, I’ll write down my number. Sometimes, in certain matters, experience is better than looks unless you like to break in novices.”

“I’m fully booked, Mr. Bogart, but thanks for the offer,” she said.

Unknown to Singleton, who was a brunette at the time, she was about to dye her locks blonde and appear as the comic strip character “Blondie” in a popular series that would run from 1938 to 1950.

Later, Bogie was surprised to learn that Singleton wasn’t the dumb bottle blonde he’d initially thought she was. She became the first woman president of an AFL-CIO union and led a strike by the Radio City Rockettes.

“The fucking bitch is a rabble-rouser,” Bogie told Ann Sheridan. “But the question remains, did Reagan get to fuck her?”

When Swing Your Lady opened, Bogie called Blondell. “You were right, babe. Across the country it was hissed off the screen.”

Swing Your Lady took in less than $25,000 at the box office, but Jack Warner wasn’t willing to let Bogie go. “Taking one more chance on the ass-hole, I’m upping his salary to $1,100 per week.”

In time Harry Medved and Randy Lowell would select Swing Your Lady to appear in their book, The Fifty Worst Films of All Time (and How They Got That Way).

Realizing too late that it had been a mistake to make it at all, Jack Warner pulled the plug on Swing Your Lady after it had run for only two nights across the country. He quickly replaced it with another Warner feature.

Bogie told the press, " Swing Your Lady is the worst film I've ever made." Of course, he had expressed those exact sentiments about some of his other movies.

Mary Philips had appeared as Nurse Ferguson in the 1932 adaptation of Ernest Hemingway's novel, A Farewell to Arms, starring Gary Cooper and Helen Hayes, but her screen appearances were very limited. However, in 1936 and into the early months of 1937, she decided to give a film career one more chance.

For a few seasons, she worked on several films back to back, appearing in supporting roles but "never as a star," she said. All her films were released in& 1937.

Wings Over Honolulu starred Wendy Barrie and Ray Milland. Ironically, that same year Bogie appeared with Barrie in Dead End. Later, Mary told her husband that Milland had made a pass at her.

As Good as Married starred John Boles, Doris Nolan, Walter Pidgeon, and Mary. On set Mary spent most of her time talking to a fellow co-star, Katharine Alexander, who had been one of Bogie's first steady girlfriends— that is, until he introduced her to his best friend at the time, Bill Brady Jr., who moved in and stole Katharine's heart. On the set together, Mary and Katharine shared many memories of their days in New York.

That Certain Woman saw Mary and Katharine having yet another reunion when they were cast in a film starring Bette Davis and Henry Fonda. Mary later told Bogie that "Bette and I spent many long hours discussing you, and I must tell you her impression of you isn't exactly favorable."

"Tell me something I don't know," Bogie said.

On the set of The Bride Wore Red, Mary hardly got to meet her co-stars, Joan Crawford and Franchot Tone. "They were so into each other, and screwing so much between takes, that they didn't have time for any of us," Mary said.

In her films (top row), Mary Philips was always a minor player. She never made it in Hollywood movies the way she did on Broadway.

On the set of Mannequin, Mary was teamed against Joan Crawford who was co-starring with Spencer Tracy. Bogie felt nervous about Mary discussing him with his best pal, Tracy, and also with Crawford.

Mary was very blunt. "You may think Spencer is your best pal, but he put his hand up my dress."

"I'm not surprised," Bogie said, taking the revelation calmly. "I long ago told Spence that it was you who suggested that we 'date' other people when we worked on different coasts. He probably just wanted to check out what turned me on so long ago. Did you guys do it?"

"That is for me to know and you never to find out. Not only did the male star of the movie come on to me, so did the female star."

“If it’s Joan Crawford, I wouldn’t put it past her.”

During the final months of her marriage, Mary spent far more time in the bed of Kenneth MacKenna than she did with her husband. By the time a hearing was held as part of her divorce proceedings from Bogie, her marriage to him had ended long before.

In the sweltering heat of an August day in Los Angeles, Judge Ruben S. Schmidt called his court to order.

In one corner sat Bogie with his lawyer. On the other side sat Mary Philips in a demure gray dress that made her look far older than her years. She was accompanied by her lawyer, Harry E. Sokolove, and family friend and theatrical agent, Mrs. Mary Baker, who had made several attempts in the past to bring the estranged couple back together.

In the courtroom, Mary Philip’s voice was almost inaudible, despite her status as a Broadway actress used to projecting to the balcony. She seemed on the verge of tears, and her testimony was emotional and brief.

“My husband has told me that he doesn’t love me,” she said.

“How often did he tell you that?” the judge asked her.

“Frequently,” she claimed.

“My husband was rarely at home,” she continued. “When he came home, he never told me where he had been.” She was careful to omit her own infidelities with Kenneth MacKenna and Roland Young.

Mary Baker was called as a witness, and her testimony was brief. “In my presence, as a close friend of the family, I often heard Mr. Bogart tell his wife that he no longer cared for her. I also heard him say that ‘married life is too monotonous and does not give me the freedom I crave.’”

The court also heard testimony that the couple spent many months of their married life living apart on different coasts and that they had been separated since January 25, 1937.

The judge granted the divorce. Mary did not ask for alimony. It had been determined that as a working actress on Broadway during most of the span of their relationship, she had earned more money than Bogie did, and that she had often functioned in the past as her husband’s sole means of support.

At the end of the courtroom proceedings, Bogie said nothing but shook her gloved hand. Her eyes did not meet his. The first to leave the courtroom, he walked out alone.

Waiting for him across the street in a coffee shop was a very impatient Mayo Methot.

Her first words to Bogie provoked the beginning of what would become hundreds of fights. “Well,” she said, “did you finally divorce the whore?”

Months before the formal debut of their marriage, Methot and Bogie became known as “The Battling Bogarts.” Many of their feuds were carried out at public watering holes. David Niven in his memoir, Bring on the Empty Horses, described one such encounter:

He’d met Bogie when he had been loaned by Warner Brothers to Samuel Goldwyn to make Dead End.

The two actors agreed to meet for lunch one day at the Formosa Café, since both were aware that the other was, on occasion, dating Ann Sheridan.

“We did not like each other very much,” Niven claimed. “I found his aggressively tough and his needling manner rather tiresome. We parted with expressions of mutual respect and a determination from then on to avoid each other like the plague.”

Niven, along with other observers, noted that Methot, with “conspicuous cleavage,” matched Bogie drink for drink whenever they went out in public. But unlike her escort, she was unable to handle her liquor. It was obvious to many observers that she was becoming deeply entrenched as an alcoholic.

As part of a chance encounter one night at La Maze, a restaurant on Sunset Strip, Niven was seated six tables away from Bogie and Methot. His date for the night was Ann Sheridan. At that time, Methot was& unaware that Bogie was slipping off to see Sheridan on occasion, usually when they made a picture together. The two couples nodded politely to each other.

Later in the evening from their position across the room, Niven and Sheridan became aware that a burly drunk in a tacky yellow-and-green plaid jacket was trying to pick a fight with Bogie. “You’re not so tough,” the drunk shouted at Bogie. “I could knock you out flat with one punch.”

As a small man, Bogie usually tried not to engage in physical violence with drunks. But the bully kept stabbing his forefinger into Bogie’s modest chest.

Niven with the Oomph Girl tried to duck under their table. The table was too small so they crawled to the nearest retreat. Within five minutes, Bogie on all fours crawled across the floor to them. Seeing them, he assured them, “Everything’s okay—Mayo’s handling it. I wish I’d brought a fork, though. I might be able to jab the bastard in the leg.”

Sheridan later said, “For David and me, it was a moment of high drama. For Bogie and Methot, it was just another typical night. More fun was on the way. Slashed wrists. An arson attempt by her on their house. Stabbing him with a butcher knife.”

Bogie told Claire Trevor, Ann Sheridan, Joan Blondell, Spencer Tracy, and any friend who would listen, that, “I hate Jack Warner. The fucker blames me for the failure of Swing Your Lady. I hate Warner Brothers; I hate the parts I’m assigned; I detest the studio system itself. Swing Your Lady causes a greenish pile to form in my gut.”

Finally, over another drink, he asked Tracy, “Are you sure that Clark Gable is& not going to play Rhett Butler? What about Gary Cooper?”

With a heavy heart, Bogie awaited his next acting assignment.

No longer a gangster, Bogie found himself cast as the Deputy Commissioner of Correction, running a reformatory school in Crime School (1938). His leading lady this time was the unknown Gale Page, with Billy Halop, one of the Dead End Kids, co-starring. Once again, Bogie was appearing with the Dead End Kids, not only Billy but Huntz Hall and Leo Gorcey. Vincent Sherman, who would become an A-list director and helm pictures for Bogie, was the co-author of the screenplay along with Crane Wilbur.

Lewis Seiler, the director, rushed to welcome Bogie to the set as if he were a major star. "At least there's somebody on the Warner lot who respects me," he told Billy.

Bogie sized Seiler up as a lightweight and determined that he would more or less have to direct himself. Seiler had come to Hollywood in 1919 as a gag man and had worked in two-reel comedies before hooking up with Tom Mix during the 1920s in a series of Westerns. Before he left Hollywood, he would attach his name to two A-list pictures, Pittsburgh (1942), with Marlene Dietrich and John Wayne, and Guadalcanal Diary (1943), with Preston Foster. Between 1923 and 1958, he would direct 88 films, most of them undistinguished.

Heading to Los Angeles from the northwest—Spokane, Washington, to be exact— Gale Page became one of Bogie's less distinguished leading ladies. Her most famous role would be with Ronald Reagan, not Bogie. In 1940 she appeared in Knute Rockne—All American.

In a phone call after the first week of shooting, Joan Blondell asked Bogie, "Have& you already fallen in love with your leading lady?"

"Gale's nice enough, a pretty brunette, but much too wholesome for me. Privately, Seiler and I have agreed that she was cast just for decoration in this potboiler. I predict she'll have a short career before retiring to the kitchen as a dutiful housewife rattling pots and pans."

Leo Gorcey was "full of himself" in Bogie's words, especially in the commissary when he was bragging that he'd played Joan Crawford's brother in Mannequin. "I'm not gonna be 'Spit' in the Dead End Kids forever."

"Did Crawford seduce you?" Bogie asked.

“Well, not really,” Gorcey said.

“Then you’re not going to be a star. Before you can become a really big star in Hollywood, you’ve got to get fucked by Crawford.”

Although Bogie had worked previously with Billy Halop in Dead End, he didn’t really get to know him until they made Crime School together. What caught his attention was one reviewer who called Billy “the next Humphrey Bogart.” Bogie’s response to that was, “the original Humphrey Bogart is still around and isn’t going to Forest Lawn any time soon.”

When he really met Billy and had some time to talk to him between takes, he actually came to like the kid. “He brought out the father side of me,” he told Blondell. “I don’t plan to have any kids in life, so Billy is the next best thing.”

Billy had been one of the original Dead End Kids on Broadway in that stage hit, Dead End, in 1935. Samuel Goldwyn had brought him to Hollywood. In the early 1940s Billy abandoned his association with the other Dead End Kids, seeking a career of his own. To his regret, he could land parts only in B pictures.

Even as early as the period when he met Bogie, when he was still a teenager, Billy was already battling alcoholism. In the decades to come, Bogie would stand on the sidelines, watching his protégé through a series of money problems and marital disasters.

Billy seemed pleased with the salary he was pulling in for Crime School : $275 a week. “But they’re gonna raise me to $650 a week—at least that’s what I was told,” he said to Bogie.

One night Billy’s car had to be hauled off to the garage. “Damn,” he told Bogie. “I’ve been screwing this hot chick. She’s a singer and has a gig tonight at this dance joint in Santa Monica.”

“Is it just for teenagers?” Bogie asked.

“Well, my girlfriend, Mayo Methot, likes to dance,” Bogie said. “Tell you what. I’ll take you and your gal to Santa Monica, and we’ll have some fun. People seeing us together will think we’re your parents serving as chaper-ones.”

With Mayo in the front seat with him, and Billy in the back, Bogie drove to the house of Billy’s girlfriend.

The girl must have been looking out the window. Billy didn’t have to ring the doorbell. She came running out to the car.

Even younger than Billy, this teenager was a bundle of nervous energy. Without waiting for Billy to introduce her, she jumped into the back seat. “Hi, I’m Judy Garland. I know all about you from Spencer Tracy. He took my cherry when I was only fifteen.”

“Now that’s how I like a gal to introduce herself,” Bogie said. He’d never met a teenager like Garland before. Already, even though she was just breaking into Hollywood, she gave the impression of a battle-scarred show business veteran. Later he’d say, “When Judy sang ‘Born in a Trunk,’ I believed her.”

“I lost my virginity to dear old dad,” Methot chimed in as a rejoinder to Garland’s revelation. “I was only fourteen.”

“Now let’s keep it cooled down,” Bogie said as a warning to Methot. He couldn’t help but notice that she was already drunk. She’d taken a flask so they’d have liquid refreshment during the long drive to Santa Monica.

As the evening evolved, neither of "The Battling Bogarts" were able to fulfill their duties as "chaperones" who'd drive their "charges" back home. Billy took the wheel and delivered the smashing drunk chaperones back to Bogie's home, leaving his car parked in front. He and Garland took a taxi back to where they were going.

"That kid's got something," Bogie said about Judy Garland the next morning over coffee with Methot. "I found it thrilling to hear her sing. She really got to me. I think she's going to topple that Deanna Durbin from her throne."

"Deanna Durbin," Methot said with contempt. "She may be the favorite singer of Winston Churchill and Joseph Stalin, but I can't stand the little stuck-up bitch."

Later, when Crime School was released, Bogie told Spencer Tracy and Joan Blondell that "I am seriously pissed off." Because of the growing popularity of the Dead End Kids, they received top billing over him in Crime School. In posters advertising the film, the names of the Dead End Kids appeared in typeface larger than Bogie's in movie posters and newspaper advertising.

Most mornings, usually over coffee, Bogie was a faithful reader of Sidney Skolsky's column "The Gospel Truth." In one of its editions he read: "Humphrey Bogart will marry Mayo Methot in September when his divorce from Mary Phillips (sic) is finalized. She will marry Kenneth McKenna (sic), who was formerly married to Kay Francis, who will marry Baron Barenekow."

(bottom photo)
Bogie with Priscilla Lane.

Did he really seduce all three of the Lane sisters?

"At least Skolsky spelled my name right," Bogie said.

Bette Davis phoned Bogie that week with the news. “I got the news before you did,” she said. “Warners has just informed me that you and I will be co-starring in a new film together, with me getting star billing, of course. It’s called Men Are Such Fools. I haven’t seen the script yet, but I just adore the title.”

Two weeks later, Bogie still hadn’t received a copy of the script. Instead, he got a call from Joan Blondell. “Duckie, it looks like we’re going to be starring in a new film together. It’s called Men Are Such Fools.”

“What about a certain Miss Bette Davis?” he asked.

“Oh, she’s out the door. I’m in.”

By the end of the week, Bogie learned that Blondell was out of the picture too, the lead female role now going to Priscilla Lane.

When Warner Brothers finally contacted Bogie that his next picture was to be Men Are Such Fools, and the director was to be Busby Berkeley, his reaction was, “You’ve got to be& kidding. I don’t wear feathers and boas, and I don’t dance, at least not on camera.”

Warners was insistent, however, claiming he’d be with such previous “film mates” as Penny Singleton and Priscilla Lane. The catch was that Bogie was assigned the third lead. The star of the picture would be Wayne Morris. “The big lug,” Bogie said. “If you look good on camera, you can be dumb as a carrot but shoot right to stardom.”

In addition to Singleton, Bogie’s other love interest in the film would be Mona Barrie, playing a sardonic vamp. Before hooking up with Lane and Singleton again, Bogie met the English-born Barrie, who’d begun her career as a teenage ballerina.

He told his director, Berkeley, “Talk about a kid who’s going nowhere in pictures. She’ll get two or three more film jobs, and it’ll be all over for that one. The only woman she can play on camera is the one who loses the man.”

It’s true that Barrie’s career would fade into the setting sun by the early 1950s, but in the meantime she would appear in secondary roles in some fifty motion pictures, earning a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

Morris, as the film’s romantic lead, was being groomed as Warner’s answer to MGM’s Robert Taylor. Newspapers were billing him as “Hollywood’s latest hearthhthrob.”

“You’ve worked with Morris before in Kid Galahad,” Berkeley said to Bogie. “Do you think he can carry this picture as the male lead?”

“I think if you tossed Morris a football, he could run to the goalpost,” Bogie said. “As an actor, he’s tall and blond and some say handsome. I also hear he’s got a big dick.”

“The first qualifications are just fine,” Berkeley said. “But I don’t get that about the big dick. We can’t show that on camera.”

“Why not?” Bogie asked. “The day will come in film when you can. Why not be the first? Also showing big dicks on the screen will increase attendance from women and homosexual guys.”

Based on a magazine article by Faith Baldwin, the plot of Men Are Such Fools was weak. Lane played a woman who wanted both a career and a husband simultaneously, with Morris playing her spouse, an ex-football star. Bogie was cast into the role of a sleazy advertising big shot who will help Lane’s career if she’ll be “nice” to him.

Bogie had initially thought he’d despise Berkeley on sight. But the two men bonded, each finding that the other was a drinking man. Although he’d reigned as one of the most creative directors in Hollywood, Berkeley was late into his career and deep into alcoholism when he made Men Are Such Fools.

“If I recall, and I do, Busby and Bogie drank a lot during the shooting of that picture,” said Priscilla Lane.

Although much of Hollywood thought Berkeley was gay because of his outlandish musical extravaganzas, he was a notorious womanizer.

Eddie Cantor said, after seeing Golden Diggers in 1937, “Only a flamer would feature 75 helmet-wearing dancers carrying drums and flags with 50 oversized white rocking chairs, each one big enough for three.”

Berkeley admitted to Bogie that he went from woman to woman, but had nothing but failed relationships. “I can’t satisfy a woman, yet I lust after them.”

“Sounds like you got a real problem there,” Bogie said, embarrassed at hearing such a personal revelation.

Busby Berkeley directed 42nd Street (1933).

Bogie told Berkeley he drank because he wanted to, but Berkeley said he did it to control his nervousness. He’d been through several highly traumatic experiences in 1935, his divorce from his fourth wife, Merna Kennedy, being the smallest of his problems.

He’d attended a party thrown by William Koenig to celebrate the completion of In Caliente (1935). On the way back home, he crashed into two cars.

Defended by hotshot attorney Jerry Giesler, Berkeley was put on trial for murder, not manslaughter.

Two passengers had been killed and five others seriously injured in the accident. Berkeley was badly cut and bruised. Hauled into court on a stretcher, he heard witnesses testify that they smelled liquor on his breath. They also testified that Berkeley whizzed down Roosevelt Highway, cut out of line, crashed headlong into one car, and then sideswiped another.

After two trials, each ending in hung juries, Berkeley was acquitted in a third and final trial.

“This Giesler sounds like a great phone number to have,” Bogie told& Berkeley. “I’m gonna need him when I finally get around to killing Mayo Methot.”

On the set, Bogie and Singleton shared their mutual despair over the bomb they’d made, Swing Your Lady. She also confessed that, “Ronnie got away from me,” meaning Ronald Reagan. “Among others, he’s dating a gal named Jane Wyman.”

Priscilla Lane came up to Bogie and said, “When you worked with my sister, Lola, on Marked Woman, she told me all about you, you wolf.”

“Did she also tell you how good I am in bed?” he asked provocatively.

“Watch those come-ons with me,” she said. “I look like a sweet and innocent gal, but I’m not. I might take you up on that.”

Maybe she did take him up on his proposition. Bogie remains the only source of his claim to his pals that he seduced each of the three Lane sisters.

He was yet to work with Rosemary Lane, but in a few months he’d be co-starring with her in The Oklahoma Kid.

During the shoot, Bogie shifted his attention to a young Carole Landis, who got 17th billing.

When he met her, he told her, “You are the most beautiful woman working in movies today.”

“A compliment like that will get you anywhere,” Landis said.

And so it did.

Landis got the part in the movie because of Berkeley, who was her boyfriend and supporter.

Landis agreed to date Bogie but they had to slip around and conduct a clandestine affair, since Berkeley was hot on her trail, wanting her to marry him, and Bogie had his stalker, the fierce and occasionally violent Mayo Methot.

Without attempting to make Ann Sheridan jealous, Bogie told her that “Carole is my kind of woman. She broke into show business on the casting couch. That’s how a gal should do it.”

He found Carole strikingly beautiful, but terribly insecure. She seemed to be searching for love and not finding it. He was certain that her extraordinary beauty would win her many men, but not one with whom she could ever build a lasting relationship.

Their affair ended when the shoot was over. “It was brief, but memorable,” he said. “Call it An Affair to Remember.”

Even though he no longer saw Landis, he remained intrigued by her.

When he saw the final cut of Men Are Such Fools, producer Hal Wallis said, “I should have junked the whole thing. Let’s re-title it Hanky Panky in an Ad Agency.”

No complete version of Men Are Such Fools exists today. In the footage that does exist, Landis does not appear. Just a few months earlier, she’d worked with the same stars, Wayne Morris and Priscilla Lane, on a picture called Love, Honor and Behave.

In the years ahead, Bogie often speculated that he should have married Landis instead of Methot. He eagerly listened to any news of her tragic final years in the 1940s and was titillated by the streams of gossip swirling around her.

In 1945, he heard that Landis was appearing in a Broadway musical called A Lady Said Yes.

Jacqueline Susann, who later became one of the world’s best-selling novelists, had been cast into the same show. The talk of Broadway was that Landis and Susann were sustaining a torrid lesbian affair. When Susann wrote her blockbuster book, Valley of the Dolls, she based the character of Jennifer North on Landis.

Bogie was deeply saddened by the death of Landis, presumably by suicide. The date was July 5, 1948, and at the time, Landis was only twenty-nine years old.

Landis had spent her last night with her lover, actor Rex Harrison. On the final evening of her life, he had told her that he would not divorce his wife, Lilli Palmer, that he planned to resuscitate his marriage, and that he was ending his affair. Reportedly, Landis threatened Harrison that she'd reveal the details of their affair to the newspapers.

A maid discovered her dead the next afternoon on the bathroom floor of her Pacific Palisades home. She'd overdosed on Seconal and had left two suicide notes, one for her mother,& the second for Harrison. The maid gave Harrison the note, and he destroyed it.

At a coroner's inquest, Harrison denied there was a second note and claimed he knew of no reason why Landis would consider killing herself.

There was underground speculation that Harrison was responsible for Landis' death, faking a suicide when it was actually murder. He apparently feared that a revelation of marital infidelity would destroy his stellar career.

Bogie always maintained that Harrison—"that limey bastard"—had arranged for Landis' death. "No one can convince me otherwise," he said.

Since he had no real star power at Warners, Bogie more or less had to take whatever roles he was assigned. Often he found out what role he was slated for by reading the trade papers. Previously known for its black-and-white films, Warners was moving more and more into Technicolor.

He'd heard that George Brent and Wayne Morris were set to star in Valley of the Giants, a Peter B. Kyne story about lumber camps in the Northwest.

On March 30, 1938, he picked up a newspaper paper and read an item by Elizabeth Yeaman. Brent was off the picture, having been replaced by Bogie himself. "Oh, no, not Wayne Morris again," he shouted at Methot. "And, to top it off, my puss in Technicolor."

Yeaman predicted that Valley of the Giants "will be a bigger opportunity for Bogart, who has plugged along delivering villainous supporting roles, but always turning in a good performance."

Like so many previous casting announcements, this one fell through for Bogie. Valley of the Giants (1938) was filmed without him. Morris kept his starring role but Bogie's part went to Frank McHugh, appearing in the film with Claire Trevor taking the female lead.

When director Anatole Litvak sent over a script called The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse, Bogie read it but wasn't impressed. To Methot, he disparagingly referred to this movie as "The Amazing Doctor Clitoris."

“I don’t even get to play Dr. Clit,” Bogie told Methot. “The lead goes to the ugliest man in Hollywood, Edward G. Robinson. Alongside him, I look like Tyrone Power. Ronald Colman turned down the lead. Smart guy, that Colman. Would you believe my character is called Rocks Valentine? Who makes up crap like this? Some of the other characters include Pat Pal, Rabbit, Tug, and Popus Poopus. One guy, Billy Wayne, plays Candy. If we ever have a son, let’s call him Candy. He’ll learn to be tough when the bullies beat him up every day in the schoolyard.”

This was one of the most bizarre gangster films Warners ever turned out.

As Dr. Clitterhouse, Robinson wants to understand the criminal mind. To gain first-hand knowledge, he becomes a criminal himself, committing several jewelry heists.

He joins up with a “fence,” surprisingly played by Claire Trevor, who negotiates deals with a gang of safecrackers headed by Rocks (Bogie himself).

In a weird twist, near the end, Dr. Clitterhouse gives Rocks a poisoned drink so he can study his reactions while he goes into his death throes.

On the set Bogie asked Robinson, “How many times are you gonna kill me in the movies before I die off?”

Bogie is caught between The Beauty (Claire Trevor) and The Beast, (Edward G. Robinson), whom Bogie called “Dr. Clit.”

Bogie later claimed that Robinson had his mind on everything but playing the role of Dr. Clitterhouse. “All he talked about was the oncoming war in Europe. He was supporting every group opposed to Hitler and contributing a lot of dough. Because many of the groups he joined were pro-Stalin or pro-Soviet Union, he was later accused of being a Communist.”

By late 1949, Robinson was being attacked by such ilk as Gerald I.K. Smith, the moving force behind the Knights of the White Camellia, an anti-Semitic, anti-Black group. “Robinson is one of Stalin’s main agents in Hollywood,” Smith charged. “A part of the Stalin machine. He should be put in a Federal Penitentiary.”

On the set Bogie hoped to resume his warm, cozy relationship with co-star, Claire Trevor, but she was planning to marry CBS producer Clark Andrews, so she had cooled her ardor for him. “Let’s be friends,” she told him. And so they did.

Born in Kiev, Anatole Litvak, the director, was married to actress Miriam Hopkins when he arrived on the set to direct Robinson and Bogart in The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse.

“Miriam and I just might take your title away from you,” Litvak told him. “The Battling Bogarts” might be replaced& by “The Battling Litvaks.” Miriam and I had a knock-out, drag-out—as you Americans say—the other night. I left her.”

“Mayo and I don’t need an excuse to fight,” Bogie said. “What about you and Miriam?”

Three views of Miriam Hopkins

“That’ll do it every time,” Bogie said. “Women are so different from men. We’re made to have affairs.”

“My dear boy, so are women,” Litvak said.

Three days later, Bogie was only mildly surprised to encounter Bette Davis slipping onto the set for a rendezvous with Litvak, whom she referred to as “Tola.” That same year of the Clitterhouse movie, Litvak would direct Davis in The Sisters.

With Davis and Litvak occupied in their torrid love affair, Bogie was left alone on the set to greet Gale Page, with whom he’d made Crime School, a film in which he’d been the star and Page his leading lady. Now in The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse, he was reduced to third billing, but she fared even worse, having been demoted to sixth billing in her role as Nurse Randolph.

“I thought Crime School was going to make you a big star,” he said to Page. “At least, that’s what you told me. What happened?”

“You’re such a needler,” Page said. “I don’t need to be reminded about how I’m not setting the world on fire. Perhaps there will be a scene between us in this picture where I, as your nurse, get to stick a very long needle in your ass.”

“You’d do anything to see my ass, wouldn’t you now?” Bogie asked.

“You don’t have one of the great asses of Hollywood, in case you haven’t turned backwards for a look in a full-length mirror.”

“She turned her back on him and started to walk away. “Actually, I’m an ass man myself, and you’ve got a set of buns,& baby."

"You'll never get to enjoy it," she said as her farewell greeting.

"An hour later, Litvak emerged from his bungalow, leaving Davis inside, presumably to repair the damage to her makeup. Bogie walked over to Litvak, but decided not to mention Davis. "I just encountered Gale Page," Bogie said. "Leslie Howard and I have this bet to see who can seduce the largest number of our co-stars, but I just struck out with Page."

"Don't bother with her." Litvak said. "I'll give you my wife's phone number. You can call up dear Miss Miriam Hopkins herself. She'd love to get deep-dicked by you. She's certainly not getting it from me."

"Thanks for the offer of your wife's sevices," Bogie said. "Bette Davis must not find out about this. She positively hates Miriam."

"I know," Litvak said. "Now get back before those cameras and try to give me some emotion this time."

As far as it is known, Bogie never revealed to any of his friends, not even Spencer Tracy, whether he took advantage of Miriam Hopkins' phone number—or not.

In the making of The Sisters, Davis had fought with her director over how a scene should be shot. She called Litvak "stubborn." He called her "very, very stubborn."

When Davis and Bogie met again, he asked her pointedly. "I heard you and Litvak broke up. What happened?"

"It was more than his being a very stupid director," she said. "I found out that he took Paulette Goddard to dinner at Ciro's and spent most of the evening under the table servicing the bitch."

Bogie had a major fight with wardrobe when he was asked to don a bathing suit and dive off the edge of a swimming pool. "I don't have the kind of body I like to show off," he said. "Get Wayne Morris, maybe Johnny Weissmuller."

Finally, Litvak got him to perform the scene in an old-fashioned "shoulder-to-thigh" suit.

John Huston, the future director of Bogie's The African Queen showed up on the set of The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse. He'd written the screenplay with John Wexley, who identified himself to Bogie as "a radical leftist."

That afternoon, Huston would encounter a trio of stars—Robinson, Bogie, and Claire Trevor, all of whom he'd eventually cast in Key Largo (1948), along with Bogie's fourth wife, Lauren Bacall.

Billy Wayne played so many bit parts between 1935 and 1955 that he lost track of the number of times he'd been cast as cabbies, sailors, reporters, and photographers. Bogie asked Litvak to introduce him to the boy playing "Candy." He expected him to be effeminate. If so, Bogie would rib him a bit.

"Hi, Candy," Bogie said, coming up to him. "I play Lollipop in this movie. Maybe we can get together and eat each other?"

Wayne studied him carefully. "You know that scar on your lip, Bogart? Would you like another?"

Bogie had several drinks with supporting players John Litel and Ward Bond. They were part of what became known as the "Warner Bros. Stock Company" in the 1930s, assigned to various supporting roles whenever they came up.

"I'm getting old, guys," Bogie told Litel and Bond. "If I don't make it soon as a number one movie star, I'll be playing character roles with you losers."

Always cast in no-nonsense roles, Litel would appear in more than 200 films. A few times he played the lead in B movies. Bogie would work with him again in They Drive by Night.

Gruff, burly, Nebraska-born Ward Bond became a familiar face to movie-goers of the 1930s and beyond. A favorite of director John Ford, Bond was John Wayne's best friend.

"What do you guys do all the time hanging out together?" Bogie asked.

"We go to bars, get drunk, and start fights," Bond said.

"Sounds like fun," Bogie said. One afternoon when Bogie was complaining to Bond that Warners forced him to make too many movies in one year, "Don't& be a fucking sissy," Bond said. "In 1935 I& acted in thirty movies."

Two views of Ward Bond, the busiest actor in Hollywood and John Wayne's best friend. Bond made a "death oath" with Bogie.

Bond himself would make at least 175 movies. One drunken night Bond and Bogie made a strange pact. Both of them agreed to die before their 60th birthday. "Who wants to live to be 60?" Bogie asked.

"Not me," Bond replied.

Although they may have forgotten their alcohol-sodden vows by the time of their deaths, both Bond and Bogie kept their promise to each other, each of them eventually dying at the ages of 57 and 58, respectively.

The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse earned a profit of $10,000, The New York Times calling it "sad and aimless," the kindest words they had for this turkey.

Bogie later claimed that the role of& Rocks Valentine was "one of my all-time least favorites."

Also cast in the Dr. Clitterhouse movie was Max (Slapsie Maxie) Rosenbloom. Bogie found this former boxer fascinating with his cauliflower ears, fat lips, and punch drunk mug. Instead of chasing women on the set, as he usually preferred to do, Bogie spent long hours talking with Slapsie Maxie, a title bestowed on the boxer by Damon Runyon because of this less-than-classy style of slapping opponents in the ring.

Slapsie Maxie enthralled Bogie with his stories of the ring, but also his tall tales of his gambling and womanizing. He claimed he'd bedded Mae West, and Bogie did not find this unbelievable as Miss West was known to have "this thing" for boxers.

Bogie confessed, "I'm a coward. I run from a fight. But since I play a tough guy on screen, every bully goes after me."

Slapsie Maxie Rosenbloom learned that Mae West had a "thing" for boxers.

Slapsie Maxie agreed to work out with Bogie in the ring to teach him how to defend himself. "I did okay in the ring before I ended up in Hollywood playing Runyon-like thugs and pugs. But I was never a strong puncher in my heyday. I developed this technique of a hit-and-run defensive type of boxing. I'll teach it to you."

"Actually, I wish you would," Bogie said. "Not just to protect myself from bullies, but for another reason. Career advancement. Hollywood is getting ready to make Golden Boy. I want the lead role of a boxer."

"Okay, I'll teach you to box," Slapsie Maxie agreed. The ex-boxer kept his promise, with Bogie working out in the ring with the champ, as Mayo stood on the sidelines, screaming, "Kill the fucker, Bogie. Kill him!"

Bogie continued to see Slapsie Maxie over the years.

In 1943, Bogie showed up at Hollywood's newest night club, Slapsie& Maxie's. Bogie's date that night was Ingrid Bergman.

In just a few years, the boxer, as Bogie observed, was suffering from Paget's disease, actually pugilistica dementia, as a result of continuous blows to his head which he'd endured as a boxer.

"Poor Slapsie Maxie," Bogie later said. "He taught me how to fight. Punch the fucker in the kisser, bloody his nose, and while he's recovering from the blow, run like hell."

On the set Bogie encountered Ronald Reagan again. He was complaining about his meager part as a radio announcer. "They are not even letting me show my face in this film—just my voice."

"Would you say that's better than having to show your ass?" Bogie asked. "Listen to me, Reagan, you're a good looking guy—not my type, but good looking enough, I guess, although I prefer men with more kissable tits. I saw a picture of you without your shirt."

"You're kidding me," Reagan said. "I was told you like to put people on."

"You're gonna go to the top," Bogie said. "I've told you this before. You're going to become a bigger star than I could ever hope to be. It'll take a few more Bs for you, then it's Grade A prime rib beef movie roles for you. As for me, with my kisser, I'm stuck in the Bs. Jack Warner has told every director on the lot that I'm not good looking enough for a romantic role. He also considers me a midget. He complains I'm losing my hair. Then there's the question of my lisp."

"Yes, I was wondering about that," Reagan said. "I was told to stay away from guys who lisp in Hollywood."

“I also got my report card from Jack Warner,” Reagan said. “A little bird told me.”

“Something like that,” Reagan said. “Warner thinks I’m nice looking—of course, that’s damning with faint praise. He says my best quality is my voice, very friendly. As for my acting, he thinks I’m a bit stiff but okay for B pictures. He thinks I have no comic timing, so I can only do drama. But, and here’s the rub, he thinks I have ‘no heat’ on the screen.”

“If you and I did a love scene together, we’d burn up the screen,” Bogie said.

“You’re such a kidder,” Reagan said. “I was warned about you. Fortunately, man-on-man kissing scenes will never be shown on the screen—we can thank God for that.”

“As I said, hang in there,” Bogie said. “You can play romantic leads throughout the 40s and into the 50s. If you’re still around in the 60s, highly unlikely, you’ll have to switch to villain roles.”

“What about you?” Reagan asked. “You still plan to be a villain in the 1960s?”

“No, not me,” Bogie said. “When the 60s roll around, I’ll be resting comfortably in Forest Lawn.”

“I’m going to hang around for two or three more years,” Reagan said. “If I don’t make it, I’m going back home, back to radio.”

Of his early roles, including Swing Your Lady, Reagan later said, “Remember the guy in the movies who rushes into the phone booth, pushes his hat to the back of his head while the tails of his trench coat are still flying, drops a nickel in the box, dials a few numbers and then says, ‘Gimme the city desk. I’ve got a story that’ll split this town wide open!’ That was me.”

Ronald Reagan in his only role as a villain. Whereas John F. Kennedy seduced Angie Dickinson (depicted with Reagan, above), Reagan, a future president, beat her up, but only on screen.

Bogie had met so many young actors like Reagan in Hollywood. As he told Methot, “They start out in bit parts, become romantic stars on the screen, and end up in character roles when the face sags. The hero often becomes an aging villain.”

Indeed that was what happened to Reagan in his last movie, The Killers, based on a story by Ernest Hemingway. He was cast as a powerful underworld figure who beats up on poor Angie Dickinson. A scene of him, with his face contorted in anger, was used against him when he ran for president in 1980. The head read: HE VIOLENTLY

BEAT UP ON ANGIE DICKINSON. AS PRESIDENT, HE'LL DO THE SAME TO AMERICA!

As long as Bogie lived, he'd never forget the way Susan Hayward had approached him on the set of The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse. She was appearing in the film in a minor role.

"Hi, Rocks," she said, using the name of the character he was playing. "I'm Susan Hayward, and I've come to Hollywood to play Scarlett O'Hara. It appears we'll be working together, with you as my Rhett Butler."

He was so stunned by her approach that at first he did not have a ready answer, unusual for him. "You certainly have the hair to play Scarlett," he finally said.

"That's not the issue," she said, standing before him with a hand on her hip. "The question is, do you have the balls to play Rhett Butler?"

"Indeed I do," he shot back, "and I'm ready to start clanking them at any minute."

"Ronald Reagan's already beat you to me," she said.

This surprised Bogie, who felt that Reagan wasn't quite enough of a man to handle Hayward. As he would later tell Claire Trevor, "I wonder if I'm enough of a man to take Hayward."

"If you can deal with Mayo Methot, you can tackle Hayward."

The details are missing, but it appears that Bogie did have a brief fling with Hayward. It seemed to be a tryst he wanted to break off quickly.

Trevor later said that Bogie came to her one day with a horrible problem. "In bed, Hayward claws a man's back like a tigress. How am I going to explain that to Mayo?"

"I've got an idea," Trevor said. "Take her in the kitchen while she's cooking dinner. You remain fully clothed, with only your pants down. Pull up her dress and go at it. Tell her you were overcome with passion and couldn't wait to get to the bedroom and undress."

"Claire, that's why I love you so," he said. "What would I do without you?"

"Learn to live with it," she said. "I'm fully booked."

"The question was only rhetorical."

In later years, he would say, "Susan Hayward was a stunning beauty. But she had a savage heart. In many ways, her granite-hard Brooklynese, feisty spirit evoked Barbara Stanwyck. Susan made it the hard way. From the slums to the stenographers' pool, from the modeling agency to Hollywood's casting couch. She did it her way. What she lacked in talent, she made up for in fierce determination to become a star. We ended up working for different studios, but I think one of the great screen teams of all times would have been Humphrey Bogart and Susan Hayward.& Note the billing, of course."

Susan Hayward

In the final cut of The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse, you don't see Reagan but you hear his voice as a radio& announcer, a job he held before becoming a film actor.

As Hayward lamented to Bogie, “My part in the film ended up on the cutting room floor.”

“Welcome to Hollywood, babe,” Bogie said.

Even though Hayward and Bogie would never work together, she would appear in his life story as a morbid footnote. Bogie and Lauren Bacall were planning on filming Melville Goodwin, U.S.A., a script based on the novel by John P. Marquand.

After Bogie died, Bacall understandably dropped out. Warner Brothers re-titled this 1957 release Top Secret Affair, giving Hayward Bacall’s part and awarding her star billing. Kirk Douglas took the role originally slated for Bogart.

This box office bust was about an aggressive lady publisher seeking to discredit a distinguished war hero. “Too bad Bogie died,” Hayward said upon the release of the film. “I wasted my time and energy on this turkey. He should have lived to make his Last Supper.”

Director Lloyd Bacon called Bogie with the news. “Jack Warner wants you to do another gangster movie. You play the most powerful gangland chief in Manhattan wanting to muscle in on the trucking business.”

“It sounds like something from the bio of George Raft, but I guess he turned it down. What’s the billing?”

“You’re the fucking star,” Bacon said.

“At least that’s an improvement.” Who’s the leading pussy?”

“Gloria Dickson,” Bacon said.

“It’ll be good working with you again, Bogie,” Bacon said, “without that Irish drunk hamming it up.” The director was referring to Bogie’s San Quentin picture, in which he’d co-starred with Pat O’Brien and Ann Sheridan.

The film, Racket Busters, was based on Thomas E. Dewey’s investigations of organized crime in New York City, specifically as they applied to New York City’s trucking businesses. George Brent, Bette Davis’ frequent leading man, was cast as Bogie’s co-star.

Even before meeting him, Bogie had many reasons to dislike Brent, whom he derided as having all the excitement of a tube of paste. His main objection was that Brent had been the lover of Bette Davis ever since the making of So Big in 1932. In the years to come they made a series of pictures together including Golden Arrow in 1936.

Brent was actually married to the star, Ruth Chatterton, and had little interest in Davis, who was still married to Ham Nelson. But Davis still managed to seduce him in her dressing room whenever they made a picture together.

The same year that Racket Busters was released, Brent had been reduced to playing third lead after Davis and Henry Fonda in 1938.

Gloria Dickson

Suddenly, as Davis moved up as the number one star at Warner Brothers, Brent's allure was fading at the box office, although he'd hang on for many years to come.

Bogie had another reason to resent Brent. While casting was being considered by Jack Warner, Bacon had promoted Bogie to play the role of trucker Denny Jordan.

The role of the male lead, an independent truck driver who later rats on the gangland bosses, was clearly the most sympathetic. Bacon cited Black Legion in which Bogie had played a similar role, and suggested he'd be excellent as Denny. Warner turned Bogie down, going for Brent instead.

Since Bogie had to work with Brent, he decided to conceal his hostility and accept his invitation for a game, just assuming Brent meant a game of golf.

Arriving at Brent's home, he was directed to a rifle range out back, one which used focused beams of light from photo-electric cells instead of real bullets.

Little tin rabbits painted in rainbow-hued colors raced across the target, but fell "dead" whenever Brent got a "bead" on one of them with the light from the photo gun.

After about fifteen minutes of target practice, Bogie asked Brent, "Got something strong to drink?"

The rest of the afternoon was spent listening to Brent discuss his role in IRA guerrilla fighting during the Anglo-Irish War (1919-1922). He later fled Ireland with a bounty on his head.

To end the day, Brent, a licensed pilot, took& Bogie on a sightseeing tour at sunset over the California coast.

On the set the following week, Bogie met his co-star Gloria Dickson. "Where you from, kid?"

"Pocatello, Idaho," she said.

"I thought Pocatello, Idaho, was a joke. I didn't know that somebody actually came from there."

Later he said to Bacon, "The gal looks familiar. I must have seen her in something."

"She made an auspicious debut in They Won't Forget," Bacon said.

“Yeah, I caught that one,” Bogie said. “But I was too busy watching Lana Turner’s tits bounce around in that tight sweater to pay attention to anything else.”

Dickson had just gotten married to Perc Westmore, so he gave her wide berth, although he told Bacon that Dickson “is definitely fuckable. But I’ve got my own bottle blonde at home. Think I’ll sit this one out.”

Bogie thought Dickson’s career would be short but not so tragic. In one of her last performances in Crime Doctor’s Strangest Case, she played the wife of a man who habitually started accidental fires with carelessly discarded cigarettes. Ironically, within just two short years, she would die in a house fire caused by a carelessly discarded cigarette.

Her footnote in history? Her image was the first natural color photograph in history to be transmitted by International News Pictures from Hollywood to New York.

After she’d died, Bogie was waiting in a dentist office, thumbing through some old movie magazines. He was surprised to find Dickson on the cover. The title of the article was THE LUCKIEST GIRL IN THE WORLD.

Racket Busters almost became Bogie’s last movie. His life was saved by the quick-thinking crew. As part of his portrayal of a racketeer in the story, he was instructed to stand on a platform with a bucket of highly toxic sulphuric acid, waiting to throw it over a truck of garden produce as it drove by. The director had ordered that real acid be used because it would raise smoke as soon as it hit the produce.

Just at the moment he was to toss the acid, Bogie lost his footing and fell into the moving truck with the bucket of acid over him. Had it hit his face, he would have been permanently disfigured for life.

Rushing to the scene, the prop men ripped off all his clothes, leaving him jaybird naked. He watched in horror as his clothing seemed to burn to pieces. Someone finally thought to bring him a blanket to cover up his nudity.

The doctor on call at Warners examined him for wounds or damage, but amazingly he had emerged unscathed from the lethal acid.

Instead of allowing him the rest of the day off, Bacon ordered that the scene be re-shot. Dry ice would be used instead of sulphuric acid.

On the set, Bogie couldn’t help needling Penny Singleton. “In seventh billing, huh?” he asked. “Just a few months ago you had star billing over me in Men Are Such Fools.”

“No gentleman would ever point that out to me,” she said.

“I’m not a gentleman,” he said.

“That was obvious from the first day I met you,” she said.

“I hear you just made a movie called Blondie where you’re the wife of Dagwood Bumstead. And you once told me you wanted to be a serious actress.”

“Didn’t you set out to be a serious actor?” she asked. “Now look at you. A fourth rate George Raft.”

“Okay, Singleton, I think we’ve traded enough barbs for one day. I’ve got to hunt up George Brent and needle him. You know, I’m billed over him?”

“Why I’ll never know,” Singleton said, turning and walking away from him. She paused and looked back at him. “Why can’t you be a gentleman like Ronald Reagan.”

“Because ladies like a man who treats them rough,” he said.

“Then I’m no lady,” she said.

“I’d already figured that out for myself.”

“Oh, let me out of here,” she said. “You just won’t let go.”

“Not when I’ve got hold of a hot pair of tits,” he said.

“She doesn’t.”

That day he had lunch with the mustachioed character actor Walter Abel. He had a favor to ask. Abel was married at the time to the concept harpist Marietta Bitter.

Bogie began with an apology. “Of course, there’s no money in it but I’d like your wife to play her harp at my wedding to Mayo Methot.”

“I’m sure she’d do it,” Abel said. “I’ll ask her.” Bogie ordered ham and eggs, Abel preferring the blue plate special, beef stew. “You know, Bogie, you and I are the same age, but I just don’t seem to get the star parts like you. What have you got that I don’t have?”

“Three extra inches, your wife tells me.”

“You just can’t give up that damn needling, can you?” Abel asked. “Not even when you’re asking a favor.”

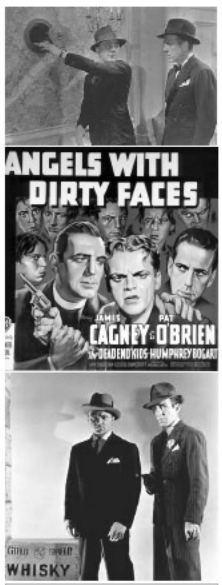
During the course of his long career, Abel would appear with some of the biggest stars in Hollywood, ranging from Bette Davis in Mr. Skeffington (1944) to Montgomery Clift and Elizabeth Taylor in Raintree County (1957).

At the end of the shoot, Brent came up and shook Bogie’s hand. “It’s been real swell working with you. I hope I’ll have the pleasure again.”



During the 1930s at Warner Brothers, Bogie lived in the shadow of James Cagney. Bogie envied Cagney, dismissing him as "a song-and-dance man trying to be a gangster on screen." Both men are depicted in the three images above.

At private parties, Bogie imitated Cagney as a cocky, fast-talking, conceited bundle of dynamic energy.

“Perhaps Bette Davis will cast us in her next picture where we’ll be two beaux fighting over her honeypot,” Bogie said. “Incidentally, speaking of that honeypot—it’s ginger if you remember—Bette told me you were a lousy lay.”

At long last, Michael Curtiz, future director of Casablanca, brought Bogie together with one of his three arch rivals on the Warners lot, James Cagney. Thanks partly to his status as a major box office star, Cagney, of course, had been awarded the lead in Angels with Dirty Faces, with Pat O’Brien coming in second. Bogie and his friend, Ann Sheridan, had the third and fourth leads.

Bogie was also reunited with the Dead End Kids, Huntz Hall, Leo Gorcey, and Billy Halop. He preferred to spend his time with Billy and not the other boys.

Curtiz, riding the rest of his fame, at first objected to doing a gangster movie. But Hal Wallis insisted. “I know you conflicted with Cagney while making Jimmy the Gent with the little fart, but you also have the balls to keep that one in line.”

As critic Robert Sklar put it, casting Cagney as the lead criminal instead of Bogie gave the menacing figure “a violent comic energy, not a morose lethargy.”

Bogie played James Frazier, a crooked lawyer fronting for the mob. Wallis was hoping with the Dirty Faces movie to revive the gangster genre, which had catalyzed a stream of box office hits for the studio throughout the 1930s.

Bogie’s first words to Cagney were, “No longer in drag, huh? Don’t mess with me or I might spread the word around the lot about how you got your start in show business.”

Bogie and Cagney would never be friends—they were far too jealous of each other—but they tried to amuse each other with stories of their work at Warner Brothers.

At one point, Cagney related to Bogie what it was like making the film Boy Meets Girl (also set for release in 1938) with sexy, ‘dumb-blonde’ Marie Wilson.

Cagney knew that Bogie had appeared with Wilson in China Clipper. “Marie was required in one scene to sit on my lap, and the director had to shoot and reshoot,” Cagney claimed. “I kept& getting a hard-on. Marie later told everybody, ‘Sitting on Jimmy’s lap was like being on top& of a flagpole.’”

The Dead End Kids (top photo) thought gangster Cagney was a hero until he walked The Last Mile on his way to the electric chair. But Cagney onscreen, during that scene, became a wimp.

Bogie was known for delivering the last word before he walked away from a person. “That’s a good one, Cagney. But I heard Howard Hughes turned down a loan-out offer from Warner Brothers because he said you’re ‘nothing but a runt.’ As for exact measurements, I guess I’d better ask Noël Coward.”

“You know about that, you mother fucker?”

Bogie and Cagney made up the next day. After having recently been suspended by the studio, Cagney was eager to make this picture work. He viewed his role of Rocky Sullivan as a sort of comeback picture for him.

“I told Wallis that I was tired of doing just another gangster picture, and I wanted to make this one something special,” Cagney told Bogie.

What Bogie didn’t confide to Cagney was that he’d lobbied behind his back to play the role of Rocky himself.

“I haven’t read the script yet,” Bogie& said. “But I assume you’ll kill me in the final reel.”

“You got that right, kid,” Cagney said.

“I hope you go to the electric chair for it,” Bogie said.

“I do, but it’ll be the most dramatic last mile in the history of cinema.”

Pat O’Brien, in the first of his roles as a fighting priest, played Father Connolly, who struggles to keep the Dead End Kids from pursuing a life of crime. Cagney, a hero to the boys in the neighborhood, is trying to drag them along to hell with himself.

During his direction, Curtiz continued to butcher the English language. Cliff King, the still cameraman, asked Bogie to pose for some publicity stills.

Bogie was a bit fidgety during the shoot, and King asked him to “Please try to keep still while I make the picture.”

Curtiz overheard him, “You bum,” the director shouted. “When you make the movies you’re still, and when you take the stills, you move.”

In one explosive scene, real bullets were used, based on direct orders from Curtiz. Regrettably, neither Curtiz nor any of his assistants bothered to tell Bogie. When Bogie found out, he physically attacked Curtiz but two grips pulled him away before he could harm the director.

“I know you don’t like the word shit, so I’ll say crap.” It was Ann Sheridan talking over lunch. “I’m trying to make the best of this part but my character isn’t well defined. Rowland Brown [the creator of the original story] spends far too much time cocksucking than he does developing my character. What can I do?”

As it turned out, Sheridan wasn’t the little wren she feared she was. Angels With Dirty Faces marked her first big featured role in an A-list picture, and a turning point in her career.

During the making of the film, George Hurrell released his soon-to-be famous photographs of her, and they were published across the country. The publicists at Warners immediately launched a massive campaign, releasing these pictures in magazines and newspapers.

Bogie kept a cheesecake picture of Sheridan posing as the Oomph Girl in his dressing room until Methot visited and ripped it down before hitting him over the head with a liquor bottle, which caused a minor concussion.

During the shoot, the Dead End Kids terrorized the set. One afternoon, they held Bogie to the ground and stripped off his trousers. However, when they tangled with Cagney, he fought back, bloodying Gorcey’s nose. After that, they gave him wide berth, “Don’t fuck with me,” Cagney had told them. “I grew up in Hell’s Kitchen.”

One day, Judy Garland showed up on the set for a rendezvous with Billy Halop, whom she was still dating infrequently. Bogie generously lent them his dressing room for their tryst.

Afterward Garland came to him, “Oh, Mr. Bogie, a girl can’t make up her mind. Should it be Billy? Should it be Mickey Rooney? I just don't know."

"If I was a gal, I'd go for the one with the biggest dick.

"That would be Billy, of course, and he's far handsomer, but Mickey is such a delight to be with."

"Play the field," he told her.

"I've got another problem," she said. "I think Louis B. Mayer actually wants to take me to bed. What can I do? He's the boss."

"Honey, do what every smart gal in Hollywood has done since movies began," he said. "Lie down on that casting couch and endure it. Just five minutes of horror, and it'll all be over. You've got the talent. You might become the biggest star at MGM. So go for it."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Bogie, for making up my mind for me. I'll let you know how it works out."

"When all these guys have broken you in real good, you come to me for some real loving," he said.

"I will, I will, I promise," she said.

"After these amateurs have worked you over, you can learn how a man does it."

Cagney was right about the movie's final dramatic scene, perhaps the most memorable he ever shot. Just before his execution, Father Connolly begs him to become a sniveling coward on the way to the chair. That way, he'll no longer be a hero to the Dead End Kids.

At first Cagney refuses his old friend. But at the last minute, he breaks down and becomes hysterical. Movie-goers over the years have pondered exactly what was going on in this final scene. Did the character Cagney was playing really turn yellow, and did he decide in the final moments of his life to give in to Father Connolly's last plea to him? Regardless of his motive, he destroyed himself as a role model for the young, potential criminals in waiting.

This is the movie that inspired Cagney impersonators. He twisted his neck, lifted his shoulders, and bit his bottom lip which became his signature act. He said he learned these ticks from a pimp in Hell's Kitchen who used to stand on his street corner.

Reviewer Harrison Carroll claimed that Angels With Dirty Faces "is the most grimly realistic gangster film that has come out of Hollywood since the early days of the cycle."

After the film opened, Cagney walked off with honors, winning the 1939 New York Film Critics Circle Award for Best Actor. In addition, he was nominated for an Oscar.

One film critic claimed if there was only one Cagney film to place in a time capsule, it should be Angels With Dirty Faces.

Somehow Bogie got lost in all the buzz over Cagney. But Bogie was left with a steely determination to star with Barbara Stanwyck in Golden Boy. To do that, he had to renew his relationship with the Steel Magnolia herself.

As she made preparations to marry Kenneth, Mary opened on Broadway in the comedy Spring Thaw. Appearing opposite her was her long-time lover, Roland Young.

One drunken night, Bogie called his old friend, Kenneth, when he found out he was making plans to marry Mary. "I keep hoping Mary will change her mind and come back to me before our divorce becomes final."

"Surely you don't mean that," Kenneth said in protest. "You never really loved Mary. I should have married her back in the 20s in New York. Tell me you don't mean what you just said."

“Of course, I mean it,” Bogie said. “Have you ever heard me say something I don’t mean?”

“Yeah,” Kenneth said, not concealing the anger in his voice. “You didn’t mean it when you told me I was your best friend.” He put down the phone.

Bogie’s best friends continually speculated that he was not in love with any of his three wives. Spencer Tracy once said that “in Helen Menken he found a mother figure. Young boy dominated by a strong mother ends up marrying mother. Classic case.”

“If Bogie were in love with any woman in the 1930s, it was Mary Philips,” Leslie Howard once said. “But they spent much of their time on separate coasts sleeping in the beds of other people.”

No one could accuse Mayo Methot of being anybody’s mother. Bogie once admitted to Ann Sheridan, “I don’t love Mayo. But I’m fascinated by her, and I love to beat her up, especially when she beats me back.”

On August 12, 1938, the Associated Press carried a notice that “Mary Phillips Bogart, known professionally as “Mary Philips,” whose divorce from screen actor Humphrey Bogart became final two days ago, and Leo Meilzinger, former husband to Kay Francis, also a film prominent, were married today at the office of the Justice of the Peace J. Fred Collins.”

The article noted that Meilzinger was known in the theatrical world as Kenneth MacKenna, a film editor for MGM in New York City. Kenneth was 38, Mary 37.

In some long-forgotten fan magazine of the 30s, Bogie gave a surprisingly candid interview on the dawn of his marriage to Methot.

“I love a good fight,” he claimed. “So does Mayo. We have some first-rate battles. Both of us are actors, so fights are easy to start. Actors always see the dramatic quality of a situation more easily than other people and can’t resist dramatizing it further. For instance, I come home from a game of golf. Maybe I’ve been off my drive. I slump into my chair. ‘Gosh, I feel low today.’ I start. She nods meaningfully. ‘Low, hmm, I see. You feel low. You come to see me and it makes you feel low. All the thrill has gone and . . . you feel low.’ And we go right on from there. We both understand that one of the important things to master in marriage is the technique of the quarrel.”

As an ominous sign, there were threatening storm clouds across Los Angeles on the morning of August 20, 1939. But by eleven the highly unpredictable skies cleared in time for the wedding of Humphrey Bogart, age 38, to Mayo Methot, age 35.

Bogie and Mary Philips had long been a friend of Mary and Mel Baker, who had agreed to host the wedding of Bogie to his third wife, Mayo. Mel was a comedy writer and Mary Baker a theatrical agent to both Mary Philips and Bogie. He had long forgiven her for testifying against him in Mary’s divorce case against him. Judge Ben Lindsay had agreed to perform the ceremony marrying Bogie to Mayo.

Methot arrived at her wedding to Bogie in a housedress that looked as if she’d slept in it. Her hair was ratty, needing to be washed and set.

Wedding bells for "The Battling Bogarts." A marriage made in hell almost didn't make it through the first day.

"I've got nothing to wear," she told actress Gloria Stuart. "I spent all my money on liquor, and that tightwad Bogart, the fucker, wouldn't give me money to buy a new dress."

"What a great way to start a marriage," Stuart said. She went to see Mary Baker, the hostess, who claimed she had something appropriate. She emerged with a beaded dress and a matching hair band that Joan Crawford might have worn in Our Dancing Daughters. Right before her, Methot pulled off her dress, revealing that she wore no underwear.

Appraising herself in the mirror, Methot turned to Baker, "Aren't you supposed to wear something borrowed at a wedding? Well, look at me now."

"What about some panties, darling?" Mary asked.

"Who needs them?" she asked. "If a man wants to fuck you, you should make it easy for him and not make him have to take off a lot of garments. Just pull up your dress and tempt him with your cooze."

Marietta Bitter and her harp provided the event's high point in culture, but another performer, Mischa Auer, stole the show. He attracted the most attention by crawling naked under the tables, putting an experienced hand up several of the women's dresses.

During the actual marriage ceremony, Bogie cried through the entire service. "If I were marrying Mayo Methot, I would cry too," said Spencer Tracy.

Long before the sun set that day, "The Battling Bogarts" were at it. After downing nearly half a bottle of Scotch, Methot in front of the guests, filled her hands with great globs of creamy wedding cake, walked up to her new husband, and crushed the gooey mess into his face, rubbing it in. Some gossip at the party had told her that her new spouse was having a torrid affair with Claire Trevor.

Bogie punched her back, knocking her down. She fell backward, crashing into a table of four enjoying the wedding buffet.

Bogie ran back into the house, and within an hour he and Mel Baker were driving down the coastal road toward the Mexican border. Methot spent her wedding night sobbing in the bed of Mary Baker, who tried to offer the new bride whatever comfort she could on her "honeymoon."

Two days later Bogie sent Methot a rubber plant, and "The Battling Bogarts" made up, at least for a few hours.

Methot told Mary Baker, "We managed to screw for a few hours before we started in again. It was over the Tijuana whores I suspected he'd sampled during our honeymoon."

CHAPTER EIGHT

Back from a real honeymoon in Oregon, where Bogie met his in-laws, he arrived in Hollywood with a steely resolve.

Over breakfast with his new bride, his face tightened into knots of determination. “God damn it, I’m gonna be a big-time movie star in spite of Jack Warner. It’s now or never. I’m seeing Barbara Stanwyck today.”

“I don’t have to be jealous of that bitch,” Methot said. “Bette Davis told me she’s lez. Her romance with Robert Taylor is just for show.”

“I want to star with her in Golden Boy,” Bogie responded. “Babs and I can heat up the screen with that film. If she doesn’t think I can quite handle the part, I’ll throw you in as the party favor for Stanwyck.”

Bogie ducked just in time to miss a flying plate that crashed into the wall behind him.

If Bogie had known how many young actors wanted to play the role of the boxer, Joe Bonaparte, in the screen adaptation of Clifford Odets’ Broadway play, Golden Boy, he might never have gone out for the role. Everyone from matinee idol Tyrone Power to newcomer Alan Ladd was competing.

Director Rouben Mamoulian estimated that some 5,000 actors, including a 17-year-old Dale Robertson, wanted the part. “My God,” Mamoulian said, “more guys wanted to play Joe Bonaparte than gals wanted to be Scarlett O’Hara.” [In all, 1,400 candidates for the role of Scarlett were interviewed. Of these, ninety were given screen tests.]

Methot reminded Bogie that he was nearly forty years old and didn’t have the figure for an appearance in boxing trunks. She accurately predicted that some twenty-year-old brat would get the part—“and it’ll probably make him a star.”

As payment for her forecast, she got a plate of unfinished ham and eggs thrown in her face. The last thing Bogie wanted was to be reminded of how old he was.

He was convinced that if Stanwyck would just return his calls, he could use his former connection to her to get the director to cast him. In preparation, he took boxing lessons every day and also violin lessons. In the play,& Bonaparte wanted to be a violinist before he was lured into the ring.

Unknown to Bogie at the time, a future co-star of his, William Holden, was also taking boxing and violin lessons.

Bogie tried to get two of the most coveted roles in Hollywood—that of the violinist/boxer in Golden Boy and also that of Rhett Butler in Gone With the Wind.

He lost the roles to William Holden (depicted in all three images above) and Clark Gable, respectively.

Barbara Stanwyck (bottom photo) wanted Holden—and not just on the screen.

Finally, the call came in from Stanwyck, whose star was rising rapidly in Hollywood. It was not the kind of call he expected. At first she didn't even mention Golden Boy.

"Bogie, how's it hanging?"

"It's grown three inches longer since the last time," he said. "Wanna swing on it again?"

"No, I'm perfectly satisfied with Robert Taylor's four inches," she said. "Let cut the crap, Bogie. You know why I'm calling."

"I hear Samuel Goldwyn has signed you for Golden Boy," he said.

"That's the least of my concerns right now," she said. "The publicity people are pushing me for the role of Scarlett O'Hara. Can you believe such nonsense?"

"A gal from Brooklyn. I'm surprised. If you get it, you've got to sound like you have magnolia juice dripping down your chin."

"That's not all," she said. "I hear David Selznick wants us to do a screen test together. You, of all the actors in Hollywood, for the role of Rhett Butler."

"As dumb as it sounds, let's go for it," he said. "If we could pull this one off, we might become the biggest stars in Hollywood since Rin Tin Tin."

"They're going to get in touch with you," she said. "Now, more business. What's all this talk I hear that you want to play Joe Bonaparte. Are you out of your mind?"

"It's a great role, and I could do it."

"But you're forty years old," she said. "Almost. The kid in the movie should be in his early twenties."

Before she hung up, he convinced her to come to his gym the following day and watch him work out in the ring with Slapsie Maxie.

“I don’t want that retard,” she said. “I want to see you in the ring with a real man. I’ll bring along someone to get into the ring with you and duke it out.”

“You’ve got yourself a deal, Babe, or is it Babs?” he said.

“Miss Stanwyck will do,” she said after jotting down the time and place.

Stanwyck showed up with a stunningly handsome actor whom she introduced as& William Holden.

The solution? Bogie plans to poison Stanwyck.

While Holden was in the changing room getting into his trunks, Bogie said, “I’ve never seen a boxer that good looking before. Where did you find him?”

“He’s not a boxer,” Stanwyck said. “He’s an actor. He’s also up for the role.”

At this point Holden returned, looking even younger and more gorgeous without his clothes. Like some boxing manager, Stanwyck ushered Bogie and Holden into the ring together. “May the best man win.”

The bout was short, not sweet. After only four minutes of sparing, Holden threw Bogie a punch that knocked him out.

When he came to, he was sitting on the sidelines, with a gym attendant and Stanwyck hovering over him. Holden had disappeared.

Bogie had a splitting headache, and Stanwyck appeared rather blurred before his eyes. “I didn’t quite come clean with you,” she said. “Holden was assigned the part yesterday. Better go back to those gangster roles, sweet cheeks.”

“You are an incredible bitch,” he said.

“There are side benefits from casting Holden,” she said. “In case you haven’t noticed, twenty-year-old cock tastes better than forty-year-old cock.”

Two days prior to the screen test with Stanwyck and Bogie for the Rhett and Scarlett& roles, Selznick’s office sent Bogie a message, notifying him that the screen test had been cancelled.

Not only was Bogie's screen test cancelled, but the following week he received a memo from Selznick.

Bogie told his pal, Sydney Greenstreet, "I don't have the right equipment for these two lesbians."

"Mr. Bogart, although I admire your talent in gangster roles, you are not a serious candidate for the role of Rhett Butler. Although some polls list you as a candidate, you are not. As you should know, the role is completely unsuitable for you. You'd be laughed off the screen. In case you and Barbara Stanwyck haven't read the novel, it's set in Georgia—not Brooklyn. I have not determined who will play Scarlett, but I am more or less set on Gary Cooper for Rhett Butler. Kindest personal regards, David O. Selznick."

With a certain bitterness, Bogie watched newcomer William Holden and Barbara Stanwyck appear in one of the greatest films of 1939, perhaps the single greatest year in the history of motion pictures.

He vowed never to speak to Stanwyck again. Methot warned that if she encountered her at a party or in a public place, "I'll pull out every hair in her head."

Bogie watched in amazement as Stanwyck became the highest paid female star during World War II. At the end of the war, and after Casablanca, his own star had risen so high that he was offered star billing over her in The Two Mrs. Carrolls, slated for a 1947 release. For the opportunity to co-star with her, with his name above hers, he decided to forgive her and go ahead with the picture.

He told its English director, Peter Godfrey, that he could definitely honor his marriage vows while making this movie. "You've cast me opposite two lezzies-Stanwyck and Alexis Smith. Maybe the gals will connect—not me."

Bogie had already co-starred with Alexis& Smith in the 1945 Conflict, which included backup support from Sydney Greenstreet.

During the filming of The Two Mrs. Carrolls, Bogie and Stanwyck each realized they were miscast in this adaptation of Martin Vale's play that had brought such success on Broadway to the great Elisabeth Bergner and Victor Jory.

During the shoot, reporters provocatively asked Bogie how she could hook up with him on the screen when she had "pretty boy" Robert Taylor waiting back home at the ranch.

"I'm not good looking, and I admit that," Bogie responded. "I used to be quite pretty, but not in the league of Robert Taylor. But I've got character on my face. It takes an awful lot of late-night drinking to put it there."

Godfrey allowed Bogie to mug shamelessly as the psychopathic artist who paints wives as "Angels of Death," then kills them with poisoned milk.

Warners held up the release of the film for two years. When it finally hit screens across the country, critics ridiculed and mocked it. The public cast its vote by staying away. The film would find new life in the 1960s when it was rediscovered by the French New Wave.

Stanwyck and Bogie made a valiant attempt to appear together one final time on the screen in The Fountainhead based on Ayn Rand's best-selling 754-page novel. This Russian-born philosopher novelist stood for "muscular capitalism and a disdain for the common herd." Stanwyck wanted to play the lead role of Dominique Francon who marries the book's villain but loves the hero, architect Howard Roark of unbounded ego. Bogie saw himself in that part of a rugged individual.

Kay Francis had once reigned as the highest paid female star in Hollywood, but when she made King of the Underworld with Bogie, she was on the way out the Warner Brothers' gate.

When Mervin LeRoy signed to direct, it was with the understanding that the stars would be Bogie and Stanwyck. Before shooting began, he was forced to leave the picture.

Called in to direct, King Vidor wanted Gary Cooper for the part of Howard Roark. "Stanwyck's too old to play Dominique. Not sexy enough. I want Ida Lupino."

In the end, Cooper retained the lead, appearing opposite the "new love of my life," Patricia Neal.

Bogie survived the rejection, but Stanwyck virtually "fired herself" on June 21, 1948, by sending a blistering communication to Jack Warner, expressing her wish to end their contractual obligations to each other. At the time, the studio was in financial trouble and was glad to see her go. The Fountainhead had marked her first defeat to a younger actress. "I had Gary Cooper long before this Neal bitch," Stanwyck told Bogie.

It was a bittersweet reunion Bogie had with Kay Francis when director Lewis Seiler cast them together in the 1939 release, King of the Underworld.

Seiler had helmed him in Crime School, and the two men worked easily together. George Bricker, co-authored the screenplay with Vincent Sherman, who would direct some of Bogie's future pictures.

Sherman later admitted, “I was not proud of my work on this film.” It was a remake of Dr. Socrates, a Paul Muni film in 1935.

Bogie hadn’t read the script until the first day of the shoot. “I’m supposed to be a dumb gang leader who fancies himself as the next Napoleon,” he protested to Sherman.

“Don’t blame me. It wasn’t my idea. I just work here.”

“Kay,” he said, coming up to kiss her on the first day of the shoot. “Great to see you again. It looks like we couldn’t hold on to our mates, so they ended up marrying each other.”

He was, of course, referring to Kenneth MacKenna and Mary Philips.

“Mary’s welcome to Kenneth,” she said. “I’ve moved on.”

“True, true,” he said. “But at times I miss Mary, especially when Mayo is beating me over the head with a beer bottle. Mary was such a gentle person.”

“Then she won’t make it in this town,” Francis predicted. Over lunch that day, she shared her woes.

Francis told Bogie that her career was in serious decline, and she was hoping that their co-starring venture would pull her up again.

“Even though my pictures end up in red ink, I still have a contract,” she said. “In 1936, I took in $227,500, the highest paid star on the lot.”

“Don’t remind me,” he said.

“But I’ve been moving from one flop to another,” she said. “Jack Warner personally told me that I’m not worth my paycheck.”

“I fear he’s gonna tell me the same thing one day,” Bogie said. “Sooner than later.”

“I had a lavish dressing room, but they moved me out to give it to John Garfield,” she said. “You better watch that kid. He might take your roles. Right now they’re paying me $4,000 a week to do screen tests with unknown actors. I’m the only actress doing B pictures for a six-figure income.”

“Don’t worry, babe,” Bogie said. “I hear your latest beau is rich.” He was referring to Baron Raven Erik Barnekow, with ties to the aviation business.

“He’s rich and handsome,” she said. “But there are problems. He’s so jealous, he’s a psycho. And, get this, he told me the other night that if I don’t stop wearing makeup he will leave me. Imagine an actress without makeup.”

“I shudder at the prospect,” Bogie said mockingly.

She leaned over to him to whisper something. “I know I can trust you. My husband makes secret trips to& Mexico. He refuses to discuss& where he’s been. I think he’s a& secret Nazi agent.”

Bogart, Methot, and their friend

“Sounds like a good plot for your next movie,” he said. “I could play the baron.”

The third star of the movie was James Stephenson, a British actor who was ten years older than Bogie. “Pretty late to be breaking into films, don’t you think, kid?”

“Better late than never,” he said. “Forgive the cliché. Jack Warner has signed me to play urban villains and disgraced gents. Incidentally, you’re my favorite star.”

“Good God, a newcomer to Warners with some taste,” Bogie said. “I’m not used to that.”

Bogie and Stephenson never& became close friends, but Bogie was happy for him when William Wyler cast him in the sympathetic role of the family attorney in Bette Davis’ The Letter (1940). In “my role of a lifetime,” he was nominated for Best Supporting Oscar.

With regrets, Bogie read in the paper that Stephenson had died at the age of 53 in 1941. He’d suffered a heart attack, and death was sudden.

He turned to Methot, “I fear I’m gonna die young too.”

“Impossible,” Methot said. “You’re already too old to die young.”

“I’m gonna get you for that, you broken down drunken hag,” he said, rising to chase after her.

Methot later told Bette Davis, “Our epic battles always end in hot sex, so starting a good fight is usually worth it.”

“How odd,” Davis said. “My battles with my husbands or lovers always begin after sex.”

Months later after filming on King of the Underworld came to an end, Bogie encountered Francis at a party. She looked awful and had gained at least twenty-five pounds.

Used to needling people, he resisted mocking her. Her last two years at Warners had been hellish enough.

“I was right about my baron,” she said. “He left me without a note and returned to Germany. He wanted to be by Hitler’s side during the invasion of Poland.”

Francis ended her career working on Poverty Row turning out undistinguished pictures for Monogram. “Poverty Row” was the name applied at the time to the low-rent, marginal studios that churned out cheapies.

Bogie never saw her again but was saddened to hear that she’d attempted suicide while traveling in a road show, State of the Union, in Columbus, Ohio.

She survived, and Bogie was relieved. “No one should choose Columbus, Ohio, as the place to die.”

Heavy drinking destroyed many a career in Hollywood of both men and women. Regardless of how much Bogie drank the night before, he always showed up promptly for work the following day. He arrived at the studio in time to be made up, and he had always memorized his lines.

Nathaniel Benchley, in his portrait of Bogie, tried to put his heavy drinking into the context of the day, noting that if a man didn’t drink “he was considered some sort of fairy. It was a sign of masculinity to get drunk—a sign of a free man who did as he pleased—and it also fitted the tough guy image that was his trademark.”

Benchley later noted that Bogie “could be enchanting when sober, but savage when drunk. Since he didn’t show drunkenness in the usual manner, the only way to tell if he was sober was by what he was doing. He didn’t slur his words or stumble, but he did things that catalyzed an acute remorse the next day. The sober Bogart bled for what the non-sober Bogart had done.”

One example of his outrageous behavior occurred one night at the Café La Maze when Bogie spotted John Garfield at another table with a very young and very beautiful blonde actress, who looked somewhat like Lana Turner did years later when Garfield would appear with her in The Postman Always Rings Twice.

With a sense of despair, Bogie heard that Garfield would soon be replacing him in many of those bad boy roles at Warner Brothers. Bogie rose from his table with his glass of Scotch, approaching Garfield’s table. He tossed the liquor in the young actor’s face.

Garfield handled the scene with such style and sophistication that he amazed the other patrons, who thought he would attack Bogie. “Tastes good, man,” Garfield said. “Let me call the bartender to order another one since your glass is empty.”

Bogie had so embarrassed himself that he turned and walked out the door.

On some nights he was seen out drinking with Clifton Webb. Ever since his early days on Broadway, he and Webb had been friends—Bogie called him “Webby.” Often they would be seen leaving bars together with their arms around each other.

Since Webb was a notorious homosexual in Hollywood, rumors were spread about Bogie and the actor. But there is no evidence that the relationship ever became sexual.

On weekends, Bogie and Methot sailed on a small powerboat he’d purchased. Their destination was always Catalina Island, twenty-one miles west of Los Angeles. He nicknamed the craft “Sluggy,” as he and Methot staged some of their epic sea battles aboard the aptly named boat. One night Bogie tried to drown her, and she fought him viciously, scratching and bloodying him. Fortunately, he was between pictures.

When Bogie encountered John Garfield, "tomorrow's competition," he tossed a glass of Scotch into the young actor's face.

Whenever she wasn't beating the hell out of Bogie, Methot was a decent housekeeper at "Sluggy Hollow," a nickname for 1210 North Horn, in Greater Los Angeles. Bogie was making enough money to hire a black woman, the& very overweight May Smith, as their "cook and bottle washer."

He didn't like much variety in his diet, but the cook provided a lavish spread for guests.

Beryl Evelyn Wood Methot, his mother-in-law, was a frequent visitor from Oregon. Bogie called her "Buffy," and got on with her rather well considering that she was Methot's mother. One of the leading newspaperwomen of her state, Buffy enjoyed the respect of her daughter. Methot became rather docile whenever Buffy was living with them. Unlike Methot, Buffy could handle her booze and finished off many a bottle with Bogie long after Methot had gone to bed.

At one point, Bogie was heard at a party saying, "Buffy, old gal, I should have married you and not Mayo."

Ann Sheridan once visited the Bogarts when Bogie's mother, Maud, was there. "It was amazing," Sheridan said. "Bogie related to Buffy, but Mayo gravitated to Maud."

Disappointed at how her life had gone, Maud had moved to the West Coast where Bogie had secured a small apartment for her. That way, Maud could be not only with Bogie, but with her mentally ill daughter Frances. Maud earned a meager living by drawing sewing patterns for a company, her $50,000 annual salary a distant memory.

Maud told her son, "Belmont and I used to have our arguments. An argument, not a fight to the death. I really believe you and Mayo will one day kill each other." Maud was referring to a past evening when Bogie had taken a rope and chased Mayo into the garden, threatening to hang her from a tree.

On Sunset Boulevard, Maud lived only two blocks from Schwab's Drugstore, the center of social activity for Hollywood actors in those days. Bogie said his mother started hanging out there "and picking up all the gossip, which she later confided to me. This proper Victorian woman was treated like Lady Maud, because everyone knew she was my mother. One day I came to get her and caught her talking to Bob Hope. On another occasion she met Betty Grable."

In New York, Maud had been contemptuous of her son's attempt to become an actor. But at Schwab's Drugstore, she often approached gossip columnists like Sidney Skolsky, and introduced herself. "I'm Humphrey Bogart's mother. Would you like to hear what 'The Battling Bogarts' did last night?" Suddenly, after decades, she came to understand that her role as Bogie's mother was something to be flaunted.

At some point during the final years of her life, Maud began to lose her mind. On many a night, the police brought her back from Sunset Strip to Bogie's home after they came to know who she was. One night they found her chatting with about six prostitutes who worked the corner.

During one of her more rational moments, she confessed to Methot, "I think I'm going crazy like Frances Bogart Rose."

At times, Maud would say something to Bogie that made him fear that she was losing her mental stability. One example among countless others included:

MAUD: "I just can't believe that Frances has been confined and her husband hasn't come to see her."
BOGIE: "Mother, Stuart Rose divorced Frances years ago."

Whenever Frances recovered from one of her straight-jacketed seizures, she was allowed to go free again. But insanity would soon after seem to overtake her.

Like her mother, Frances too would get arrested in public places. One night she went out into the city topless, wearing only her panties. The headline the next morning read: BOGART'S SISTER ARRESTED ON SUNSET STRIP.

The Hollywood columnist and writer, Joe Hyams, who knew both Bogie and Frances, later claimed that Bogie loved his sister "who was tall and slender and had a short waist and long legs like Betty. In fact, they looked very much alike. And I think that was one of the reasons he fell in love with Betty."

The columnist, of course, was referring to Lauren Bacall, whose name at the time of her birth on September 16, 1924, in New York was Betty Joan Perske.

There were many dangers inherent whenever Maud wanted to sit out in the garden at the Bogart home. California was filled with butterflies, and whenever she saw one, she would scream and become hysterical. It would take hours for Methot to calm her down.

A familiar voice came over the phone. It was director Lloyd Bacon. "I'm teaming James Cagney and you in a Western called The Oklahoma Kid."

"Am I the Oklahoma Kid?" Bogie asked.

"No, Cagney is. You play a black-clad guy named Whip McCord who is a gang leader. You guys hold up the stagecoach carrying government money to the Indians for their land. You'll also be working with Ward Bond."

"I don't have to kiss Ward, do I? Who's the pretty one?"

"Rosemary Lane," Bacon said.

"I have had the other two Lane sisters," Bogie said. "Might as well spread my goodies around to the third."

"You may not get so lucky this time."

Only moments before he's fatally shot on screen, Bogie tries to strangle Cagney (top photo).

After the release of this outer, no one ever compared Cagney and Bogie to Roy Rogers and Gene Autry

"By the way, I assume I get killed in the final reel," Bogie said.

"You got that right."

"It's my first Western," Cagney said, greeting Bogie on the set. "And we're going to make it a good one. I just knew you'd be my evil adversary, since that's about all you know how to play."

"Compliments from such a big-time box office attraction like you are always appreciated," Bogie said. He noted that Cagney looked like a midget standing alongside his horse. "I hear you own a lot of horses. I bet you're an expert rider."

"Well, not really," Cagney said. "Don't tell anybody."

Cagney was assigned a horse who'd made dozens of Westerns. After the star straddled the animal and was taking in the sun the following day, the horse heard the assistant director's clapper and apparently thought it was a call to action. Taking off at break-neck speed, the horse raced toward the distant camera.

"I grabbed his neck and held on," Cagney said. "He came to a ditch and jumped it—about six to seven feet. I don't know how the hell I stayed on, but I did. We worked well together after that, once the horse found out I could hang on."

"Lola Lane, Priscilla Lane, and now Rosemary Lane," Bogie said, coming up to the female co-star of the movie.

"I hear you're telling everybody in town you seduced Lola and Priscilla, which I find hard to believe," Rosemary said. "Priscilla might have flirted with you, but she's a deeply religious woman. So is my older sister Lola."

"What about you?" he asked.

"I can be had for the price of a drink."

Bacon was aware of Bogie's claim to have& seduced all three of the Lane sisters, "but I don't think he made it with either one of them. Maybe he seduced them in his mind."

Years later Cagney recalled working with Bogie. “He and I never became friends, and we never saw each other after work, maybe only one time. We didn’t hate each other. We just didn’t care for each other that much. I don’t think he had any real friends—maybe Spencer Tracy. Nobody at Warners really liked him. Bogie said, ‘I beat ‘em to it. I don’t like them first.’ He hated just about everybody, but that was his aim—to hate them first. When it came to fighting, he was about as tough as Shirley Temple.”

As a hobby, Cagney liked to write poems. As he was driving along Coldwater Canyon Drive, he stopped for a traffic light, spotting Bogie in a sleek red sports car in the lane next to him. He was busy picking his nose, waiting for the light to turn green. “He wasn’t just picking, but really going for the big ones.”

The next day, Cagney left a poem tacked to the door of Bogie’s dressing room.

In this silly town of ours,
One sees odd primps and poses;
But movie stars in fancy cars,
Shouldn’t pick their fancy noses.

Bogart and Cagney as Oklahoma Kids: NYC boys camping out in the Wild West

At the end of the shoot, Bogie as Whip and his gang try to kill Cagney, who was playing the Robin Hood desperado. With Bacon directing, Cagney walks into the ambush set by Bogie and his men.

When Bacon called a wrap, Bogie sauntered over to him. “That scene should give audiences a laugh. Up to now in the picture my gang and I—all supposed to be dead shots—have fired 172 times at Cagney and haven’t hit him yet.”

Viewed today, The Oklahoma Kid is pure camp, especially when Cagney sings “I Don’t Want to Play In Your Yard,” a number interrupted by gunfire. In another scene, he croons “Rockabye Baby” in Spanish to an actual baby.

The film is often remembered for a scene of Cagney rubbing the thumb and forefinger of his hand together and exulting, “Feel that air!”

When he saw the final print, Jack Warner said, “What were we thinking? Cagney is a street kid from Hell’s Kitchen. He’s no Hopalong Cassidy. Don’t put him in a Western ever again. As for Bogie, let’s cast him in ‘The Lisping Cowboy.’”

When Bogie sat through the final cut, he said to Bacon, “In that ten-gallon hat, Cagney looks like a mushroom.”

Dark Victory, starring Tallulah Bankhead, had been a rather unsuccessful Broadway play during the 1934-35 season. David O. Selznick had once optioned it, hoping to cast Greta Garbo in the role of socialite Judith Traherne, who is dying of a brain tumor. She turned him down, as she was occupied making Anna Karenina at MGM.

When Warners took over the property, the studio briefly considered it as a role for fast-fading Kay Francis.

Davis told Bogie that she had "begged, cajoled, and pleaded for months to get Jack Warner to buy the property. His answer, 'Who wants to see a picture about a gal who dies?' But he finally gave in to my demands."

After Garbo bowed out, Gloria Swanson tried but failed to get the movie role.

Bogie even heard from Barbara Stanwyck, who was calling everybody she knew to get the role for herself. "I really hated missing out on the part," Stanwyck told Bogie. "I was encouraged when I heard Selznick had optioned it, and I told my agents to do anything go get it for me. Then I learned that Selznick, the fucker, was preparing it for Merle Oberon. When I played Judith on Lux Radio Theater, I thought I had it wrapped up. Then in stepped Miss Bette Davis."

Bogie played the third lead under George Brent. "I've been demoted," Bogie said to Brent. "When we made Racket Busters, you were my second stringer."

"The vagaries of casting at Warners," Brent said.

Bogie's old pal, Spencer Tracy, had turned down the role that eventually went to Brent.

Bogie couldn't help but notice that even though Davis' marriage to Harmon Nelson was crumbling, that didn't prevent Brent from visiting her dressing room for an hour in the afternoon between takes.

Edmund Goulding, directing Bogie and Davis, was "Hollywood's genius bad boy." The reputation of this London-born director had already preceded him. He was known for his heavy drinking, homosexual liaisons, and orgies. In fact, he was the most notorious director in Hollywood.

Goulding wisely cast the Irish actress Geraldine Fitzgerald in her American debut in a role where her character was "to act as a sort of one-person Greek chorus, so that the central doomed figure would not have to cry for herself."

Bogie never bonded with Fitzgerald, but met her at the peak of her career. This fine, passionate actress would go from Dark Victory to a star role in& Wuthering Heights, where, as Isabella, she is the best thing in the film. Laurence& Olivier, as Heathcliff, marries her on the& rebound.

Two views of director Edmund Goulding

Bogie was so impressed with both of Fitzgerald's stellar performances that he called her and seriously urged her to reconsider starring with him in The Maltese Falcon, which she'd turned down. "I'd rather face suspension," which is what happened to her. The part, of course, went to Mary Astor.

Cast in the movie was the inexperienced Ronald Reagan as Alex. He clearly did not like his role, preferring the part of Michael O'Leary, the stable hand, that was slated for Bogie. Someone on the set told Reagan that he was actually playing a homosexual, although such "perverted" characters could not actually be depicted on the screen at that time.

The gay producer, David Lewis, said Reagan "could not distinguish between playing a homosexual and being implicated as one. He clashed several times with Goulding. It was not only the role but personal. The director had come on to him."

Later, recalling making Dark Victory, Reagan said, "It wasn't the rewarding experience it should have been. I was playing the kind of young man who could dearly love Bette but at the same time the& kind of fellow who could sit in the girls' dressing room dishing the dirt while they went on dressing in front of me. For myself, I want to think if I stroll through where the girls are short of clothes, there will be a great scurrying about and taking cover."

Even as shooting began, Reagan was still pleading with Goulding to give him Bogie's role. "He's already got the lisp," Reagan said.

When Bogie heard what Reagan had said, he decided to play one of his many practical jokes. The following day before lunch, he saw Reagan heading for the men's toilet on the Warner lot.

Although there were eight urinals lined up in a row, Bogie stood immediately next to Reagan, who was already urinating.

"To get even with the fucker and to frighten the hell out of him, I stared down at his dick," Bogie said to Goulding. "I leaned over close to him and whispered in his ear, 'I can take care of that thing for you.' Reagan didn't even finish pissing before he was zipping up and out of that toilet."

Throughout the remainder of his life, and despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary, Reagan always insisted in private that Bogie was a bona fide homosexual.

However, when it came time for Reagan to write his memoirs, Where's the Rest of Me?, he had only kind words for Bogie. "I've always been glad that some of my pictures teamed me with Humphrey Bogart. Here was a pro, an affable, easy person, fond of gentle ribbing. At this time he was yet to reach his ultimate potential, which came about during the war years in Casablanca —a part he was given after George Raft turned it down."

Originally, Dark Victory was to end on an anticlimactic scene with Bogie. According to the movie plot, after Judith's death, her horse was seen winning a race while its trainer, Michael& (Bogie) was seen crying. Sneak preview audiences in Pasadena mocked Bogie's tear-filled moment, and Goulding cut his scene.

Dark Victory became a hit at the box office, and marked Davis' third Oscar nomination in five years, although it did little for Bogie's career. "I spent most of the movie shoveling horse shit," he said mockingly, finally bringing himself to use the word shit.

One reviewer noted that Bogie played his role with a "creepy kind of sexuality and seemed terribly miscast and out of place. As for Reagan, he does-n't do much of anything but guzzle vast quantities of alcohol and generally embarrass himself."

Time Out London critic Tom Milne pronounced it "a Rolls-Royce in the weepie world."

Davis would lose the Oscar to Vivien Leigh that year for her portrayal of Scarlett O'Hara in Gone With the Wind, a role Davis had coveted.

As a boost to his career, Bogie eagerly wanted to play the male lead in The Old Maid, which had been tailored as a vehicle for Bette Davis with a script based on a novel by Edith Wharton. Budgeted at $778,000, shooting on The Old Maid began on March 15, 1939, with Edmund Goulding directing.

Bogie was scheduled to begin working five days later, even though both Goulding and Davis would have preferred Alan Marshall. With a dapper manner and a mustache, he was suave and sophisticated. He was often described as the poor man's Ronald Colman or perhaps the discount version of David Niven. Bogie had met Marshall briefly and thought this Aussie-born actor was "a complete phony."

Hal Wallis, the producer of the movie, told Goulding he wanted "a George Brent or David Niven type" for the role. That Bogie was offered the part has never been fully explained, since no one seemed to want him.

On his first day, Bogie went to call on Davis and found her furious at Goulding. He'd cast Miriam Hopkins, her dreaded scene-stealing enemy as the second female lead. "I should cut off Jack Warner's balls," Davis told Bogie. "That's not all. I, the star, am getting paid $35,000 for this picture, while dear Miriam is hauling in $50,000."

In his first scene, Bogie knew he was bombing. Davis later recalled that unhappy Monday at Warners. "One of the funniest miscastings I remember was Humphrey Bogart playing a nineteenth-century romantic lover opposite me in The Old Maid. In the opening scene, he appeared in a flowing black cloak, running through a railroad station trying to catch up with me. As he pursued me along the platform, he looked so sinister that he seemed for all the world like a thug trying to kidnap me—rather than a hero trying to express his devotion."

"After watching him for a while, the entire cast became hysterical with laughter," Davis said. "When we finally subsided, Bogie said to Goulding, 'I guess you'll have to get yourself another lover boy.'"

Jack Warner interpreted Bogie's first day on the set with comtempt. "He's far too old and too ugly. Far too unconvincing to play the role of a man who wins the love of two women, especially two pussies like Hopkins and Davis. He's fired."

"Hal Wallis was the first to suggest George Brent," Warner said to Goulding. "Get Brent."

Goulding did just that.

"Maybe I'm lucky," Bogie told Methot. "Miriam and Bette will probably stage the biggest catfight in Hollywood history."

Privately, Bogie was furious, as his drinking increased and his fighting with Methot intensified.

Bogie reunited with director Lewis Seiler, who had helmed him in King of the Underworld. Cast as a petty crook, Frank Wilson, Bogie also reunited with his friend Billy Halop of the Dead End Kids.

When director Edmund Goulding cast Bogie as the romantic lead in The Old Maid, he was laughed off the screen when his first scenes were evaluated. Bogie was fired, leaving Bette Davis (left) to face her arch rival, Miriam Hopkins

The picture was You Can't Get Away With Murder. On the first day on the set, he met up again with Gale Page, playing the female lead. "It's old home week," he said to her, having worked with her in Crime Schoo.

"I detest Bette Davis," she said.

"The line forms on the right," he told her.

"Jack Warner was set to give me my big chance," she said. "Then Miss Jezebel intervened at the last moment. The greedy bitch took the role from me in Dark Victory. Now I may never become a big movie star."

"You weren't the only actress left out& in the cold," Bogie said. "Even Tallulah Bankhead called me—she used to be my first wife's girlfriend. She wanted to repeat her stage role in the film."

"What chance does a gal have up against such dragons as Bankhead and Davis?"

"Not much," he said. "They chew and devour little guys like us for breakfast."

Minus the Dead End Kids, Billy was cast as a hood from Hell's Kitchen who idolizes a small-time gangster as played by Bogie.

Years later, Bogie recalled very little about the film. "I played one nasty son of a bitch. Not a shred of humanity. Henry Travers, who played Pop in the movie, the Sing Sing librarian, got it right when he said my character is the kind of guy who's so crooked if he tried to go straight he'd crack. The only good thing I could say about the movie was that it didn't have Reagan or Bette Davis in it."

Playing a petty crook, Bogie threatens Billy Halop to keep him from "squealing." In real life, Bogie said, "I love the kid like he was my own son."

All he remembered later on was, “I got to meet Betty Grable, who I think had had an affair with Reagan—or was about to have one. Judy Garland had dropped Billy, and he’d taken up with this lady with the million dollar legs. I could go for Grable myself. She was one hot blonde. But I didn’t put the make on her since she had eyes only for Billy, and, of course, Jackie Coogan and Mickey Rooney and Desi Arnaz.”

Grable had been kicked around Hollywood for more than a decade. Even today it is hard to understand why she became the hottest female box-office attraction of the 1940s. Maybe it was those array of pin-up pictures of hers that lined footlockers from Bataan to Okinawa.

Bogie never got to know Grable, but he said he would have liked to. She married Jackie Coogan, the child actor and her co-star in Million Dollar Legs in 1939. Later she’d marry bandleader and trumpeter Harry James.

“Honey,” she said to Bogie, “Coogan taught me more tricks than a whore learns in a whorehouse.”

He’d already heard that when she was only fifteen, George Raft had taken her virginity. After that, she seemed to be giving it away—not only to Reagan, but to Tyrone Power, Victor Mature, Robert Stack, Artie Shaw, and lots of drivers she liked to fellate at truck stops.

Reflecting on Grable, Bogie told his director, Seiler, “That’s what Mayo Methot should look like but doesn’t. If she keeps letting herself go, people are going to take her for my mother. As for George Raft, he gets all the good roles that I should be playing, and gets to the fifteen-year-old virgins like Grable before I’ve had my chance to deflower them.”

When Bogie saw the ad for You Can’t Get Away with Murder, he was taken back. It read: SIXTY-THREE CENTS WORTH OF ELECTRICITY WOULD END THIS MENACE FOREVER!

When Bogie heard he’d been cast as the third lead in The Roaring Twenties, to be directed by Raoul Walsh, he called his old friend from New York, Mark Hellinger. His short story, The World Moves On, had become the basis for The Roaring Twenties. “Listen, pal,” Bogie said. “I love you. But...”

“But what?”

"Let's get together for a wet lunch at Romanoff's."

When Hellinger entered Romanoff's, all eyes turned to him. A nationally syndicated columnist, he looked like he'd somehow landed directly from Times Square. At table, Bogie was already deep into his second martini.

Hellinger had always been proud of his links to the mob on both coasts, and he seemed trapped in some time capsule from the 1920s. Unlike the other men of his day, Hellinger wore a tight-fitting suit with a midnight blue shirt and sunflower yellow tie. He could easily have been mistaken for either a gangster or a pimp. He'd arrived in a chauffeur-driven, bullet-proof Lincoln that had previously been owned by the notorious gangster, Dutch Schultz.

Seated at table opposite Bogie, Hellinger told him he'd just come from his doctor's office. "I don't have long to live. This burly doctor told me that this morning. As you know heart disease runs in my family. My parents died young. Since I last saw you, I lost my brother. I really loved him."

"I'm real sorry, pal, to hear this," Bogie said.& "Anything I can do?"

"Sure there is," Hellinger said. "Help me celebrate life. I'm doing so with three packages of cigarettes a day, a quart of brandy before the cocktail hour, and all the barbiturates I can get my hands on. There's a lot to be said for dying young. There's also sex, lots and lots of sex. You know I married this hot-to-trot showgal, Gladys Glad. She wants it morning, noon, and evening, and always a blast-off at midnight. She's not satisfied until all three holes are plugged."

Glad was a beautiful, ex-Ziegfeld showgirl he'd married in 1929, divorced in 1932, and would remarry a year later.

When their dialogue finally focused on the script for The Roaring Twenties, Bogie said, "I haven't read it yet. I know James Cagney is playing Eddie Bartlett, with me playing this guy called George Hally. I'm sure before the final curtain, Cagney will kill me like a buzzard, and perhaps die himself in a long extended death scene."

"You must have read the script," Hellinger said.

"No, I didn't," Bogie said. "I didn't have to."

"It's a bit of a gangster picture cliché, I admit that," Hellinger said.

"I can't believe how many more times in how many movies Cagney will be killing me," Bogie said. "Just once, can't I shoot the creepy little guy himself and give myself an extended, histrionic death scene?"

"Your day will come," Hellinger said.

"You play a ruthless bootlegger."

"The part should have gone to George Raft," Bogie said. "Let's face it, he was a ruthless bootlegger in the 1920s when I was a 'young sprig' on Broadway with a tennis racket, wearing a blue blazer and white shoes."

In the plot set at the end of World War I, Army buddies Cagney, Bogie, and Jeffrey Lynn, find their lives intertwining dramatically in this largely hackneyed script.

Mark Hellinger
"Live Fast, Die Young"

It had been a long time since Bogie had met the colorful director Raoul Walsh, who had voted against casting him in The Man Who Came Back way back when. Instead of giving Bogie a star role, he had assigned him the job of giving diction lessons to silent screen star Charles Farrell.

"So, we're working together once again," Walsh said. "When I first met you, I didn't think you'd go far or go anywhere for that matter. Now you're the leading male co-star in a Cagney movie. Who would have thought that?"

"Not you," Bogie said sarcastically, angry that& many years ago Walsh had not given him the break he so desperately wanted when he'd first arrived in Hollywood.

"Let's put bygones behind us and get on with the job of the day," Walsh said.

"Looks like I don't have much choice if I want to get paid at the end of the week."

"I'll go easy on you," Walsh said. 'Just be on screen the vicious son of a bitch you are in real life. It takes one to know one."

The director still had a patch over his eye, perhaps the same patch he wore back when Bogie first met him. He claimed that a jackrabbit crashed through the windshield of his car, permanently injuring his eye with the broken glass. Walsh's eye patch had become almost as synonymous as the jodhpurs worn by Cecil B. DeMille. To other listeners, he claimed that a buzzard in Arizona descended and plucked out his eye one scalding hot afternoon.

Years later, Walsh reflected on shooting a movie with both Cagney and Bogie. "I learned that a director must never kill off Clark Gable, Errol Flynn, Gary Cooper, or Gregory Peck," he said. "But when we 'shot' Cagney or Bogart, the audience and the box office loved it."

It was said that Walsh never let the truth get involved in a great story. He later claimed, "I was the one who made Bogie a star when I cast him in The Roaring Twenties. He was going nowhere until I put him in some of my other films. He was referring to They Drive by Night (1940) and High Sierra (1941). I also saved James Cagney's career."

Priscilla Lane had star billing over Bogie, much to his regret. "Well, well, well," he said sarcastically, "Little Miss Priscilla is rising fast. Who are you fucking?"

"You do reduce things to their most vulgar level," she said. "I'm not a casting couch kind of girl. Talent, Mr. Bogart —that's what I have. Right now I'm getting the most fan mail at Warners except for Miss Bette Davis. No one can touch her."

"Who would want to?" he asked, ignoring his own past experience with the star. "Well, my advice to you is to keep it up. You look like Ginger Rogers. Can you dance?" He did not wait for an answer. "I hear you and Wayne Morris are shacked up."

Raoul Walsh
"A son of a bitch directing a son of a bitch."

"We are dating on occasion—nothing serious," she said.

"Well, keep him out of any future movies with me," Bogie said. By the way, ever since I've known you, you've worn the same brown leather shoes. Want me to buy you another pair?"

"Not at all," she said. "I wear these shoes in every scene of every movie. They're my good luck charm. What's your good luck charm?"

"My dick."

"You do know how to say the most enchanting things to a lady."

"You were lucky with your hit, Four Daughters," he said. "I didn't bother to see it, but I heard that Fannie Hearst tearjerker was meant to star Bette Davis and Errol Flynn. They turned it down."

"If you go to see it, and I hope you will, pay special attention to John Garfield. He's from the New York theatre, and I predict he's going to become the biggest male star at Warner Brothers. Jack Warner told me that he plans to make a screen team of John and me. He wants to make the two of us the biggest stars at Warner Brothers in the 40s. As for you, Cagney, Raft, and Edward G. Robinson, it's time you gave up those gangster roles and started playing father parts."

He just couldn't let her get away with that.

"Walsh told me your role as the singer Jean in The Roaring Twenties was inspired by the real Ruth Etting," he said. "I knew her in New York. Now that was a torch singer. What a woman! Perhaps Walsh can get Etting to dub your voice for such songs as 'Melancholy Baby' which you sing in this movie."

"You really can't help needling people, can you? Have you ever considered it as a mental illness instead of a virtue. I assure you I can do my own singing in any movie I'm cast in. Get it? I'm a singer. Got that?"

Although there was nothing romantic going on between them, Bogie bonded with character actress Gladys George who blazed across Hollywood films in the 1930s and 40s. She was cast as Panama Smith. "She's my kind of broad," he told his director Walsh. "She worked in vaudeville since she was three years old," Bogie said. "No one plays a bad girl like Gladys. She's a gal who knows how to party, how to hold her liquor, and how to have a romance in a dark alley."

Gladys George
"My kind of broad"

When he more or less shared this point of view with Methot, she hit him over the head with a beer bottle in a bar. "The God damn part had my name written all over it—not Gladys George. I can play a role like that in my sleep. Listen, you better get me a job—or else. No one seems to want to cast me in anything. Living off your dough these days, I'd even work for free."

Ann Sheridan had originally told Bogie that she was up for the role of Panama Smith, which was clearly based on the notorious nightclub hostess Texas Guinan. But at the last& minute Sheridan was assigned to another picture.

Cagney's character was based on the bootlegger Larry Fay. Bogie knew Fay and Guinan, and the movie sparked many memories of his life in the speakeasies of the 20s.

The real-life Fay didn't end as glamorously as Cagney in the movie. Fay was shot and killed on New Year's Day of 1932 when he told his doorman that he was forced to reduce his pay. The doorman pulled out his revolver and fatally shot his boss four times.

One scene between gangster Cagney and speakeasy queen Gladys George became legendary. She confronts a fatally wounded Cagney staggering up the steps to a church. He's just been rubbed out by Bogie. In his usual death scene manner, Cagney staggers back down diagonally and falls professionally face up and camera ready.

Kneeling next to him, George tells the police, "He used to be a big shot."

This line from Gladys George was inserted into the script at the last minute and was interpreted at the time mainly as a fade-out remark, nothing special at all. But somehow it caught on with movie audiences who remembered and often repeated it. At the begining of the 21st century, the line was still remembered. Members of the American Film Institute ranked George's last line as the number one most famous remark ever uttered in a gangster movie. B o g i e would work with George again when she was cast with him in The Maltese Falcon.

More Bitte Nots: Cagney with Bogart in The Roaring Twenties

In The Roaring Twenties, Gladys George had fourth billing, with fifth billing going to Jeffrey Lynn. Along with Bogie and Cagney, Lynn was cast as the third doughboy in the movie. A handsome, mild-mannered actor, he had been a former schoolteacher in Massachusetts. Unlike Cagney and Bogie, Lynn was completely without menace on the screen.

Before being cast in The Roaring Twenties, Lynn had had a notable success in 1938 when he had appeared with the& Lane sisters--Lola, Priscilla, and Rosemary--in Four Daughters. That film had been so successful it had spawned three sequels.

Bogie had only a few encounters with Lynn on the set. Either kidding or not, he asked Lynn, "Well, how do you score, pal? I've worked with all the Lane sisters, and screwed each one of them."

"I didn't even try," Lynn honestly claimed.

"Well, Priscilla's in this movie," Bogie said. "Here's your last chance."

"Not interested." Lynn said.

“You a homo or something?”

“I like the gals. But . . .” he hesitated. “If you must know, I’ll let you in on a secret. I’m having this thing with Paulette Goddard, but I don’t want Charlie Chaplin to find out. I met her when we tested together for Gone With the Wind. It’s almost definite that Paulette is going to play Scarlett, and I’m going to appear as Ashley Wilkes, Scarlett’s true love. In fact, every time Selznick wants to test a new actress for the role of Scarlett, he calls me in to make a screen test with the hopeful. These gals don’t have a chance. Paulette’s got it sewed up.”

In a touch of irony, the role of Ashley Wilkes, of course, would ultimately go to one of Bogie’s best friends, Leslie Howard.

Like many male stars of the late 1930s, who entered World War II, Lynn never recouped his former stardom when he returned from the battlefields. His career stalled and went into such a decline he took a job selling homes to baby boomers.

At the world premiere of The Roaring Twenties, Bogie escorted a drunken Methot to the gala affair, which brought out even Louis B. Mayer and Darryl F. Zanuck to the glittering event.

As the curtain was about to go up in the theater showing The Roaring Twenties, Bogie noticed that Hellinger was missing from his seat. He asked Gladys Glad where her husband had gone.

Jeffrey Lynn
"Dreams of playing Ashley Wilkes"

Leaving the theater as the picture began, Bogie went next door to find Hellinger deep into his second glass of brandy.

“All those fucking guys in their penguin tuxedos and their whores in their glittering gowns—all of them judging me,” Hellinger said.

“They’re loving it,” Bogie assured him, getting him to agree to walk back to the theater next door.

Later he wished that he hadn’t. “We’d gone no more than ten steps before Hellinger threw up all over& my shiny new tux,” he told Methot.

At the end of the screening, Bogie accepted congratulations, but Cagney got most of the attention that evening. Bogie was eager to retire to La Maze for drinks with Methot. She’d washed most of Hellinger’s puke off him.

At La Maze, Bogie seated Methot in a chair just warmed by the brandy-drinking Hellinger. Bogie had dim hopes for The Roaring Twenties they’d just seen in its final cut.

Bogie reflected on the movie’s plot. “You know, it’s all long-gone crap— bootlegging, beer drop-offs, the Stock Market crash, Wall Street ticker tapes going beserk, burly men in tuxedos pushing around big tit blondes in Art Deco speakeasies. It’s all so pointless now. Much of the world is at war, and we Yanks will be in it soon. Instead of gangster pictures, like the one Cagney and I just did, I think Confessions of a Nazi Spy will be more what the public wants to see.”

In spite of Bogie’s dire assessment for the success of The Roaring Twenties, it was a big hit and drew rave reviews. The Hollywood Citizen-News joined the chorus, claiming “this is not just another Warner Brothers gang war drama.”

The strangest review appeared in a small Long Beach newspaper. The “critic” wrote: “It’s worth the price of admission just to see Joan Blondell's new, laughable haircut." The problem with that review involved the fact that Blondell was not in the movie.

Although Bogie didn't see any future for The Roaring Twenties, the film in 2009 would be cited in Empire Magazine as number one in a poll of the "Twenty Greatest Gangster Movies You've Never Seen."

The Roaring Twenties would be the last film Bogie ever made with Cagney, and would be Cagney's last gangster film for a decade.

Over breakfast the next morning, Bogie choked on his coffee when he read that Cagney had become the second biggest wage earner in Hollywood, topped only by Gary Cooper. Cagney had taken home $368,333 the previous year, which made him one of the highest wage earners in an America drifting down the long road into World War II.

His agent, Mary Baker, known as Bogie's "eternal fairy godmother," hooked him up with a super-agent, Sam Jaffe, a tiny man with a gift for securing first-class roles for his clients. What Bogie couldn't do on his own in the& 30s, Jaffe did for him in the 40s when he shot up to become the highest paid actor in Hollywood.

"I had a real challenge when I took on Bogie," Jaffe recalled in an interview in London where he had gone into "exile" after his career in Hollywood faded. "Bogie was balding; he didn't have a great physique; he was aging prematurely. His boozing and wild living with Methot was beginning to show on his face. Middle age was not only advancing on Bogie, it was overtaking him."

The agent, Sam Jaffe (1901-2000), is not to be confused with the famous character actor with the same name.

Beginning as an office boy at Paramount, the agent had worked his way up through the ranks to become that studio's executive in charge of production. Then, after a brief stint at Columbia in the early 1930s, he broke away to launch his own talent agency.

In time, he would represent some of the biggest names in the business, not only Bogie and Lauren Bacall, but Peter Lorre, Fredric March, David Niven, Zero Mostel, Richard Burton, and Stanley Kubrick. Jaffe's career declined when he came under suspicion by the Red-hunting demons of Joseph McCarthy during his search for suspected Communists in the film industry.

"At one time I was the only man in Hollywood who believed that Bogie had a future in the movies," Jaffe said. "Most people thought he was just an aging drunk who beat up his wife in bars. But there was great intelligence and ambition there. I sought the help of Leland Hayward. What I couldn't do for Bogie, Leland could. But it was a formidable challenge. Of course, it didn't come easy. Before High Sierra, there were still some turkeys Bogie had to make for Warner Brothers."

When Jaffe confronted Jack Warner about his client's stalled career, the studio honcho said: "Here's how I see Bogie. Give him the lead but only in B minus films, sorta Barton MacLane roles. Make him the third or fourth lead in A-list films. Maybe a great film every now and then like Dark Victory. Bette Davis is A list, Bogie is B list. But in that big film, keep him in a minor role like the stable hand he played. Of course, if any film calls for a gun-toting killer who dies in the last reel, then that script has Humphrey Bogart written all over it."

"Throughout the entire 1930s, Warner never realized the potential of Bogie," Jaffe claimed. "But other producers and directors were taking notice, especially after seeing Bogie's performance with Bette Davis in Dark Victory. We got several offers for star parts for Bogie in A-list pictures. But Warner always said no, preferring to keep his low-paid contract player churning out those B-list potboilers."

Jaffe recalled some tantalizing offers that came in, including Of Mice and& Men (1939), based on the novella by John Steinbeck. The star role went to Burgess Meredith. Directed by Lewis Milestone, the film was nominated for four Oscars.

Bogie was also offered the star role in a remake of The Valiant, the 1929 film that had starred Paul Muni, a role that garnered that actor an Academy Award in the Best Actor category.

The American film producer, Walter Wanger, wanted Bogie to co-star with Joan Bennett, his newly married wife, in The House Across the Bay, a 1940 film directed by Archie Mayo, who had worked with Bogie before. He was to appear in the role of Steve Larwitt, an imprisoned gangster set to be released from Alcatraz. The part seemed perfect for Bogie. Ironically, George Raft was given the role. Usually it was the other way around, with Bogie taking parts that Raft turned down.

In time Bogie and Joan Bennett would become friends and make a picture together for Michael Curtiz. Paramount didn't want to cast Bennett as the female lead in We're No Angels (1955), but Bogie, who still had star power, interceded on her behalf. She was retained in her role of Amelie Ducotel. There were very few film offers for her after that.

"Even John Garfield, a newcomer to the Warners lot, was taking home a bigger weekly paycheck than Bogie," Jaffe said. "Garfield got $1,500 a week, Bogie $1,250. That contrasted with James Cagney taking in $12,500 a week; Edward G. Robinson pulling in $8,500, and George Raft $5,500."

"It was no, no, no from Jack Warner," Jaffe said. "Many of these roles could have sparked Bogie's diminishing career years before Casablanca. He had to stand in the shadows while others took the spotlight. Mistreated and mishandled by Warner Brothers, Bogie had a contract that seemed more like a jail sentence than anything else. We referred to Warner Brothers as 'the prison,' with Jack Warner as the warden."

Bogie's future director, Vincent Sherman, summed up Bogie's position at Warners as 1939 came to an end. "If it's a louse-heel you're looking for,' Jack Warner shouted, 'Get Bogart!'"

The most bizarre offer Bogie received was to co-star with Mae West and W.C. Fields in My Little Chickadee (1940). He was tempted to accept it, if Jack Warner would go along with the deal, which he doubted. Even so, at Jaffe's urging, Bogie decided to check it out.

He told Methot that it would be a "hoot" to appear with West and Fields— "a total change of pace for me. Maybe it would bring out my comic side. As you of all people know, I'm a laugh riot."

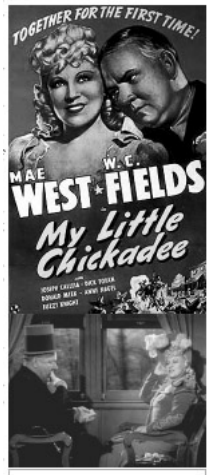
As later revealed to columnist Jim Bacon, Bogie claimed he went to the office of the producer, Lester Cowan. "I was handed a script. I had a few lines, then the next thirty pages would be blank except for the notation—'Material to be supplied by Miss West.' Another few lines for me and then thirty more blank pages. 'Material to be supplied by Mr. Fields.' The whole damn script was like that. I left quietly through an open window."

West heard that Bogie had bolted. She called Jaffe, whom she knew, and asked him to invite Bogie to her all-white apartment where she would explain his role to him and her part as Flower Belle Lee.

Bogie accepted the invitation, more to see Mae West than for any other reason. He had no plans to take the role. He told Jaffe, "Fields and West would chew me up in one bite."

Apparently, West did not hold a grudge against Bogie based on the long-ago catfight she'd had with his first wife, Helen Menken.

For reasons never fully explained, both West and her writing partner, Fields, wanted Bogie to play the romantic lead in My Little Chickadee (1940). He was offered the role of the "Masked Bandit," which eventually went to Joseph Calleia.



Vaudevillian flesh-eating dragons: W.C. Fields, Mae West

As Bogie recalled, West had arranged herself regally on a sofa in her immaculate living room. She had almost nothing to say about the film but covered a wide range of other subjects.

Obviously she had heard that he was a compulsive drinker, and she shared with him her views on liquor. “If you’ve craving a drink,” she said, “it means your nerves are screaming out for B-Complex vitamins, calcium, and other elements. It’s best to refrain. If you get offered a drink—say, at a party—just tell the hostess that you’re allergic to alcohol.”

“I’ll keep that in mind,” Bogie falsely claimed.

“I’m a great believer in a star maintaining his health,” she said. “I wanted you to play my lover in the film, but we may have to do something about your hair—perhaps a hairpiece would be in order. Of course, it’s better to have natural hair,” said the woman famous for her wigs. “To save your hair, tell your wife—Mayo Methot, if I can& believe the papers—to put you on a special diet. We’ll draw up a list of what you can eat. Beef heart, beef brains, lamb kidney, plenty of oysters, turnip greens, mustard greens, cabbage, raw wheat germ—and plenty of buckwheat and cornmeal.”

“Stop it!” she said. “You’re making me hungry.”

When not discussing health and regeneration, West talked about her favorite subject—herself. “Let’s face it, after all these years, I’m outrageously sexy, unlike all those lez actresses you’ve appeared with. We won’t even mention that older woman you married. The less said about that number the better. I’m an immortal sex symbol. I would never play a role that harmed my image. You’ve got to build an image like mine, but of a different sort, of course.”

“Like what kind of image?” he asked.

“First, you’ve got it all wrong. You’ve patterned yourself after the wrong guys in films. Take George Raft for instance.” She smiled amusingly at her own wit. “I’ve already had him, and you can definitely take him. You’ve got to come up with a different role model. I know back in the 20s they were talking about you being the next Valentino. Today, it’s different. Gary Cooper is the biggest thing at the box office. Tell Warners to start billing you as the next Gary Cooper.”

“But Coop is two years younger than me,” he said. “How can I be the next Gary Cooper?”

She thought for a minute. “We’ve got a problem here. Give me some time to think that one through.”

Methot and Bogie slugging away aboard the Sluggy

“Also, my dick isn’t as big as his—or so I hear.”

“Well, Mother Nature wasn’t always fair when she dispensed the goodies. Take me for instance. I’d venture to say that every woman on Earth would want to look like Mae West. But not one can match me. A man can’t do a lot about the actual size of his dick, but he can do something about what he thinks is the size of his dick.”

“You’ve got a point there,” he said. “In other words, stop going to bed with Mayo Methot, who makes me feel I’ve got only an inch with nothing to spare.”

“Exactly,” she said. “Incidentally, Mr. Bogart, I’m just the kind of woman you need to make you feel like a big man in bed.”

“I’m sure you are,” he said. “But I didn’t mean to give you the wrong impression. I mean, I’m not small—in fact, I’m rather large, especially for a man of my size.”

“I’m sure that what you say is true, but Mae never accepted a man’s word for the size of his dick. I’m from Missouri by way of Brooklyn. Show me. As men from coast to coast can testify, a night in the bed of Mae West will rank as the most memorable of your life. When you die—say, around 1975,—your last memory will be of me and what we did in bed together.”

The next day, Sam Jaffe could not pry the final details of Bogie’s night with Mae West from him. Future film historians are left with a baffling puzzle.

Did Humphrey Bogart seduce Mae West that night—or did he not?

When he returned home the next morning, Methot had already answered the question for her husband. As he walked inside the door, a ceramic living room lamp sailed past his head, shattering on the ceramic tiles of the hallway’s floor.

The year 1939 is still hailed for having produced some of the greatest movies of Hollywood. That year witnessed the release of such instant classics as Gone With the Wind, Wuthering Heights, Stagecoach, The Wizard of Oz, and many other memorable films.

Bogie would remember it as one of his least favorite years.

He suffered through the release of both The Oklahoma Kid and The Return of Doctor X. Dark Victory, of course, became a classic, except nearly all reviewers drew attention to two particularly inept miscastings within that Bette Davis film—Ronald Reagan’s part as the disguised homosexual companion of Davis, and Bogie as the Irish horse trainer who longs for her love.

In The Return of Doctor X, Bogie's first and only horror movie, Bogie received bad reviews for a role that had originally been intended for Boris& Karloff. In the decades to come, thanks to Bogie's chalky makeup and streaked hair, he evoked a punk rocker.

In the film, Bogie played a criminal who died in the electric chair, and then was brought back to life by the doctor, John Litel, who revived him.

The film's director, Vincent Sherman, remembered Bogie's first reaction to playing third lead in The Return of Doctor X (1939). "It's my first horror movie, Vince baby," he said. "I hear I play the living dead, lusting after Rosemary Lane in my ceaseless search for blood to sustain my second life beyond the grave. Wayne Morris as the lead! Why in hell do I have to play second fiddle to that stuck-up, no-talent, big-dick creep!"

"On orders from Jack Warner," Sherman said. "We are just the working stiffs on this turkey. It's movie hokum, but I've got to start out as a director with the first picture Jack Warner assigns me. Stick around and watch me go. We'll do some great pictures together in the 40s. Of course, with the way the world is, those will no doubt be war pictures."

Years later, in 1990, Sherman claimed that Bogie did not complain about getting trapped in Dr. X. "He was cast into one villain role after another. He came from the theater, as I did, and even if it was a cornball, crappy part, you tried to do the best you could with it. I was the one who suggested the white streak in his hair because he had been electrocuted. That's& right, he was electrocuted and not hanged. And I got the idea of him walking around with a rabbit and stroking it because that was life—that was blood. We gave him that pasty look because he had been executed and brought back to life."

"When I was assigned Bogie as one of the leads in Dr. X, I was told by the honchos at Warners 'to get him to play something besides Duke Mantee,'" Sherman said. "That was a reference, of course, to his role in The Petrified Forest. The thinking was that Bogie should always be cast as a heavy, not as a romantic leading man. I bought into that. It was inconceivable to me that he'd ever be cast as a romantic lover, appearing opposite Ingrid Bergman in Casablanca. But he became the idol of millions, more dashing to some fans than Errol Flynn himself."

"When I directed Bogie, I never knew if he'd show up beaten, stabbed, or bloody," Sherman recalled. "He was married to this vixen named Mayo Methot. She showed up on the set one day looking for her man. She rightly suspected that Bogie was having an affair with the script girl."

“I was ahead of her,” Sherman said. “I sent Bogie to my studio office to fuck the girl, because the first place Methot looked was in Bogie’s dressing room.”

“To get one up on Bogie, who thought he was so damn smart, I came up with an idea,” Sherman said. “Since she couldn’t find her straying husband, I invited the bitch for a drink. Before the night ended, I screwed the hot-to-trot harridan. Bogie was none the wiser. He showed up the next day, looking like the cat who swallowed the canary. But I was the one who got his whore. I went back to directing him in his cornball role in this hokey picture, and no one was ever the wiser. What Bogie didn’t realize was that Methot was getting as much on the side as he was.”

“Bogie’s claim to fame in the boudoir was that he had seduced all three of the Lane sisters when he worked with them in movies,” Sherman said. “I can’t vouch for that, but I did see Rosemary Lane, who had the female lead in Dr. X, emerge on two different occasions from his dressing room. Maybe they were just holding hands or going over the script together. But I doubt that. I really do.”

“Wayne Morris, the lead, looked good only when he had a hard-on, or so I was told,” said Sherman. “Since we didn’t show hard-ons back then, he didn’t look good on camera, certainly not as an actor. He tried to be funny in the film, once or twice. He fell into a room by leaning against a supposedly locked door which suddenly opened. That was really hilarious. Huntz Hall was the funniest thing in the movie except for Bogie risen from the grave as a leftfield mad doctor.”

As Bogie moved deeper into middle age, a new and younger crop of stars was being groomed for the leading roles of the 1940s.

Although he’d worked briefly under the name of Stanley Morner, the newly emerged “Dennis Morgan” had been assigned three pictures for release in 1939, one of which was The Return of Dr. X. Although he’d be first and foremost a singing star, he would go on to do straight drama, Westerns, light comedies, and even war movies. He’d scored a hit when he sang “A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody” in The Great Ziegfeld (1936), using his Stanley Morner name. Sometimes he was billed as Richard Stanley.

“I hear you’re the latest sensation,” Bogie said, coming up to Morgan and extending his hand. “But what name will you be using next year?”

“From now on, it’s Dennis Morgan to the grave,” the handsome young actor said.

“I hope you’re not gonna take any jobs from me,” Bogie said. “I have a lot of people to support.”

“That will never happen, Mr. Bogart,” Morgan assured him.

Bogie didn’t believe him. “He was an ambitious actor with a gleam in his eye. I think he would have sold me down the river the first chance he got.”

Although some film historians deny it, Morgan admitted later in life that he, along with Ann Sheridan and Ronald Reagan, were briefly considered for the star roles in Casablanca. “I shudder to think what would have happened if I had fucked up a classic like that,” Morgan said.

“I don’t give a damn what all these so-called historians say, I was approached to play Rich Blaine in Casablanca,” he said. “Jack Warner himself talked over the role with me. Ronald Reagan was originally slated to play the Paul Henreid role before Warner considered him for Rick. Ann Sheridan was originally set to play the Ingrid Bergman part. Instead I made Thank Your Lucky Stars —Bogie was in that one too—and The Desert Song, that creaky operetta that was updated to include Nazis. My greatest regret in life was I didn’t get to play Rick. By the 50s, I was on the way out. At least I was remembered for a role in Won Ton Ton, the Dog Who Saved Hollywood in 1976.”

"I, not Bogie, should have played Rick."

In the last months of her life, Maud recalled hearing a sound truck blaring along Hollywood Boulevard hawking The Return of Doctor X.

When the film was released, and as his marriage to Methot crumbled, Bogie was at his most despondent about his career.

Within a year or so, his luck would change. But first he had to survive a string of upcoming screen disasters. Only his most diehard fans would ever remember those films.

As Methot herself said, "I sat through two of them, saw only twenty minutes of the third one he made, and didn't bother to see the final two."

Director Lloyd Bacon, who'd just helmed Bogie and Cagney in The Oklahoma Kid, cast him once again in Invisible Stripes, a film about the ethical struggles of ex-convicts on parole.

Bogie found his billing in fourth position behind George Raft, Jane Bryan, and William Holden humiliating. Jack Warner had decided to give Holden the lead over Bogie because of his success in Golden Boy, a role Bogie himself had desperately wanted.

“Guess who I really wanted to play Raft’s brother?” Bacon said. “Not Holden. Wayne Morris.”

“Why in the fuck is it, that every picture I’m in the director wants to hire this no-talented big prick?” Bogie asked.

Bacon told Bogie that he was sorry he’d cast Holden in the film. “He’s just too damn inexperienced. But Raft seems to have taken him under his wing. Betty Grable told me that Raft is a& & switch-hitter.”

“I can confirm that,” Bogie said. “Back in the golden days of Broadway, Raft was banging his roommate, Rudolph Valentino.”

“Personally, I think Raft has the hots for Golden Boy,” Bacon said.

“I haven’t read the final pages of this script,” Bogie said to Bacon. “But let me guess. Both Raft and I are bumped off in the final reel?”

“You don’t even have to ask me that question,” Bacon said. “You already know it’s true.”

Bogie made his hostility to Holden obvious. One scene called for Holden, with Bogie riding on the seat behind him, to drive a motorcycle into a wall. “That S.O.B., he’ll crack it up!” Bogie shouted at Bacon. Bacon insisted, and Holden aimed the cycle head-on into a wall. Fortunately, both stars escaped unharmed.

Encountering Raft again, Bogie said, “Me and you old guys are slowly being replaced with studs like William Holden. They call them stars of tomorrow. What are we? Stars of yesterday.”

“You weren’t a star of yesterday,” Raft said. “I was. Not only that but Jack Warner personally told me that he’ll be lining up a whole string of pictures in the 40s and plans to star me in most of them.”

“That’s wonderful,” Bogie said, “not that Warner’s promises mean a damn rat’s fart. But don’t count on anything. They may not be making gangster movies in the 40s. Only war pictures.”

The female lead, Jane Bryan, was polite but reserved with Bogie. They’d last appeared together in the Bette Davis/Edward G. Robinson film, Kid Galahad. In Invisible Stripes, Bryan played “Peggy,” Holden’s girlfriend.

“Not only does Holden get third billing over me, but he gets the girl while I end up with a bullet,” Bogie said.

Bacon was tired of listening to Bogie complain. In a cutting dig, he said,& “There are stars in the making like William Holden, already established stars like George Raft, and stars that will never be.”

From Invisible Stripes:
Two views of George Raft with Humphrey Bogart, "working together but hating each other."

Bogie resented the close bond that quickly formed between Raft and Holden, both on and off the set. “George was my big brother in and out of the movie,” Holden said. “In fact if he hadn’t helped me, I might have been thrown out of the picture. He told Bacon to go easy on me.”

In one scene, though, Holden, straight from the boxing ring of Golden Boy, accidentally rammed his head into the socket of Raft’s left eye, causing damage to Raft that included bruises and stitches.

“He forgave me,” Holden said, “and I ended up sitting with him all night, applying cold compresses on his eye.”

Unlike his rather formal reunion with Jane Bryan, Bogie had a warm reunion on set with one of the supporting players, Lee Patrick. She came up to him and gave him a long, passionate kiss. “I have a right to do that,” she said. “Don’t forget you were my husband.”

“I don’t remember us getting married,” he said. “I drank a lot in those days. Still do, as a matter of fact.”

“No, you silly goose, you were my priggish young husband on Broadway in Baby Mine.”

Behind the scenes of Invisible Stripes: George Raft (left) and Bogie nude in the shower together. Raft showered with his shoes on. "We compared cock sizes with each other," Bogie said.

Later over lunch, she said, “I know you know how old I am, but don’t tell anybody.

“Actually, I don’t remember,” he said.

“I’m only two years older than you, but in Hollywood I claim I was born in 1911. A gal’s got to earn a living, right, and I’m not ready for grandmother parts yet.”

“Your secret is safe with me.” He looked at her intently. “Are you happily married—or shall we resume our shack-up?”

“Are you and I gonna be second bananas in film for the rest of our careers?” he asked.

“I’m afraid so in my case,”& she said. “I’m resigned to it. My last big chance came when I was considered for the lead in Stella Dallas. Alas, Miss Barbara Stanwyck snagged the role from me. So, whenever Jack Warner has a potboiler, and he needs someone to play a nurse, a floozie, whatever, he can call on me. I specialize in hard-bitten dames.” At the end of the lunch, she kissed him long and hard. “After going to bed with you, I know why they call you Hump.”

“I’m now called Bogie.”

Invisible Stripes played for a week in movie theaters along Hollywood Boulevard. During its run, Bogie invited Methot to go with him to see it after dinner at the Brown Derby. The meal went off smoothly, without any physical violence, even though patrons at the other tables waited for The Battling Bogarts to break into a fight.

But they left the restaurant without any altercation. As Bogie drove up to the Warners Hollywood Theater, he noticed that the marquee read: GEORGE RAFT AND WILLIAM HOLDEN STARRING IN INVISIBLE STRIPES.

Immediately, Methot accused Bogie of being a wimp for not demanding billing instead of Holden. “Next thing I know, Jack Warner will demand that you lick off Holden’s dingleberries on camera.”

That started it. The Battling Bogarts launched America’s entry into World War II before the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

Fast forward to September of 1953: The feud between William Holden and Bogie was still percolating when they appeared together on the set of Sabrina, a movie that starred the enchanting Audrey Hepburn. Bogie was the star this time, with Holden billed third. Soonafter, hostilities between "the two roosters" [director Billy Wilder's words] bubbled over.

Bogie admitted that "I always knew Wilder wanted Cary Grant for the part, but the faggot turned it down."

"Bogie's face was so weathered at this late hour in his life, I felt audiences would not believe that a cute little number like Audrey would go for this grandfatherly type," Wilder said.

In Sabrina, Bogie played a boring, workaholic tycoon, Larry Larrabee, with Holden cast as his playboy brother, David. Both are vying for the prize, young and beautiful Sabrina Fairchild, the daughter of their chauffeur.

When he made Sabrina, Bogie was fifty-four years old, but Wilder thought he looked "at least sixty-five, maybe more so."

Bogie staggered through Sabrina as best he could, but it was obvious to Hepburn that his many years of hard drinking had made him dyspeptic and ill. Unknown to the cast, Bogie was beginning to show the first symptoms of the cancer that four years later would claim his life.

"Paramount has given me a real problem," Wilder said. "I have to make the audience believe that Audrey would prefer weathered old Bogie to the handsome, dashing, and gorgeously blond Bill Holden, who was thirty-five but looked twenty-eight.

Bogie and Wilder feuded right from the beginning, with Bogie calling Sabrina "a crock of crap." He still didn't use the word shit. At one point, studying his new lines of dialogue, he asked Wilder if his young daughter had written it.

Between takes, Bogie reminded Holden that he was earning $300,000 for the picture, as compared to Holden's $125,000.

Directly to his face, Bogie called Wilder "a Prussian German with a riding crop." On other occasions, he called Wilder a "Kraut bastard" or "Nazi." When Wilder issued an instruction, Bogie mocked him by saying " Jawoh! "

Bogie, Audrey Hepburn, and William Holden. Bogie may have won Audrey on screen, but Holden got her when the cameras stopped rolling.

When Hepburn flubbed her lines, Bogie said, "Have you considered staying home and learning your lines instead of going out every night?"

Holden later complained that on many a day on the set, he almost came "within an inch of knocking Bogie's teeth out because of the insulting way he was treating Audrey and Wilder, too."

As he moved closer to death, Bogie became more and more insecure. He mocked Holden as "Smiling Jim," and ridiculed his good looks. "More matinee idol than a man." He even mocked his hair, whose color had been lightened for the role.

Holden snapped back at Bogie in the press. "He's an actor of consummate skill, with an ego to match."

At one point during a scene, Holden blew smoke in Bogie's face, making him ruin his lines. Bogie stalked off the set, shutting down production.

When Bogie's long-time friend, Clifton Webb, visited the set and asked what it was like working with Hepburn, Bogie replied, "It's okay if you like to do thirty-six takes."

Bogie recalled passing in front of Holden's dressing room at the end of the day, where, in the words of author Bob Thomas, "he could hear the rattle of ice cubes and the tinkle of Audrey Hepburn's laughter and Holden's hearty guffaw as they listened to Billy Wilder's witticisms."

"Those Paramount bastards didn't invite me," Bogie claimed. "Well fuck 'em."

Toward the end of the shoot, Bogie learned that Holden had fallen in love with the film's female star. "I really was in love with Audrey," Holden told Wilder. "But she wouldn't marry me. So I set out around the world with the idea of screwing every woman in every country I visited."

Irving ("Swifty") Lazar, who was Bogie's agent at the time, summed up the tense condition on the set of Sabrina. "Bogie thought that Wilder must humble himself before Bogie. But on a Billy Wilder picture, there is no star but Billy Wilder."

At the end of the shoot, Bogie dismissed Hepburn, Wilder, and Holden. "I'd rather drink a quart of rat's piss than work with either of them again. In fact, I've decided Sabrina is going to be my last picture."

That was just a drunken vow Bogie made at Romanoff's to Clifton Webb. Even on his death bed, he was planning to make another picture and another picture.

Back in Hollywood in 1939, Bogie was given his latest assignment, a Western called Virginia City, to be directed by Michael Curtiz, whom he met at Romanoff's for a wet lunch to discuss its details. Both men were just a few short war years from making Casablanca together.

"I want you to wear a mustache," Curtiz said.

"Whatever Herr Director wants," Bogie replied. "More to the point, what's the billing?"

"You're the fourth lead," Curtiz said. "It's an Errol Flynn picture. You'll absolutely hate the fucker. He's nothing but a big piss."

"I can work with Flynn providing you write in some love scenes between us," Bogie said.

"You're such a kidder," Curtiz said. "Always make the joke."

"Who are the other co-stars?" Bogie asked.

"Miriam Hopkins and Randolph Scott."

"Oh, goodie-goodie, a super bitch and a cocksucker."

CHAPTER NINE

The dashing star of Virginia City, Errol Flynn, was remarkably different from Bogie. Self-destructive, sexually wanton, and reckless in his private life, Flynn, like Bogie, had started out at Warners at about the same time, although their careers would follow remarkably different paths. Whereas it would take years for Bogie to reach the top, Flynn burst like a dynamo upon the American public, a strikingly beautiful, romantic figure with enough charisma to obscure his limited acting talent.

Flynn was a swashbuckler, excelling at swordplay both on and off the screen. “I’m a devil-may-care ladykiller,” he said of himself, leaving out mention that he had a great fondness for young boy ass too.

“Robin Hood,” Bogie said to him on the set. “I almost didn’t recognize you without your green tights.”

“They were far too tight to hold my big bundle of goodies,” Flynn claimed.

“This is no reflection on working with you, but I hope this is my last western,” Bogie said. “I’m a big city boy who hates getting cactus in his ass and sleeping with rattlesnakes.”

“I hear you keep fighting for better roles,” Flynn said. “Not me. I keep fighting Jack Warner for more money. Miriam Hopkins is getting the same paycheck as me, $50,000. Randolph Scott is taking home $35,000. How about you?”

A handsome, self-destructive rogue: Erroll Flynn

“Would you believe $10,000?” Bogie said.

The hard-driving Michael Curtiz, of the short fuse, was furious at being assigned to helm another Western. “I know no God damn thing about Westerns,” he said. “Why choose me? All I know is that all that horse riding makes cowboys impertinent.”

“Don’t you mean impotent?” Bogie asked.

“Call it what name you want,” Curtiz said. “Let’s don’t fight over words. It means cowboys after all those years in the saddle become no good in the saddle. Get my river gush?”

“You mean drift, don’t you?”

“What are you?” Curtiz asked. “Some fucking English teacher? I know English better than you. That’s why dialogue’s my specialty. But you dumb actors can’t say words right.”

When not fighting with Flynn during the shoot, Curtiz directed most of his hostility toward Hopkins. “Cunt can’t ride horse,” he told Bogie. “Says it’s the time of month for her period. Cunt too old to have period, but claims her vagina’s bleeding.”

In the final days of 1939, the unit manager wrote Warners: “It grows more difficult each day for Curtiz to handle Miss Hopkins. They have utter contempt for each other. I have never seen such hostility. Perhaps you can fire her and hire Bette Davis instead. The last line is a joke, of course.”

“Oh, God,” Bogie told Ann Sheridan who came to visit him. “In the future I’ll have a rule. No more mustaches. I’m dressed in black to let the audience know I'm a villain. I play this half-breed outlaw with a Spik accent."

"At least it's not that Irish brogue from Dark Victory," she said.

"Curtiz is always the same directing Flynn," Bogie said. "His fists are clenched, his face red with rage, and his voice constantly shouts 'You bum, you bum' to Flynn. Some of the hostility between the two is because they'd both married Lili Damita."

Bogie told Sheridan that she should be playing the saloon girl and Confederate spy, not Hopkins. "You could give it a sexy, comic touch," he said. "Hopkins is playing it like a grande dame."

vs. the real thing

On November 13, 1939, Sidney Skolsky revealed to the public what was happening on the set of Virginia City. "There are plenty of feuds in the Virginia City company. Errol Flynn and Humphrey Bogart are feuding, Errol Flynn and Miriam Hopkins are feuding, and Mike Curtiz and Miriam Hopkins are feuding."

When Bogie encountered Ronald Reagan on the studio lot, the two actors agreed to break for a cup of coffee, with Bogie smoking a cigarette, of course. "I was set to play the Randolph Scott role, but another project kept me from it," Reagan said.

"Sorry we didn't get to work together," Bogie said. "But you might not have had time to learn your lines. That Jane Wyman is one hot little cutie."

"No, it's not like that," Reagan said. "She's not a nympho like Betty Grable. Jane and I believe in moderation."

"Good to hear that, pal," Bogie said. "I wish another project had come up for me instead of my playing a bandito mexicano. Talk about type-casting. Now I understand why you were cast as a latent homosexual in Dark Victory. You look like a latent homosexual."

"I could get insulted by that, but I know you're a ribber," Reagan said. "Actually I heard that Olivia de Havilland was set to take over the Hopkins role. Something went wrong."

"Maybe Flynn got tired of fucking her in all those pictures and wanted a change of vaginas," Bogie said.

"You're something else, Bogie," Reagan said, slightly embarrassed. "I don't think you're housebroken. If you don't improve your manners, how can Jane and I invite you over for dinner?"

Bogie told him, "I was raised with politeness and manners. That's the way I was brought up. But in the goldfish bowl of Hollywood, it's impossible to use them. Do you think politeness and manners would work on Michael Curtiz, much less Jack Warner? Dream on."

Flynn was mostly involved with his gang that included Alan Hale, Guinn "Big Boy" Williams, Bruce Cabot, William Lundigan, and Patric Knowles. Curtiz called them "raisers from hell."

"Don't you mean hell-raisers?" Bogie said.

“Whatever,” the director said. “The key word is hell.”

One night when the Flynn’s entourage didn’t show up, Flynn invited Bogie for a night of boozing, not womanizing. He later told Cabot, “I am amazed at the whiskey Bogie can drink and still stay on his feet. He drank me under the table.”

If any revelation emerged that night, it came from Flynn, who drunken-ingly informed Bogie that Mayo Methot, a wife Bogie hated but couldn’t live without, had been “royally screwed” [Flynn’s words] not only by himself, but by his pals Bruce Cabot and Knowles. All this had occurred when Methot was cast in a bit part in The Sisters (1938), a film that had starred Bette Davis, Flynn, and Knowles.

Bogie’s reaction to this revelation is not known. Perhaps it led to another fight between “The Battling Bogarts,” or perhaps he never brought it up. Considering his own record, he could hardly attack her for infidelity.

Far from seeming angry at Methot, he gave her a $15,000 diamond necklace for Christmas, the most expensive gift he’d ever presented to anyone. That piece of jewelry could be split up into various combinations of brooches, clips, and bracelets.

Jack Warner more or less ordered Bogie to attend the world premiere of Virginia City in Nevada. He told Methot, “I found myself drowning in a sea of rhinestone-studded cowboy suits, ten-gallon hats, and six-shooters.”

With his fake mustache removed, Bogie rushed from the set of Virginia City to take the third lead in It All Came True.

After Bette Davis turned down the role, Ann Sheridan was cast as the star of the picture, playing a sexy nightclub entertainer described as “teasing, tempting, and a manhandler.” It was a good showcase for her, as she also got to sing “Angel in Disguise” and “The Gaucho Serenade.”

Bogie with Sheridan in It All Came True
“A teasing manhandler”

The ardor between Sheridan and Bogie had cooled, but they remained close friends and confidants. Playing Sheridan’s boyfriend was Jeffrey Lynn, who had second billing. Bogie, who had appeared in titles above him in The Roaring Twenties, was sorry to see himself demoted. “I think Jack Warner is gradually shoving me out the door,” he told Sheridan.

The director, Lewis Seiler, was not a temperamental Michael Curtiz, but a working professional who had helmed Bogie in You Can’t Get Away With Murder. Bogie expected to encounter no problems with him.

During the first day of the shoot, Seiler told him that James Stewart had originally been set to star in the film.

Stewart had a one-picture commitment to Warner Brothers.

When that didn't work out, Jack Warner conceived a new screen duo of George Raft teamed with John Garfield. "Garfield can do all those gangster roles that I used to give Bogie in the 1930s," Warner said.

But both Garfield and Raft pulled out at the last minute. With an undisguised contempt, Raft dismissed the role of the gangster in the film, Chips Maguire. "It's a Humphrey Bogart part," he told Jack Warner.

Bogie's close friend, the writer Louis Bromfield, came onto the set to bond with Bogie. He'd sold his story, "Better Than Life," for $50,000, which is the exact amount that David Selznick had paid Margaret Mitchell for her rights to Gone With the Wind.

Bromfield attacked screenwriters Michael Fessier and Lawrence Kimble. "They couldn't decide if Bogie was a villain or a good guy." When he saw the final cut, Bromfield praised Bogie's excursion into comedy. He played a mobster who was a sort of guardian angel to some aging vaudevillians, including ZaSu Pitts, in a rundown boarding house."

In fact, Bromfield was so pleased with Bogie's work that when the time came for Bogie to wed Lauren Bacall, he invited him to conduct the ceremony at his Malabar Farm in Ohio.

Mark Hellinger, Bogie's pal and the associate producer, brought him the script for the next Edward G. Robinson film, Brother Orchid. Robinson had contracted to play Little John Sarto, with Bogie in the third lead as Jack Buck.

The female star of the picture, Ann Sothern, had been cast as Robinson's ever-faithful girlfriend. In this far-fetched yarn, Robinson goes from racket chieftain to a monastery.

James Cagney was originally set to play the Robinson role, but bolted at the last minute. Producer Hal Wallis had wanted Bogie's long-time friend, Lee Patrick, to play the& female lead as Flo, and Bogie was looking forward to working with her. At the last minute& Hellinger, against Bogie's wishes, appealed to Jack Warner to cast Sothern, and he agreed.

When Bogie read the script, he told Hellinger, "Of all the films I've made with that runt, Robinson, this is the only one in which neither of us is killed."

Once again Bogie found himself working with director Lloyd Bacon, who had last helmed him in Invisible Stripes.

Bacon was anticipating tension between Bogie and his rival, Robinson. But Robinson said, "Everybody thought we'd be at each other's throat. Not at all. He was a pro in the best meaning of the word. Between takes we talked ominously about America's entry into the war. We saw it coming."

In the fifth lead was dependable Ralph Bellamy, best known for playing second leads who invariably lose the girl in the final reel.

“When you need an actor to play anything, get Ralph Bellamy,” Robinson said. “His range is limitless; his abilities unparalleled; his ego barely ever ruffled. He is the kind of star that made it possible to make pictures. Never getting the girl is a difficult role; it enables an actor to grow old gracefully. I cherish Ralph. I could not say the same about Brother Orchid.”

Bogie had a lot of respect for the British film actor, Donald Crisp, who would go on to win an Oscar as Best Supporting Actor for his performance in the 1942 How Green Was My Valley. Bogie had worked with him before on such pictures as The Great O’Malley and The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse.

When Bogie met him again, he’d just appeared with Laurence Olivier in Wuthering Heights (1939).

“We’re 19th century men,” Bogie said to Crisp, welcoming him to the set. “Tell me what it was like fighting the Boer War the year I was born?”

Crisp’s answer startled Bogie as it was so earthy. “All I remember was crossing pathways with the Prime Minister of Britain. A very young Winston Churchill and I took a horse piss together. I can assure you that if the PM had whipped out his dick in front of him, Hitler would have declared the war lost.”

Over a drink later that night, Crisp confided, “I’m not English, really Scottish. We Scots know the value of a pound.”

He did, indeed, becoming at one time in later life chairman of the Bank of America.

Bogie was introduced to Ann Sothern. From the cold winds of North Dakota, this sexy, good-looking, wisecracking blonde had originally appeared on the screen as Harriet Lake, her real name. She had wanted to be a singer, but movie producers had other plans for her, viewing her mainly as a comedienne.

When Bogie met her, she had just finished filming Maisie in 1939. The film proved so popular she would be appearing as Maisie in sequels up to 1947. She’d also been teamed with Gene Raymond in a series of films which, among many others, included The Smartest Girl in Town (1936).

“Thank you for confirming what I already know,” he said. Since you’re a married lady, and because I’m a New York gentleman who respects marriage vows, I won’t be pursuing you on this picture.”

“Are you talking about that jerk I’m married to, Richard Pryor?” she asked. “Me and him will be heading for the divorce courts one of these days. No doubt I’ll meet you and Mayo Methot there too.”

“Perhaps,” he said. “I’d leave her, but I’m afraid she’d hunt me down and kill me.”

“At any rate, drop by my dressing room late this afternoon,” she said, “and I’ll see if you’re man enough to handle me.”

The next day, Bogie told Hellinger, “I don’t think Sothern enjoyed me so much in the sack. As a consolation prize, she told me I’d be just the right fit for her old MGM cohort, Lucille Ball. It seems that Ball is alone for weeks at a time whenever Desi Arnaz is on the road.”

It was once again Mark Hellinger, its associate producer, who brought Bogie his next film script, They Drive by Night. Based on A.I. Bezzerides’ novel Long Haul, it was a drama about the rough-and-tough trucking industry.

“Who am I playing second lead to this time?” Bogie asked. “It has to be either George Raft or Edward G. Robinson.”

“You’re right on the mark,” Hellinger said. “It’s Raft. He plays your brother. You’re only the fourth lead. Ann Sheridan, your old gal pal, is the second lead, and Ida Lupino is in third position.”

“That Lupino is one hot dame,” Bogie said. “It gives me an incentive to work on this stinker.”

“You’re judging the script before you even read it?” Hellinger asked.

“Hell, I could play the role without& even reading the script.”

Driver Raft saved their lives that day.

Raoul Walsh, the testy director with the eyepatch, was called in to helm the stars. He’d last worked with Bogie in You Can’t Get Away With Murder.

Arguably, Walsh was the one who nicknamed Bogie as “Bogie the Beefer,” because he was always complaining about roles he received. “His acting experience resembled that of John Barrymore,” Walsh said. “Both hated, or appeared to hate, every part of the motion-picture industry. John damned it because of the long hours and Bogie echoed him: ‘They get you up before daybreak and work your ass off all day until sundown. In the theater I went to work at eight in the evening and was through by eleven; all the rest of the night and next day to play and catch up with my drinking. Working in pictures is for the birds.’ Bogie could go on like this indefinitely, and his invective never faltered.”

Tiring of his gripes, Walsh confronted him. “You like that fat paycheck at the end of the week, don’t you?”

With a scowl, Bogie said, “That’s the only kick I get out of this lousy business.”

The film version of They Drive By Night, at least in terms of some aspects of the plot, is derivative of Bordertown (1935), that had starred Bette Davis as the predatory wife alongside Paul Muni and Margaret Lindsay. In They Drive by Night, Ida Lupino took over the Bette Davis role, Raft was cast in the Paul Muni part, and Sheridan won the role previously played by Margaret Lindsay.

The plot was recycled once again in 1953 in a film, Blowing Wild, starring Barbara Stanwyck, Anthony Quinn, and Gary Cooper.

Ironically, during the casting discussions for Blowing Wild, Lauren Bacall had been the first choice to play the tempestuous wife of an oil baron, the role that eventually went to Stanwyck, but Bacall turned down the offer.

On the set of They Drive by Night, Bogie once again came into contact with Gale Page, with whom he’d previously starred in Crime School.

“My parts are getting smaller with each picture,” Page said. “I’m still hanging in there, but just barely. Jack Warner told me I look like an ordinary 1940s housewife. So any time a script calls for a drab but dependable housewife, I can do it.”

“Not all women were made to be the Oomph gal,” Bogie said. “Since not all women in the audience look like Lana Turner, the public will identify with you. You’re the type of gal a man brings back to meet his family before he marries her.”

“Thanks, Bogie,” she said. “I think I was just insulted but in the nicest way.”

Veteran actor John Litel, was also upset by his role with an eighth billing. “You know I’ve starred in movies. The star, carrying the whole fucking picture. You know that’s true.”

“Not really,” Bogie said. “The only pictures of yours I’ve ever seen were those you did with me.”

Although he was attracted to her, Bogie had only a passing relationship with the British/American actress Ida Lupino. The young star was too busy trying to get her role of Lana right, since this was her first picture for Warners. She announced to Bogie that “Bette Davis is a tough act to follow.”

“Even Bette Davis finds Bette Davis a tough act to follow,” he said.

Sheridan and Lupino clashed. It wasn’t a feud to equal Bette Davis and Miriam Hopkins, but it was nonetheless lethal. “That two-bit British whore is stealing my thunder,” Sheridan complained to Bogie in his dressing room over drinks. “I could pull out every hair in the bitch’s head. Howard Hughes should have fucked me when I was fifteen years old—not that tight little pussy.”

Sheridan’s rivalry with the British import dated back to a 1934 Paramount film, Ready for Love. Ida Lupino had been the star of that movie, and Clara Lou Sheridan—Ann’s original name—had a walk-on.

“Thanks for being so reassuring,” she said.

Sheridan was correct, however, in her belief that she was being upstaged. In a July 9, 1940 review in the Hollywood Reporter, a critic observed: “Ann Sheridan is in a tough spot because of little Ida Lupino. Annie looks great, and before Miss Lupino comes on the screen with so much the better of the parts, the redheaded Sheridan stands out. But after Ida gets working, she steals all the attention. But Miss Oomph is okay.”

The highlight of They Drive by Night involved Lupino’s scene in the courtroom where she went berserk, confessing to the murder of her husband, who had been portrayed by the veteran actor Alan Hale. The way she played it made her a star, landing her a seven-year contract at Warner Brothers.

In the 1920s, George Raft had driven a truck along Third Avenue in Manhattan, delivering bootleg liquor for the notorious gangster and bootlegger, Owney Madden. During his portrayal of a gangster on the set of They Drive By Night, Raft’s real-life experience paid off.

In one scene he was called upon to drive a truck down a steep California mountain road, with Bogie and Sheridan as his passengers.

Halfway down the hill, as the cameras were rolling, the truck went out of control, the brakes not working. Sheridan screamed and covered her eyes. Bogie shouted, “You’re gonna kill us!”

The speedometer reached eighty miles per hour. Spotting an embankment which was being dug out for another road, Raft swerved the truck up that embankment. Halfway up the embankment, the truck skidded to a stop.

Jumping out of the truck, Sheridan kissed him on the mouth. “I owe you the fuck of your life for that.”

Bogie merely said, “Thanks, pal,” perhaps embarrassed at all his screaming and cursing.

“Don’t thank me,” a shaken Raft said. “Write a letter to Owney Madden.”

They Drive By Night was completed in thirty-three working days for a budget of $500,000. According to the preview audiences at theaters on Hollywood Boulevard, it seemed unanimous that Lupino had stolen the picture from Bogie, Raft, and Sheridan. One writer asserted Lupino projected a “fascinating blend of beauty, danger, and deceit.”

On March 13, 1940 Warner Brothers bought the screen rights to W.R. Burnett’s crime novel High Sierra, with a plan to star Paul Muni as its male lead. In 1936 Muni had won the Oscar for The Story of Louis Pasteur, and since then, he had reigned as Warner’s number one male star, even at age 45.

A decade earlier, Burnett had become famous for his crime novel, Little Caesar, based on the life of Al Capone and brought to the screen in a sensational performance by Edward G. Robinson.

John Huston was called in to tweak the script, but Muni rejected the first version. Warner then decided to ask Burnett himself to work on a screenplay for High Sierra. When Burnett’s version was submitted to the censors manning the Production Code, they objected to the “illicit” sexual relationship spinning around Ida Lupino with unmarried partners. They also found the words “damn,” “tramp,” and even “punk” objectionable.

& Ida Lupino was cast as the female lead playing Marie Garon, a dime-a-dance tramp willing to run off with whatever man came along.

In the wake of Muni’s rejection and the perception by the studio that he wasn’t really right for the role anyway, a revised script was submitted to George Raft. He turned it down, claiming he was not going to be killed off in any more films. Huston and Burnett then resubmitted the script to Muni who rejected it once again, even though he thought it had been vastly improved. He rejected it this time because it had been turned down by Raft.

Next in line, Edward G. Robinson said “no way,”& before the script was shopped to John Garfield. Even though he had no real star power at the time, he, too, rejected High Sierra. Exasperated, Jack Warner said, “Who else but Bogart? He’s a son of a bitch, but what actor isn’t?”

bottom photo:
Ida Lupino with Bogart

Even at the last minute, Warner almost didn't cast him. As he told his friend, Raoul Walsh, "Bogie's going around telling people I'm a fairy. But if you want to take a chance, go ahead."

Why Bogie spread the story that Warner was a homosexual is not known, perhaps in revenge for Warner's long ago taunting him about his lisp.

Hard at work on the screenplay, Huston was contemptuous of Raft. " Everything was intended for Raft at the time. I was not one of his great admirers. I thought he was a clown, walking around in his white suit with those padded shoulders and form-fitting hips, protected by bodyguards. He was very much a Mafia type and liked to display it. And it turned out the poor devil came to nothing. He refused everything that was thrown at him. And he refused High Sierra. You know, he was really an ignorant man. And I was delighted he didn't do our script because Bogie then got to play it. And I knew Bogie was a fine actor."

Huston said that what made High Sierra different from other gangster films was the way Bogie played Roy Earle. "We had seen bad guys, hundreds, maybe thousands of them before, but the bad guy Bogart played was a decent man. He had a sense of loyalty, a code of ethics. He could feel sorry for a neglected dog or a crippled girl and go out of his way to help them. He was essentially a loner, a man up against a system, and even though he knew how to use a machine gun and was on the wrong side of the law, he was likable. The way Bogart played him, you couldn't help rooting for Roy Earle."

Although they knew each other before, it was during the making of High Sierra, that Bogie bonded with Huston. For some reason, Bogie called his future director "The Monster & Double Ugly."

Author Axel Madsen said, "John was Bogie's kind of snake charmer, a natural-born anti-authoritarian, a guy with panache and style. Bogie thought John had more color than ninety percent of Hollywood's actors. In the future when John would call and say, 'Hey, kid, let's make a picture,' Bogie knew he was being conned but he also knew he would have a great time."

On the set of High Sierra, Bogie found every excuse he could to complain about the working conditions. He even attacked the packed lunches the crew was served. "I wonder when this sandwich was made? Last year? Christ, they feed the cons at San Quentin better than this."

“In spite of his eternal beefing, Bogie turned in a top performance, jerking tears when he paid for the young lame girl to have successful surgery and setting the audience on the edges of their seats during the robbery and long chase before he died,” Walsh said. “This performance made Bogart a star. He would never have to play bit parts again. He only grunted when he read the good things the critics had to say. His mind seemed to be busy with other things. I think he was still blaming Jack Warner for sending him that lousy lunch.”

At first, Lupino and Bogie appeared almost hostile to each other on the set. “I have a way of kidding with a straight face,” she later said. “So does Bogie. Neither of us recognized the trait in the other. Each thought the other was being nasty, and we were both offended.”

Detroit-born Joan Leslie got her first major role in High Sierra, playing a crippled girl. She would soon star with Bogie again. Bogie told Walsh, “I can never relate to good girls like Leslie. They’re so wholesome, so pure, like professional virgins. I don’t think she’ll go far in films. We need Lana Turner, Bette Davis, Ann Sheridan, Claire Trevor—you gotta be a bitch to make it big in Hollywood. This town is full of sweet, perky, young things like Leslie.” Later he said, “Imagine being little Joan Leslie, and peaking in your career at the age of twenty-one.”

Bogart—Very, very noir

As High Sierra was being filmed, Walsh came to Bogie with some good news. Muni and Jack Warner had had a violent argument and Muni was out the Warner door.

Warner had been on the verge of green lighting a film for Muni about Ludwig von Beethoven. When Warner told him the movie had been canceled, Muni exploded. He severed his relationship with Warners and tore up his seven-year contract. At last, the road opened for Bogie to get better scripts.

Barton MacLane appeared in High Sierra, but with a tenth billing. Bogie had worked with MacLane before in such films as San Quentin. He would appear with Bogie again in the Forties—in fact, MacLane’s name is kept alive to future generations because of his appearance in three of Bogie’s big movies of the Forties.

Bogie stayed mainly to himself during early filming. But he did meet and talk with some major actors in the supporting cast, including Alan Curtis. His role as Babe Kozak in High Sierra remains perhaps the most memorable of his career.

At the time Bogie met Curtis, he was on the dawn of marrying the Hungarian actress Ilona Massey, that shapely operatic blonde from Budapest.

Curtis discussed his marriage plans. “Massey is not a woman you marry,” Bogie said. “She’s a woman you have make you goulash and then you fuck her.” Curtis seemed insulted but Bogie was giving good advice. The marriage was virtually over in three months, although officially it lasted a year.

Perhaps the best actor in the supporting cast was a Kentuckian, Henry Hull, a thin man with a furrowed brow who specialized in playing practical oldsters or crotchety types. Over a drink, Bogie told him, “It’s great talking to one of the real pros in the business, The Werewolf of London.” He was referring to Hull’s 1935 hit. Both Hull and Bogie recalled their 1934 appearances in the film Midnight with Sidney Fox.

By this time, Bogie had been around the Warner lot so long that it became increasingly obvious that he was working with much younger “stars of tomorrow,” some of whom he held with a certain disdain. He was resentful of Arthur Kennedy, because he’d been discovered by James Cagney, who’d cast him in City for Conquest (1940) as his younger, piano-playing brother. When Kennedy brought up the name of James Cagney four times in different conversations, maintaining that Cagney was the best actor in Hollywood, Bogie finally interrupted. “You’re out of your mind, fucker. Cagney can do only one thing well. Dress up in drag and pick up sailors to bed. I hear he's great at fellatio. Don't tell me he didn't put a good-looking guy like you on the casting couch."

Kennedy and Bogie would get along better when they starred together in William Wyler's The Desperate Hours (1955), where Kennedy played a policeman trying to capture Bogie.

Joan Leslie

One star of tomorrow who Bogie interacted with was Cornel Wilde, who had only a small role in High Sierra, but would go on to stardom. When Bogie encountered this bisexual actor from Hungary, he was fresh from having taught fencing lessons to Laurence Olivier for his 1940 Broadway production of Romeo and Juliet.

Bogie had already heard the rumors about Olivier and Wilde. "What else did you teach Mr. Olivier?" Bogie asked.

"How to handle his sword," Wilde said.

"I can take that two ways," Bogie said with a smirk.

Years later, when Bogie was appearing in Battle Circus (1953) with June Allyson, he ran into Wilde in a restaurant. "How's it hanging, kid?" he asked.

"Haven't you heard?" Wilde said. "I'm in beefcake bondage. I've become the darling of the S&M crowd. In At Sword's Point, I was stripped and bound at the waist in a torture chamber where my chest was burned with a hot iron. In California Conquest, my next picture, I was again stripped to the waist and bound to a tree. I was lashed across my beautiful, golden chest with a whip."

"Sounds like kinky fun to me," Bogie said. "I'll have to hire some whore to do that to me."

As filming progressed, according to Walsh, Bogie was clearly falling in love with Lupino. At first they stayed clear of each other, but as the days passed they became cozier and cozier, taking lunch together, spending time in each other's dressing rooms, having drinks after work and delaying a return home to their spouses.

"Bogie knew such an affair could mean nothing but trouble for them," director Raoul Walsh said. "It was like they couldn't help it. As for Ida, I don't think she really loved Bogie, at least not as much as he loved her. She cared for him; she liked him. But I wouldn't call it love. Several members of the crew disagreed with me, and told me that Ida looked at Bogie with love in her eyes. I think the sex between them was good. Methot was no longer the sex object that she used to be. Also, like many men his age, Bogie wanted someone much younger and prettier on the hoof. Ida was in the relationship for sex. For Bogie, it either love or temporary insanity. If Methot caught him, I truly believe she would have shot him dead, just like Edward G. Robinson used to do on screen."

Cornel Wilde

Deeper into the shoot, Lupino and Bogie were drawn even closer to each other. "Too close," in the words of Huston.

Somehow Mayo Methot got word of this and began showing up on the set. “If I see that little limey floozy make one move toward my husband, I’ll yank out every hair in her overworked pussy.”

Dialogue director Irving Rapper said, “Mayo was so jealous of the younger, more beautiful Lupino that she was in a boiling rage. We expected violence on the set.”

Louis Hayward, Lupino’s husband, also showed up on the set. He’d seen a picture of Bogie in a bathing suit on his knees looking adoringly at Lupino as she rested on a chaise longue by a pool.

Born in South Africa, but reared in London, Hayward was sophisticated, urbane, and a light second lead that made him one of the less memorable leading men of his day.

Fearing a fist fight, and often reluctant to engage in battle, Bogie remained in his dressing room until Walsh told him that “the coast is clear. I ordered Hayward to go home.”

Methot hawkeyed what was going on when High Sierra was shot in a studio. But for seven weeks, the film was shot on location, including a fishing camp and the Arrowhead Spring Resort. The final scene, which included Bogie’s death on film, was in the Sierra Nevada of Eastern California, with Mt. Whitney looming in the distance.

Location shooting allowed Lupino and Bogie to spend their nights together, living almost like man and wife in full view of the crew. “They did little to conceal their relationship, which surprised me since both of them had jealous spouses,” Walsh claimed.

In September, the filming of High Sierra came to an end, and under its budget of $455,000. Bogie earned $11,200, with Lupino taking home $12,000. Walsh got $17,500.

At the end, Lupino and Bogie decided to go their separate ways. In later interviews, she treated him with respect, but denied that any affair ever took place between them. “He was the most loyal, wonderful guy in the world.”

Critics hailed High Sierra as the last gangster film of the Depression Era. Others called it “the most memorable of the twilight-of-the-gangster pictures.”

When Lupino went on to make The Sea Wolf (1941), the other stars included Edward G. Robinson and John Garfield. Bogie sent her a note: “Hanging out with my competition. Traitor.”

Just as his career was starting to ascend into super stardom, Bogie was labeled a Communist. He likened the accusation to “a bolt of lightning hitting me.” His only political activity had been in the mid-1930s when he backed the striking, underpaid lettuce harvesters in the San Joaquin Valley, and when he had contributed $200 to the strike fund of another underpaid group of workers, the reporters on some Seattle newspapers.

A witch hunt, evocative of that led by Senator Joseph McCarthy in the early 1950s, had been launched by Congressman Martin Dies, a blond-haired bully who had been appointed head of the Special Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives. His claim to fame today is that he ordered his staff “to prove that Shirley Temple was a Communist.” Somehow he found Red propaganda in her motion pictures.

Dies opposed Franklin Roosevelt’s New Deal, labor unions, Jews (“especially those of New York”), and all black people. The latter he privately told supporters “should be shipped back to Africa where these jungle bunnies belong.” He didn’t particularly oppose homosexuals since he did not believe “that such perversion” ever took place on American soil.

Testifying before the Dies Committee in July of 1940 was John L. Leech, who called himself “chief functionary” of the local Communist Party in the Greater Los Angeles area. Before the committee, he named names of the leading Communists in Hollywood. Heading the list was Humphrey Bogart, followed by Fredric March, Melvyn Douglas, James Cagney, and Franchot Tone. On August 15, 1940 in a front-page story, Bogie was cited for attending Communist study groups and contributing $150 a month to Communist causes.

He issued a statement: “I have never contributed money to a political organization of any form. That includes Republican, Democratic, Hollywood Anti-Nazi League, or the Communist Party. Furthermore, I have never attended the school mentioned nor do I know what school that may be. I dare the men who are attempting this investigation to call me to the stand. I want to face them myself and not by a proxy to whom I am only a name.”

Only the year before, a trial examiner had labeled Leech “a pathological liar.” Even so, a newspaper head proclaimed HOLLYWOOD STARS ACCUSED AS REDS BEFORE GRAND JURY.

Congressman Martin Dies
"Shirley Temple is as red as her panties!"

In a suite at the Biltmore Hotel, Bogie confronted Dies, who year round wore a piss-stained suit the color of eggnog ice cream with a red, white, and blue polka dot tie. Under extensive questioning, Dies could not find one iota of evidence that Bogie was or had ever been a Communist.

After the meeting, the Dies Committee exonerated Bogie, claiming that he was a patriotic American. However, unlike the front-page accusations, that item appeared on page 18 of the Los Angeles Times. The report stated that “the link of one Mr. Humphrey Bogart to the Communist Party does not appear to be founded in fact.”

All this did not escape the attention of Jack Warner. He was set to give Bogie star billing in his most important picture to date, High Sierra. At the last minute, he called his publicity department. “On all the posters, make it IDA LUPINO AND HUMPHREY BOGART STARRING IN HIGH SIERRA.”

During the closing months of 1940, Maud Bogart was battling cancer at the age of seventy-two. On November 23, she lost the battle.

Methot called Bogie at the studio, telling him that his mother was dead.

Since she moved to her small studio on Sunset Boulevard, she still hadn’t become intimate with her son, but they had come to respect and admire each other.

He would later regret that they had not developed a more intimate relationship. He also regretted that she did not live to see him ascend to become the major star on the Warners lot. “When she died,” he told Methot, “I was still playing third or fourth leads in crappy movies.” She never lived to see me in High Sierra.”

That landmark movie opened in January of 1941, weeks after her burial.

Methot, who remained close to Maud, even though fighting with her son, handled the funeral arrangements. She was interred at Forest Lawn, which would see the burial of Bogie himself in the 1950s.

He cried as Maud was buried. All he could manage to say was, “She died as she had lived. With guts!”

After High Sierra, Bogie expected Jack Warner to offer him the best scripts floating around the studio. To his disappointment, he was presented with Carnival, which seemed to be a cheap rip-off of Kid Galahad. The boxing ring of Kid Galahad had been changed to a circus setting.

Instead of a top-notch director, Bogie was assigned Ray Enright, the same guy who’d directed him in one of his worst movies, Swing Your Lady.

Amazingly, the sluggish director had assembled a first-rate cast. Bogie would co-star with Sylvia Sidney with whom he'd appeared in Dead End in 1937. Joan Leslie was once again appearing with him, as was a charming and very talented young actor, Eddie Albert.

Bogie sarcastically told the director, "Great script. Instead of getting mowed down by Edward G. Robinson, I get killed by an insane lion in the final reel."

"All in a day's work," Enright said.

To add to his humiliation of starring in Carnival, Bogie was "the sloppy second" choice [his words]. Hal Wallis had at first offered the role to George Raft. Usually Raft was a poor judge of scripts, but not this time. He rejected it, but did not do so in a diplomatic way. "Go fuck yourself," he notified Warners.

Before going into general release, the film's original title, Carnival, was changed to The Wagons Roll at Night. The plot called for Bogie to play a traveling carnival owner Nick Coster, with Sidney as his girlfriend, Flo Lorraine. Eddie Albert played a lion tamer, Matt Varney, who falls for Nick's sister, Joan Leslie, cast as Mary Coster.

Bogie is the definite loser in this film, and it did nothing to establish him as the romantic hero he was about to become. Not only does his girlfriend, Sidney, fall for Albert, but so does his sister, Joan Leslie.

Bogie hated the film and did not want to see the final cut. He did encounter a fan while he was buying a new suit at a men's store on Hollywood Boulevard. "I didn't think you were that bad," the salesman told him.

Many articles have claimed that The Wagons Roll at Night was the first film in which Bogie got first billing. Actually, he'd had top billing in such 1930s features as Racket Busters, King of the Underworld, and You Can't Get Away With Murder.

On a trip with Methot to New York, "the battlers" had seen Irwin Shaw's hit play, The Gentle People. Bogie had gone backstage to chat with its star, Sylvia Sidney, who had gotten the best notices for The Wagons Roll at Night.

Franchot Tone, trying to escape the label of "Mr. Joan Crawford," was cast as the male lead, Geoff, a waterfront extortionist who is the terror of his neighborhood.

After the show, Bogie told Methot that he was "itching" to play the role in the screen version. He personally telegraphed Hal Wallis that he wanted the part.

Upon his return to Hollywood, he learned that Wallis was going to cast James Cagney. Cagney balked, and, once again, so did George Raft, who completely rejected the script.

Anatole Litvak, its director, pleaded with both Raft and Cagney to change their minds, but each of the actors adamantly refused. In desperation, Litvak turned to Edward G. Robinson, who in one afternoon read the script and immediately turned it down.

Bypassing Wallis at this point, Bogie shot off a telegram to the boss man himself, Jack Warner. IT SEEMS TO ME THAT I AM THE LOGICAL PERSON ON THE LOT TO PLAY GENTLE PEOPLE. I WOULD BE GREATLY DISAPPOINTED IF I DIDN'T GET IT.

While in New York, Hal Wallis received a telegram from the coast. Ida Lupino had been cast as the female lead with script approval and arguably approval of her choice of leading man as well. Wallis read the wire. LUPINO REFUSES TO PLAY IN PICTURE WITH BOGART.

In later years Lupino denied that she had refused to work with Bogie. "We parted on the friendliest of terms," the actress claimed. "Hal Wallis, and perhaps Jack Warner, just did not want Bogie in the role. But they blamed me. Both of them preferred John Garfield. Even when Bogie was trying to get the role, the department had come up with what they thought was a novel idea. They were going to promote John and me as a new screen team. That never happened, of course. Ironically, pictures originally intended for John and me, such as To Have and Have Not or Key Largo, went to Bogie and his& new bride, Lauren Bacall."

Merrily They Rolled Along

One morning over Methot's too black coffee, Bogie picked up a trade paper. The headline read: BOGART OUT, GARFIELD IN.

Bogie took a small delight when The Gentle People —its title by now changed to Out of the Fog —opened to mixed reviews and dwindling box office returns.

He was out of work for only two weeks, most of which he spent battling with Methot, when the studio told him they were putting him back to work in Manpower, the latest George Raft movie. Each of them would play a power lineman vying for the affections of Marlene Dietrich, who had been lent to Jack Warner in a deal with Universal.

The powers behind the movie were well known to Bogie—Raoul Walsh as director, Mark Hellinger as producer. He'd also known Dietrich, but hadn't seen her in years.

When he read the script, he realized that it was a rip-off of Howard Hawks' 1932 film Tiger Shark, in which Edward G. Robinson had played a Portuguese fisherman.

Raft's bitterness and jealousy toward Bogie reached a boiling point on the set of Manpower. He even called Bogie's agent, Sam Jaffe, telling him "the role is completely absurd for your client. If he continues in this picture, it will ruin his career." Raft complained daily to Walsh and to the co-stars, including Dietrich.

Finally, Raft stormed into Jack Warner's office and told him bluntly: "I will walk off the lot today if Bogart stays in the picture."

After an hour of cajoling, pleading, and threatening, Raft got his wish. "I'll tell Walsh to fire Bogart this afternoon," Warner claimed. "Eddie is free."

He was, of course, referring to Raft's other rival, Edward G. Robinson.

Walsh went along with orders, but told Warner, "Your boy Raft is really stupid. He was offered Manpower last year when the script was called Danger Zone. He turned that down. The fucker doesn't know it's the same damn script."

Before leaving the set, Bogie called on Dietrich in her dressing room for a final adieu. She stood at the door and didn't let him in, as she was obviously entertaining someone. Was it George Raft himself? "I'm sorry you didn't stay longer," she whispered. "We could have gotten together and shared our goodies." She gave him a wet-lipped kiss and then shut the door. He heard a man's voice calling to her.

In the second week of the shoot, Raft was so furious at Robinson he asked Walsh if he would hire Bogie back. He and Robinson clashed every day. Not only were they vying for top gun on the screen, but battling offscreen for the affections of Dietrich. At one point they were caught by a Life magazine photographer punching each other out. After Manpower wrapped with a minimum of violence, Robinson wouldn't speak to Raft for the next fourteen years.

As Bogie was being laughed off the screen for his performance in The Wagons Roll at Night, he received an unexpected call from his new friend, John Huston. "My dream has come true. I'm going to direct a picture, and I want you to star in it."

"What character do I play?"

John Garfield

"You play a private detective named Sam Spade. It's based on a novel by Dashiell Hammett."

"What's this stinker about?"

"Well, it's about a bird."

"That sounds okay with me," Bogie said. "A bird I can handle. In my last picture, I got bumped off by a lion."

"My picture is called The Maltese Falcon," Huston said.

"Are you recycling that old Bette Davis movie, Satan Met A Lady ?"

"Indeed I am, but with a different twist," Huston said. "This is serious drama. Actually Ricardo Cortez was the first Sam Spade back in those bad old Depression days of 1931."

"Listen, I need a hit," Bogie said, "I can't keep appearing in all this recycled crap."

"Perhaps, you'll change your mind when I tell you who your leading lady in The Maltese Falcon is going to be. Miss Ingrid Bergman, late of Sweden."

Bogie paused for a long moment. "Ingrid Bergman. Leslie Howard told me a lot about her. Ingrid Bergman, you say. OK, I'll star in your fucking picture."

There are various stories as to what caused Methot to stab Bogie with a butcher knife in their kitchen.

John Huston later claimed that Bogie told him the true story, or at least his version of what happened one night when Methot and her spouse were sitting in their living room drinking. At first, the talk was about politics. Bogie was a Roosevelt Democrat but Methot was politically conservative.

As related by Bogie, the evening got off to a bad start when Bogie suggested that Ingrid Berman "is the only true lady in Hollywood." They had just returned from seeing Bergman play a French governess in Adam Had Four Sons.

"Well, what do you think I am?" a drunken Methot asked.

"You did play a prostitute in Marked Woman," he said. "Type casting."

Within moments she'd gone to the bar and picked up a whiskey bottle, bashing it into his skull.

Getting up from the sofa bleeding and with a splitting headache, he made his way to the kitchen to get an ice pack.

Furious at her, he called back. "Jack Warner called me in the other day. He said with the release of High Sierra, I'm gonna be a big star, and I can no longer be seen around town with a blousy matron long past her peak—that is, if she ever had a peak. He said I need to have a young, beautiful wife more appropriate to my new status as a star. Someone like Ingrid Bergman or Ida Lupino."

Methot came into the kitchen and picked up a butcher knife. In a fit of madness she lunged toward him. Seeing her coming, he ducked. Instead of his heart, she missed, stabbing him in his back.

Bleeding profusely, he ran out the door and called on a neighbor in a house nearby. An ambulance was summoned, and he was taken to a hospital. As it turned out it was only a flesh wound but had bled so much it seemed more serious.

Unless Bogie was putting on Huston, he claimed that after he left the hospital he went to a nightclub and later spent the night in a Turkish bath.

He enjoyed seeing the state Methot was in when he took a taxi home the next morning. She had not slept all night and had been frantically calling all over Hollywood to locate her husband.

"She was a model wife for forty-eight hours," Bogie told Huston.

The following Sunday night, Bogie invited Methot to La Maze for dinner and drinks, lots of drinks. He was usually more modest, but as of late he preferred to believe the press generated by High Sierra, not The Wagons Roll at Night.

"You know what, your old man is going to become the new idol of American women," he told her. "All the hot tamales will be shaking it at me, telling me to climb up for the wildest ride of my life. I'm gonna be bigger than George Raft and Edward G. Robinson. The dames will adore me. You should read my fan mail. Half the women of America, or so it seems, are begging me to fuck them. I'm adored by my public."

"You fucking ham actor," she shouted at him, throwing her glass, filled with alcohol, in his face. She raced toward the door and started down the street. One of her high heels came off, and she stumbled, falling drunk onto the sidewalk. She managed to pick herself up and stepped off the curb, hoping to summon one of the cabs that lined up in front of nightclubs in those days.

In the meantime, Bogie, who had driven to the restaurant, summoned the valet to get his car, even though he was in no condition to drive. Behind the wheel, he headed down the street. Spotting Methot, he stepped on the accelerator, and the car lunged toward her.

As he later told Huston, "I think I wanted to kill her at that moment. If ever I were psychotic in my whole life, that was it. I was heading right toward her. But at the last minute, I swerved and narrowly missed her, although I felt my car sideswiped her body. I braked but the pavement was wet and I skidded right into a parked car."

Both Methot and Bogie spent the night in the same hospital room. A policeman came to investigate. Fortunately, he was a fan of Bogie's, and no charges were filed.

"As you know, I once made a movie called San Quentin," Bogie told Huston. "Had I not swerved that night, I would have ended up in that prison. And if I hadn't seen Mayo coming at me with that knife, she'd be in prison too, and I'd be lying next to Maud at Forest Lawn."

"Kid, my advice to you is to file for a divorce from this bitch," Huston said. "She brings out the worst in you. I want to become a director, and I want you to star in my biggest films. That can't happen if you're dead. I know you rose from the dead in The Return of Doctor X. But we're talking real life here. Divorce her! You're going to sooner than later. Why not now? Don't postpone it—or it may be too late."

“You’re right!” Bogie said. “I’m gonna go home tonight and kick the bitch out of my house.”

Portraits of a marriage: Three views of Humphrey Bogart with Mayo Methot

That was a promise he’d keep, but not right away. Even more spectacular wars would be raged between “The Battling Bogarts” before the final curtain.

Huston later recalled that, “I got one of the most disappointing calls of my life when Jack Warner told me that he was going to offer the part of Sam Spade to George Raft. I had to call Bogie and tell him he was off the picture. No Ingrid Bergman. No Bogie.”

Since Huston didn’t want Raft anyway, he was delighted when he turned down the role. He called Bogie right away with the news.

By now Bogie felt he was a star and, although he wanted the part of Sam Spade, he regretted that he was still second choice—“still a sloppy second,” he told Huston.

Raft had told Jack Warner that he did not think the movie “would be an important picture.” He exercised a clause in his contract that stated that he did not have to work on remakes.

He also objected to Huston. “I’m too nervous to entrust my career to a director’s first assignment, this young John Huston. He’s far too inexperienced to direct me.”

After Raft turned down The Maltese Falcon, “Warner began to see him as a jerk,” according to Huston.

Bogie heard that the studio owed Raft $75,000 but that Raft nonetheless bought out his contract for $10,000 “just to get the hell off that Warners’ lot.”

Warner told friends he “practically ran to the bank to cash the check before Raft changed his mind.”

The long battle for roles between Raft and Bogie had at last come to an inglorious ending.

In the aftermath of the Bogart vs. Raft conflicts, Raft would make only one more movie for Warner Brothers, Background to Danger (1943), in which he was directed by Raoul Walsh with Peter Lorre and Sydney Greenstreet as his co-stars.

Background to Danger, ironically, was conceived as a spin-off of Casablanca. Because of the spectacular success of Casablanca, every studio in Hollywood was trying to duplicate its ambience.

Bogie came off a two-month suspension to appear as the lead in Huston's Maltese Falcon. He'd refused to do Bad Men of Missouri, which was rare for him, as in the 1930s he'd more or less done what Jack Warner told him to.

Bogie's intended role in Bad Men of Missouri went to fast-rising Dennis Morgan, who vowed that he'd never take a part away from Bogie.

When Bette Davis ran into Bogie on the Warner lot, she'd already read that he'd be starring in The Maltese Falcon. "That tired old thing," she said provocatively. "You tell everybody you don't want to take Raft's sloppy seconds. Now you're taking mine."

Released in 1931, The Maltese Falcon, the original version, had starred Bebe Daniels with Ricardo Cortez cast as the detective. In the first version, Cortez played it much more as a ladies' man than Bogart in his version of 1941.

Davis was referring to her failed film, Satan Met a Lady, which was the second recycling of The Maltese Falcon. In 1936, she starred in the most unsuccessful adaptation of the drama, appearing in the Brigid role opposite Warren William. Within the Davis movie, detective Sam Spade had been turned into a lawyer.

Bogie was very disappointed to learn that Ingrid Bergman had only been considered, and that no firm offer had ever been extended to her.

"I will give you the world's greatest consolation prize?" Huston said. "

Who dat ?" Bogie asked. "Marjorie Main?"

"No, Rita Hayworth."

"That's great, pal," Bogie said. "If her father has stopped fucking her, maybe Rita will share some of her goodies with me. Send her on."

Before Bergman or Hayworth were considered for the role of the female lead, Brigid O'Shaughnessy, it had originally been pitched to 27-year-old Geraldine Fitzgerald, with whom both Bogie and Bette Davis had worked in Dark Victory. Wanting to play sympathetic parts, she turned it down. "Let Bette do those bitch roles," she said.

Huston then had to call Bogie with more bad news about the female lead. "Rita Hayworth is off the picture. But, get this, how about Olivia de Havilland?"

"First you give me Raft's sloppy seconds," Bogie protested. "Now you offer Errol Flynn's sloppy seconds."

Finally, a contract for the female lead was finally signed, with Mary Astor, whom Bogie knew only slightly, having performed a radio drama with her.

Originally a child star, Astor had had a checkered past. As a teenager she'd been seduced by John Barrymore, and she'd even had an affair with Walter Huston during the filming of Dodsworth (1936). "She went first for the father, then for the son," Bogie said.

Her first husband, Kenneth Hawks, the brother of Howard Hawks, had died in a plane crash.

During her divorce from her second husband, Dr. Franklyn Thorpe, in 1935, her scandalous diary was entered into evidence in the custody fight for their daughter, four-year-old Marylyn Thorpe.

Among other revelations, it included juicy insights into her notorious affair with playwright George S. Kaufman. She confessed that the playwright was "the kind of man I'd go over a cliff for."

The diary also revealed her struggle with alcoholism and her various suicide attempts.

Usually, off-screen notoriety would be a detriment to a star's career. But in Astor's case, Huston hired her for the role because of her adulterous reputation. Astor described her role of Brigid as a "bitch cauldron" and a psychopathic personality.

"I'm a director at last," Huston said, rushing to embrace Bogie when he showed up on the set of The Maltese Falcon. "It sure beats sleeping on park benches in Hyde Park when I was a struggling scriptwriter in London. To keep from starving, I even sang cowboy songs to people waiting in line to get into the theater."

It was Bogie who welcomed Walter Huston, John's father, to the set. As a good luck gesture in honor of his son's debut as a director, Walter had agreed to appear in an uncredited cameo. John had promised Jack Warner, a tightwad, that he would not charge Warners for his father's appearance.

In his cameo, Walter, a sea captain sieved with bullet holes, appears in Spade's office. Mumbling a word or two, he delivers the falcon before falling dead.

During the first week of the shoot, Huston came to Bogie. "Let's talk man to man, kid," he told his star. "During the filming, Mary Astor is off limits to you. I'm taking director's privilege, and I'm the one who fucks the female star."

"That's okay with me, pal" Bogie said. "I don't want to end up in some sex diary."

Bogie had several talks with Astor on the set. In spite of her scandalous life, he found her a sensitive, caring woman. He confided to her that he "hated the marriage trap."

"I don't like to be used, the feeling that another human being possesses me, that I always have to buckle down, turning out all those crap pictures to bring home the bacon."

When Astor, years later, heard about his upcoming marriage to Lauren Bacall, she approved completely. "The remarkable Bacall knew who he was and let him be who he was and what he was. In return, he was at last able to give something no other woman could grab from him— certainly not Mayo Methot or Mary Philips—and that was his total commitment."

In recalling her work with Bogie on Falcon, Astor said, "He wasn't very tall; vocally he had a range from A to B; his eyes were like shiny coal nuggets pressed deep into his skull, and his smile was a mistake that he tried to keep from happening. He was no movie hero. He was no hero at all."

Bogie had fond memories of making The Maltese Falcon, and either was a friend or became a friend of some of the supporting players.

On the set, he invited "two of my all-time favorite" broads—Lee Patrick and Gladys George—to his dressing room for drinks. Patrick, a former girlfriend from the 20s, was cast as Effie Perine, the loyal, quick-thinking secretary of Sam Spade. This small role became one of her most enduring film characterizations. Patrick had been called in at the last minute. Eve Arden had been the first choice for the role of the secretary.

Years later, Patrick's final acting role was a reprise of the Effie Perine character she developed for The Maltese Falcon. In a reworking of the Sam Spade story, The Black Bird (1975) starred George Segal as Sam Spade Jr. In that movie, he was forced to continue his father's work and to retain his father's increasingly sarcastic secretary.

Gladys George, who had worked with Bogie before in The Roaring Twenties, received third billing, even though she played a relatively minor role. In The Maltese Falcon she was cast as Iva Archer, the faithless wife of Spade's partner, Miles Archer. The role became her most remembered.

According to Huston, Jerome Cowan was perfectly cast as Miles Archer, Sam Spade's sleazy partner.

In The Maltese Falcon, Bogie would be forever linked in the public's mind to two of his supporting players, Peter Lorre and Sydney Greenstreet.

Working with Lorre on the set of The Maltese Falcon marked the beginning of a beautiful friendship between Bogie and the Hungarian-born actor, who had made a name for himself in the German theater before fleeing to America to escape the Nazis. Lorre was known as Warner's "resident pervert with an accent."

Like Belmont Bogart, Lorre was a morphine addict, having developed his addiction in the wake of a horrendously painful gallbladder operation during the late 1920s. He first achieved fame as the psychotic child murderer in Fritz Lang's M (1931).

Lorre and Bogie became "close pals," in Bogie's words and would work in four more films together, not only the memorable Casablanca but the controversial Beat the Devil.

Lorre, incidentally, became the friend who would urge Bogie to marry Lauren Bacall in spite of the vast difference in their ages. "Five good years are better than none," he told Bogie.

The Maltese Falcon marked the first pairing of Lorre and Greenstreet, who would go on to make nine more movies together. "They became more famous as a couple than Romeo and Juliet," said Huston.

"I will always remember Peter Lorre and Sydney Greenstreet moving through some fog-laden street on the back lot of Warners," Huston said. "You could be sure that both of them were up to some heinous deed. I'd call them the Laurel and Hardy of crime. Even though they appeared in many films without each other, they are forever married as a pair of disreputable but fascinating evil-doers that won a place in our hearts forever. They may, in fact, become immortal long after we've forgotten Lana Turner and Rita Hayworth."

From the start, Lorre was Huston's first choice to play the role of Joel Cairo. "You will know that you're playing a homosexual," Huston said. "I will know that, and Bogie will know that. But according to the Production Code, we're not supposed to depict homosexuals openly on the screen. Those blue noses think that sucking cock or taking it up the ass isn't what men should do. So let's keep it our little secret, okay?"

Lorre defiantly played the role of Cairo as effeminate. In the movie, both his calling cards and handkerchiefs are scented with gardenias; he fusses about his wardrobe, and becomes hysterical when blood from a scratch spoils his shirt. He also virtually fellates his cane during an interview with Sam Spade.

In Hammett's novel, the character is more blatantly homosexual, and is called "queer" and "the fairy."

Greenstreet made his first on-screen appearance as Casper Gutman or "The Fat Man" in this picture. The 357-pound, 60-year-old British actor would forever be associated with Bogie's screen image.

The scene where Greenstreet tries to get Bogie to take a drink which is drugged was the performer's first appearance in front of a Hollywood camera.

Greenstreet fit Hammett's description—"flabbily fat with bulbous pink cheeks and lips and chin and neck, with a great soft egg of a belly that was all his torso."

Before making his first appearance on camera, Greenstreet turned to Astor, "Mary, dear, hold my hand; tell me I won't make an ass of myself!"

During his previous forty years, Greenstreet had been a prominent stage actor. Two decades Bogie's senior, Greenstreet had once been a tea planter in Ceylon before going on what he still called "the wicked, wicked stage" in London.

Suffering from diabetes and Bright's disease, Greenstreet made films for a period of only eight years, but he is among the best remembered and the most recognizable of all film actors. Greenstreet's film career ended not in a Bogie movie but in Malaya (1949), in which he had third billing after Spencer Tracy and James Stewart.

Lorre wasn't the only actor evoking a homosexual in the film. Elisha Cook Jr., who had appeared on Broadway with Bogie in the 1932 Chrysalis, was cast as the punk, Wilmer Cook.

In the movie, Sam Spade refers to Wilmer as a "gunsel." The censors thought that meant a gunman. The Yiddish term gunsel, literally "little goose," was a vulgarism for a homosexual, similar to the Yiddish word "faigle" or "little bird." Gunsel usually meant a young man involved in a homosexual relationship with an older man.

Cook later claimed, "I was forever cast as a pimp, an informer, or a cocksucker."

The characters of Casper Gutman (Greenstreet) and Wilmer (Cook) were referred to in the Falcon film as "Fat Man" and "Little Boy." These were the names used for the two atomic bombs that were dropped on Nagasaki and Hiroshima in 1945, ending World War II.

Arguably, The Maltese Falcon included more scenes wherein its principal actors smoked cigarettes onscreen than any film of the 1940s, surpassing even movies made by Bette Davis. Jack Warner hated to see actors smoke on the screen, claiming it would prompt smokers in the audience to leave their seats and walk out into the lobby to light up.

But the excessive smoking in Falcon actually contributed to the atmospheric tension of the convoluted story.

Jack Warner wanted to entitle the movie The Gent from Frisco because The Maltese Falcon had been the name of the 1931 version. But Huston insisted that the original title be used, and he eventually won the battle.

In thirty-four days, Huston ushered the filming of The Maltese Falcon (1941) to completion, one of the world's most classic films. If High Sierra didn't quite put Bogie on the A-list in Hollywood, The Maltese Falcon did the trick.

"Bogie was a second-class star who then became a big star after The Maltese Falcon," Huston said.

Or as Otto Friedrich claimed, "Bogie was released from his gangster roles and won audiences over by playing a good guy anti-hero. The Maltese Falcon was the movie in which he created the persona that not only made him famous for the rest of his life but gradually became his own permanent identity."

The climatic confrontation in the movie lasted for almost twenty minutes, taking up one-fifth of the 100-minute running time. All five principal stars were on camera, the shoot taking an entire week with a day off to celebrate July 4.

The closing line, “The stuff that dreams are made of,” was voted as the 14th most famous piece of movie dialogue of all time by the American Film Institute. It was Bogie who suggested that Huston use this paraphrase of a line from Shakespeare’s The Tempest.

In 2007, the American Film Institute also ranked The Maltese Falcon as #31 among The Greatest Movies of All Time.

On May 18, 1950, the Screen Guild Theatre broadcast a thirty-minute radio adaptation of the movie, with Bogie as Sam Spade. His fourth wife, Lauren Bacall, performed the Mary Astor role.

After The Maltese Falcon, Huston would have only admiration for Bogie as an actor. “There was a devil in the kid, and Bogie made audiences aware of his demons. The devils were so obvious that it was like unzipping your pants and putting your dick on public display. When Bogie was uncaged, he was one of the most exciting creatures in the history of movies.”

Bogie’s acceptance of Huston as a director and his acceptance of the role of Sam Spade consolidated their life-long friendship and set the stage for collaboration on such later films as The Treasure of Sierra Madre (1948), Key Largo (1948), The African Queen (1951), and Beat the Devil (1954).

The Maltese Falcon was nominated for Best Picture Oscar in 1941, but lost to John Ford’s How Green Was My Valley.

When he saw the finished cut, Bogie proclaimed, “I’ll no longer have to be a punching bag for guys like Cagney, Robinson, and Raft. The world is starting to discover what drives Mayo Methot crazy—and that is Humphrey Bogart has sex appeal. I’ve been denied love in nearly all my films. It’s time from now on that I get the gal in future movies. Old guys like me need love, too.”

CHAPTER TEN

Bogie was always getting a call, either from another actor or a director, which indirectly transmitted details about his next starring role. Jack Warner or Hal Wallis never contacted him personally, the way they did with George Raft.

The last time he'd seen the producer, Wallis, Bogie had reminded him, "I'm the new George Raft. Let's not forget that when assigning roles in the future. When did Raft last deliver a hit like The Maltese Falcon ?" He paused a few seconds. "You don't have to answer that."

This time around, it was director Vincent Sherman who called to tell Bogie he'd been cast in All Through the Night (1942) to be produced by Jerry Wald.

"Who are my co-stars?" Bogie asked.

"Conrad Veidt and Kaaren Verne," Sherman said.

"You've got to be kidding. "With a war nearly upon us, you put me in a film with Krauts. Don't you know there's anti-German sentiment out there? Who else?"

Listen, I had to settle for Verne," Sherman told Bogie. "I really wanted David Selznick's new discovery, Ingrid Bergman, but she wasn't available. At one point Warner wanted Olivia de Havilland."

"John Huston has his eye on De Havilland, so she's off-limits to me," Bogie said. "No use spoiling a great friendship. But that Swedish icicle, the Bergman dame. I bet I could melt her down."

"In addition to the leads, we've got an amazing supporting cast," Sherman claimed. "Some of the best supporting talent in Hollywood. Your new friend, Peter Lorre. But also Jane Darwell. She was marvelous in Grapes of Wrath. Frank McHugh. Barton MacLane. Wallace Ford. Phil Silvers. Jackie Gleason, William Demarest. Fucking comics they give me. And, for the lezzies, Judith Anderson."

"What's my character called?"

"Gloves Donahue, a bigshot Broadway gambler."

"Gloves?" Bogie asked. "What about Mittens?"

"Listen, the picture is all about Nazi agents," Sherman said. "It's very timely and all. Part of the film involves a Nazi attempt to blow up the Brooklyn Navy Yard. You're not going to bolt, are you?"

"I'll do the goddamn picture, providing you sign a blood oath that you didn't offer it to Raft first."

Unhappy with the script of All Through the Night, Bogie placed a private call to Irene Lee, the West Coast story editor for Warner Brothers. Contract players weren't supposed to do that, but Bogie said, "What the hell!"

"What's the hottest property you've got cooking on the stove?" he asked Lee, who was a fan of his.

"I've read a copy of this play that never got produced," Lee said. "It's called Everybody Comes to Rick's. It's set in Morocco. I sent it to Wallis, and he liked it. But he didn't like the title, though. Algiers was such a big hit that he wants to call it Casablanca. The lead role, Rick, owns a bar. There's this gal. They met in Paris."

(center photos) Conrad Veidt, Kaaren Verne

"Could I play Rick?"

"The role was made for you," Lee said. "But there's a problem. Wallis and Jack Warner see George Raft doing it."

"See you, kid," Bogie put down the phone.

By now, Bogie was openly telling anyone who wanted to listen, "Raft is a complete asshole. The day is coming, and it's coming very soon, when Raft will be taking my sloppy seconds. Mark my words."

Peter Lorre called Bogie to meet him for drinks at Romanoff's, where he was introduced to his female lead, Kaaren Verne. This Berlin-born actress had fled the Nazis in 1938. Bogie had never heard of her, and she explained why.

"The studio changed my name to Catherine Young," she said. "But since& Jack Warner thinks war with Hitler is inevitable, he told me to call myself Kaaren Verne again. He thinks there's publicity to be gained by a Teutonic actress who turned her back on Hitler and fled to America."

Before the second drink, Bogie had decided that Verne and Lorre had fallen in love. It didn't seem to matter that Verne was married to musician Arthur Young, and Lorre had wed Celia Lovsky in 1934.

Ever his provocative self, Bogie, now into his fourth martini, asked Verne, "What does a dame like you, a member of the superior race, want with this little Jew gnome?"

"There's more to Peter than meets the eye," she said.

"I hope so," Bogie said. "Judged from the outside package, he looks like a shrimp."

The affair between Lorre and Verne began during the making of All Through the Night, but neither of them would divorce their spouses until 1945, at which time they married each other.

Verne had played the lead for Vincent Sherman in Underground (1941), and they worked well together. "Finally," Sherman told Bogie, "you get the girl but only on screen. Our little Jew boy [a reference to Lorre] is pounding that Kraut pussy every afternoon in his dressing room before she goes home to hubbie."

Meeting Jane Darwell, Bogie virtually fell into her bosom. "You're my mommy on screen but I want you to be my mommy off screen too. I'm a new orphan, and I need my mommy."

"You can place that lovely head of yours in my bosom any night you want," Darwell told him.

Bogie's first greeting to Gleason was, "You look like the man who came to dinner and ate the guests."

On the first day of the shoot, Sherman complained to Bogie that Warner was giving him only $300 a week to direct the picture with a budget of $600,000. "Other directors are getting so much more."

Jane Darwell
"My bosom for you."

"Maybe you just ain't worth it," Bogie said just to rile him.

Bogie fitted easily into his role as a Damon Runyon New York type who has to outwit a ruthless pack of Nazi sympathizers.

All Through the Night was one of the first anti-Nazi films. Once war against Germany was declared, Hollywood began turning out such pictures by the hundreds.

Sherman explained to Bogie that he was forced& to use "this fat guy," Jackie Gleason, because he was pulling in $250 a week, and Warners had no role for him. The same problem was faced by Phil Silvers. Since there was no work for them at Warners, the studio let them both go soon after they'd appeared in All Through the Night. As comics in the years ahead, Gleason and Silvers, of course, became household names.

Both Sherman and Bogie had seen Conrad Veidt in The Cabinet of Dr.& Caligari, as had most of tout Hollywood.

In the film, Veidt delivered his usual "iron-fist-in-velvet glove" performance as a Nazi agent.

He told Bogie, "With America about to enter the war, I think I have a whole new career ahead of me in playing dreaded Nazis. Actually, I fled the Nazis. My wife is Jewish." By that time Bogie was calling Veidt "Connie."

He was accurate in his prediction. Predating Casablanca, Veidt's next film was entitled Nazi Agent.

Over drinks, Veidt told Bogie that there was another reason to leave Germany. "I was known as a staunch anti-Nazi," he said. "As such, I attracted the scrutiny of the Gestapo. A decision was made to assassinate me. I found out about the plot in time. I was able to escape from Germany before the Nazi death squad got to me."

One drunken night when Veidt had had too many beers, he asked Bogie if he could sing a song in his ear. Very quietly he sang "Where the Lighthouse Shines Across the Bay."

"It was the song I sang in my last German film F.P.I. in 1933," Veidt said. "My record was a flop."

"Yeah, my songs haven't been hits either," Bogie said jokingly.

Ironically Veidt's song became a hit in England fifty years later when it was discovered by disc jockey Terry Wogan.

Filming of All Through the Night went smoothly except on six different occasions when Mayo Methot showed up. She suspected that Bogie was having an affair with Kaaren Verne.

On the set of Veidt's previous picture, Above Suspicion, he had told Joan Crawford, "When I made All Through the Night with Bogie, I was shocked at the fighting that went on between him and his wife, Methot. I heard screaming one afternoon, and I opened the door to my dressing room in time to see Bogie chasing Methot across the sound stage. At the top of his voice, he was screaming, 'You dirty bitch! You filthy bitch! I'm gonna kill you, you broken-down old hag.'"

“I went to Sherman to see what was going on,” Veidt said. “He told me, ‘Get used to it. One day, sooner than later, one of them is going to kill the other. I hope it’s Methot who bites the dust. I need Bogie.’”

All Through the Night came under fire from isolationists, but Warner and Bogie, too, did not back down. Bogie’s response to such isolationists as Senator Gerald Nye was, “Go stick a fat dildo up your crusty ass.” Senator Bennett C. Clark charged Bogie with “creating war hysteria with such anti-German propaganda movies.”

At long last Bogie and Jack Warner were united in a common cause, fighting censorship and undue influence from Washington politicians who wanted to silence them.

Warner denounced isolationists, claiming, “I may be charged with being anti-Nazi, but no son of a bitch is going to call me anti-American.”

Bogie chimed in, telling the Hollywood Reporter that censorship “is the number one enemy of a free democracy. Let Josef Goebbels stay where he is in Berlin, licking the dingleberries off Hitler’s asshole.” The first part of his statement was printed, the second part was censored.

Bogie was not a joiner. But he did join the Fight for Freedom Committee, urging the entry of the United States into World War II.

He knew that an attack of some sort on American soil was imminent. He volunteered his thirty-eight foot, diesel-powered Sluggy for the war effort.

Southern California, with all its defense plants and refineries, was vulnerable to attack. After qualifying for the U.S. Coast Guard Auxiliary, he piloted his Sluggy along the coastline one weekend, looking for enemy ships. Larger vessels had already been called up by the U.S. Navy.

All Through the Night was wrapped around the middle of October in 1941.

Ironically in the weeks preceding December 7, 1941, Warners was developing an action thriller for Bogie called Aloha Means Goodbye, involving a Japanese plot to attack military installations in Hawaii. It had been serialized in the Saturday Evening Post.

Bogie was due December 10 in St. Louis to appear at a Fight for Freedom rally with Melvyn Douglas and his politician wife, Helen Gahagan Douglas. Linda Darnell, a rising film star, was also slated to appear with Bogie and Mr. and Mrs. Douglas, whose career would later be ruined by a Red-baiting young politician named Richard M. Nixon.

All plans were cancelled on December 7. Peter Lorre telephoned Bogie so that he’d switch on a radio for news about the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

In January of 1942, All Through the Night opened across the country and did better business than The Maltese Falcon. By then both Franklin Roosevelt and the Congress had declared war against both Germany and Japan.

There were no more protests against Warner Brothers for its anti-Nazi films. The America First organization, which had opposed the entry of the United States into World War II, had become history once Pearl Harbor was attacked.

Bogie specifically requested that Jack Warner star him in more anti-Nazi films.

He made another call to see how that play Everybody Comes to Rick’s — tentatively entitled Casablanca —was coming along.

In the meantime, Sam Jaffe negotiated a new contract for Bogie with Warners, a seven-year deal at $1,750 a week.

He had high hopes for his wartime future in films. Having already served in the military during the closing days of World War I, he was too old for the draft.

Expecting bigger and better pictures, he was immediately disappointed when he learned that the leading role in The Big Shot, his next film, had been previously rejected by George Raft. “Another sloppy second,” he told his director Lewis Seiler, who had helmed him before.

When Bogie read the script for The Big Shot (1942), he interpreted it as just another aging gangster clinker. He told director Seiler that, “I thought we stopped making crap like this in the 30s.”

Bogie was disappointed that Mary Astor, his co-star in The Maltese Falcon, had turned down the role of the female lead.

“I saw a secret memo that Jack Warner sent to his directors,” Astor confided to him. “After this war is over, there may be no more pictures for either one of us to turn down. That’s why I’m desperate to take only the right roles. Warner has urged his staff to find new stars. To quote him directly, he said, ‘We just cannot go on being satisfied with the old ones because each day they become more unmanageable and less box office.’”

“What you’re really saying is for me to avoid turkeys—or else,” Bogie said.

“Perhaps we’ll work again some day,” she said.

“Maybe in Grandpa and Grandma roles,” he said, before ringing off.

During the shoot of The Big Shot, Bogie was sleeping with Methot only on special occasions, whatever that was. He was looking to begin an affair. For a while he settled on his female co-star, the beautiful, sultry Irene Manning, an actress-singer from Cincinnati.

He recognized her from her appearance in Yankee Doodle Dandy (1942), as Bogie never missed a James Cagney movie. “I need to see what the drag queen is up to,” he told Methot.

Manning had been around since the mid-30s, appearing with Roy Rogers and Gene Autry. She quipped, “I left light opera for horse operas.”

Bogie may have seduced Manning—or maybe not. Neither party ever spoke of the matter. It was obvious to those on the set that he was attracted to her, but whatever there was between them was not recorded by any eyewitnesses.

“Instead of hot love scenes with Bogie in the film, I had to take a bullet for him in the final reel,” Manning said.

Bogie was even more attracted to the second female lead, a Spokane-born “starlet with promise,” the lovely and luminous Susan Peters.

But he backed away when he heard this young girl was dating Howard Hughes and also getting serious with actor Richard Quine, whom she would marry in 1943.

She’d been nominated for an Oscar as Best Supporting Actress for her appearance in the 1942 Random Harvest. Bogie realized that Peters was one of those stars of tomorrow that Mary Astor had been talking about.

Bogie liked Peters and had several long talks with her between takes. He told Seiler she "treats me like a father. After all, I can't expect a nineteen-year-old gal to fall for me."

Obviously Bogie wasn't very good at prophesying his own future, as Lauren Bacall waited in the wings.

He was very saddened to pick up a newspaper on New Year's Day in 1945 to read that Quine and his bride, Peters, on a duck-hunting trip outside San Diego, had had an accident. Her rifle had discharged accidentally, the bullet lodging in her spine, leaving her permanently paralyzed from the waist down.

Peters would hang on to life until October 23, 1952, when she died. She'd lost her will to live and had literally starved herself to death, having not eaten in weeks.

Bogie was in the doldrums, his marriage to Methot all but over except for the divorce. Three or four times a week, he went to the Finlandia Baths on Sunset Boulevard. Methot became convinced that it was a brothel. She was right, at least in one aspect. It was a brothel but not filled with women.

It was patronized by young actors, many of whom were gay. There is no evidence that Bogie ever participated in any of these gay activities going on at the baths, which in the 1950s would draw such actors as Rock Hudson.

Methot's ire at Bogie's Finlandia visits grew so pronounced that one night she set their home on fire. With the aid of the studio police at Warner Brothers, the flames were put out, and there was no newspaper publicity.

His wife's drinking, violence, and mental instability grew worse. On several occasions, he tried to get her to seek psychiatric help. "There's nothing wrong with me that a stiff drink and a stiff dick won't cure." In a bizarre touch, she went around all day and half the night humming "Embraceable You."

Bogie's depression was relieved when a call came in from John Huston. "How about being in my next movie, playing a character called Rick?"

At long last Bogie showed some excitement. "I've been waiting for months to play Rick. Jack Warner is finally green-lighting Casablanca."

"Not so fast," Huston warned him. This is a different Rick. Rick Leland. It's a war movie. The good news is you'll be reunited with Mary Astor and Sydney Greenstreet, minus Peter Lorre.

Huston sent over the script that afternoon, and Bogie immediately recognized the screenplay by Richard Macaulay as a rewrite of Aloha Means Goodbye, which he had been up for before December 7. It involved Rick's attempt to prevent a Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. Since he failed to do that, the plot was reworked to have Rick save the Panama Canal from a Japanese bomber.

As a title, Across the Pacific had been used by Warners for a silent feature in 1926, starring Monte Blue. For his own personal amusement, Huston gave Blue a small role in the 1942 version.

In a role originally slated for Ann Sheridan, Astor was cast as Alberta Marlow, a mysterious, sophisticated lady with whom Bogie has a light-hearted romance. Greenstreet was cast as Dr. Lorenz, an urbane spy for the Japanese.

Not only Bogie, but Astor, Greenstreet, and Huston claimed, "We miss Peter."

"One afternoon Peter donned a white coat and walked through a scene in which Sydney, Bogie, and I were being served breakfast on the ship," Astor recalled. "We didn't know John had made the switch with the actor who was playing the waiter. Peter was behind us, so we couldn't see him, and he served us, making tiny mistakes—holding a platter a bit too far away, just touching Sydney's arm as he lifted a cup of coffee. Finally, he leaned down and kissed me on the back of the neck, and we all broke up."

Peter Lorre

Having scored a hit with The Maltese Falcon, Jack Warner was eager to repeat the success of that film. He& used not only part of the same cast—Bogie, Astor, and Greenstreet—but similar dialogue, especially that spoken between Bogie and Astor.

Right from the beginning, Huston created a "deliberate ambiguity" in the character of Rick. Was Bogie a renegade? A gangster? Or ultimately the hero who saved the Panama Canal?

Before filming began, Huston warned Bogie that at any minute he might have to leave the movie. He was set to be called up for active duty, as he was close to being commissioned in the signal corps.

At the most crucial point in the film, Huston got his marching papers. In the plot, Bogie had been roped to a chair, and he was surrounded by a small army of Japanese soldiers with machine guns. There was virtually no way he could escape from that trap.

Huston had come to a stumbling block in the script, and he couldn't solve it. He told Bogie on the set that he'd been called up. "I'm out of here. Off to war."

"How in the fuck am I going to get out of this Jap trap?" Bogie asked.

"Don't worry about it," Huston assured him. In a call to Jack Warner, Huston said. "I'm off to the Army. Bogie will know how to spring himself from that trap."

Bogie's friend, Vincent Sherman, was called in to complete the picture.

In a talk with Warner that morning, the studio chief told Sherman, "It's not just the Army. Huston is having female trouble. His wife comes in one door, and Olivia de Havilland goes out the other. The guy sometimes doesn't know what he's doing. Take over for him in the morning and finish the damn picture. I'm running out of money."

& In the film, Bogie manages to overpower a guard and take over his machine gun station in time to shoot down a Japanese plane taking off to bomb the Panama Canal. Bogie shouts, "I'm not easily trapped."

When someone pointed out to Sherman that this plot development was not believable, the director shot back. "If you ask me, we were lucky to get the bastard out of there at all."

As one reviewer noted, "The characters in Across the Pacific never got to the Pacific, much less crossed it."

Long after completing her last movie with Bogie, Mary Astor reflected on the man himself.

"I have heard people say he wasn't really a good actor," she said. "I don't go along with that. It is true that his personality dominated the character he was playing—but the character gained by it. His technical skill was quite brilliant. His precision timing was no accident. He kept other actors on their toes because he listened to them, he watched, he looked at them. He never had that vague stare of a person who waits for you to finish talking, who hasn't heard a word you said. And he was never 'upstage center,' acting all by himself. He was there. With you."

After Huston volunteered for Army duty and abruptly abandoned the film he'd been directing, there was a glitch. He was assigned an Army desk job with nothing to do. When Jack Warner heard that Huston was just waiting around for an overseas posting to the war front, he sent him the script of The Killers to work on.

The Killers was an adaptation of a short story by Ernest Hemingway. The film was to star two exciting new personalities, both of whom were gorgeous. They were Ava Gardner, who had became famous when she'd married Mickey Rooney, and the new sensation, muscular, strikingly handsome Burt Lancaster.

Director Vincent Sherman
"Saving Huston's ass"

Huston did not accept screen writing credits for The Killers because he did not want the Army to find out that he wasn't devoting his full attention to his do-nothing job, which consisted of just waiting every day for his orders.

One evening, after Huston had finished coaching Ava Gardner for her part in The Killers, the lady herself showed up on his doorstep. It was after midnight. He'd been having his ninth drink of& the evening on his outdoor patio, and he asked her to join him.

"She was jaw-dropping beautiful," Huston told Bogie. "Still with her North Carolina accent. The Tarheel farm gal has become a Hollywood goddess."

"Did you fuck her?" Bogie asked.

"She seduced me. She stood in front of me and pulled off her clothes and jumped in the pool. When she emerged wet, I had a towel waiting. I don't think I got to dry her off before we did the dirty deed."

Bogie was anxious to meet this goddess, and soonafter, a private dinner for three was arranged way out in the San Fernando Valley, presumably where no one in the film industry would see them.

Bogie remembered that drunken evening, where Gardner called him "honey chil'." He found her beguiling and wanted to take her away from Huston and have her just for himself.

When Huston went to the men's room, Gardner provocatively said, "I saw a picture of you and your wife. Miss Mayo Methot. Is that really your wife or your mother?"

"You're good, kid," he said.

"I'm not just good, I'm the best."

At the end of the evening, Gardner succulently kissed Bogie right on the lips in front of Huston. "Some day let's make a picture together. Perhaps John will direct it."

"Considering how you look and how I look, I could only play your father," Bogie said.

Fast forward to Rome in January of 1954. Joseph L. Mankiewicz was set to film The Barefoot Contessa, based on the tumultuous life of Rita Hayworth, who had turned down the role. "Too close to home," she said.

Mankiewicz had cast Bogie in the lead, with Gardner playing Maria Vargas. Cast as a loud-mouthed press agent, Edmond O'Brien had the third lead, for which he would win an Oscar as Best Supporting Actor.

Bogie played the world-weary writer-director Harry Dawes. He arrived on the set with his wig maker and long-time mistress Verita Peterson. In the first weeks of the shoot, Lauren Bacall had not yet arrived in Rome.

The wonderful camaraderie that had flourished between Bogie and Gardner during the war years did not exist on the set of Contessa. He got top billing, but he was drawing only half the salary that she was.

As a founding member of the Rat Pack, Bogie was a close friend of Frank Sinatra's. Gardner had just separated from him.

"I'll never figure you broads out," Bogie told her when they met on the set. Half the world's female population would throw themselves at Frank's feet, and here you are flouncing around with guys who wear capes and little ballerina slippers."

He was referring to Luis Miguel Dominguín, the celebrated Spanish matador with whom she was having an affair.

Although Gardner was putting away a massive amount of alcohol every day, Bogie told her he knew why she drank so little. "That's because when you're drunk you revert to your cornpone-and-molasses Southern accent. Then all your fancy friends will know you're just a hillbilly gal."

"That's what attracts them, honey chil'."

Mankiewicz was forced to shoot many takes of their scenes together. Either Gardner would flub her lines because of her "stage fright," or else the scene would be interrupted by Bogie's racking coughs, an early sign of the cancer that would eventually kill him.

Bogie would often halt production, "God damn it, Mankiewicz, can you tell the dame here to speak up? I can't hear a God damn word she's saying."

When he was actually speaking to Gardner on the set, he told her, "I think I'm good for another decade or so. Then maybe Betty will support me. She'll carry on for at least another forty years." He was, of course, referring to his fourth wife, Lauren Bacall.

Gardner was well aware of his affair with Verita Peterson. Bogie was also aware of her awareness. He told her, "When Betty arrives in Rome, I've got to stash Verita somewhere. We can't go carrying on right in front of Betty."

"I'll take her off your hands," Gardner said.

“Then those rumors about you are true,” he said.

Ava Gardner

“It makes my dick limp,” he said, exiting her dressing room.

“Mr. Bogart didn’t make my life any easier,” Gardner said. “He was always needling me, calling me the Grabtown Gypsy, and complaining that he needed a running start toward the set if he wasn’t going to be trampled by my entourage.”

Gardner also didn’t endear herself to Bogie after The Barefoot Contessa opened. Having learned that he didn’t like the word shit, she& penned the following note: “Bogie, just seen Contessa. I’m sure you’ll agree that I looked the most gorgeous I’ve ever been photographed. But, honey chil’, you looked like shit! Love, Ava.”

The review from Pauline Kael didn’t help much either. “ The Barefoot Contessa is a trash masterpiece: a Cinderella story in which the prince turns out to be impotent. It’s hard to believe Mankiewicz ever spent an hour in Hollywood; the alternative supposition is that he spent too many hours there.”

In January of 1942 Bogie was disheartened to read an item in the Hollywood Reporter, claiming that Ronald Reagan and Ann Sheridan, the lovers in Kings Row, had been selected to head the cast in Casablanca, with Dennis Morgan as the third lead in this romantic triangle.

This may have been a trial balloon. Years later Reagan claimed that he was made no serious offer to play Rick. Speculative casting was a common practice to attract publicity for a forthcoming film.

The producer Hal Wallis wanted to cast Bogie in the lead, Jack Warner preferring Raft. Warner prevailed.

Raft at the time was trying to escape the taint of gangster roles. In the films of the 40s, the Nazis had become the gangsters of the 1930s. Raft felt that Rick Blaine, an ex-smuggler, was really a gangster. “The script doesn’t make clear why Rick can’t return to America,” Raft said. “Obviously he was involved in some illegal activity. I won’t do it.”

But after turning it down, he had second thoughts. He then notified Wallis that he would accept the role. It was too late. Warner had agreed to let Wallis cast Bogie.

“I had many regrets after I gave Bogart the role of Rick, the slick casino owner, in Casablanca,” Raft said. “But the part caught up with me in Cuba. In Background to Danger, the movie I shot in Havana, I starred in a real-life drama that was more exciting& than Casablanca. It had a live revolution as a background, and the bullets in the machine guns pointed at my head were real.”

The screenplay for Casablanca was based on an unproduced play, Everybody Comes to Rick’s, written by Murray Burnett and Joan Alison.

Lisbon was the major port of embarkation for refugees from Nazi-occupied Europe. The playwrights in their first draft set the scene in Portugal, but later transferred it to Casablanca, which was also one of the key stops for refugees on the run.

Samuel Marx had pitched the property to Mayer as an ideal vehicle for Clark Gable. Alison had envisioned him for the role. “Gable as Rick was my concept of a guy that I would like. I hated Humphrey Bogart. I thought he was a common drunk.”

Warners did not immediately get first dibs on the play Everybody Comes to Rick’s. Samuel Marx of MGM wanted to offer Burnett and Alison $5,000, but Louis B. Mayer vetoed the idea.

The script of the play arrived on the Warner lot on December 8, 1941, one day after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor.

The first script analyst at Warner who read the play, Stephen Karnot, called it “sophisticated hokum.” In his words, “It will play.” He sent it up to Irene Lee, head of the Warner story department. She liked the script and shot it at once to Jack Warner, who also liked it. He agreed to pay $20,000, the highest amount ever paid for an unproduced script.

Thinking of the success of the film, Algiers (1938), Warner had already ordered that the play be retitled Casablanca.

After several attempts to get a workable screenplay, Hal Wallis had long talks with& Julius J. Epstein and Philip G. Epstein, two brothers. These writers were known on the lot as “The Boys” or else “Phil and Julie.”

Identical twins, they were both bald and rather lanky, but each of them was known for their snappy dialogue, as demonstrated when they were called in “to fix” Yankee Doodle Dandy for James Cagney in his role of George M.& Cohan.

In its simplest format, the Epsteins created their romance/drama set in unoccupied Morocco during the early days of World War II. An American expatriate, Rick Blaine (Bogie), meets a former lover Ilsa Lund (Ingrid Bergman), with unforeseen complications. She is in essence torn between two lovers. Paul Henreid, as Victor Laszlo, would later be cast to fill the triangle.

To bail out the brothers, screenwriter Howard Koch was called in to develop a screenplay from scratch.

As a writer, Koch had already had a moment of notoriety. He was known for his dramatization of H.G. Wells' The War of the Worlds. That broadcast had convinced thousands of Americans that the country was being invaded by Martians.

Later, writers Casey Robinson and Lenore J. Coffee were asked to read both the Koch version of the play and the Epstein version. These two new writers found merit in both scripts. But Robinson beefed up the romantic angle.

Wallis considered casting Hedy Lamarr as Ilsa, because of her success in the film Algiers. In the final negotiation, MGM refused to release her. Hedy also objected to the unfinished script.

Months later, when both Bergman and Bogie were overseas entertaining the troops, Hedy, along with Alan Ladd in the Rick role, agreed to perform the screen drama in a 1944 radio show for the Lux Radio Theater.

A classic French beauty, Michèle Morgan was a serious contender for the role of Isla. Her enigmatic features and gloomy allure invited comparisons to a young Greta Garbo. Although she would be cast opposite Bogie in his upcoming Passage to Marseille, she did not click with American audiences. After the war, she'd go home to France where she became one of her country's most popular leading ladies.

"We'll always have Paris"

Her asking price of $55,000 was too high, since it was more than twice what Warner would have to pay Bergman.

Years later, when asked how she felt losing out on the pivotal role of Isla Lund in Casablanca, Morgan issued an enigmatic statement: "A woman can always deceive a hundred men but not a single& woman."

The Epstein twins were sent to meet with David Selznick to persuade him to lend the services of Ingrid Bergman, whom he had under exclusive contract. Although the twins were articulate on paper, they bumbled the plot, which had not really been worked out in their minds, when they had to deliver it face-to-face to Selznick.

" Casablanca is going to have a lot of schmaltz—lots of atmosphere, cigarette smoke, guitar music," Julius Epstein told Selznick. After nearly half an hour of describing the movie to a seemingly bored Selznick, Julius finally gave up and said, "Oh, what the hell! It's a lot of shit like Algiers."

"When Selznick stopped slurping his luncheon soup and nodded, I knew we had Bergman," Epstein later claimed.

Selznick agreed to lend Bergman to Warners for $25,000. It was a barter agreement. To sweeten the deal, Selznick agreed to lend Bergman for eight weeks in return for eight weeks of services from Olivia de Havilland. Selznick never used De Havilland but lent her to RKO to make the lackluster Government Girl instead.&

Off and on-screen views of Casablanca with Bogart, Rains, Bergman, and Henreid

---Ingrid Bergman

"I didn't want to be Ilsa in Casablanca," Bergman said. "There wasn't that much for me to do."

But since she was under exclusive contract to Selznick, she had to go through with the deal; otherwise she'd face suspension. To prepare for the role and to understand Bogie's acting style, Bergman watched The Maltese Falcon six times.

Selznick wasn't as dumb as this exchange with the Epsteins made him appear. At the time, there was fear that Sweden might be joining forces with the Axis to fight the West. A Swedish actress might be viewed as an anathema to American audiences.& Greta Garbo had already retired and didn't face that problem.

Bergman was a politically naïve young woman when she filmed Die vier Gessellen (The Four Companions) in Germany. One of her biographers, Charlotte Chandler, claimed she at first interpreted the Nazis as only "a temporary aberration—too foolish to be taken seriously."

"Germany will not start a war," Bergman claimed. The actress later had a life-long guilt because she had so horribly misjudged the situation and was so slow to see the evils of Hitler.

Her estranged first husband, Petter Lindstrom, in a later attempt to embarrass his wife, claimed that she had been taken to a Nazi rally in Hamburg and later praised Josef Goebbels, the Third Reich's minister of Enlightenment and Propaganda, for giving "a fantastic speech." That was corroborated in another Bergman biography, Laurence Leamer's As Times Go By.

Amazingly, even after Germany invaded Poland and launched World War II in 1939, Bergman turned down a movie role in So Ends Our Night, which was based on an Erich Maria Remarque novel. Allegedly, the actress claimed that the script was "too anti-German."

Selznick wisely suspected that Bergman was a public relations time bomb waiting to explode. If word of her pro-German sentiments got out, it would no doubt have seriously& damaged her career. As it turned out, the script for Casablanca was perfect for her, portraying her as the supportive wife of a resistance fighter.

Two views of Ingrid Bergman
"She'd do it with doorknobs"
--Alfred Hitchcock

Weeks later, an anti-Nazi like Bogie told Peter Lorre, Michael Curtiz, and others that he was the one who "turned Ingrid's head around politically" during their time together.

"I educated her and warned her never to be heard speaking German again," Bogie claimed. "I told her, 'If it's called for you to speak German in a script, turn it down. And don't wear one of those new bathing suits seen at the North Sea resorts, where a Fraülein has the image of a swastika covering her vagina.'"

Warner and Wallis assigned their temperamental Hungarian director, Michael Curtiz, to helm Casablanca. "Curtiz has tamed Bogie before," Warner told Wallis. "I'm sure he can do it again. After The Maltese Falcon, Bogie is getting a little& too big for his breeches."

Bogie had long wanted to work with Bergman, and in Casablanca at long last he had the opportunity. He asked Geraldine Fitzgerald, who had appeared with him in the Bette Davis picture, Dark Victory, to set up a luncheon, since she knew Bergman.

The cover-up of what actually went on between Bogie and Bergman may have begun at that luncheon. Fitzgerald would later claim that the two stars of Casablanca rarely spoke to each other off camera, which suggested that they were feuding, which they were not.

Bergman herself may have asked Fitzgerald to spread that false story. At any rate, Fitzgerald was not in Casablanca and was not privy to what went on privately among the actors.

During the luncheon, Bergman confessed that the role she really wanted was that of Maria in For Whom the Bell Tolls (1943), which she eventually won, appearing with Gary Cooper, who became her temporary lover.

Three views of infidelity:
Bogart with Berman

At the luncheon, Bergman pointedly asked Bogie, “How can I play Ilsa in Casablanca ? I’m supposed to be the world’s most beautiful woman. I look like a Swedish milkmaid.”

“If that’s what you think you look like, I’m taking up a new profession—that of milking cows.”

“Don’t be vulgar,” Bergman cautioned him. “I hardly know you.”

“When you get to know me, we can get down and dirty together.”

According to Fitzgerald, “The whole subject at lunch was how both Bogie and Ingrid could get out of making that movie. They thought the dialogue was ridiculous and the situations were unbelievable. I knew Bogie very well, and I think he wanted to join forces with Bergman, to make sure they both said the same things.”

There’s another problem here. Fitzgerald’s summary of the lunch with Bergman and Bogie may have accurately stated her position, but it left out the fact that Bogie had campaigned for months to play Rick Blaine. Why would he suddenly want to bolt from Casablanca ?

Because Paul Henreid was not available at& the time shooting began, Wallis and Curtiz considered Herbert Marshall, Dean Jagger, and Joseph Cotten for the role of Victor.

Henreid did not want to play Victor Lazlo, fearing that being placed in a secondary character role would ruin his burgeoning career as a romantic lead.

With a cast not fully decided, but with Bogie and Bergman in tow, principal photography began in May of 1942 on Casablanca.

The film’s scriptwriting team, which was composed of five writers, had not yet come up with a suitable script. Many problems in the plot had not been worked out. Some loopholes in the plot were never answered even after the film was released—for example, why had Rick been banished from America?

On the first day of shooting, Curtiz received a telegram from Warner. “These are turbulent days and I know you will finish Casablanca in tops seven weeks. I am depending on you to be the old Curtiz I know you to be, and I am positive you are going to make one great picture.”

Bogie was rushing through the film because he had agreed to star in Sahara for Columbia in return for a Cary Grant commitment.

Desperately trying to get out of town

“Bogie told Curtiz, “The audience won’t believe that a looker like Ingrid would fall for a guy with a mug like mine.”

Later, after viewing the first rushes with her, he changed his mind. “When the camera moves in on that Bergman face, and she’s saying she loves you, it would make anybody look romantic.”

Spencer Tracy advised Bogie, “This is the first time you’ve played the romantic lead against a major star. You stand still and always make her come to you. Curtiz probably won’t notice it. If she complains, you can tell her it’s in the script. You’ve got something she wants, so she has to come to you.”

The Blaine in the name of Bogie’s character came from Amory Blaine, the romantic hero of This Side of Paradise (1920), the first novel of F. Scott& Fitzgerald.

In spite of his initial complaints, Bogie was actually pleased with the role, yet didn’t want to admit it to anybody. In the first draft script sent to him, a reader had made this notation about the character of Rick Blaine. “Two parts Hemingway, one part F. Scott Fitzgerald, a dash of Christ.”

Bogie did demand that his character be made stronger. “The world is at war, and Rick is crying in his champagne about some whore he dumped in Paris.”

The difference in height between his stars caused some problems for Curtiz. Bergman towered over Bogie, who stood on a box in some scenes or else sat on a pillow. In one scene which was shot while Bogie and Bergman were sitting together on a couch—the famous “franc for your thoughts” moment—Curtiz directed Bergman “to slouch down.” Bogie also had to wear platform shoes in some scenes.

Rick’s Café Americain in the movie was modeled after the Hotel El Minzah in Tangier, former retreat of such vacationing stars as Errol Flynn and Marlene Dietrich.

Because of wartime restrictions on building supplies, Rick’s Café was one of the few original sets custom-built for the film. The rest of the sets were recycled from previous Warner Brothers films. As an example, the set which depicted the Paris train station was recycled from Now, Voyager (1942), which had starred Paul Henreid and Bette Davis.

Wartime restrictions also made it impossible for an actual airport to be used after dark because of security reasons. To solve that problem, Curtiz had a small cardboard cutout airplane made, which he filmed in forced perspective. To create the illusion that the craft was full-sized, he hired midgets to portray the crew preparing the plane for the famous take-off with Ilsa’s immortal goodbye to Rick.

A film noir legend
“By the time I was twenty-seven, I knew not to marry an actress, so I married four of them.”

At last, Bergman came together with her director, Curtiz, former circus juggler, strongman, and trampoline artist. His directional advice about how to play Ilsa was simple: “Just be yourself, Ingrid Bergman. Bogie will be himself, like the asshole could be anything else.”

But when she showed up the next day for filming, she encountered a very different personality. “Fortunately,” she later recalled, “I’d already made Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, so I knew about dual personalities.”

When Bergman appeared on the set, Curtiz& attacked her. “You’re playing a decent woman, not a whore from 10th Avenue. Take off pounds of makeup. No lipstick.”

Bergman pestered Curtiz, asking him, “Which man am I in love with?” Since the director hadn’t decided, he told her to “play it in between.”

Until deep into the shoot, Curtiz and the writers could not make up their minds about how the film should end. Bergman later said, “I never knew from day to day which man I was in love with, Rick or Victor.”

Curtiz discussed with his writers the possibility of having Rick run away with Ilsa. But he was warned that the censors might object. After all, Ilsa was married to Victor. Finally it was decided that Ilsa, although still in love with Rick, would remain with her husband.

The third lead, Paul Henreid, reluctantly showed up on the set long after shooting had begun.

He was about to enter the pantheon of film history for his portrait in Now, Voyager. In the film, he had put two cigarettes at once to his lips, lit them, and passed one on to Bette Davis. A legend was born.

Rivals on the screen, Bogie and Henreid did not get along. Bogie told Peter Lorre that Henreid was a "prima donna." Both Bogie and Henreid were gentlemen and managed to conceal their contempt for each other, although denouncing& each other privately. On the surface, they seemed like friends and even played chess& together between takes.

Henreid told Bogie that when he'd appeared in a 1940 British thriller, Night Train to Munich, he got a lot of fan mail from women asking "Who was that cute Nazi in the movie?" It is believed that Henreid had some Jewish ancestors, hence his flight from Nazi-occupied territory.

Although Bogie was all smiles playing chess with Henreid, when the actor disappeared into his dressing room, Bogie attacked him to Curtiz. "Henreid is the biggest case of self-idolatry since I last fucked Hedy Lamarr. After lighting that cigarette for Bette, he pictures himself a matinee idol."

"Wait a minute, you slimy son of a bitch," Curtiz said. "You fucked the Austrian bitch? I saw Ecstasy. When she ran bare-assed naked, I got a hard-on."

"She called me one night, and we got together," Bogie said. "At the time, as you know, she was up for the role of Ilsa. She wanted to see if we had any sexual chemistry together. We did. And how! Her pussy is top of the line. I heard she once fucked both Hitler and Mussolini—not at the same time, of course. With Hedy, it may be the only time in my life where I had sloppy seconds after the Führer."

"You asshole," Curtiz obviously infuriated said. "The Lamarr cunt should have come to me. After all, I'm the director of this silly fairytale. How did it happen? An ugly guy like you born when Lincoln was president. Hedy Lamarr and Ingrid Bergman. Who's next? Betty Grable? Lana Turner? Veronica Lake? Rita Hayworth?"

"If you brag to me you fuck one of these cunts, I'll cut off your dick if I can find it," Curtiz threatened. You may be great with women off-screen, but you are lousy on screen. When you go to kiss Bergman, you look like you about to throw up. You're no homosexual, are you? Errol Flynn told me you were always looking at his crotch. Ronald Reagan told me you made a pass at him in the men's toilet."

"That was just a joke," Bogie protested.

"Don't speak to me rest of day," Curtiz said. "Just for fucking Hedy Lamarr, I'm gonna make you do one take thirty-two times."

Lamarr had made Ekstase (Ecstasy) when she was fifteen. She'd met the Fascist dictators during the course of her marriage (1933-1937) to Fritz Mandl, a Vienna-based arms manufacturer and multi millionaire. In those days she always appeared in public wearing a fortune in jewels, especially diamonds.

For Casablanca's supporting players, Curtiz had rounded up the usual suspects: Claude Rains, Conrad Veidt, Sydney Greenstreet, Peter Lorre, S.Z. Sakall, Joy Page, Dooley Wilson, and Helmut Dantine.

Claude Rains, in a brilliant screen portrayal, was cast as Captain Louis Renault, a corrupt Vichy opportunist who claims, "I have no convictions. I blow with the wind, and the prevailing wind happens to be from Vichy."

Freelancer Rains, arguably the single most talented actor in the cast, certainly had a lot to smile about in his role, as he'd jacked up his salary from Jack Warner to $4,000 a week.& "Let the shoot drag on forever for all I care," he told Bogie.

Rains would go on to appear in Notorious, the Alfred Hitchcock film that also starred Bergman.

The bulky Sydney Greenstreet played the small but pivotal role of Signor Ferrari, the jovial but sinister fez-wearing owner of the Blue Parrot, chief rival of Rick's Café. That was his day job. At night he was Casablanca's leading black marketer. Everything was for sale for a price, even a passport to get a refugee out of Casablanca and on the plane to Lisbon and freedom.

Conrad Veidt, on loan from MGM, was paid the same amount that Bergman was, $25,000. Originally Curtiz had wanted Otto Preminger for the role of Major Strasser, but at the time, he was under contract to Darryl F. Zanuck, who demanded a salary of $7,000 a week. Jack Warner turned Preminger down.

Veidt delivered his usual brilliant performance as the icily cold but elegant Gestapo major, Strasser, who likes vintage champagne and very cold caviar.

Many of the actors who played Nazis in Casablanca were in fact German Jews who had escaped from Hitler's Nazis. Veidt himself had hurriedly escaped Germany when he learned that the SS had sent a death squad after him because of his anti-Nazi activities.

Peter Lorre was cast as the creepy petty criminal Ugarte, selling "letters of transit," which he obtained through the murder of two Nazi couriers.

In a key moment, Lorre as Ugarte asks Rick, "You despise me, don't you?

Rick answers, "If I gave you any thought, I probably would."

The defining moment occurs when Lorre is trapped by the police in Rick's Café. He rushes to Rick, his eyes bulging with fright. "Rick," he cries. "Do something! You must help me!"

Rick shares his personal credo with Lorre. "I stick my neck out for nobody."

The unfortunate Lorre is hauled off by the police and assassinated.

S.Z. Sakall, cast as Carl the waiter, was from Hungary. Although he had fled from Germany in 1939, each of his three sisters died in a concentration camp.

Chubby-jowled Sakall had such rotund cuteness that he was nicknamed “Cuddles.” Bogie is claimed to have given him that nickname, but that does-n’t appear to be true. Sakall hated the part of the head waiter in Casablanca and turned it down. He finally took the role when he was guaranteed four weeks of work for $5,250. Sakall actually had more screen time than either Greenstreet or Lorre.

Wallis had considered hiring female musicians such as Lena Horne, Ella Fitzgerald, or Hazel Scott for the role that was eventually awarded to Dooley Wilson, who played Sam. Warners feared a backlash, especially in Southern theaters, for giving such a pivotal role to a black woman.

Wilson was a professional drummer who had to fake his piano playing. Since the music was recorded at the same time as the film, the piano playing was actually by Elliot Carpenter who performed behind a curtain. He was positioned so that Dooley could watch—and copy—his hand movements.

Curtiz was not without female companionship on the set. As Henreid revealed, “Curtiz, befitting the reputation of most Hungarians, was a practiced womanizer and was known to hire pretty young extras to whom he promised all sorts of things, including stardom, just to have them around and make passes at them at any odd hours when there was a break in shooting. He would choose any private place on the set, usually behind some flat in a secluded area. He’d have the grips move a piece of furniture there, a couch, or even a mattress—almost anything to soften his lovemaking.”

“But I didn’t go for Bergman,” Curtiz recalled. “I decided to give Bogie a chance. I had plenty of other broads to fuck on this picture.”

At one point Lorre secretly hooked up a mike to Curtiz’s dressing room. The whole crew heard a script girl screaming. “Oh, God! No! No! I can’t take it! More, more, more!”

For all the cast to hear, Curtiz shouted “Take it all, take it all—my balls too!”

One of the emotional highlights of the film was the “duel of the anthems,” between the French singing La Marseillaise and the Nazis warbling Die Wacht am Rhein.

Censorship continued to plague the film. Ilsa says, “Victor is my husband, and was, even when I knew you in Paris.” This was almost cut, as it suggested adultery. However, at a later point, she claimed that she thought Victor was dead at the time of her affair with Bogie. The censors then agreed to let the line stay.

As he stated in Love and Death in Casablanca, author William Donelley claimed that “Rick’s relationship with Sam, and subsequently with Renault, is a standard case of repressed homosexuality that underlies most American adventure stories.”

Hungarian S.Z. Sakall

That’s why one of the most famous of all straight love stories, the celluloid romance of Bogart and Bergman, always ends up on a list of most famous gay films.

Gays claim that the real love story is not between Rick and Ilsa, but between Rick and Captain Louis Renault, as played by Claude Rains.

One viewer claimed that for him, the most& interesting relationship in the movie is between Rick and Louis. “Theirs is a relationship of almost perfect cynicism, one-liners, and claims of neutrality that provide much humor, as well as gives a necessary display of Rick's darker side before and after Ilsa's arrival."

Many famous movie reviewers, including Roger Ebert, knew that Rains was playing a "subtly homosexual police chief."

Rains as Louis is obviously besotted with the super-butch Rick. In Rick's presence, Rains becomes almost like a school girl. Gays picked up on such lines as when Louis says to Rick: "You were never interested in any woman."

Louis also tells Rick: "She [Ilsa] was asking questions about you earlier, Rick, in a way that made me extremely jealous." Rains said "extremely jealous" in such a way that only a redneck homophobe could not have picked up on what he meant.

At the end of the film, after Ilsa, accompanied by her husband, is airborne, the captain walks away with his man. Bogie famously drawls, "Louis, I think this is the beginning of a beautiful friendship." World War II audiences didn't get this homoerotic overtone.

The line, "Louis, I think this is the beginning of a beautiful friendship" was voted No. 54 among "The 100 Greatest Movie Lines" of all time.

Wallis came up with this line after the film was finished. Bogie was called back to the Warner lot to dub it in.

In fact, Casablanca ended up having more famous one-liners than any other movie in history.

One of the most famous lines of the movie, "Play it again, Sam," was never uttered. The actual dialogue was, "You played it for her, you can play it for me. Play it!"

Casablanca

Ilsa says, "Play it, Sam, play 'As Time Goes By.'"

In name recognition, "Round up the usual suspects" came in No. 32, with "We'll always have Paris" voted No. 43.

Reportedly, the line, "Here's looking at you, kid," was improvised by Bogie when he appeared as a star in the little-seen film Midnight in 1934. The movie's line was voted the fifth most famous movie quotation of all time by the American Film Institute.

Bogie fell in love with the word "kid" when describing his screen women. In Dead Reckoning (1947), he called Lizabeth Scott "kid" twice. Again in Tokyo Joe (1949), he called the Czech-born actress Florence Marly "Hello, kid." Finally, in Sirocco (1951), he tells Marta Toren, "You're a sweet kid!"

Bogie added another line to the script other than the "kid" reference. He was given the line, "Of all the cafés in all the cities in all the world, she walks into my café." He changed it to, "Of all the gin-joints in all the towns in all the world, she walks into mine."

When the Allies invaded Casablanca on November 8, 1942, Jack Warner went into a tizzy, as he was urged to incorporate the invasion into the film's storyline. Hal Wallis thought the invasion could be presented as an epilogue for the spring release of Casablanca. The producer was prepared to shoot a sequence in which Bogie and Claude

Rains hear about the invasion. However, Warner eventually nixed the idea, thinking the invasion worthy of a film all on its own and not just as an epilogue. It was decided to release Casablanca as a pre-invasion story.

Bogie had his greatest moment on film when he stood on the gray tarmac with those fog machines blasting away. In his rumpled trench coat and fedora, he looked into Bergman's eyes welling with tears.

"You're saying this only to make me go," Bergman says.

"I'm saying it because it's true. You belong with Victor. If that plane leaves the ground and you're not on it, you'll regret it. Maybe not today, maybe not tomorrow, but soon, and for the rest of your life. I'm not good at being noble, but it doesn't take much to see that the problems of three little people don't amount to a hill of beans in this crazy world. Here's looking at you, kid."

Rick (Bogart) sending Ugarte (Peter Lorre) to his doom

As Laurence Leamer, Bergman's biographer, put it: "For Bogie, it was booze, blood, and brawls, a butcher knife in the back, a fistfight in the living room, pistol shots in the ceiling. It was a wife so jealous of Ingrid that he didn't dare get near his co-star. It was life as a forty-two-year-old& balding actor with an alcoholic wife, a drinking problem of his own, and a co-star so beautiful, so irresistible, so shrewdly professional, that he was likely to lose the movie to her."

Night after night, Methot fought bitterly with Bogie over his alleged affair with Bergman. Finally, Bogie had had it. He told Curtiz, "If you have the name, why not play the game? I'm going after the Swedish broad. I'm an ass man myself, and that gal's got ass."

As a Hollywood insider, Mrs. Humphrey Bogart, his third wife, knew much of what was going on, especially off camera. From the very beginning of her marriage, she'd suspected that Bogie was a "whoremonger" [her words], and she never changed that opinion. She'd known many actresses personally with whom he'd had brief flings in the 1930s.

Methot also knew that Ingrid Bergman's screen image had nothing to do with the private woman. Alfred Hitchcock, who directed her in several later films, claimed "She'd do it with doorknobs."

She was "Notorious" (the name of one of her movies) for having affairs with her leading men. They included Leslie Howard, co-star in Intermezzo (1939); both actor Spencer Tracy and director Victor Fleming on the set of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1941); Gary Cooper in For Whom the Bell Tolls (1943) and Saratoga Trunk (1945); Joseph Cotten in Gaslight (1944); Bing Crosby in The Bells of St. Mary's (1945); Gregory Peck in Spellbound (1945); Yul Brynner in Anastasia (1956); Anthony Quinn in The Visit (1964), and Omar Sharif in The Yellow Rolls-Royce (1964), plus numerous other actors and directors, including her "sponsor," David Selznick himself.

Why should Bogie be exempt?

The homosexual actor, Anthony Perkins, claimed that Bergman tried to seduce him on the set of Goodbye Again (1961). She did not succeed.

Spencer Tracy was quoted as saying, "Ingrid worked best when she was in love with her leading man. Beginning with Leslie Howard in Intermezzo, she seduced all of us." He'd made Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde with her in 1941.

Larry Adler, the world's most famous harmonica player, whom Ingrid met on a USO tour in 1945, was egocentric and a political leftist. Bergman's long talks with him turned into an affair.

Adler later said, "I think she needed to show her power over men. She wasn't coquettish or a tease. Ingrid wasn't interested in sex all that much. She did it like a polite girl."

In that opinion, Adler was a minority of one.

Bergman was wise not to allow any of the details of her affairs with her leading men of the 1940s to be revealed. Her virginal image as a model of propriety was shattered when her affair with the Italian director, Roberto Rossellini, was revealed in 1949. The affair and her subsequent pregnancy shocked her fans and sent her into exile from America for seven long years.

Although it seems silly today, her affair caused national outrage and she was denounced for her "immorality" on the floor of the U.S. Senate. In the wake of that, the press tore her reputation to shreds. She was temporarily "soiled" among puritanical moviegoers who refused to even tolerate her image on the screen.

One of Bergman's most famous off-screen remarks about Bogie was when she said, "I kissed Bogie. But I never got to know him."

Later among her friends in Sweden, when she had nothing more to lose career-wise, she admitted, "I did say that. Can't a woman say something that is not true? That happens all the time. Why should the world at that time have known about my private relationship with Bogie? I didn't announce any of my other affairs with leading men. Why should I have with Bogie? It would not have helped either of us. Besides, what went on between Bogie and me is our own personal business."

In an interview in her native Sweden in later years, she recalled, "What could I say? That we were carrying on passionately and had a brief but torrid fling? We were both married at the time. An adulterous affair—look at what happened to me later—could have destroyed my career. It probably would not have affected Bogie's own career that much."

There is no real proof that Bogie and Bergman had an affair. Likewise, there is no proof that they did not. Eyewitnesses claim they did, notably& Michael Curtiz, who had his finger on the heartbeat of every member of the cast.

Views of Ingrid Bergman with more of her leading menlovers (top to bottom):

Bing Crosby, Gregory Peck, Yul Brynner, and Anthony Quinn

When Curtiz found Bogie becoming “love sick,” he warned him, “Ingrid’s trapped in a bad marriage. For her fun, she fucks her leading men, then forgets them. Don’t fall in love with her. She’s poison. Other men fall for cunt, then regret it. She’ll break your heart.”

“After marrying Mayo Methot,” he said, “I no longer have a heart to break.”

He confided to Ann Sheridan that he’d fallen in love with Bergman and had asked her to marry him, after both of them had gotten divorces from Methot and Bergman’s Swedish doctor husband, Petter Lindstrom.

Bogie even gave Sheridan a review of Bergman in bed: “She’s great but won’t fellate me.”

Rossellini, Bergman’s future husband, had much the same complaint, claiming that his new wife would not perform fellatio on him, one of his major sexual pleasures. “She doesn’t do the things a whore does. For that, I have to go to a bordello.”

Claude Rains later told Bette Davis that when he dropped by Bogie’s dressing room for a drink, Bergman was adjusting her dress and Bogie zipping up. “I assumed that they had been rehearsing their love scenes,” he said sarcastically. “What else could it have been?”

Henreid also told Davis that Bogie and Bergman were having an affair.

“I’d heard that she ‘auditions’ all her leading men,” Davis snorted. “No doubt she’s trying to rival Joan Crawford in& that department.” Davis looked skeptically at Henreid. “Do you think you and Bogie will share her during the shooting?”

“I think I’m out in the cold,” Henreid said. “She told me I look too much like Petter.” He was referring, of course, to Bergman’s husband, Petter Lindstrom.

Spencer Tracy, Bogie’s pal, told George Cukor that Bogie and Bergman were having an affair, and gossipy Cukor spread the word.

Bob Williams, Bogie's publicist on Casablanca, later claimed. "I think Bogie fell in love with Ingrid. He was so jealous that if I brought anyone on the set, especially another man, to see her he was furious at me. He would sulk. I had a feeling he wanted Ingrid for himself."

Jack Warner seemed to know about the affair. When Bogie showed up late on the set two days in a row, Warner fired off a memo to Curtiz: "Tell Bogart to quit fucking the Swedish broad all night long and report on time. In one of the rushes, he looks sixty years old. Tell him to clean up his act. The Swedish pussy can wait until picture's end. Then he can have a whole fucking smörgåsbord."

Vincent Sherman, Bogie's sometimes director, claimed that Bogie told him that he had an affair with Bergman all throughout the shooting of Casablanca. "Forget all those stupid biographies that claimed Bergman and Bogie didn't have an affair. He fucked her during the entire making of Casablanca, and fell madly in love with her. In spite of that saintly look, that cold Swede was hot to trot once you got her pants off."

Methot frequented the set for confrontations with Bogie. She accused him of having an affair with Bergman. In this case she was right.

That chemistry was undeniable both on and off the screen, although biographers for years have perpetuated a myth, spread by Bergman herself, that she had almost no contact with Bogie off camera. Methot knew better.

Emotionally deranged even without provocation, she allowed her fury to bubble over one afternoon. Halfway through the shooting of Casablanca, the picture came close to not being finished, at least with Bogie and Bergman in the leads.

An anonymous letter had been sent to Methot. It read:

> "When your errant husband isn't needed on the set, he disappears into the dressing room of Ingrid Bergman, the Swedish cow. The sounds coming from that dressing room can be heard all over the sound stage. Your husband can be seen leaving Bergman's room zipping up his pants. They are engaged in a torrid affair. How many nights does he come home late? You answer that question for yourself."

The next afternoon Methot showed up on the set. Somehow she'd obtained a pistol. It was later revealed that she planned to shoot both Bogie and Bergman, hopefully after she'd caught them together.

When she got there, from a distance, she saw Bogie innocently playing chess with Lorre. She asked the script girl to direct her to Bergman's dressing room.

The script girl rushed to tell Bogie what was going on. Sensing trouble, he jumped up, according to Lorre, and raced to Methot. Confronting her, he discovered that she packed a pistol. He fought with her to wrest it from her tightly clenched fingers. The gun went off. Instead of shooting him, the bullet was fired into the air, alerting the entire crew.

Bergman emerged from her dressing room. Rather calmly she walked over to Methot.

"Mrs. Bogart," she said, "I recognize you from your photographs which do not do you justice. Your devoted husband here has told me what a wonderful person you are. It's an honor to meet you. I'm sorry they didn't find a role for you in this picture. I saw you in Marked Woman with Mr. Bogart. You stole that picture from both your husband and Bette Davis." Then Bergman, showing enormous grace under pressure, turned and walked away.

Methot seemed stunned and didn't know how to react. At this point Curtiz arrived with two stagehands. Lorre had told him what had happened. Curtiz ordered that Methot be forcibly removed from the set and barred from entering the studio gates again until Casablanca was wrapped.

Bogie's reaction to this drama taking place off camera is not known. He didn't want to speak about it to Curtiz, to Lorre, or to anybody.

Under the cloak of darkness. Bogie came and went from the place where Bergman was staying, since her husband was back on the East Coast with her daughter, Pia Lindstrom.

On the final night Bogie saw Bergman, he invited her to an out-of-the way restaurant to celebrate the end of filming.

It was on that fateful night that Bergman gave Bogie "the worst news of my life." She rejected his proposal to marry him after their respective divorces from Lindstrom and Methot.

She explained to him that she was going back to her husband in "dreary, boring" Rochester, New York. "There is no great romance there, but I have a daughter, Pia. I owe it to her to go back and be a mother. I can't leave either of them."

Bogie was said to have cried that night, and he was a man who didn't cry very often.

Although it may be apocryphal, Ann Sheridan later claimed that Bergman, as a final goodbye, told Bogie, "We'll always have Paris."

Curtiz brought the film in just eleven days over schedule. Problems arose along the way. He constantly fought with Bogie over script changes, which delayed production. As shooting began, the actors did not have a working script. Curtiz handed them new pages of dialogue on the morning of each day's shoot.

Max Steiner complained to Curtiz about the song, "As Time Goes By." It's got to be cut from the final score," Steiner demanded.

"Like hell!" Curtiz shouted at him. "I love that song. You're an idiot!"

Casablanca, budgeted at $950,000 ran over budget, going $100,000 into the red, much to the fury of Jack Warner.

In one of his final interviews, Henreid revealed what had never been told before.

One night he was called back for "still" sittings with Bergman. Warners planned to use these photographs for publicity purposes.

Bergman seemed heartbroken. Henreid assumed that it was because her affair with Bogie was going badly. "I knew that she had broken it off with him, and she looked very sad," he said. "I was completely mistaken when she revealed what was really wrong. She went in and out of affairs with her leading men so quickly it did not seem to phase her."

She was actually heartbroken over the loss of the role of María in Ernest Hemingway's For Whom the Bell Tolls, the part having gone to Vera Zorina.

"Those idiots," Bergman told Henreid. "Picking Zorina of all people. She can't act. She just can't, and I'm good. I'm really good!"

Bergman with Roberto Rossellini "an international scandal"

Born in Berlin, Zorina was an American ballerina, musical theater actress, and choreographer. At the time she was considered for For Whom the Bell Tolls, she was married to the famous choreographer George Balanchine.

When word got out that Zorina had been fired from For Whom the Bell Tolls, and replaced by Bergman, her film career was more or less destroyed in Hollywood. She never recovered from the blow. Although she tried for other major roles, she failed to find them. In 1946, she said good-bye to Hollywood.

In the middle of the photography session,& Bergman was called to the phone. During her conversation, she let out a yell that Henreid compared to that of "a tigress who has made a kill, a yell of such joy and triumph that I was stunned."

Returning to him, she kissed Henreid on the lips. "I got it! I got it! Zorina is out. I'm María. I got it! Paul, we've got to celebrate!"

It was at this point in his memoirs that Henreid drew the curtains, the way movie directors in the 1930s did when a man and woman faded into the bedroom to make love.

"That night," I learned what Bergman meant by celebrate," Henreid said. "It wasn't just the champagne. In spite of her cool demeanor, she was that tigress in bed, the same blood-curdling scream I'd heard on the phone when she got the part of María. Over pillow talk, as you Americans say, she told me that I was a much better lover than Bogie—much smoother in bed, more suave, more capable of making a woman feel like a real woman. She also told me that in spite of all the experiences he'd had with women, Bogie still approached a woman in bed with a certain schoolboy awkwardness."

Suave, sleepy-eyed Henreid, whose acting style was "as rigid as a board" in Casablanca, enjoyed only a passing vogue in the 1940s, mainly as a continental lover. Decades after his appearance in Casablanca, he expressed a bitterness against the movie. He especially disliked its director and Bogie himself.

Many of Henreid's fans assumed he was French born. Actually, the actor was Austrian, having been born in Trieste (now part of Italy) when that city was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

"Mr. Bogie Man was a nobody," he claimed shortly before he died in 1992. "That is, before Casablanca he was a nobody. He was the fellow Robinson or Cagney would say, 'Get him!' He was always a very mediocre actor with an extremely limited range. He was so sorry for himself in Casablanca. Unfortunately, Michael Curtiz was not a director of actors; he was a director of effects. He was first rate at that, but he could not tell Bogart he should not play the role of Rick like a crybaby. It was embarrassing, I thought, when I looked at the rushes."

Those negative comments about Bogie were deleted from his 1984 autobiography called Ladies' Man. Henreid's editor at St. Martin's Press felt it might harm the potential sale of the book.

"I would much prefer that I be remembered for my role opposite Bette Davis in Now, Voyager," he claimed. "If I had it to do over again, I would never have accepted the role in Casablanca."

The stories that Henreid spread in the interviews he gave during his later years did not appear in his memoirs and cannot be verified at this late date. Perhaps he was getting some long-delayed revenge on Bogie. Or perhaps the incident he described that night with Bergman really was true.

Much of the initial success of Casablanca resulted from the sweeping historical events that had inspired its plot. In November of 1942, Allied forces landed in Morocco, forming a beachhead at Casablanca. Then in January of 1943, the famous Casablanca Conference took place between Franklin D. Roosevelt and Winston Churchill in a suburb of Casablanca. It was at this conference that Roosevelt announced that "unconditional surrender" would be demanded of the Axis powers.

Casablanca premiered at the Hollywood Theater in New York City on November 26, 1942. It was timed to coincide with the Allied invasion of North Africa and the capture of Casablanca. But it didn't go into general release until January 23, 1943, when it took advantage of the publicity generated by the Casablanca Conference.

After President Franklin D. Roosevelt returned from the war-time conference in Casablanca with Sir Winston Churchill, he asked for a screening of Casablanca at the White House ["Casa Blanca" in Spanish].

During its initial run, the film was a solid but not spectacular success. The legend would come later. In time, its characters, dialogue, and music would become iconic.

In its aftermath, many bizarre legends arose about the movie, including one that claimed that Jack Benny had appeared briefly in it.

Not all the reviews were raves, The New Yorker referring to it as only "pretty tolerable." The New York Times, in contrast, asserted that it "makes the spine tingle and the heart take a leap." Variety claimed that Bogie was "more at ease as the bitter and cynical operator of a joint than as a lover," and Bogie himself agreed with that review.

When Julius Epstein saw the final script, on which so many others had labored, he said, it contained "more corn than in the states of Kansas and Iowa combined. But when corn works, there's nothing better." He later expressed grave reservations about the script, calling it "slick shit."

"Casablanca is one of my least favorite pictures," Epstein said. "I'm tired of talking about it after thirty years. I can explain its success only by the Bogie cult that has sprung up after his death. I can recognize that the picture is entertaining and that people love it. But it's a completely phoney romance, a completely phoney picture. For instance, nobody knew what was going on in Casablanca at the time. Nobody had ever been to Casablanca. The whole thing was shot in the back lot. There was never a German who appeared in Casablanca for the duration of the entire war, and we had Germans marching around with medals and epaulets. Furthermore, there were never any such things as letters of transit around which the entire plot revolved. . . . the movie is completely phoney!"

Actually, there were some Nazis in Casablanca during the early 1940s. These Germans were arrested when the Allied invasion occurred. Those "letters of transit" were actually visas and exit papers which were eagerly bought by European refugees wanting to escape to Lisbon where they could subsequently arrange transport to New York.

Both Bogie and Bergman later claimed that they were wrong about the impact and the importance of Casablanca. "We thought we were making a B movie, and that was how it was viewed at the time," Bogie said. "I was used to making B movies. To me, Casablanca was just another assignment. It took me years to realize that it was a picture that ranked up there with Citizen Kane as one of the greatest movies ever made."

Bergman later said, "Regardless of how many more movies I make, or how many Oscars I win, when I die The New York Times will give me a front page headline that says 'CO-STAR OF CASABLANCA DIES.'"

Movie buffs have long pondered why Bergman and Bogie never made another film together, given their on-screen chemistry.

The success of Casablanca led Warner to plan a sequel. It was to be called Brazzaville. However, Bergman was not available. Geraldine Fitzgerald, whom Bogie had appeared with in Dark Victory, was considered for the role, before the project was killed. In the late 1990s, Michael Walsh's novel, As Time Goes By, was published as the sequel.

For his role as Rick, Bogie took home exactly $36,667, in contrast to Lorre, who made only $2,333. Curtiz was the highest grosser, earning $73,400.

Following the release of Casablanca, Bogie would become the highest paid actor in Hollywood, and in the world for that matter. He would reign as Tinseltown's biggest star from 1943 to 1949.

After hitting it big in Casablanca, Bogie was no longer Duke Mantee, gangster at large, or Sam Spade, detective at large. After the release of Casablanca, he could& virtually play any character part he wanted, ranging from the seedy captain of The African Queen to the psychotic Captain Queeg in The Caine Mutiny.

The date was March 2, 1944, the setting Grauman's Chinese Theater. When it was announced that Casablanca had been designated as Best Picture of 1943, the audience gasped. It had not been a heavy favorite.

Paramount's For Whom the Bell Tolls or Warner Brothers' Watch on the Rhine were considered the major contenders. Bogie lost his chance for the Oscar, as Paul Lukas walked off with the Best Actor prize for Watch on the Rhine, in which he'd co-starred with Bette Davis. Claude Rains, nominated for Best Supporting Actor, lost to Charles Coburn for The More the Merrier.

Accepting his Oscar as Best Director, Curtiz said: "So many times I have a speech ready, but no dice. Always a bridesmaid, never a mother. Now I win, I have no speech."

Casablanca was nominated and won the Oscar as Best Picture of the Year.

Wallis rose to accept the Oscar until he noted Jack Warner hurrying down the aisle. It was an Academy tradition that the producer of the film accepts the Best Picture Oscar, not a studio head.

Wallis was so incensed that he never forgave Warner. Up to then Wallis had been regarded as the Wünderkind of Warners, but he left the studio shortly after that slight at the Academy Awards ceremony.

Bogie invited Ann Sheridan to the Casablanca wrap party. Ironically, Sheridan was to have been the award-winning film's female star. With her was her newly minted close friend, a demure little brunette.

"Bogie," she said, "I want you to meet a good friend of mine and the best hairdresser in Hollywood. She can do wonders for that toupée of yours. Meet Verita Peterson."

CHAPTER ELEVEN

“Who is this good-looking broad?” Bogie asked of Ann Sheridan.

“Those words were the first I ever heard from Bogie,” Verita Peterson recalled. “Romantic, don’t you think?”

“After that intro, Annie wandered off and threw herself at Michael Curtiz, so we figured we’d seen the last of her,” Verita said.

Verita Bouvaire Peterson, locked into an unhappy marriage to Robert Peterson, a studio technician, met a middle-aged but rising star, Humphrey Bogart, who was also locked into an unhappy marriage to Mayo Methot.

At the wrap party for Casablanca, she later recalled, “No one on the set, including Bogie and Michael Curtiz, knew they’d made a classic.”

“Bogie didn’t like to dance, but, honey, we danced the night away,” she said in an interview in 1998. “From that night on we were lovers.”

The attractive little brunette who would become his mistress and the “custodian of his toupée” was a hard-drinking beauty who could match Bogie drink for drink. “I liked to down the booze. He liked to down the booze. I could match him cuss word for cuss word, shot for shot. We did a lot of crazy things together, some of which I’d rather forget. It got a little kinky at times, but so what? The war was going to end one day, although when I met Bogie I thought we might lose it.”

“From the very beginning, Bogie told me he’d never marry me,” she said. “‘Marriage is a trap,’ he said. ‘I’ve been trapped too long. When I escape from Mayo, I never want to be trapped again. But we’ll have a lot of fun, and having fun is what life is all about.’”

“I couldn’t agree with you more,” she whispered into his ear as he whirled her around the dance floor.

Half-Irish, half-Mexican, Verita arrived in Hollywood straight from Arizona. “I didn’t know a God damn thing about acting, but I felt a gal like me could have a hell of a good time in Hollywood. When I won a beauty contest, Miss Arizona, I decided to try to capitalize off it. In fact, after a few auditions on the casting couch, I got a job at Republic.”

“I was cast in a Western and fell off my horse the first day and broke my arm,” Verita said. “I was soon out of Republic but got to fuck John Wayne and Forrest Tucker.”

“Then I got picked up by the pool one day by this Frenchman who’d come to America with a huge amount of French lace and a lot of beautiful hair from the convents of Europe,” she said. “Believe it or not, French lace is one of the best foundations for making great wigs and toupées. Because France had been invaded by Hitler’s armies, the lace was not available all during the war.”

“I’d inherited a lot of money from my grandfather who had died, and I agreed to stake this guy,” she said. “I bought a brand new car, figuring it would be the last one made until the war was over. I filled it with his wigs, toupées, and falls and started making the rounds of all the studios. That’s how I met Bogie’s pal, Ann Sheridan. They’d had this little fling, but once they got the fucking out of the way, they found they really liked each other and became pals.”

“I did wigs for women, but a lot of the men were having problems with their hair too,” Verita said. “I’d become a licensed hairdresser. I found the men more fun to work with than the ladies. Within a year, I’d been fucked by Ray Milland, Charles Boyer, and Gary Cooper. Not bad.”

Verita Peterson

“When I met Annie at Max Factor, she was just coming down from a fling with Ronald Reagan,” Verita said. “He wasn’t my type at all. He had to have his flings during the day because Jane Wyman kept him locked in a cage at night—just joking.”

“Gary Cooper was at the wrap party for Casablanca,” Verita said. “I’d already had him, so Ingrid Bergman was welcome to him. She was obviously making a big play for him, and they were about to make a movie together. Having dumped Bogie, she was pursuing her next leading man.”

That evening Bergman broke from Cooper long enough to come over and pay her respects to Bogie. He was seated with Verita at a makeshift table while the orchestra hired by Warners took a break.

“She came to our table and shook Bogie’s hand,” Verita said. “She pointedly ignored me, and Bogie didn’t bother to introduce us. He also didn’t rise to his feet. It was all very cold. She called him ‘Mr. Bogart’ and told him how much she’d enjoyed making Casablanca with him. It was total bullshit!”

“Annie had told me that Bergman and Bogie had had an affair, and that the Swedish bitch had broken Bogie’s heart,” Verita said. “I really think that’s why he turned to me so suddenly. He didn’t want to show up at the wrap party stag, looking rejected with tears in his eyes. I don’t know where Methot was. Bogie almost wanted to show Bergman that he, too, had moved on with his life. In a matter of days, Bergman was in Cooper’s bed and I was in Bogie’s, or rather Bogie was in my bed. Of course, all of us in this quartet had spouses, even Bergman, but what the hell. This was Hollywood!”

“It was one o’clock and we were still dancing,” Verita said. “In front of the whole cast and crew. Fortunately, Jack Warner had left. Bogie began kissing my neck. For the last thirty minutes, he hadn’t taken his hand off my ass.”

“That’s the most romantic thing a man has ever said to me,” she told him. “My brains must be in my ass, or otherwise I wouldn’t be dancing around the floor with you at this hour with everybody looking on.”

“Bogie was pressing hard against me,” she said. “I really felt him and more or less knew how this night would end. He kept kissing my neck.”

Finally, they left the studio’s wrap party. Bogie walking her to her car in the parking lot. “I thought he was gonna take me home and fuck me in the ass,” she recalled. “But he didn’t. At my car, he gave me a long, lingering French kiss and told me he’d call me tomorrow after I gave him my phone number. I never expected to hear from him again. Nor did I expect him to take advantage of that subtle invitation to sex I gave him—that is, if you call grabbing& his crotch subtle.”

To her surprise, Bogie did call the next day, and they agreed to meet for lunch at the Smoke House, a popular actors' hangout across from Warner Brothers. He was already into his second martini when she came in, sliding into a booth alongside him. They talked only briefly of the night before, as he placed an order for his typical ham and eggs.

He got to the point quickly. "Where do you live and how do I get there?"

She explained that she and her husband, Robert Peterson, lived on Roselli Street in Burbank, and that he was away until six o'clock in the evening.

Within an hour of her return home, she spotted Bogie arriving at her house in his Jaguar XK-120.

"He walked so briskly to my door that he looked like an eager schoolboy about to lose his virginity," she said.

Within fifteen minutes inside the house, he had ushered her into the bedroom. It was the beginning of an affair that, with some interruptions, would last until 1955.

After that successful debut—"Bogie was a great lover"—he slipped off to see Verita whenever he could. "I feared the neighbors would spot him coming to see me and tell my husband about it," she said. "After all, Casablanca had made him one of the most recognizable faces in the world."

Indeed her worst nightmare came true. "No, it wasn't my worst nightmare. My greatest fear was that Mayo Methot would catch us. She was a stick of dynamite waiting to explode."

One afternoon after love-making, Verita feared that Bogie was too drunk to drive home. She put on a pot of coffee and led him into the shower. They both got into the booth together, and she turned on the cold water.

"At that moment my husband Bob came home early and caught us," she said. "He'd been tipped off by a nosey neighbor."

Still drunk under the cold shower, Bogie started attacking Bob for being "a son of bitch barging into a ladies' toilet."

"Bob didn't exactly see it that way," Verita said. "After all, I was his naked wife showering with not just another man, but the Humphrey Bogart, world famous movie star."

"Fortunately Bob wasn't a violent man," she said. "After storming and yelling, he barged out of the house. My marriage was over at that point. Actually, it'd been over for a long time."

She later claimed that "Bob could have ruined Bogie's divorce by getting us some unwanted front-page headlines, but he didn't."

Before the Petersons could file for divorce, Bob was drafted into the Army. They would remain married in name only until the end of World War II, at which time he filed for divorce, never naming Bogie as the reason why.

"My affair with Bogie continued," she said.

In the wake of Pearl Harbor, with Nazi U-boats taking a horrible toll on Allied shipping, especially on the run to Murmansk, Russia, Jack Warner had an idea. “Let’s make a movie about our Merchant Marines.”

He called in producer Jerry Wald who assigned John Howard Lawson to write the script based on a novel by Guy Gilpatric.

Bogie’s long-time director, Lloyd Bacon, was assigned to help the picture, to be called Action in the North Atlantic (1943).

Bogie had accepted the assignment before filming Casablanca. Like so many of his pre- Casablanca assignments, he was a second choice.

Bogie went into a rage when he picked up a copy of the Hollywood Reporter and read that Edward G. Robinson and George Raft were to star in the picture. When both stars pulled out, the role went to Bogie—“sloppy seconds again”—and Raymond Massey.

Bogie was very avant-garde in casting, telling The Pittsburgh Courier on September 26, 1942 that he felt an African American should play the ship’s captain. Most WWII films rarely gave lead roles to blacks. “In the world of the theater or any other phase of American life,” Bogie said, “the color of a man’s skin should have nothing to do with his rights in a land built on the self-evident fact that all men are created equal.”

Bacon directed Massey as Captain Steve Jarvis, with Bogie as his chief executive officer, Joe Rossi. For Bogie’s love interest, Julie Bishop was assigned.

Bogart with Raymond Massey

Bogie was surprised that Warners didn’t assign him a bigger name. Colorado-born Jacqueline Wells acted under her real name until 1941 when she changed it to Julie Bishop. She’d been a child actress in silent movies, appearing with Mary Pickford and Clara Bow.

Reasonably attractive, though not stunning in any way, she intrigued Bogie at first. “I made a pass at her but she didn’t receive it,” Bogie told director Lloyd Bacon.

Perhaps the reason for that was that she’d met her second husband, Clarence Shoop, a pilot, while filming the 1943 Princess O’Rourke with Olivia de Havilland.

“I thought while hubbie was up there in those blue skies, wifie would want a little male companionship down here on the ground,” Bogie said. “Where have gals like Ann Sheridan and Claire Trevor gone? Some of these actresses today at Warners are too tightly wound.”

Ruth Gordon, Bogie’s friend from “way back when,” was cast as Massey’s wife. Seeing her after a long time, Bogie came up to her, “Ruthie,” he said, “you look younger than the day I meet you. But I’ve always wanted to ask you something. Did we ever have sex back in the 1920s?”

“I’ll never tell,” she said, kissing him on the mouth.

Those future stars of tomorrow that Bogie feared as he neared fifty were popping up. He met Bernard Zanville who had the seventh lead.

Bogie liked Zanville even though at one point the lowly actor shouted at him, “You son of a bitch! You just don’t know your lines!”

Bogie not only forgave him for his outburst but suggested that he change his name to Dane Clark, and not “Brick Bernard,” as Warners had wanted. As Dane Clark, future movie star, the actor became known as “the poor man’s Bogart.”

Robert Mitchum, a future superstar, had one line of dialogue in the movie. Since he couldn’t support himself, he was hustling Clifton Webb on the side. Webb kept his private homosexual life from Bogie.

“Webby and I never spoke of such things,” Bogie told Verita Peterson.

Warners built a replica of a ten-thousand ton tanker on its sound stages. Wartime security restrictions would not allow movies to be filmed on vessels on the open seas.

Bacon had been the head of the U.S. Navy’s photo unit during World War
I. In Action in the North Atlantic, he used real live war combat footage.

At one point Bogie and Massey were drinking and watching stunt men& rehearse their escape from a burning vessel after it was torpedoed by the& Germans.

Dane Clark
(aka Bernard Zanville)

As Massey later related, “Bogie, after his fourth martini, faced me with that ‘Play it again, Sam’ look and said, “come to think of it, I guess I’m braver than you.’”

“Maybe so,” Massey said. “Are we going to let two men risk their lives to make us look good?”

“Are we men or mice?” Bogie asked. Bacon warned them, “If either of you idiots gets fried, it’ll be your fault and I’ll rewrite the script.”

The shot was potentially dangerous to its stars. As Massey later recalled, “The burning tanker was really terrifying, to actors as well as audiences. The effect was achieved by dozens of gas jets controlled through a set of valves which looked like an organ console. This was operated by the so-called “smokebun,” who could play his valves with such skill that the actors seemed to walk through the flames. And that’s what Bogie and I did. I got through the flames, but Bogie got his pants caught on fire, and we had to rip them off him. The director got what he wanted, even though Bogie was almost turned into a human torch.”

Midway through the filming, Bacon’s contract expired, and Jack Warner didn’t renew it. Bacon walked off the job, and Jerry Wald hastily hired Byron Haskin to finish the shoot.

Franklin D. Roosevelt introduced the movie in a prologue, declaring “DAMN THE TORPEDOES, FULL SPEED AHEAD.”

Massey would make one more picture with Bogie, Chain Lightning in 1950, co-starring Eleanor Parker. In that one, Bogie was cast as a WWII bomber pilot, with Massey playing a jet manufacturer loosely based on Howard Hughes.

In a 1943 release, Thank Your Lucky Stars, Bogie appeared as himself in a “Calvacade of Stars” benefit. It reunited him with many Warner stars with whom he’d worked before—Bette Davis,& Errol Flynn, Joan Leslie, Ida Lupino, Dennis& Morgan, and even S.Z. Sakall from& Casablanca.

Bogie’s friend, Mark Hellinger, produced this WWII distraction, which included appearances by John Garfield and Olivia de Havilland, both of them playing themselves.

In a patriotic skit, “tough guy” Bogie is intimidated by roly-poly “Cuddles” Sakall.

At long last Bogie was able to fulfill his commitment to Columbia when he starred in Sahara (1943), a World War II action picture supposedly depicting the battlefields of the Sahara in North Africa. Actually, it was filmed in the desert of California. Originally Sahara had been cast with Melvyn Douglas and Glenn Ford in the lead roles.

Saying good-bye to Verita in Burbank, Bogie headed for what he called “a God forsaken hell-hole,” a reference to Brawley, California, which lies in the harsh Borego Desert of the Imperial Valley north of the Mexican border. The temperatures and the terrain evoked conditions in the Sahara desert, the setting for this war-time drama.

The script was based on a 1937 Russian film, The Thirteen, and it evoked another film, John Ford's The Lost Patrol (1934). That film had starred Victor McLaglen and Boris Karloff.

Bogie's action picture showed a British-American unit stranded in the Sahara in the path of the oncoming Nazi infantry. Bogie, cast in the lead, played Sergeant Joe Gunn. The picture was directed by Zoltan Korda, who was the middle brother of filmmakers Alexander and Vincent Korda, all born in Hungary.

A former cavalry officer, Korda specialized in military action and adventure films, many of which were filmed in Africa or India. His greatest cinematic triumph was the 1939 The Four Feathers, starring Sir Ralph Richardson. He both directed and wrote the screenplay for Sahara, which was produced by Bogie's pal, Mark Hellinger.

Bogie bonded with most of the cast, whom he invited to his suite at night at the seedy Planter's Hotel for some heavy drinking.

Bogie found his co-star, Bruce Bennett, fascinating. "He was my kind of guy," Bogie later recalled.

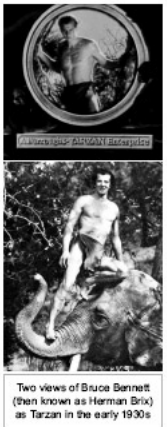
Growing up in the rugged lumber camps of Washington State, Bennett built up his physique. After playing football in the 1926 Rose Bowl, Herman Brix (his original name) won six national titles in the 1928 Olympics in the shot put category, eventually earning a Silver Medal.

He had been a screen Tarzan in the 1930s but had changed his name to Bruce Bennett when he wanted to escape the serials and become a legitimate actor.

In Gabe Essoe's book, Tarzan of the Movies, he wrote: "Brix's portrayal was the only time between the silents and the 1960s that Tarzan was accurately depicted in films. He was mannered, cultured, soft spoken, a well-educated English lord who spoke several languages—and didn't grunt."

Although she hated the blistering desert heat, Mayo Methot showed up on the set with a thermos of chilled martinis for her husband. Bennett and his wife, Jeannette, spent many nights with the Bogarts, even driving down to Mexicali with them for a picnic.

In later years, Bennett said, "We had a room next to Bogie's suite. Sometimes they'd fight all night. Many a night we heard the sounds of broken glass. Mayo was very unhappy. I think she knew she was losing her man but didn't know how to keep him. She would literally drink all day and night. Bogie did tell me that Mayo wasn't anything like the woman he'd married. 'She was very witty, very intelligent, and possessed a remarkable charm when I fell in love& with her,' he said. 'Now she's turned into a possessive, overbearing harridan.'"



Two views of Bruce Bennett (then known as Herman Brix) as Tarzan in the early 1930s

"She interrupted many a shoot," Bennett claimed. "She fought on the set with Bogie and even used her fists. She'd throw bottles at him. She gave him a big black eye and inflicted cuts on him. Korda often had to shoot around these damages that makeup couldn't hide. It became obvious to me that Mayo was mentally ill. Bogie confided to me that he thought his wife was 'a schizo'—his words—and I agreed."

“Finally, when we were alone, I asked Bogie: ‘why in hell do you stay married to someone like Mayo?’”

“I leave her for a week or so at a time,” Bogie told Bennett. “But I go back to her. On several occasions, she’s attempted suicide, and I don’t want to be responsible for her death.”

Bennett and Bogie became pals, and Bogie was instrumental in getting John Huston to cast Bennett in The Treasure of Sierra Madre (1948).

“Bogie was king of the hill at this time in his career,” said Bennett. “For the most part, he was very cooperative and friendly to the workers. But he just loved to drink. Every morning when the director came on the set, Bogie wanted to argue. Sometimes he would argue about something for an hour. It was really frustrating Korda. Finally I said to Korda, ‘Don’t you know what’s going on? Bogie drinks every night, and he needs to buy some time in the morning to get his head clear and learn his lines.’”

Born on the Mississippi River, the son of a steamer fireman on the river-boat Robert E. Lee, Rex Ingram was an African-American actor. When he met Bogie he’d finished his best known film appearance as the genie in The Thief of Baghdad (1940). He is also remembered for playing Jim, the fugitive slave, opposite Mickey Rooney in The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1939).

To Bogie’s surprise, he found that Ingram was a licensed physician, like Bogie’s late father.

In 1949 Ingram pleaded guilty to a charge of violating the Mann Act when he transported a teenage girl to New York “for immoral purposes,” and drew an eighteen-month jail sentence.

Bogie liked Ingram and visited him in prison, telling him, “It’s too damn bad when a guy gets sent up the river for liking young pussy. I’ve been known to go for teenage pussy myself.”

The German-born actor Kurt Kreuger was befriended by Bogie who called him “The Kraut.” A strikingly handsome “blond God,” as the press called him, Kreuger was the third most requested male pinup at 20th Century& Fox, after Tyrone Power and John Payne. He complained to Bogie that he was going to have to go through all the war movies of the 1940s being typecast as a Nazi.

Two views of Rex Ingram (lower photo) as the Genie of the Lamp in Thief of Baghdad

As quoted in the San Francisco Chronicle, Kreuger said, “I was running across the dunes when Tambul [Rex Ingram] jumped on top of me and pressed my head into the sand to suffocate me. Only Korda forgot to yell cut, and Ingram was so emotionally caught up in the scene that he kept pressing my face harder and harder. Finally, I went unconscious. Nobody knew this. Even the crew was transfixed, watching this dramatic ‘killing.’ If Korda hadn’t finally said cut, as an afterthought, it would have been all over for me.”

That’s not the story Bogie told when he got back to Los Angeles. He said he came onto the set and immediately saw what was happening. “I was the one who called cut. If I hadn’t, The Kraut would have bit the dust in more ways than one.”

Another member of the cast, Dan Duryea, who had graduated from Cornell University in 1928, had made his name on Broadway in the play Dead End. Ironically, Bogie had starred in the film version.

Veteran Character Actors

Duryea was one of those "stars of tomorrow" that Bogie dreaded to meet, but he got along with him. The actor would go on to demonstrate a certain villainy on the screen.

When he had a brief fling with actress/girl about town Liz Renay, Duryea said, "I looked at my nude body in a full-length mirror. Ugly puss. So-so dick. A 155-pound weakling. No leading man. So I decided right there and then to become the meanest SOB in movies."

Like other actors such as Dane Clark, Duryea also became known as "the poor man's Bogart."

Bogie also bonded with Lloyd Bridges, the California-born actor who is best known today for his role of Mike Nelson in Sea Hunt, which was the top American TV series in 1958. "He was no dumb actor," Bogie said. "You could have a real conversation with this fucker,"

Shortly after making Sahara, Bridges left Columbia to enlist in the U.S. Coast Guard.

Near the end of the shoot, Methot was back in Los Angeles, as was Bridges' wife, Dorothy Simpson, whom he had married in 1938. Bogie invited him one night to drive across the Mexican border to sample the wares in a bordello.

"I picked the wrong chick," Bridges later said. "I got the clap. Bogie got a clean one and emerged unharmed. Perhaps he had so much alcohol in his body it killed all VD germs."

Bogie also liked character actor J. Carrol Naish, who, although of Irish descent, always ended up playing Latin, Arab, or East Indian characters. The year Bogie met him, he was also cast as Dr. Daka, the first villain to go up against Batman on the silver screen in the serial The Batman (1943).

For his appearance in Sahara, Naish would be nominated for an Academy Award as Best Supporting Actor, losing as did Claude Rains himself (Casablanca), to Charles Coburn in The More the Merrier.

When Bogie and Bennett had their final drink together at the wrap party for Sahara, Bogie said, "I'm a professional. I've done pretty well, don't you think? I've survived in a pretty tough business."

Bennett claimed that, "Part of his survival was due to his great talent and his determination to pay the price, any price, for success. But certainly some credit must be given to Dame Fortune and timing, as well."

Shooting ended in April, and Bogie returned from the desert to Los Angeles. Since he didn't have to go to work until May, he spent most of his time aboard his boat, Sluggy. He developed a technique. Right before leaving for days at sea, he'd stage a big fight with Methot, then storm out of the door.

Sailing Sluggy in the Pacific, he'd spend the nights in the arms of Verita.

Events were spinning around Bogie's future in 1943. Often he didn't know what they were, although his life would be affected by them.

While he was in the Imperial Valley shooting Sahara, the March issue of Harper's Bazaar fashion magazine came out. Its cover featured "Betty Bacal" an eighteen-year-old blonde from New York, who had a sultry, come-hither look. The magazine generated inquiries from Howard Hughes, who probably wanted to seduce her, David O. Selznick, and Columbia Pictures. But it was Howard Hawks, a Warner Brothers director, who ended up putting her under personal contract.

In the closing days of the shoot of Sahara, Betty Bacal (later changed to Lauren Bacall) arrived in Hollywood.

As Bacall settled into a new life, Mary Baker, still Bogie's agent and "guardian angel," negotiated a new contract for him at Warner Brothers that paid him $3,500 a week.

Production was set to begin in May on Bogie's next film, Passage to Marseille (1944). For some odd reason, the "s" was left out of the name of this Provençal city, and no one caught it.

Back in Burbank and with Robert Peterson away at war, Bogie spent many a night at Verita's home. His separation from Methot often stretched out for a week at a time. Sometimes she'd chase him from the house with an iron skillet.

"There was many a night he would arrive drunk on my doorstep at two or three o'clock in the morning, having fled from Methot," Verita said. "Once he escaped his house wearing nothing but his underwear. He always kept his keys in his car in case he had to make a fast getaway."

Inevitably the talk was of marriage. "He told me that he wanted to marry me as soon as I divorced Bob and he divorced Methot. I had reservations, but planned to go through with the marriage. We were in love with each other. I thought that once married to him I could straighten him out."

"All during the war, I couldn't file divorce charges against Bob," Verita said. "What could I do? Charge him with adultery? I also feared a scandal that would damage Bogie's career. Also I didn't want to call Methot's attention to me. If I did, she might show up at my doorstep with an ax. I was in a real dilemma. Bob thought I'd get over Bogie and would settle down to become his hausfrau when he came marching home."

"Bogie was talking with lawyers about divorcing Methot, and he urged me nightly to divorce Bob," Verita said. "Still, I held back. We began to fight and argue about our mutual divorces—not the brutal fights he and Methot had. All this fighting was putting a serious strain on our romance, except when we were sailing aboard Sluggy, as we did every weekend."

As Verita related in her memoirs, she claimed that one night they were sitting and drinking at her kitchen table. She said, "I told him he had lousy taste in wives, and that he chose them as a fighter would choose sparring partners. I also told him that he drank too much and that I drank too much when I was with him, and I told him that maybe our fiery natures were too combustible for marriage. I wasn't sure I could live with some of his characteristics, such as needling people to the brink of fight or flight."

The end result of that night in the kitchen led to an agreement between the two of them not to see each other until their divorce papers were filed. That way, she claimed, there would be no chance of her being named as a correspondent in his divorce proceedings against Methot.

Bogie agreed but in the weeks ahead he called several times and wanted to renegotiate their agreement. But she remained steadfast, and he respected their deal.

Actor Leslie Howard Reported Lost With Big British Airplane

LONDON, June 3.—(AP)—British overseas transport plane, with actor Leslie Howard reported among its 13 passengers, was officially declared overdue and presumed lost today after reporting in a final message yesterday that it was being attacked by enemy aircraft while enroute from Lisbon to England.

Leslie Howard

Years later in New Orleans, Verita claimed, “It was the worst mistake of my life. I almost set up a situation where he’d meet some other dame. Separation seemed right at the time, but I was wrong. I blew my chance to become the fourth Mrs. Humphrey Bogart, and I have no one else to blame but myself. For Bogie and me, it was the final curtain. Or so I thought at the time. But life moves in very unpredictable ways. I never dreamed that what would happen between us would actually happen.”

Although Bogie hadn’t seen Leslie Howard in many months, the two actors still wrote each other. “I loved the man and would always be grateful to him,” Bogie said.

On June 2, 1943, Bogie received the shocking news.

On a KLM/BOAC flight from Lisbon to Bristol, England, the plane carrying Howard had been shot down by a German Junkers-JU 88 aircraft over the Bay of Biscay. All passengers aboard had lost their lives.

There were rumors that the Nazis believed that Winston Churchill, who had been in Algiers, was on board. In his autobiography, Churchill expressed that a mistake about his activities might have cost Howard his life.

Subsequent research does not verify Churchill’s belief. Other authors have concluded that the Germans wanted to shoot down the plane in order to kill Howard himself. His intelligence-gathering activities had come to their attention. It is also believed that the Nazis wanted to demoralize Britain with the loss of one of its most outspoken and patriotic figures.

The Nazi high command knew the whereabouts of Churchill at the time of the attack on Howard’s plane. Also, they were hardly naïve enough to believe that the war-time prime minister would be traveling alone aboard an unescorted and unarmed civilian aircraft when both the secrecy and the air power of the British government were at his command.

It is believed today that the order to liquidate Howard came from Josef Goebbels himself. He had denounced the actor for “being the most dangerous propagandist in the British service.”

On hearing the news, Bogie went into a deep depression. He had his own theory as to why he thought Howard was assassinated in the air crash.

Bogart conflicting with Alexis Smith

He claimed that Howard was on a top secret mission at the bequest of Churchill to dissuade Francisco Franco, Spain's dictator, from joining the Axis with Benito Mussolini and Hitler.

Bogie may have been right. Long after Bogie's death, a Spanish writer, José Rey-Xieman, in his book El Vuelo del Ibis (The Flight of the Ibis) documents Bogie's claim of the secret mission in convincing detail.

Bogie was thrilled as he prepared to film Passage to Marseille. He would be reunited once again with "the gang"— or at least most of them— from Casablanca. But suddenly Jack Warner changed his mind and sent him a script called The Pentacle. This was a story of a man who kills his wife after their fifth wedding anniversary. At the time Bogie was trying to establish himself as a romantic hero on the screen or else an action hero. He did not want to return to the role of a villain, especially one who murders his wife.

Steve Trilling had become Jack Warner's executive assistant, and Bogie called him to denounce both the storyline and his part in it.

Trilling reminded him that he had promised "greater cooperation" after signing a fat seven-year contract. "This part has George Raft written all over it," Bogie said. "Give him my sloppy seconds."

Trilling promised rewrites. Bogie told him if they met his specifications, then he would agree to postpone Passage to Marseille and film The Pentacle.

When the rewrites arrived, Bogie discovered that it was still basically the same script with him playing the wife killer "with no motivation."

"I won't film this fucker," Bogie told Trilling. "You're an asshole to send it to me." He slammed down the phone.

Bogie's new contract had brought him a huge financial gain, but it did not bring him script approval. Jack Warner had refused to grant that.

Warner dug in his heels and got tough with tough guy Bogart. The studio had changed the film's title from the God-awful The Pentacle to the more commercial Conflict, but the weak plot remained unchanged.

Warner issued a threat to Bogie that he'd replace him in Passage to Marseille with French actor Jean Gabin.

Even a threatening call from Jack Warner refused to make Bogie change his mind. It became a battle of wills between a gigantic star and a studio head.

Exasperated, Warner slammed down the phone on Bogie but not before issuing a warning: "You'd better watch it that you don't get your left ball caught in a wringer."

One clever telegram from Warner evoked the song from Casablanca.

Dear Rick,
You must remember this. As time goes by, you must remember your contract. Or else Ilsa may not be the only person you're telling goodbye on the tarmac.
Jack Warner.

Soonafter, Warner fired off a telegram to super-agent Charles K. Feldman, who represented Gabin, who was known at the time "as France's answer to Spencer Tracy." Gabin was made a firm offer to star in Passage to Marseille.

Warner called the next day. "Bogart, I've made stars and I can break them. Only the other day a star from way back when was trying to get me to cast him as an extra in one of our upcoming movies. You've got no hair; you've got bags under your eyes, and you've got the physique of a Nazi general who's been held in a Russian prisoner-of-war camp for two years."

Willingly agreeing to go on suspension, Bogie told Warner, "Unleash your mad dogs on me."

But by now, Warner was harboring second thoughts about the box office allure of Gabin, who was being asked to carry a $2 million picture. His box office draw, strong in his home country, was virtually nil with American audiences.

Hal Wallis was the producer of Passage to Marseille, and Bogie was caught up in a battle of egos going on between Warner and his greatest producer, Wallis. Secretly Warner had been tipped off that Wallis was in secret negotiations with Darryl F. Zanuck to move to 20th Century Fox.

Warner fired off a telegram to Wallis, warning him that, "I, Jack Warner, am in charge of production at Warner Brothers, and I do not want any executive producer taking undue credit for my achievements."

Two weeks later, the agent, Feldman, responded to Warner's offer. "Gabin has refused the role in the Marseille picture. He did suggest that an S be added to the spelling of one of his favorite French cities."

Because of his loyalty to Bogie, Sydney Greenstreet announced that, based on the studio's bad treatment of Bogie, that he was considering pulling out of both Passage to Marseille and Conflict, as he'd been cast in each of them.

At the last minute, Bogie caved in. Shooting began on Conflict, starring Alexis Smith.

Originally Joan Crawford was slated for the female lead, that of Bogie's first wife. She read the script and sent word to Warners: "Joan Crawford never dies in her movies, and she never loses her man to anyone." She wrote that before Mildred Pierce, of course, in which she loses Zachary Scott to her own daughter, played by Ann Blyth.

Greenstreet came back on board when Bogie agreed to do the film.

Once again Bogie was reunited with Rose Hobart, with whom he'd worked before. She recalled that Methot arrived on the set to celebrate the fifth anniversary of her marriage to Bogie. "There was a certain irony here," Hobart& said, "since the plot concerned a man plotting to kill his wife on their fifth anniversary. I found it amazing that the Bogarts had not killed themselves a long time ago."

Bogart with Methot in 1944

As soon as Bogie completed Conflict, he rushed to the set of Passage to Marseille (1944), where he was reunited with many of his Casablanca stars, including director Michael Curtiz.

Missing was Ingrid Bergman. The French actress, Michèle Morgan, who had originally been asked to play Ilsa, was his female co-star. Although a stunning beauty, she and Bogie did not make sparks on the screen in this lackluster gathering of the clan.

Casey Robinson, one of the scripters for Casablanca, worked on the screenplay with Jack Moffitt, based on a novel Men Without Country. This was another World War II drama, depicting a Devil's Island escape marred by a flashback-within-flashback confusion. As WWII films go, it was not bad, but a disappointment considering the collective talent of its Casablanca stars that included Claude Rains, Sydney Greenstreet, Peter Lorre, and Helmut Dantine.

"Bogart was a difficult man to relate to," Morgan said. "He was polite, but always seemed to have his guard up. I knew he was in an unhappy marriage. He appeared every morning on the set with an awful hangover. He was very hard to direct, and argued constantly with Curtiz."

Director Howard Hawks, who had cast Bogie in the lead for To Have and Have Not, his upcoming picture, brought his new discovery, Betty Bacal (to be billed as Lauren Bacall) to the set of Passage to Marseille.

She would recall the moment in her memoirs, Lauren Bacall By Myself. Hawks wanted to determine if there was any chemistry between his star and the young actress. He introduced Bacall to Bogie.

She wrote: "There was no clap of thunder, no lightning bolts, just a simple how do you do. Bogart was slighter than I imagined—five feet ten and a half, wearing his costume of no-shape trousers, cotton shirt, and scarf around neck. Nothing of import was said—we didn't stay long—but he seemed a friendly man."

Bacall may have had visions of appearing opposite Cary Grant, Tyrone Power, or Charles Boyer. Reportedly, she had not been impressed with Bogie on screen.

Lauren Bacall
Young, so very young

Biographer Joe Hyams quotes her as saying, "When Hawks said the star would be Bogart, I was disappointed and thought, 'How awful to be in a picture with that mug; that illiterate. He must not have a brain in his head. He won't be able to think or talk about anything.'"

Hawks had acquired the rights to the Ernest Hemingway novel, To Have and Have Not. He had long wanted to make a movie out of it, which he planned to both produce and direct.

He hoped to introduce Lauren Bacall to movie audiences, along with a supporting cast that included crusty old Walter Brennan and even Hoagy Carmichael.

The upcoming release of Passage to Marseille sparked controversy before it was shipped around the world. The domestic version showed footage of Bogie, in an act of vengeance, shooting down unarmed Nazi pilots escaping from their downed plane. The U.S. Office of War Information asked Jack Warner to cut this violent footage before sending the film abroad. Warner agreed, but told the office that Warner Brothers would retain the scene for domestic consumption within the United States.

Because of its broad similarities to Casablanca, including a recycling of most of its cast, Passage to Marseille did mediocre business, although most reviewers concluded, "It is no Casablanca."

Conflict, as Bogie had predicted, was a disaster of a film, as reflected by the poor box office. On viewing the movie, Jack Warner realized he'd made a mistake by forcing Bogie into the role. He delayed Conflict 's release for two years.

An early morning call came in for Bogie, who was staying anonymously at a small hotel in West Hollywood. It was from Methot, who had somehow found out where he was lodging. “I’ve cut my wrists,” she shouted to him when he picked up the phone. “I’m bleeding to death.”

In his pajamas and a robe, he drove to their home where he rushed upstairs to the bedroom. She hadn’t lied to him. Her wrists had been slit. He called immediately for an ambulance.

No one knows the exact details of what happened next, and neither Bogie nor Methot volunteered any information. It was an embarrassing incident that the Warners publicity department rushed to suppress from the newspapers.

The end result of that suicide attempt led to Bogie moving back in with Methot, much to the chagrin of Verita.

After Methot recovered, Bogie told Michael Curtiz, “The old men declare the wars, then send the young men off to get killed. I want to do something for the war effort.”

He asked Jack Warner if he could apply to the Hollywood Victory Committee and take his month-long vacation entertaining the troops overseas. Seeing the publicity value of such a tour, Warner agreed to it, not realizing that Bogie planned to take along the emotionally unstable Methot.

After an investigation from the F.B.I. cleared him of any Communism connections—once again—he was scheduled to travel abroad with his wife.

Bogie told Peter Lorre, “Here we are fighting Hitler and the Japs, but all the War Department is concerned with is do I have any Communist connections. Russia is our ally in this war. Why don’t they ask if I’m a Nazi spy? There’s word out there that Errol Flynn is flirting with some Nazis, although I find that hard to believe.”

In November of 1944, with the war still raging in Europe, Bogie, along with Methot, began a ten-week tour of North Africa, West Africa, and Southern Italy. Their itinerary would transit across 35,000 miles of war-torn terrain.

Along with the unhappily married couple were actor Don Cummings and accordionist Ralph Hark. Bogie dubbed them “The Filthy Four.” Guest appearances before thousands of GIs began with a local band playing “As Time Goes By.” The Casablanca legend was already in the making.

Onstage during some of the troop entertainments, Bogie apologized for not being “a dancing fool” like James Cagney in Yankee Doodle Dandy. “Edward G. Robinson claims he had the most beautiful legs at Warners in the 1930s,” Bogie told the audience. That line always got a big laugh. “Not having gams like Robinson, I can’t show off my toothpick legs, but I’ll bring out my wife who was a Broadway stage beauty. Mayo Methot.”

Methot usually got heavy applause, and she sang some blues numbers and show tunes from Broadway of the 1920s. Her favorite song for entertaining the battle-weary troops was “More Than You Know.”

Bogart and Methot
Offstage and rowdy during a USO tour

From Berlin, Joseph Goebbels broadcast an attack on Bogie, referring to him as one of America’s most noted gangsters before he entered into films, perhaps confusing his past with that of George Raft’s. “That Humphrey Bogart is the best that America has to send abroad clearly demonstrates the complete breakdown of American morals,” Goebbels charged. “Under the dire command of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the whoremonger in the White House, the Americans are destined to lose the war.”

When Bogie landed in the actual city of Casablanca, GIs recognized him, each one demanding, “Show me the way to Rick’s. Is my first drink on the house?”

An officer in charge of their tour wrote back to his home in Pennsylvania. “The Battle of North Africa took on new meaning with the arrival of The Battling Bogarts. They are a disaster. They’re polite to each other on stage, but off stage they’re killers.”

One infantryman insulted Bogie by asking him, “Couldn’t Warner Brothers have sent Ann Sheridan instead of you and that wife of yours?”

“See that scar on my lip?” Bogie asked the soldier. “Do you want one for yourself? Back off!”

Freezing in the cold and in his long johns, Bogie with Methot arrived in newly liberated Naples to perform their show in the San Carlo Opera House, which had been spared during the many Allied bombing raids which rained destruction down around it.

Looking like a combat veteran himself, Bogie appeared on stage, hawking his tough guy image.& “Listen, you guys, I’m& formin’ a gang to take back& to Chicago. Any of you guys& wanna go back with me?”

Methot and Bogart
Hung over and on tour with the USO

No one laughed. The audience was filled with troops who were surviving on “inhuman rations” and often freezing in the winter cold. On a brief four-day leave, they were going to be sent back to fight Germans, and many expected the only way they’d see Chicago, or their hometown in America, was feet first.

When their supply of liquor ran out, the Bogarts switched to cognac, which Methot likened to rancid olive oil. “But we guzzled the stuff.”

Methot later claimed that "I fell in love with Bogie all over again when we were visiting wounded soldiers in a hospital outside Naples. One guy had had both legs and an arm amputated."

"The soldier from his hospital bed looked into Bogie's eyes and asked him, 'Will my gal still accept me like this?'" Methot said.

"She'll not only accept you but love you more than ever," Bogie assured the twenty-two-year-old.

In letters back home, Methot said, "We slept in blankets on the floor; we bounced in Jeeps for endless hours over incredibly rough roads; we trudged through mud, and we still did our stuff."

Bogie virtually had to offer a bribe to get a bed for Methot and himself in the Army's VIP Hotel in Naples. One officer reported that the Bogarts, back from an all-night party with the troops, had guns and started shooting up the hotel in the early morning hours. The sleeping officers at first thought it was an attack from the Nazis.

One general in his boxer shorts removed the guns from the Bogarts and asked them to check out.

Northeast of Naples in Caserta, the Bogarts had a reunion with Captain John Huston. Bogie renewed his friendship with the director, who was always contemptuous of Methot. He called her "The Rosebud."

Jealous of the camaraderie between Bogie and Huston, Methot tried to take over the reunion. She rose to sing.

"She was drunk," Huston recalled. "She couldn't sing. Everything off key. It was humiliating for Bogie to sit through it and have me sit through it."

Later in his film, Key Largo, starring Bogie, Huston would insert a similar scene, when he had Edward G. Robinson force Claire Trevor to sing off key.

When they returned to Naples, Bogie and Methot checked into a seedy hotel, where they staged a raucous all-night party for enlisted men. The noise was so loud that a general, lodging in a room across the hallway, knocked on their door. He ordered Bogie and Methot to go to bed and tell their guests to leave.

When Bogie refused, the general politely asked him again.

This time Bogie told the general to "fuck off." The next morning Bogie and Methot received a notice to leave Naples at once on the next available Army transport.

They reached New York on the cold, rainy morning of February 15, 1944.

Arriving exhausted after a grueling flight, the Bogarts checked into the Gotham Hotel on Fifth Avenue. Jack Warner himself stayed there on his visits to New York. A wire was waiting for Bogie to report to Warners for the start of To Have and Have Not.

Bogie was in no condition to return to the Warner sound stages in California. He was also drinking heavily and needed a vacation. Instead of responding to the urgent request from Warner Brothers and Howard Hawks, he sent a telegram to Peter Lorre instead. "Mayo and I have the distinction of being thrown off two continents," it said.

Beginning at around midnight, the Bogarts wrecked their hotel suite, tossing lamps and furniture around. They woke up everyone on their floor. The manager was summoned from his bed to confront them. He asked them to check out at once and pay damages.

Bogie refused. The bill for damages was later sent to Warner Brothers. The studio chief ordered that the amount be deducted from Bogie's weekly salary.

Leaving an angry, confrontational Methot to face the hotel manager, Bogie fled the building without telling his wife where he was going. She was alarmed that in his drunken state, he might get run over in New York's wartime traffic.

Returning, eventually, to the Gotham the following morning in time to check out at nine o'clock, Bogie faced Methot. She demanded to know, "What whore did you sleep with last night?"

For the first time in his relationship, Bogie decided to tell her the truth. "Helen Menken," he said calmly. "I asked her to remarry me after my divorce from you comes through." At that point, what remained of their hotel suite was wrecked.

Word arrived once again from Jack Warner, demanding that Bogie return to Burbank at once, since shooting on To Have and Have Not could not be delayed any longer. The studio chief threatened to hold Bogie personally responsible for the cost of any further delays on the picture.

Defiantly, Bogie sent word that he planned to remain in New York "with my divorced first wife, Miss Helen Menken, Broadway star."

Warner even threatened the Army that it would no longer send stars on USO tours if Bogart wasn't returned immediately. Then the studio chief was informed that Bogie was still under military jurisdiction. The Army issued orders for Bogie to fly immediately to Los Angeles.

Because of wartime conditions, there were no flights available. Bogie, along with Methot, was booked on the train, the Twentieth Century Limited. The reservations were for Thursday night. At the last minute Bogie bolted. No one could find him.

A call from the Army to Menken's apartment brought her to the phone. She denied having any knowledge of his whereabouts. Of course, she could have been covering for him, and no doubt was.

Methot was waiting at Grand Central Station Thursday night hoping Bogie would appear. Extreme manipulation and endless phone conversations had transpired behind the scenes. At one point Warner had threatened to sue him for breach of contract.

Two minutes before the train was set to leave the station, Bogie appeared without any explanation to Methot about where he'd been.

In Chicago, Howard Hawks, the director of To Have and Have Not, had a telegram delivered to Bogie's compartment on the train.

"We have an exciting new girl I want to appear opposite you in our film," he wrote. "Anxiously awaiting your arrival at Union Station when the train pulls into Los Angeles."

On the train heading west, Bogie was grumpy. He complained to Methot, "Hawks has lined up what he calls his protégée. We know what protégée means. He's cast some unknown teenage pussy opposite me. God damn, the bastard. That means I'll have to carry the picture on my own. He wants some of my major stardom to rub off on his latest crush."

When I agreed to do this God damn picture, I was told that Ann Sheridan was to be my co-star," Bogie said. "Now I get this schoolgal and clothes model. Just my fucking luck. Warner is sticking it up my ass once again."

Co-starring Bogie and Methot, a three-minute short film, Report from the Front (1944), was released in theaters across the country. Its sponsor was the Red Cross Drive Committee of the Motion Picture Industry, and the distributor was National Screen Service. The film begins with the arrival in North Africa of the Bogarts on December 11, 1943, for their three-month tour entertaining the troops. They are shown visiting Army camps, military bases, hospitals, and field units.

Bogie handled the narration and issued an appeal for donations for the war effort.

Report from the Front marked the last screen appearance of Mayo Methot.

Before a final casting decision was made about who would play the female lead in To Have and Have Not, Howard Hawks asked Lauren Bacall to do a screen test. It was with the actor John Ridgely, who was under contract for Warners.

Hawks wanted the scene “to be special” in his words, and he had written it himself. It became known as “the whistle scene.” In time it would become her most famous scene among her many screen appearances.

The lines were provocative.

At the doorway, as she is about to leave the room, she asks the main character.

“You know how to whistle, don’t you, Steve? You just put your lips together and blow.”

Days after filming her screen test, she was told that Bogie had seen it. She feared his reaction.

Called to lunch with Hawks, she headed for his bungalow at the appointed time. Just as she was heading for the door, it opened. Bogie appeared. Having met with the director, he was just leaving.

This was her second meeting with the star. He appeared to evaluate her more carefully this time, taking in her tawny blonde hair, her triangular catlike face, and her penetrating green eyes.

Finally, he spoke, “I saw your test. We’ll have a lot of fun.”

And so they did.

AMERICAN ICONS:
BOGIE AND BACALL

EPILOGUE

William Faulkner, "out of print and out of work," was hired by Howard Hawks to work on the script of Ernest Hemingway's To Have and Have Not. To the chagrin of his rival, Hemingway, Faulkner contributed greatly to the snappy dialogue, much of it emerging from the beautiful lips of Lauren Bacall, who was cast as Marie ("Slim") Browning.

Critics claimed that To Have and Have Not was Hemingway's worst novel. When the Bogie/Bacall movie was released, other critics called it Hawks' version of Casablanca.

Cast as a tough skipper-for-hire guy named Harry Morgan, Bogie in the plot reluctantly becomes involved with the French Resistance. He also woos an equally tough character, as played by Bacall.

Hawks would later claim, "It wasn't Bacall that Bogie fell for; it was the character of Marie. She had to play Marie for the rest of her life. She should have fallen for me."

In their love scenes, you can practically see Bacall and Bogart falling in love for real. When she saw the movie, Methot agreed with that assessment. "Bogie's no good on the screen in love scenes. But in To Have and Have Not, it was clear to me he wasn't faking that kissing just for the camera."

Dolores Moran, who had fourth billing, had been cast as the lead actress, but her part was reduced to give Bacall more screen time.

Moran, along with Bacall, was promoted as a new screen personality. Bacall made it; Moran did not. A popular pin-up girl, she never struck it big in movies, although she appeared in major films such as Yankee Doodle Dandy with James Cagney and Old Acquaintance with Bette Davis.

Moran languished in Hollywood, working sporadically. Near the end of her life in 1982, she claimed, "Had it not been for Lauren Bacall, I too might have become a screen legend. She stole not only Bogie, but my thunder. Had she not come along, I know Bogie would have fallen for me. I was his type."

In 1944 as February (a leap year) moved into spring, the forty-four-year-old Bogie fell in love with the nineteen-year-old Bacall. They didn't mean to—it just happened.

Bogart with Bacall

During the shoot, Methot turned forty, but her beauty had disappeared somewhere in a bottle of Scotch. She'd gotten fat and no longer went to the hairdresser. Often she appeared without make-up, making her look even older than she was.

The immaculately groomed Bacall, in contrast, was the epitome of New York chic, looking for the most part as if she stepped from the pages of Harper's Bazaar.

During the early days of her courtship with Bogie, Bacall met him in the shadows, keeping their love affair a secret, although Hawks was aware of it from the very beginning.

Jack Warner told his colleagues, "In Bacall, we have another Marlene Dietrich in the making. After all, The Kraut isn't getting any younger. I hear she spends two extra hours painting her face before appearing in public."

In the wake of the success of To Have and Have Not, and Bacall's stunning screen debut, Howard Hawks cast the lovebirds in The Big Sleep (1946), with dialogue also written in part by William Faulkner, and music by Max Steiner. The third lead was played by John Ridgely, who had starred with Bacall in her screen test.

This film noir was the first movie version of Raymond Chandler's 1939 novel, featuring the character of detective Philip Marlowe. The plot was convoluted, and many fans did not fully understand it but went to see it because of the "Bogie and Bacall" phenomenon. Even the original author, Raymond Chandler, couldn't figure out who the murderer was.

Because of Bogie's ongoing affair with Bacall and his marital problems, his drinking became even heavier during the shoot and on some days he was unable to work.

When Chandler saw the finished cut, he claimed that Martha Vickers had delivered such an intense performance that she overshadowed Bacall. That led to much of Vickers' work ending up on the cutting room floor. She never forgave Hawks for that.

A stellar supporting cast was lined up for The Big Sleep, including Dorothy Malone and Regis Toomey. Bogie was reunited with Elisha Cook Jr.

If such a thing were possible, Methot increased her own consumption of alcohol. During one fight with Bogie, she fell down and broke her foot. Recovering in bed, and furious at the news of Bogie's affair with Bacall, she called her rival at three o'clock one morning in October. "Listen, you Jewish bitch—who's going to wash his socks? Are you? Are you going to take care of him?" At this point her marriage to Bogie was over except for the divorce.

On October 10, 1944, Warners announced the separation of Bogie and Methot, but, almost unbelievably, they had a reconciliation two weeks later.

On December 4, Bogie, following one of their most violent fights, ran out of the house for the final time.

At the wrap of The Big Sleep in January of 1945, Bacall returned to New York, and Bogie was hot to trot on her trail. That month he announced to columnist Earl Wilson that he and Bacall would marry.

Back in Hollywood, he filmed The Two Mrs. Carrolls (1947) with Barbara Stanwyck. This was followed by a May 10 divorce from Methot, in which she got two-thirds of his cash.

At long last, on May 21, 1945, Bogie and Bacall were married in Lucas, Ohio, on Malabar Farm, belonging to Bogie's friend, the writer Louis Bromfield, a descendant of Daniel Boone. Their honeymoon was spent cruising in Sluggy along the California coast.

By August 15, World War II was over, a Cold War about to begin. It appeared that Bogie had settled into a happy marriage. But there were complications.

It wouldn't be quite the storybook romance that publicists or even biographers have suggested.

Back in Burbank, Verita Peterson had read in the papers that Bogie was seeing a young actress named Lauren Bacall. She didn't realize the seriousness of the romance.

When his divorce from Methot came through, she thought, or at least hoped, that he might resume his relationship with her. News of his marriage to Bacall came as a shock to her.

"I was furious at first, then I cried for several days at the news," Verita said. "I took it so hard. I felt I'd been betrayed. I raged against Bacall, whom I viewed as an opportunistic Jane-come-lately. Perhaps irrationally, I did not blame Bogie for his action. It appeared that I had removed myself from the race too long. I was sick, and I hated myself for what I'd done. Now, thanks to me and my damned dispassionate reasoning, it was over. At least I thought it was over."

Three months later, a call came in from Bogie, asking her to lunch at the Smoke House where it all began. He told her he was glad to see his "sassy li'l bitch again."

(upper image) Hollywood promotes Bogie and Bacall (lower image) Verita Peterson

Before they could resume their old relationship, she had to needle Bogie the way he needled other people. "Who is this bitch anyway? Someone who just drifted into your life! A total goddamned stranger!"

Then Bogie said an amazing thing. "Pete, I've told you a hundred times. You're the only woman in my life."

Verita later said, "I started to walk out of the restaurant at that point. What did he mean that I was the only woman in his life? What about Lauren Bacall? She seemed like a woman in his life."

He tried to explain his marriage. "Okay, I did it again. I got drunk and I got married. I don't even know how the hell it all happened. But now I'm locked in again, and I gotta figure a way out of it."

She bluntly asked him, "Do you love her?"

"What the hell's love?" he asked. "We haven't a damn thing in common, and she's young enough to be my daughter."

By his third martini, Bogie made his pitch. He wanted Verita back as the keeper of his toupée. "Listen, Pete, how the hell can you go off and just leave me at the mercy of those fags over at Warners in makeup? I mean, they're prancing in and fluffing up my muff between every goddamn take."

"I knew what was coming," she later recalled. "He wanted me back to fluff his muff, but that could be taken two ways, and he meant it two ways. What surprised me was not that he pitched the ball at me but that I caught it. Without thinking I said, 'Of course, we can take up right where we left off.'"

Bogie and Bacall purchased Hedy Lamarr's secluded house called Hedgerow Farm at 2707 Benedict Canyon Road in Beverly Hills in January of 1946. At first Bogie liked the isolation of it, but in time he began to feel that "it is too remote."

Verita turned down the hairdresser job on The Big Sleep, perhaps because Bacall was in it, but she was back on board for the filming of Dead Reckoning (1947) for Columbia Pictures.

Bogie's film noir had been intended for Rita Hayworth but, because of a commitment to Orson Welles, she was not free. A sultry blonde, Lizabeth Scott, was cast instead by the director John Cromwell, Bogie's long-time friend dating back to the 1920s.

Bogie traded in his beloved Sluggy for the Santana, paying Dick Powell $50,000 for the fifty-five-foot championship racer which had once been owned by George Brent and Ray Milland.

Verita bowed out as hairdresser to Bogie on the film, Dark Passage (1947), for which he returned to the Warner Brothers lot to star with Bacall again. There, he was reunited with Bruce Bennett, who had remained one of his favorite people, and Agnes Moorehead, who had never been one of his favorite persons.

Cast as Vincent Parry, Bogie is framed for the murder of his wife. He escapes from San Quentin and alters his face with plastic surgery. The film is unusual in that the audience does not see Bogie's face until sixty-two minutes into the feature.

This is the first film in which Bogie wore a full hairpiece. It was designed by Verita, although she did not appear on the set.

For a while, Bogie was miffed that John Huston had walked out at a crucial moment during the filming of Across the Pacific. But he had to forgive him. After all, Huston was putting his life on the line to join the Army to defend his country during a time of peril. "And what were the rest of us doing?" Bogie asked. "Making bad movies about the war."

Their friendship had been renewed when Bogie and Huston met up on the battlefields of Italy. Huston had always held Mayo Methot in utter contempt, but he had nothing but praise for Bogie's fourth wife, Lauren Bacall. The Bogarts became friends with Huston and his new wife, actress Evelyn Keyes, or "Scarlett O'Hara's Younger Sister" as she called herself in her memoirs.

Upon his return from the war, Huston and Bogie would make their greatest pictures together.

For the 1948 release of The Treasure of the Sierra Madre, Huston hired his father, Walter Huston, as Bogie's co-star in a picture that became a classic.

Ronald Reagan had desperately wanted to work with Bogie, in spite of certain reservations, but he was told that Bruce Bennett had been cast as "Colt," the role Reagan coveted.

The Treasure of Sierra Madre was John Huston's first film since his return to Hollywood. The plot concerned three Americans who set out into the depths of Mexico's mountainous country to search for gold. Bogie had never looked so disheveled. A critic wrote that by the end of the film he "became frighteningly inhuman—little more than a black mask, with white eyes, and a wolf grin."

Bogie's appearance in Sierra Madre was a far cry from that "sprig of aristocracy" on Broadway who invited guests out for tennis.

For his appearance on screen, Bogie needed Verita more than ever. By the time he arrived in Mexico to shoot scenes for Sierra Madre, he was almost completely bald. He'd been taking vitamin B shots to make his hair grow back, but it never really did. He'd opt to wear a wig for the rest of his screen life.

Huston put Verita on the payroll. She fitted his toupées in Burbank, but did not go on location to Mexico to fit them on Bogie's bald head.

A mistress who endured two of Bogie's marriages: Verita Peterson Thompson

When he saw the final cut of Sierra Madre with John Huston as director and Walter Huston as co-star, Bogie said, "One Huston is bad enough, but two are murder."

Bogie heard he hadn't been nominated for his magnificent performance of Dobbs in Sierra Madre. He claimed, "I wuz robbed!"

Laurence Olivier won that year for Hamlet, competing against Lew Ayres in Johnny Belinda, Montgomery Clift in The Search, Dan Dailey in When My Baby Smiles at Me, and Clifton Webb in Sitting Pretty.

"All those guys are homosexual," Bogie said.

"Don't get me wrong. I think Webby is a great guy, but everyone nominated, according to my sources, can perform fellatio better than Nancy Davis." He was referring, of course, to starlet Nancy Davis, who would later marry Ronald Reagan.

At Oscar time, it was Walter Huston who walked off with an Academy Award for best performance of the year in a supporting role in The Treasure of the Sierra Madre.

For his next film, Key Largo (1948), John Huston teamed Bogie and Bacall again in this film noir set in the Florida Keys. Huston also reunited Edward G. Robinson with Bogie, casting Robinson as a gangster once again, this time playing Johnny Rocco, based on Al Capone.

Originally Huston had wanted Charles Boyer for the role, but Jack Warner had screamed at him that the French actor was box office poison.

In supporting roles, Huston hired Lionel Barrymore, who performed in a wheelchair. Bogie also had a reunion with Claire Trevor, with whom he'd had a brief fling years before.

Bogie was cast in a sympathetic role—no longer a gangster. He played Frank McCloud, who visits a small backwater Key Largo hotel run by Barrymore and his daughter-in-law, Nora, the widow of Frank's WWII friend. Once there, he becomes trapped n the motel which Rocco and his gang have taken over.

Although major talent was involved, Trevor would take home the Oscar as Best Supporting Actress for playing Robinson's boozy moll. Her singing "Moanin' Low" a cappella was probably the scene that won her the Oscar. The Trevor character of Gaye Dawn was based on the real-life moll, Gay Orlova, of gangster Lucky Luciano. Key Largo would mark the fourth and final pairing of Bacall and Bogie.

Despite the fact that he was deep into its shooting, Huston had not yet conceived of a logical conclusion to Key Largo. Howard Hawks came to the rescue. During the filming of To Have and Have Not with Bogie and Bacall, he had produced goodly amounts of celluloid depicting a shootout on a boat. That footage did not make it into the film's final cut.

Hawks met with Huston and showed him how the unused To Have and Have Not footage could be spliced into the footage of Key Largo for a logical conclusion. When both directors saw the final cut of Key Largo, Huston said, "My God, your half-baked idea has popped out of the oven fully baked. I love you. Thanks, pal! I'll let you kiss me with tongue to thank you."

In lieu of marriage, Bogie and Verita formalized their relationship as a business contract. In the future he'd have her written in as his personal hairdresser on all his movies. Agent Sam Jaffe drew up the contract. Beginning in 1949, she would work on all but four of Bogie's last eighteen pictures.

The contract gave her a reason to be seen in public with Bogie. Up to then, they'd had to slip around in shadows to see each other. In the future, she'd go on trips with him, arriving, for example, in New York with Bogie at her side.

When reporters inquired who she was, Bogie always said, "My hairdresser and my mistress." The newsmen thought he was joking about the mistress angle and never reported on that part of their relationship.

On December 20, 1947, Mark Hellinger had died, which ended Bogie's plans to join with him to co-produce films. Without Hellinger, he forged ahead to set up his own production company. As such, he was the first post-war actor to form his own production company, calling it Santana Productions after his boat.

By mid-year in 1948 Santana films produced Knock on Any Door for Columbia. Bogie starred with John Derek, then at his most beautiful.

The film was directed by Nicholas Ray. Bogie was cast as a lawyer, Andrew Morton, taking the case of Nick Romano (Derek), a troubled young man from the slums.

Right before his death, Hellinger had purchased the rights to Knock on Any Door and planned to star Bogie and a young Marlon Brando.

In the movie, Derek says the line that would become the clarion call for a generation of disenfranchised youth—"Live fast, die young, and leave a good-looking corpse."

Bogie referred to Nicholas Ray as "a lightning rod," and was impressed with him. The director, who would go on to helm Rebel Without a Cause with James Dean, was openly bisexual and a heavy user of drugs and alcohol. Bogie told him, "Listen, pal, I'll join you in the alcohol, but I'll have to skip out on the bisexual stuff and the drug use."

At the time Bogie meet Ray, he was married to the sultry blonde Gloria Grahame, with whom Bogie would appear in In a Lonely Place.

That same year Santana also produced Tokyo Joe co-starring Alexander Knox, Florence Marly, and Sessue Hayakawa, the silent screen actor.

Tokyo Joe was the second of two films that Bogie would make with director Stuart Heisler. The other was Chain Lightning with Eleanor Parker and Raymond Massey. Although it was wrapped in 1949, it wasn't released until 1950.

On January 6, 1949, at the age of forty-nine, Bogie became a dad. At the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital, Bacall gave birth to a six-pound, six-ounce boy, Stephen.

Bogie had wanted to star with Bacall again in the next Santana Production In a Lonely Place, a 1950 film noir, but Warner Brothers refused to lend her out. Instead, director Nicholas Ray cast his wife, Gloria Grahame.

In the film, Bogie stars as Dixon Steele, a cynical screenwriter suspected of murder. The movie, not fully appreciated at the time of its release, later became a classic.

During the shoot, Ray and Grahame became estranged. Ray came home one night and found his wife in bed with his teenage son. Later, when he came of age, Grahame married her former stepson, Anthony Ray, with whom she had two children.

Bogie did not like the script for Warner Brothers' film, Murder Inc., and told director Bretaigne Windust that he felt it was "old fashioned." He was cast with such veteran actors as Zero Mostel, Ted de Corsia, and Everett Sloane. The title was later changed to The Enforcer (1951).

Windust, a French-born theater, film, and TV director, became ill. Raoul Walsh took over, but insisted that he not be credited, wanting Windust to take the honor.

No longer a gangster, Bogie played a district attorney, Martin Ferguson, in this one.

In another film produced by his own studio, Santana, Bogie signed to star in Sirocco (1951), with one of his best array of character actors, including Lee J. Cobb, Everett Sloane, and Zero Mostel (once again). Cast as Harry Smith, Bogie plays a gun runner in French-occupied Damascus in the year 1925.

His female lead was Marta Toren, the Swedish-born actress who joined the pantheon of exotic European stars that Bogie appeared with in the late 40s and 50s.

Bogie found Toren intriguing because she was secretly dating Dr. Petter Lindstrom, the former husband of Ingrid Bergman. When a reporter visiting the set asked her about her romance with Lindstrom, Toren claimed, "I met him only once at a party."

After the reporter left, Bogie told her, "That's the way to tell 'em, gal. When a reporter asks me about my mistress, I always claim she's my hairdresser."

"Petter told me you were once in love with Bergman," Toren said. "Is that true?"

Ever the provocateur, Bogie said, "No, that was just a smokescreen. I was in love with Petter himself. I always felt that getting fucked by a Swedish doctor is one of the world's greatest thrills, and I'm sure you agree."

"I don't know," she said. "Howard Duff is not bad."

"But don't you think Ava Gardner is a tough act to follow?"

"Perhaps she is, but Duff prefers me."

"You sound like a genuinely bad girl." He said.

"Didn't you read the Sirocco script?" she asked Bogie. "That's the role I'm playing."

Although born in 1926, as opposed to Bogie's birth in 1899, they would die the same year in 1957. Toren succumbed to a brain hemorrhage.

The German director, Curtis Bernhardt, had helmed Conflict, one of Bogie's least popular films. He came back to direct him in Sirocco. When Bogie saw the finished cut, he said, "Curtis, dear old pal, you failed again. Sirocco is too set bound."

On his next film, Bogie scored a bull's eye, arguably his greatest movie, even better than Casablanca in the view of some critics.

It began with a call from John Huston, who told Bogie that "I have one hell of a script. The lead is a low life. As you are the biggest low life in Hollywood, you'd be perfect for it."

Over lunch at Romanoff's, Huston revealed the title. It was a screen adaptation of C.S. Forester's novel The African Queen (1951).

"That tired old thing," Bogie said. "Bette Davis has been hustling that script for years."

"I've read the book, and I know the role," Bogie told Huston after two martinis. "You and I both know I can do it. But working with Bette Davis in the wilds of Africa. That's a bit much even for me."

"Would you believe Katharine Hepburn?" Huston asked.

(center and bottom images)

"Katie's a friend of mine. Spencer Tracy's mother. She's a fragile-looking thing but tough as nails. She'll de-ball us before the last reel."

Within weeks, Hepburn, Bogie, and Bacall were sailing on the Liberté to the port of Le Havre in France. Bogie and Bacall would visit London and Paris before flying to Rome. From Italy, they would fly to Léopoldville in the Belgian Congo (now Zaire).

Arriving in darkest Africa, Bogie said, "At least this film gives me a chance to get out of a trench coat. It is my destiny to play Charlie Allnutt, and destiny is not a word I go around using."

"Here I am," he told Huston, "just where you wanted us. On the banks of the Ruiki River, deep in the Congo, a hundred miles from nowhere. Heat, soldier ants, and poisonous snakes—my kind of place."

Huston warned him that the river itself, which was black because of decaying vegetation, was filled with crocodiles. "Even worse than the crocs are parasitic worms. They're called bilharzia. They penetrate your skin and live off your flesh."

Of all of the stories told about the making of The African Queen, and there were hundreds of them—Katharine Hepburn even wrote a book about her adventures—Bogie topped them all.

"John had to recruit natives for crowd scenes in the jungle. The tribal chief got the idea that we were white cannibals and planned to eat his people. Huston asked for two hundred natives. But at first the chief gave us only ten. He sent some women—perhaps former wives—he was bored with and some unwanted children. He charged sixpence for the small kids, but a whole shilling for the larger kids. When he saw we didn't boil them in a pot, he allowed more natives to come and work for us."

In mid-June the mail from American brought some sad news. In a June 9 dispatch from Portland, Oregon, appeared this headline: MAYO METHOT, STAGE AND FILM ACTRESS, DEAD.

After Bogie dumped her, Methot went through her money quickly, as she sank deeper and deeper into alcoholism and depression.

Returning to Oregon to live out her final years, she died in a seedy motel room on the outskirts of Portland. Her body wasn't discovered until two days later.

In the jungles of Africa, Bogie read her obituary. His only comment was, "Such a waste."

(lower image)
Bogart with Kim Hunter

Near the end of the shoot, Bogie's patience with Africa and with Huston was running out. "I hate the fucking jungle," he told his director. "The blistering heat, and those bugs, those awful, never-ending bugs," Bogie said. "The only way to beat the bastards is to burn 'em, kill 'em. After you've done that, reward yourself with three double Scotches. I wanted to turn Hepburn onto Scotch, not the water. She didn't listen and spent most of two weeks sitting on the makeshift can."

The crew, at great expense and difficulty, moved to Uganda with the final scenes shot in a studio outside London.

Through it all, Hepburn kept her cool. "Damn Hepburn!" Bogie shouted at Huston. "Damn her! She's so God damn cheerful. She's got killer ants in her bloomers, a fungus-like mildew in her shoes, and she's so God damn cheerful."

The Best Actor Oscar competition for 1951 was the toughest in years. Bogie faced Marlon Brando in A Streetcar Named Desire, Montgomery Clift in A Place in the Sun, Arthur Kennedy in Bright Victory, and Fredric March in Death of a Salesman.

Broderick Crawford, who sat next to Bogie at the Pantages Theater in Hollywood, later revealed, "Bogie was a nervous wreck. He jumped up and down and out of his seat a hundred times. When his name was announced, he was sweating blood. He was so flustered he fluffed his ad-lib, stammered a polite thank you, and stepped on Greer Garson's toe as she handed him the statuette."

(two lower images) Bogart as an army surgeon in Korea

"Later, backstage, Bogie regained his nerve and became Bogie again," Crawford claimed. "He said that all this Oscar business was just bunk. He also said if the Academy wanted to know who the best actor of the year was, they should put each guy in costume and have him play Hamlet."

Fresh from his triumph in The African Queen, Bogie signed with 20th Century Fox to star in Deadline—U.S.A. (1951), directed by Richard Brooks, who also wrote the screenplay.

Bogie's leading lady this time was Ethel Barrymore, the grand dame of the theater. Bogie had already appeared with her brother, Lionel Barrymore in Key Largo.

A personal friend of Bogie's, Brooks had lined up a stellar cast that included Kim Hunter, who had famously appeared as Stella opposite Marlon Brando in A Streetcar Named Desire. Rounding out the cast were such veteran actors as Ed Begley, Paul Stewart, and Martin Gabel.

Bogie was cast as Ed Hutcheson, a crusading managing editor of a large metropolitan newspaper called The Day.

To get the feel of what it would be like to work for a real newspaper, Bogie hung out at the city room of The New York Daily News.

Years later when James Dean started to receive such acclaim, Bogie said, "I once made a movie with Dean," He was referring, of course, to Deadline—U.S.A. Cast as an extra, Dean appears only briefly in the movie.

Shooting had already begun when Brooks, Bogie's longtime friend, told him that Darryl Zanuck had wanted either Gregory Peck or Richard Widmark for the lead. "Here I am, a fucking Oscar winner, and still I'm getting sloppy seconds," Bogie said.

Brooks later claimed that Deadline—U.S.A. marked "the beginning of the end of Humphrey Bogart. He had a few good pictures left, but he wasn't the same man we knew and loved. He was arrogant, grumpy during the entire shoot, argumentative, and he never knew his lines. He was very sarcastic and snapped at the other actors, although he treated Miss Barrymore with the greatest of respect. How could he not?"

Richard Brooks immediately cast Bogie in M.A.S.H. 66 (later changed to Battle Circus, 1953). As his co-star, June Allyson played opposite him. She'd been known as America's Sweetheart back in the 1940s. Keenan Wynn played the second male lead in this Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer production.

When Brooks viewed the final result, he had to admit, "There is no on-screen chemistry between Bogie and June at all. When he had to kiss her, it was like he was kissing his maiden aunt."

Bogie already knew Allyson, as he'd purchased his beloved Santana from her husband, Dick Powell.

Set behind the front lines during the Korean War, the picture is not to be confused with the Robert Altman film *M*A*S*H* in 1970 or the long-running TV series of the same name (1972-83). Neither the TV series for CBS nor the Altman film would ever want to be associated with the lackluster Battle Circus, one of Bogie's lesser efforts.

The highlight of the film? Bogie accidentally set his left thumb on fire with lighter fluid while filming the scene in which his character of Major Jeb Webbe accidentally burns some documents.

The accident is clearly visible on screen, as Brooks decided to keep it in. He later said, "The thumb burning was the most exciting thing in the movie. At least I got some real pain, not fake pain."

At the end of Battle Circus, Bogie told his friend Brooks, "Let's not make any more movies together."

On August 23, 1952, Bacall gave birth to a six-pound, five-ounce baby girl. Bogie named her "Leslie" in honor of his long ago friend, Leslie Howard, who had given him his first big break in The Petrified Forest.

Around the same time the Bogarts moved from their rustic Benedict Canyon house to a $175,000 roomy, whitewashed brick colonial manse in chic Holmby Hills next to Beverly Hills. David Niven arrived to see the new mansion and immediately told Bogie, "I thought it'd never happen. The ol' rebel himself has gone Hollywood."

For his final film with John Huston, Beat the Devil (1954), the director had assembled an all-star cast of Jennifer Jones, Gina Lollobrigida, Robert Morley, and Peter Lorre. Beat the Devil was intended as a tongue-in-cheek spoof of his early masterpiece, The Maltese Falcon.

Huston told Bogie that if Sydney Greenstreet had still been acting, "I would have cast him instead of Morley."

Many actresses were considered for the role of Gwendolen Chelm before it went to Jennifer Jones. Huston suggested either Jean Simmons or Audrey Hepburn. Bogie recommended an actress named Lauren Bacall.

Finally, the name of Ingrid Bergman was proposed. She was living in Italy at the time and could have easily played the role.

Bacall had a more intriguing offer. Coming out of retirement after three years, she had agreed to play one of the trio of gold diggers in How to Marry a Millionaire (1953), starring Betty Grable and her "replacement," Marilyn Monroe.

In an automobile accident along the Amalfi Drive in Italy, Bogie knocked out three of his front teeth, which hindered his ability to speak. He already had a lisp. Huston in an emergency hired a young British actor noted for his mimicry skills. He re-recorded some of Bogie's spoken lines in post-production looping. That actor was Peter Sellers.

Beat the Devil

Peter Lorre came to realize that Beat the Devil "was the fifth and last movie that I'd ever make with Bogie. He was ill at the time. In the hotel where we stayed, I heard him coughing. Some nights he seemed to stay up half the night coughing. I think cancer was already eating his body."

Lollobrigida was a star in Italy, but not in America. On meeting her, Bogie told Huston that "she makes Marilyn Monroe look like Shirley Temple." Huston countered, "Gina is built like an apartment house with balconies."

Bogie noted that "Jennifer Jones, when not getting marching orders from her husband, David Selznick, in Morocco, spent most of her free time running around the Amalfi coast trying to escape from the clutches of a tall, aggressive lesbian."

Morley didn't like any of the cast, calling Bogie "a man with no brain." He said Lorre "is an unlovely man in every way."

The convoluted plot tells of the adventures of a motley crew of swindlers and ne'er-do-wells, trying to lay claim to land rich in uranium deposits in Kenya. They are stalled in a southern Italian port hoping to travel aboard an ill-fated tramp steamer to Mombasa.

To hammer some sense into the disorganized script, Huston, on the recommendation of David Selznick, hired Truman Capote, who was living in Rome at the time. Capote arrived in Ravello in a red overcoat that came down to his ankles with a ten-foot lavender-colored scarf. He was openly homosexual, and Huston feared he might conflict with Bogie, who always called everybody "a fag" if he didn't like them. To his surprise, Capote and Bogie bonded. After two days Bogie was calling him "Caposy."

Bogie told Huston, "He's the kind of guy you want to put in your pocket and take home with you."

"He's mine, you bitch," Huston shouted at Bogie so the entire cast and crew could hear him. The onlookers actually believed that Huston and Bogie were having a "gay catfight" over Capote.

For years Capote dined out on stories about the filming of Beat the Devil. "Everybody thought John and I were having an affair since we shared the same bedroom. Bogie spread the story, claiming the sounds coming from our bedroom were clearly of my screaming as John fucked me."

Capote also claimed that "I gave Bogie a blow job one drunken night. It was to settle a bet. I told him if I could beat him at arm wrestling three times in a row, he'd had to submit to a blow-job. He agreed. When I beat him, he went upstairs with me and unbuttoned his pants and took it out for me. He allowed me to blow him but warned me 'not to swallow.'"

Capote later claimed that he alone was the author of the screenplay. "All Huston did was play cards and drink while I wrote. He was like Irving Berlin, who had the little nigger boy in the trunk writing all his songs."

Back in Hollywood, Huston privately screened Beat the Devil for Bogie. Heavily invested in it financially, Bogie did not like it. "Only phonies will like it," he told Huston.

"a pathetic, babbling ruin"

Beat the Devil was the only movie Bogie ever made where audiences across the country lined up at the box office, demanding their money back.

Critic Roger Ebert later said that Beat the Devil was the first camp movie. In later years, Capote claimed, "When I wrote the script for Beat the Devil, I invented camp." Huston thought so little of it he did not renew the copyright, and today Beat the Devil is freely available to anyone to distribute.

Bogie had long been a friend of Dick Powell, who'd married June Allyson. But relationships between actors, even when they're friends, tend to become stormy when they're maneuvering for the same part. For a long time Powell had wanted to play Captain Queeg, the cruel and paranoid skipper in The Caine Mutiny.

The producer, Stanley Kramer, had arranged for Columbia to release the film. He had a production schedule of fifteen months. Powell went to him and practically begged for the role of Queeg.

"No way!" Kramer said. "Bogie was just in here, and I think he'd be a hell of a lot better as Captain Queeg than you."

Before settling on Bogie, Kramer considered Richard Widmark for the role of Queeg. Bogie demanded his usual top salary, and Kramer was reluctant to pay it.

"This never happens to Cooper, Grant, or Gable—only to me," Bogie told Bacall. He was actually too old for the role. He was fifty-five at the time of filming, but the captain was supposed to be in his early thirties.

Based on a novel by Herman Wouk, with music by Max Steiner, the screenplay had been written by Stanley Roberts.

Director Edward Dmytryk had lined up an impressive all-star cast headed by José Ferrer, Van Johnson, Fred MacMurray, Tom Tully, May Wynn, E.G Marshall, Arthur Franz, and Lee Marvin. An up-and-coming actor, handsome, blond-haired Robert Francis had been cast as Ensign Willie Keith.

Kramer later said of Bogie, "He has the damnedest façade of any man I've ever met in my life. He's playing Bogart all the time, but he's really a big, sloppy bowl of mush. I believe that the façade is a defense mechanism."

Bogie gave one of his most stirring performances as Queeg, especially in the courtroom scene where he rolls around those steel marbles in his hand. Of his character, Bogie said, "I don't know if he was a schizophrenic, a manic depressive, or a paranoiac—ask a psychiatrist—but I do know that a person who was any one of these things works overtime at being normal. In fact, he's super normal until pressured. And then he blows up. I personally know a Queeg in every studio."

Film critic Tim Dirks called Bogie's role "his last great film performance" although he would go on to make Sabrina (1954) and The Barefoot Contessa (also 1954).

The picture was a huge success, and Bogie found himself competing with Marlon Brando for the Best Actor Oscar. Brando had delivered a memorable performance in On the Waterfront. Bogie had competed and won against Brando for his role in The African Queen, triumphing over Brando's A Streetcar Named Desire. But this time around, Brando's role in On the Waterfront beat Bogie.

Ava Gardner, who had previously appeared with Bogie in The Barefoot Contessa, told Frank Sinatra, "I think he's dying. Sometimes we had to stop a scene when Bogie was gasping for air."

At the end of the summer of 1954, filming began on The Desperate Hours, which would be released by Paramount in 1955. Produced and directed by William Wyler, the thriller co-starred Fredric March. The role of Glenn Griffin would be Bogie's last as a screen villain.

When the play was presented on Broadway, it was miscast with a young actor named Paul Newman in the Bogie role. Later Bogie called his role "Duke Mantee comes of age."

Bogie had a reunion with Arthur Kennedy, and the cast was rounded out by Martha Scott, Gig Young, and Mary Murphy. Dewey Martin, famous for a while as "Mr. Peggy Lee," was also in the cast.

When Bogie saw the final cut of The Desperate Hours, he called Wyler. "I think I'm too old to play gangsters."

With tongue in cheek, the director said, "I'm thinking of casting you as a priest in my next movie. If that whore-mongering friend of yours, Spencer Tracy, can get away with playing a priest, so can Mr. Humphrey Bogart."

Right before Bogie's Christmas birthday in 1954, he signed a deal with Harry Cohn, the chief honcho of Columbia Pictures. With a stroke of Bogie's signature, his production company, Santana, became history, at least for him. The sale netted him a million dollars.

Verita Peterson had remained a constant in Bogie's life up until 1955. Since she had become an employee, he brought her into his family life, introducing her to Bacall. There is a photograph of her cutting the hair of Bogie's son, Stephen.

"It seemed hypocritical as hell for me to have anything to do with Bogie's home life, and while Bogie agreed with me in principle, he pointed out that it would raise suspicions if I didn't act as an employee of his normally would. And so I became more familiar with Betty and the two children than I wanted to under the circumstances."

Verita's affair with Bogie finally came to an end—with his full approval—when she married the producer Walter Thompson in 1955. But she would remain Bogie's friend and occasional companion to the end.

Verita remained married to Thompson until his death in 1975. A few months later she opened Verita's La Cantina on Sunset Boulevard. In 1982 she wrote A Love Story, Bogie and Me, revealing what much of tout Hollywood already knew.

In the 1990s she moved to New Orleans and opened a piano bar, naming it "Bogie and Me." When Hurricane Katrina was roaring down on the city, she refused the offer of a private jet to escape the storm's fury. "Lauren Bacall failed to chase me out of Hollywood. Katrina won't force me out of New Orleans."

Hardcover and paperback editions of Verita Thompson's autobiography

Writer Larry Cone encountered Verita in 2005 and wrote: "Verita Thompson, a woman in her late 80s—dressed to the nines in fishnet stockings and high heels—swirled to music with the rest of us. She once had an affair with Humphrey Bogart, we were told. She's a regular at the clubs and is treated with reverence by everyone."

Verita died in New Orleans on February 1, 2008. Under her pillow a maid found Bogie's long ago toupée.

In the spring of 1955, the Holmby Hills Rat Pack was born when Bacall surveyed the wreck of a four-day party in Las Vegas. "You look like a god-damn rat pack!" she told the boys.

A legend was born. After Bogie's death, Frank Sinatra not only became the leader of the Rat Pack, but he filled Bogie's shoes in another way, becoming the temporary boyfriend of Bacall.

From the set of The Desperate Hours, Bogie began filming The Left Hand of God for 20th Century Fox. His beautiful co-star was Gene Tierney, former mistress of John F. Kennedy.

Bogie worked again, with Edward Dmytryk, with a supporting cast of familiar faces, including Lee J. Cobb, Agnes Moorehead, and E.G. Marshall.

In the film, Bogie managed to be convincing posing as a clergyman with diverting results in this drama set in post-WWII China. He called William Wyler, "At last I got to be a priest, even if a fake one."

At first he attacked Tierney for not knowing her lines. But when he came to realize how emotionally fragile she was, he softened his stance and began to help her in any way he could. He told Dmytryk that Tierney reminded him of his mentally ill sister, Frances.

Tierney was emotionally shattered at the end of her relationship with Prince Aly Khan. She would soon suffer a nervous breakdown and be sent to a mental ward for almost two years.

In spite of declining health, Bogie was convinced he could play Joseph in We're No Angels released in 1955. On the set he was reunited with his Casablanca director, Michael Curtiz. Age had only embittered Curtiz, who told Bogie, "I want to tell Hollywood to go fuck me."

"Don't you mean, you want to tell Hollywood to go fuck itself?" Bogie asked.

"I know what I mean." Curtiz snapped at him, "especially when it comes to fucking."

Curtiz had assembled an all-star cast, including Aldo Ray, Peter Ustinov, Joan Bennett, Basil Rathbone, and Leo G. Carroll. The film would prove to be only mildly entertaining, as it told of three escapees from Devil's Island who find refuge with a French family. Once there, the convicts extricate the family from their various dilemmas.

Robert De Niro and Sean Penn would remake the movie under the same title for a 1989 release.

In the autumn of 1955, Bogie would begin work on The Harder They Fall, his last motion picture. In this swan song, Bogie starred in a drama by Budd Schulberg in which he played a cynical sportswriter turned press agent. He realizes for the first time how badly prize fighters are managed.

The film noir was directed by Mark Robson. Two talented actors, Rod Steiger and Jan Sterling, backed up Bogie in his final appearance in this brutal, disagreeable story.

Bogie would soon be diagnosed with esophageal cancer. Robson found that his voice was not clear in some of the takes. Paul Frees, who appeared in the film as a priest, dubbed some of his lines in post-production. He could perfectly imitate Bogie. This re-dubbing was later denied by the studio.

In January of 1956, Bogie and Bacall reported to Warner Brothers for wardrobe tests on an upcoming film, Melville Goodwin, U.S.A. But before production began, Bogie entered the hospital, where he learned that his cancer had invaded his esophagus and spread throughout his entire body.

Bogie called producer Milton Sperling. "I can make our film, but I've got to tell you, pal, I'll be dead in six months." His coughing spasms grew more pronounced and of longer duration. Warners was reluctant to go ahead with the film.

On February 29, 1956, Bogie checked into Good Samaritan Hospital in Los Angeles, where Dr. John Jones operated on him for nearly ten hours.

His esophagus was removed, along with two—maybe more—lymph nodes and one of his ribs. Bacall was told the cancer had been detected too late. The suggestion was that Bogie would not live to see Christmas and his birthday.

Weeks of chemotherapy followed. When his friend Joe Hyams asked how the treatments were going, Bogie said, "It's shit!" He'd never been known to use that word.

Bogie still went to Romanoff's, though he had no interest in food. He was literally a walking skeleton.

Verita Peterson Thompson came for a final adieu. He secretly told her, "I think Betty has fallen in love with Frank Sinatra. If she's not in love with him, then he's in love with my wife."

Bogie was furious when the press learned of his illness. He hated reading about his upcoming death. He claimed, "I'm down to my last martini. The only thing I'm fighting is to keep my head above the press."

Bacall and Sinatra in the late 1950s

In spite of his denial in an "Open Letter to the Working Press," he checked into St. John's Hospital in Santa Monica on November 26, 1956. His cancer had metastasized. Bacall was warned that her husband had only weeks to live.

Friends such as Spencer Tracy and Katharine Hepburn, knowing he was dying, dropped by to pay their final respects in Bogie's home. Brave to the end, Bogie came down each afternoon to his living room to greet old friends like Raymond Massey at the five o'clock cocktail hour. When he could no longer walk, he was brought downstairs in a dumbwaiter.

John Huston was one of the last friends to see Bogie, flying into Los Angeles early in January of 1957. He was shocked to see the condition of his former star, whose weight was down to sixty-five pounds.

"His eyes seemed to bulge from his head," Huston said. "They were giant eyes. He looked at me, and I looked at him. If ever I wanted to cry, that was the moment. But I figured if he could be brave, so could I."

Bogie's last visitors were Tracy and Hepburn. They arrived at five o'clock on the evening of January 12. After chatting briefly with him, Hepburn kissed him on the lips. "I didn't say anything to him," she later said. "The kiss stood for it all."

Tracy bent down over him and also kissed him on the mouth. "Good night, Bogie."

With those haunting eyes, Bogie looked into the face of his decades-long friend. "Good-bye, Spencer."

An onscreen view of Spencer Tracy with Katharine Hepburn

The following day Bogie drifted into a coma. He would not come out of it.

Attended by two nurses, Bogie died at 2:25am on January 14, 1957.

Bogie's body was cremated, his ashes taken to the Gardens of Memory section of Forest Lawn Memorial Park in Glendale.

On January 18, a memorial service was held at All Saints Church on Santa Monica Boulevard in Beverly Hills.

John Huston delivered the eulogy.

"He was endowed with the greatest gift a man can have—talent. The whole world came to recognize it. His life, though not a long one measured in years, was a rich, full life. We have no reason to feel any sorrow for him—only for ourselves for having lost him. He is quite irreplaceable. There will never be another like him."

Mary Astor, Bogie's co-star in The Maltese Falcon, attempted to explain the Bogie cult that grew by the thousands in the wake of his early death.

"The Bogart cult that has emerged is very understandable. There he is, right there on the screen, saying what everyone is trying to say today, saying it loud and clear. 'I hate hypocrisy. I don't believe in words or labels or much of anything else. I'm not a hero. I'm a human being. I'm not very pretty. Like me or don't like me.' We who knew him well liked him. Bogie was for real."

One of the nurses who attended Bogie in his final hour revealed to the press his final words:

"I should never have switched from martinis to Scotch."

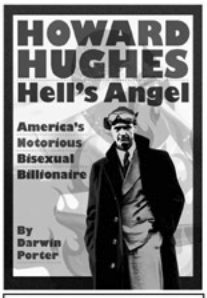
A DEMENTED BILLIONAIRE:

From his reckless pursuit of love as a rich teenager to his final days as a demented fossil, Howard Hughes tasted the best and worst of the century he occupied. Along the way, he changed the worlds of aviation and entertainment forever. This biography reveals inside details about his destructive and usually scandalous associations with other Hollywood players.

Howard Hughes: Hell's Angel by Darwin Porter



Set amid descriptions of the unimaginable changes that affected America between Hughes's birth in 1905 and his death in 1976, this book gives an insider's perspective about what money can buy--and what it can't.

"Darwin Porter's access to film industry insiders and other Hughes confidants supplied him with the resources he needed to create a portrait of Hughes that both corroborates what other Hughes biographies have divulged, and go them one better."
-Foreword Magazine

"Thanks to this bio of Howard Hughes, we'll never be able to look at the old pin-ups in quite the same way again."

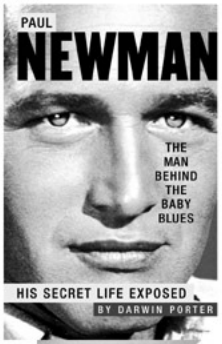
PAUL NEWMAN

The Man Behind the Baby Blues
His Secret Life Exposed

by Darwin Porter

The most compelling biography of the iconic actor ever published



Drawn from firsthand interviews with insiders who knew Paul Newman intimately, and compiled over a period of nearly a half-century, this is the world's most honest and most revelatory biography about Hollywood's pre-eminent male sex symbol, with dozens of potentially shocking revelations.

Whereas the situations it exposes were widely known within Hollywood's inner circles, they've never before been revealed to the general public.

If you're a fan of Newman (and who do you know who isn't) you really should look at this book. It's a respectful but candid cornucopia of information about the sexual and emotional adventures of a young man on Broadway and in Hollywood.

A pioneering and posthumous biography of a charismatic icon of Tinseltown. His rule over the hearts of American moviegoers lasted for more than half a century--a potent, desirable, and ambiguous sex symbol, a former sailor from Shaker Heights, Ohio, who parlayed his ambisexual charm and extraordinary good looks into one of the most successful careers in Hollywood. It's all here, as recorded by celebrity chronicler Darwin Porter--the giddy heights and agonizing lows of a great American star.

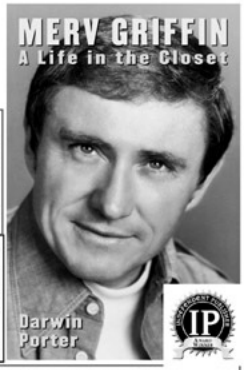
MERV GRIFFIN
A Life in the Closet

by Darwin Porter



"Darwin Porter told me why he tore the door off Merv's closet.....Heeeere's Merv! is 560 pages, 100 photos, a truckload of gossip, and a bedful of unauthorized dish"

Cindy Adams, The NY Post

"Darwin Porter tears the door off Merv Griffin's closet with gusto in this sizzling, superlatively researched biography...It brims with insider gossip that's about Hollywood legends, writ large, smart, and with great style."

Richard LaBonté, BOOKMARKS

Merv Griffin, A Life in the Closet

Merv Griffin began his career as a Big Band singer, moved on to a failed career as a romantic hero in the movies, and eventually rewrote the rules of everything associated with the broadcasting industry. Along the way, he met and befriended virtually everyone who mattered, made billions operating casinos and developing jingles, contests, and word games. All of this while maintaining a male harem and a secret life as America's most famously closeted homosexual.

In this comprehensive biography--the first published since Merv's death in 2007--celebrity biographer Darwin Porter reveals the amazing details behind the richest, most successful, and in some way, the most notorious mogul in the history of America's entertainment industry.

Most of his viewers (they numbered 20 million per day) thought that Merv Griffin's life was an ongoing series of chatty segués--amiable, seamless, uncontroversial. But things were far more complicated than viewers at the time ever thought. Here, from the writer who unzipped Marlon Brando, is the first post-mortem, unauthorized overview of the mysterious life of the richest and most notorious man in television

STEVE McQUEEN
King of Cool
Tales of a Lurid Life

by Darwin Porter

The drama of Steve McQueen's life far surpassed anything he ever played on screen. He followed in the footsteps of his mother, a prostitute, who eventually seduced him as part of an Oedipal fling. Earlier, he'd been brutally molested by some of his mother's "johns," and endured gang rape in reform school. In a bordello in Havana, he hired himself out as a sex object and porn performer.

Returning to New York, he hustled on the streets of Times Square. Later, in a borrowed tux, he became a "gentleman for rent," the toy boy of rich, aging women, two of whom included Joan Crawford and Lana Turner. When stardom finally came, the abused became the abuser. "I live for myself, and I answer to nobody," he proclaimed, "And the last thing I ever want is to fall in love with a broad."

The string of seductions that followed earned him an almost mythical status as a pansexual Love Machine. His A-list conquests included Jacqueline Bisset, Judy Garland, Lauren Hutton, Sharon Tate, Mamie Van Doren, Tuesday Weld, Natalie Wood, and Marilyn Monroe.

Publicly, he insisted that he loathed homosexuals, yet he often went to bed with them, especially if they were bikers or race car drivers. He had a tumultuous sexual relationship with James Dean, and a longer love/hate affair with Paul Newman. Other sexual liaisons developed with Peter Lawford, Sal Mineo, Rock Hudson, Chuck Connors, and George Peppard.

McQueen lived life at top speed, like the machines he raced so famously. His early death remains a source of lurid speculation, all of it explored within this pioneering biography by celebrity chronicler Darwin Porter.

McQueen: Screen hero. Rebel. Sexual Outlaw. Megastar. Loner. Male hustler. Street kid. Gigolo. Restless husband. Mysterious recluse. Brutal yet tender.Savage. And, in the words of Jacqueline Bisset, "a beautiful, beautiful man."

With the publication by Blood Moon of this pioneering work, the result of years of research, untold stories are exposed. Within its pages, "McQueen's Unreachable Star" comes down to Earth. As defined by London's Sunday Express, this is "a book that's potentially dangerous for middle-aged men."

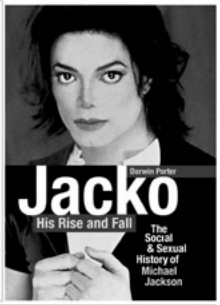
This is the most comprehensive and unbiased biography of the superstar ever published.



"This is the story of Peter Pan gone rotten. Don't stop till you get enough. Darwin Porter's biography of Michael Jackson is dangerously addictive."
The Sunday Observer, London

"In this compelling glimpse of Jackson's life, Porter provides what many journalists have failed to produce in their writings about the pop star: A real person behind the headlines."

Foreword Magazine

"I'd have thought that there wasn't one single gossippy rock yet to be overturned in the microscopically scrutinized life of Michael Jackson, but Darwin Porter has proven me wrong. Definitely a page-turner. But don't turn the pages too quickly. Almost every one holds a fascinating revelation."

Books to Watch Out For

The immediate notoriety of Michael Jackson faded with his trials. Since then, he's been defined as a musical luminary who rewrote the rules of America's entertainment industry. Read this biography for the real story of the circumstances and players who created the icon which the world will forever remember as "the gloved one," Michael Jackson.

This "entertainingly outrageous" (FRONTIERS MAGAZINE) biography provides a definitive, blow-by-blow description of the "hot, provocative, and barely under control drama" that was the life of America's most famous Postwar actor.

"Astonishing. An extraordinarily detailed portrait of Brando that's as blunt, uncompromising, and X-rated as the man himself." Women's Weekly

"This shocking new book is sparking a major reassessment of Brando's legacy as one of Hollywood's most macho lotharios." Daily Express (London)

"As author Darwin Porter finds, it wasn't just the acting world Marlon Brando conquered. It was the actors, too." Gay Times (London)

Katharine the Great (HEPBURN)

A Lifetime of Secrets Revealed, by Darwin Porter

A compelling biography of the most phobically secretive actress in Hollywood

Katharine Hepburn was the world's greatest screen diva--the most famous actress in American history. But until the appearance of this biography, no one had ever published the intimate details of her complicated and ferociously secretive private life. Thanks to the "deferential and obsequious whitewashes" which followed in the wake of her death, readers probably know WHAT KATE REMEMBERED. Here, however, is an unvarnished account of what Katharine Hepburn desperately wanted to forget.

"Behind the scenes of her movies, Katharine Hepburn played the temptress to as many women as she did men, ranted and raved with her co-stars and directors, and broke into her neighbors' homes for fun. And somehow, she managed to keep all of it out of the press. As they say, Katharine the Great is hard to put down."
The Dallas Voice

"The door to Hepburn's closet has finally been opened. This is the most honest and least apologetic biography of Hollywood's most ferociously private actress ever written."
Senior Life Magazine, Miami

"In Porter's biography of Katharine Hepburn, details about the inner workings of a movie studio (RKO in the early 30s), are relished.
The Bottom Line, Palm Springs

"Darwin Porter's biography of Hepburn cannot be lightly dismissed or ignored. Connoisseurs of Hepburn's life would do well to seek it out as a forbidden supplement."

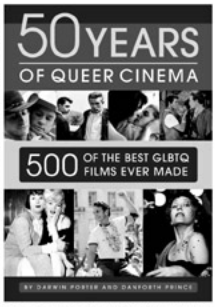
50 Years of Queer Cinema

500 of the Best GLBTQ Films Ever Made

An indispensable reference source for films about
The Love that Dare Not Speak Its Name



As late as 1958, homosexuality couldn't even be mentioned in a movie, as proven by the elaborate lengths the producers of Tennessee Williams swampy Cat on a Hot Tin Roof took to evade the obvious fact that its hero, Paul Newman, was playing it gay. And in spite of the elaborate lengths its producers took to camouflage its lavender aspects, in-the-know viewers during the late 50s realized all along that Joe E. Brown was fully aware that Jack Lemmon wasn't a biological female ("nobody's perfect") in Some Like it Hot (1959).

That kind of baroque subterfuge ended abruptly in 1960, when cinema emerged from its celluloid closet. With the release of Boys in the Band in 1970, gay cinema had come of age—It was queer and here to stay. Decades later came Brokeback Mountain, Transamerica, and Milk.

This comprehensive anthology documents it all, bringing into focus a sweeping rundown of cinema's most intirguing Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgendered, and "Queer Questioning" films that deserves a home next to the DVD player as well as on the reference shelves of public libraries. Crucial to the viability of this book is the fact that new DVD releases have made these films available to new generations of viewers for the first time since their original release.

More than just a dusty library reference, this book shamelessly spills 50 quasi-closeted years of Hollywood secrets—all of them in glorious Technicolor.

An anthology of star-studded scandal from Tinseltown's very gay and very lavender past, it focuses on Hollywood's secrets from the 1920s, including the controversial backgrounds of the great lovers of the Silent Screen.

Valentino, Ramon Novarro, Charlie Chaplin, Fatty Arbuckle, Pola Negri, Mary Pickford, and many others figure into eyewitness accounts of the debauched excesses that went on behind closed doors. It also documents the often tragic endings of America's first screen idols, some of whom admitted to being more famous than the monarchs of England and Jesus Christ combined.

The first book of its kind, it's the most intimate and most realistic novel about sex, murder, blackmail, and degradation in early Hollywood ever written.

BLOOD MOON PRODUCTIONS ANNOUNCES THE RELEASE of the 75-minute documentary it filmed in late May from the floor of America's world-famous and most important bookselling event, BEA 2010.

BOOK EXPO 2010: BLOOD MOON'S VIEW FROM THE FLOOR, represents history's first attempt to capture—close, in-your-face, uncensored, and personalized—the interactions, alliances, scandals, and dramas that explode for a small book publisher during a bookselling mega-event devoted to the marketing, pricing, and sale of its literary products.

Defined as a hybrid between a documentary and an infomercial, the film was conceived as a publicity and promotion piece by Blood Moon's founder and president, Danforth Prince: "Book publishers operate in a state of barely controlled hysteria, especially in this economic climate," he said. "Within this film, we've captured some of the drama of how books are promoted and hawked at a highly competitive event where everyone from Barbra Streisand to the Duchess of York was shaking his or her bon-bon to sell something."

"At BEA 2010, enemies, competitors, and authors evoked Oscar night in Hollywood before the awards are announced," Prince continued. "This film is the first attempt to depict, on video, how a small press swims in the frantic, shark-infested waters of the book trade. It's a documentation of a specific moment in America's mercantile history, with implications for America's reading habits and how consumers will opt, sometimes through digitalization, to amuse and entertain themselves in the 21st century."

During the footage he shot from within and near his booth #3784 at BEA, Mr. Prince was assisted by members of Blood Moon's editorial staff, and directed by Polish-born Piotr Kajstura, winner of several filmmaking awards and grants for his work with, among others, the tourism board of South Carolina.

"Michael Jackson is mass culture, not pop culture-he appeals to everybody. No one can deny that he's got a tremendous voice and plenty of style and that he can dance like a demon. He appeals to all ages and he appeals to every kind of pop listener. This kind of performer comes once in a generation."

The New York Times

Michael Jackson at the peak of his "Thriller" fame in the 1980s was probably the most famous person on earth. Undeniably, thanks to his reign as the King of Pop, he was the world's biggest superstar. He was also the most famous African-American entertainer in the history of show business.

But after the turn of the millennium, the front pages of such tabloids as The New York Post were screaming: PETER PAN OR PERVERT?.

How could Michael Jackson's career and personal life have gone so wrong?

To answer that, you have to look at Michael's roots in the grimy industrial city of Gary, Indiana, "murder capital of the U.S." Here on the scorching night of August 29, 1958, Michael Jackson entered the world.

"When Michael Jackson sings, it is with the voice of angels, and when his feet move, you can see God dancing. "

--Sir Bob Geldof

"I grew up in a fishbowl. I will not allow that to happen to my son. "

--Michael Jackson

"Sure he's a little afraid of people. When you have people that from the time you're a little kid, want a part of you, they want your clothes, they want your hair--you're going to get a little nervous around people. "

--Vince Paterson, choreographer

"He is one of the last living innocents who is in complete control of his life. I've never seen anybody like Michael. He's an emotional child star. He's in full control. Sometimes he appears to be wavering on the fringes of the twilight, but there is a great conscious forethought behind everything he does. He's very smart about his career and the choices he makes. I think he is definitely a man of two personalities. "

--Steven Spielberg

"He really feels that the audience deserves the best he can give them. He really has a very strong sense of responsibility, a strong sense of showmanship. "

--John Landis

"If it weren't for my desire to help the children of the world, I'd throw in the towel and kill myself. "

--Michael Jackson

Chapter One

It can be said that Michael's musical career began when he was only three and a half years old. His soft-spoken mother, Katherine, was in her small kitchen in Gary, Indiana, washing clothes on an old Maytag wringer machine that squeaked, rattled, and rolled, having seen better days. She'd come home early from her dreary job as a clerk at Sears.

As she turned around, she noticed her toddler singing and dancing almost like a professional. For one brief moment, she flashed on his becoming a black version of Shirley Temple before quickly ruling that out. Like her older boys, her youngest son belonged to the world of music.

When her gruff husband, Joe, returned home from a hard day's work as a crane operator in a local steel mill, she planned to tell him that yet another of his sons was musically talented. She had a gut instinct that Michael's talents might one day surpass those of Jackie, Tito, Jermaine, and Marlon.

Michael was the seventh of her children, as she'd recently given birth to not only her boys, but to two girls, Maureen and La Toya. Randy and Janet were yet to come.

"I remember seeing Michael dancing like it was yesterday," Katherine recalled. "He was singing at the top of his voice with powerful lungs I didn't know he had developed. I sensed he was not only born to dance but to sing as well. There was a joy I saw on his face that afternoon that I was never to see again. His singing and dancing were spontaneous. When he was forced to sing and dance under threat of a beating from my husband, Joe, that same joy wasn't there. But there was enough of it left to thrill the world."

Since the day he'd entered the world, Michael had grown up listening to rock 'n' roll and The Blues. Little Richard's voice was often broadcast throughout the house, singing "Tutti Frutti" or "Good Golly Miss Molly." In his wildest dreams, Michael could not have imagined that he'd eventually own the rights to both of those songs. The sounds of Chuck Berry or Otis Redding also echoed throughout the small bungalow.

At that time in his life, Joe wanted to be a musical star himself. His R&B band was called "The Falcons," and the boys in the band, the members of which included Joe's brother, Luther, rehearsed almost nightly in the tiny two-bedroom bungalow already overcrowded with the burgeoning Jackson family.

Young Michael

Sometimes when her husband was away on gigs with The Falcons, Katherine suspected that he was wasn't remaining faithful to her. But she'd decided long ago to overlook his transgressions as a means of salvaging her marriage.

One afternoon, Tito went to the closet in Joe's bedroom and removed his father's most precious possession, his guitar. Playing with the guitar in the small living room, the boy broke one of the strings. Later that night, after supper, when Joe started to play his guitar, he discovered what Tito had done. He grabbed Tito by his neck and forced him into the living room. Having repaired the string, Joe demanded that Tito play for him. "I wanna hear you play that guitar. And you'd better be good! If you're not good, I'm gonna beat the hell out of you!" Although prepared for violence, hard-to-please Joe was impressed with Tito's guitar playing.

It was on that night that Joe realized that all his sons had musical talent. If he couldn't make it in the music world himself, maybe his sons could bring in big paychecks with Joe managing their money. He began to rehearse not just with Tito, but with his oldest boys, Jackie and Jermaine. As soon as he was old enough-well, barely-the apple-cheeked Michael joined in pounding those bongos. "The kid is a dynamo," Joe told Katherine.

"What have I been telling you?" she asked.

A few weeks later, Joe decided that his own career with The Falcons was going nowhere. He threw all the energy he'd used for his own music into developing the careers of his sons-and he was a brutal taskmaster, even beating them with a switch or a belt when one of the boys missed a note or a dance step.

Joe told the members of The Falcons that he didn't practice birth control. "One kid came right after the other. With all the hungry mouths to feed, I had to bring home a paycheck." He would later claim, "I sacrificed my own career for the sake of my sons. They were not grateful for what I did for them, especially Michael, the most ungrateful of them all."

"Even before our first record contract," Jermaine said, "we used to have to be in before the street lights came on. It was rehearse, rehearse, and then rehearse some more. We missed out on being kids. We could never play with the other boys on the block because we had to tend to business-and that meant making music."

Joe began to spend money he couldn't afford buying musical instruments for his children. This led to some bitter fights with Katherine, who needed the meager funds to put food on the table.

Joe used brutality to control his sons, Katherine preferring a more emotional and psychological approach in her possessiveness. Her family was her world. To lose her family would be tantamount to losing her reason for living.

Born in Arkansas but reared in dirt-poor rural Tennessee, where his dad taught school for fifteen dollars a week, Joe Jackson came up the hard way. He was determined to make it big. He learned to discipline his own children based on the harsh beatings and strict punishment he received from his own father, the iron-fisted Samuel, a devout Lutheran who "tolerated no sass from a snot-nosed kid."

Jackie, Janet, Michael, Tito, La Toya, Marlon, Randy, and Jermaine.

Joe's father had always proclaimed, "Spare the rod, spoil the child." Joe took his father's advice. Instead of a rod, he used leather belts, razor straps, and wire coat hangers evocative of Joan Crawford in Mommie Dearest. When none of those devices seemed to do the job, he balled up his fist and plowed it into one of his boys' noses. Blood would spurt out, but Joe succeeded in getting his point across.

Sometimes in the middle of the night, he would put on a fright mask and burst into the boys' room with a kitchen knife poised menacingly. The brothers' horrified screams could be heard throughout the working-class neighborhood.

Katherine was born in a small hamlet in Alabama that is no longer on the map. She sang spirituals in her church and listened to country music on the radio. Hank Williams was her favorite. Sometimes she'd take Michael in her lap and sing such old favorites as "Cotton Fields" or "Wabash Cannonball" to him.

Michael was about four years old when he noticed that his mother walked with a limp. When he asked her about it, she said that she'd been crippled with polio when she was a young girl growing up in the South. Claiming that musical talent was "a gift from God," she began to take him to the Sunday services of the Jehovah's Witnesses. Often only Maureen-nicknamed "Rebbie"- and La Toya would go with her. Her husband and her sons would rarely, if ever, accompany her.

Before she converted to the teachings of the Jehovah's Witnesses, Katherine had been a member of both a Baptist and a Lutheran church, until she learned that the ministers of each congregation were having extramarital affairs. As a Jehovah's Witness, she would eventually be confronted with evidence that her husband was also having extramarital affairs.

Katherine, Michael, and Joe Jackson, circa 1972

> Even so, she steadfastly stood by her new faith that condemned "fornicators (in this case her own husband and later her children), idolaters, masturbators, adulterers, and homosexuals." Most of these labels-and more-would eventually be applied to members of her own family. But Katherine never lost the faith that condemned many of the pastimes of her own offspring.

Michael became an ardent disciple of the Jehovah's Witnesses and remained so until that religious cult "disowned" him.

When Michael turned five, Katherine once again caught him singing in the falsetto of a toddler, this time in front of a mirror. He perfectly impersonated Jermaine's lead vocal. For the second time, she was awed by her young boy's amazing talent. It was hard to admit it to herself, but she concluded that Michael's vocalizing, despite his age, surpassed that of Jermaine's. Jermaine had been Joe's favorite, and his father had been grooming the boy as the lead singer. That night, Katherine confided to Joe, "I think we have another lead singer." She didn't say "a replacement" but "another."

Michael was summoned into the living room. There Joe demanded that he sing for him. "Joe was really shocked when he heard our boy," Katherine said. "So young, so talented." To an increasing degree, his parents realized that they had given birth to a very special talent.

After the first week of rehearsing with Michael, Joe made an unusual prediction of stunning accuracy. "The kid is going to become the biggest entertainer in the world."

When his brothers finally heard Michael sing, "all of us were shocked," as Jackie remembered. "Michael was practically in diapers, but we knew he'd be our lead singer. Jermaine's days as lead singer were over." He was shunted aside, leading to a life-long resentment and envy of his more famous brother.

By the time Michael was six years old, he sang in public at the Garnett Elementary School. Singing a capella, he chose "Climb Ev'ry Mountain" from The Sound of Music, performing brilliantly enough to impress hard-toplease Joe and bringing tears to Katherine's eyes.

That same year, "Ripples and Waves," the first name of The Jackson 5, began to enter-and win-talent contests in Gary. Joe financed a comical record by them called "Let Me Carry Your Books to School."

Michael not only replaced Jermaine as lead singer, but he began to take over in other ways too. Soon he was choreographing their steps and even designing costumes for The Jackson 5.

The Jackson residence in Gary, Indiana

By the age of seven, Michael was performing professionally with his brothers. At a talent contest at Roosevelt High School in Gary, the brothers won by singing "My Girl," a hit song from The Temptations.

"I was scared," Michael later recalled. "Afraid we'd be booed off the stage. The audience might not like us. I was untested. But I also felt I could do it. I knew I'd not forget the lyrics or make one big mistake. I was determined, and I pulled it off."

Joe continued to arrange bookings for his sons, the entire troupe hiring out for only eight dollars for a performance. That was only the base pay. Audiences were enthusiastic about the boys, and on a good night the sons brought back one hundred dollars, all derived from tips, to help Katherine run the household.

While still working at the steel plant, Joe drove his sons to gigs at night. Sometimes he'd take a leave from work and travel cross-country with his boys in a small van.

Although Joe privately told Katherine how talented he felt Michael was, he didn't let his son in on that. In front of his brothers, Joe often denounced Michael. "You're one ugly fucker. I'm handsome. You couldn't be my son. Your mama must have fucked the milkman. You're also the dumbest piece of shit that ever got up to entertain an audience. The only way you can get a squeal from a woman is to crawl on the floor and look up her dress. You're so clumsy I'm ashamed to call you my son." When Michael seriously angered him, Joe took out a pocket knife and held it to Michael's throat, threatening to slit it.

As a little boy, Michael performed in the wildest and raunchiest of the honky-tonks of "Sin City," the nickname for Gary.

"When not in Gary, the Jackson brothers were appearing in the seedy dives of Chicago, a van ride of around 90 minutes from Gary, where most known perversions could be catered to," in the words of one habitue of the nightlife scene in The Windy City.

Michael got his taste of female nudity watching strippers peel down and tossing their G-strings into the hard-drinking crowd of men, with a few "butch dykes," as they were called, in the audience seeking a thrill as well.

After The Jackson 5 performed musical numbers, Joe ordered Michael to crawl around on the beer-stained floor, looking up the dresses of screaming but compliant women.

After these antics, customers would throw money on the dirty floor. Michael would scamper around in the filth, collecting both coins and dollars. Even though it was illegal for the Jackson boys to perform in these joints, because they were minors, no police interference ever occurred.

In time, Michael himself would become an alluring, sexually ambiguous figure, but he got his first taste of drag in a Chicago club euphemistically called Guys & Dolls. An alluring blonde, who looked like Dolly Parton did in the Seventies, appeared on the bill. Michael remembered that she had "history's largest boobs," but when that G-string came off, "she" became a "he," "although not much of one."

Michael and Papa Joe

Some sources claim that Michael deepened his appreciation of crossdressing at the Apollo Theater on 125th Street in New York's Harlem. At the Apollo, performers merely pulled off their wigs to reveal that they were men. But at Guys & Dolls in Chicago, they actually flashed their male genitalia.

Some of the honky-tonks the boys appeared in were known as "blood buckets" because of the violence that would occur on a rowdy Saturday night, particularly after midnight.

Regardless of how late he stayed up on Saturday night, Michael always got up to go to the Sunday meeting of the Jehovah's Witnesses with Katherine. Afterward, he would join her on door-to-door canvassing of his neighborhood, trying to win new converts to their evangelical movement.

Even after fame came to Michael, he still joined La Toya and Katherine on proselytizing trips to knock on the doors of neighbors' houses, soliciting their enrollment in the "Kingdom of Heaven." Michael wore disguises and usually fooled the adults. But the children often shouted at him, "I know who you are! You're Michael Jackson!"

Rebecca Lowe, a neighbor of the Jackson family in Gary, remembered years later seeing Michael come to her door. "He was well scrubbed and righteous looking, like a black choir boy. He didn't grab his crotch to simulate mas turbation. Nothing like that. He was always polite, even when we told him we were ardent Roman Catholics and wanted nothing to do with the Jehovah's Witness people."

Michael had just turned nine when Joe drove his sons to New York to perform at the fabled Apollo Theater. Louis Armstrong, Count Basic, Josephine Baker; each of those legends had appeared at the Apollo.

That night, the Jackson brothers won the Apollo's amateur night contest. "I have a date with destiny," Michael told the manager of the Apollo in one of the most melodramatic statements ever uttered by a nine-year-old. But, as those in show business and later the public were to learn, little pre-pubescent Michael Jackson was no average boy.

On one of the hottest August nights in New York, in 1967, The Jackson 5 faced "the toughest audience in the world," although the same is said for the patrons of La Scala in Milan.

Other "first timers" who broke in, appearing before the notoriously raucous audiences of the Apollo Theater, were Sarah Vaughan, Billie Holiday, Leslie Uggams, and Ella Fitzgerald.

To Joe's amazement, his boys got a standing ovation instead of being booed off the stage.

More bookings followed their win at the Apollo. The Jackson 5 hit Chicago, appearing at the Regal. In Philadelphia Joe got them a booking at the Uptown.

Upon their return to the Apollo, The Jackson 5 brothers were paid for their performance. On the same bill was Michael's role model, James Brown, the "King of Soul."

That night Michael stood in the wings, watching Brown's every move. It is said that Michael learned to "whiplash" a mike into place or "motorize a shuffle" across the stage by watching Brown do it first.

James Brown

In Rolling Stone, writer Gerri Hirshey claimed that "Michael's kindergarten was the basement of the Apollo Theater in New York. He was too shy to actually approach the performers The Jackson 5 opened for. He crept downstairs, along passageways and walls and hid there, peering from behind the dusty flanks of old vaudeville sets while musicians tuned, smoked, played cards, and divided barbecue. Climbing back to the wings, he stood in the protective folds of the musty maroon curtain, watching favorite acts, committing every double dip and every bump, snap, whip-it-back mike toss, to his inventory of night moves."

The writer was right. The Jackson 5, especially Michael, studied all the top talent of the day, especially James Brown. Michael later recalled that seeing Brown perform for the first time was "a magical night."

Brown was an unlikely role model for Michael, but nonetheless he was called "the Godfather of Soul." Born in Barnwell, South Carolina, he once served 26 months in prison for leading police on a high-speed chase in Georgia in 1988.

Like Michael in the future, Brown too would face charges of sexual abuse. But Michael couldn't have cared less about Brown's personal troubles. Even though still a kid, he knew greatness in a performer when he saw it. His judgment about Brown came true when the performer Michael so admired was voted the seventh greatest rock 'n' roll artist of all time by Entertainment Weekly.

An icon of the music industry, Brown had a great influence on soul music in the 1960s, funk music in the 70s, and rap music in the 80s. Michael avidly followed his hero's career. In 1992 Brown received a Lifetime Achievement Grammy Award.

That night at the Apollo, when Brown learned that Michael was checking out his every move, he asked to meet

"that kid watching me."

Introduced to Brown, Michael was so in awe of his idol that he couldn't utter a sound. Sensing the problem, Brown did all the talking, even taking time to give Michael some advice. "Always keep changing your hair style-that way, the public will keep noticing you. And always stay thin by taking a lot of laxatives. Shit away the fat!"

In the weeks to come, Michael would be hailed as a "pint-sized James Brown."

"Right from the beginning, audiences responded to Mike," Jackie later said. "At the time he was into that James Brown stuff. He was a born mimic. He stole ideas from entertainers everywhere. He could see a performer do some trick just one time, and then he could immediately do the same thingit was amazing."

Michael and his brothers studied every move, every nuance the competition made. They often appeared on the same bill as The Temptations. With their close-cropped hair, The Temptations bounced onto the stage in their tight-fitting sharkskin suits and pointed Italian shoes. For their really big appearances, Motown's director, Berry Gordy Jr. insisted that the singers wear snappy, form-fitting tuxedos.

The Jackson brothers also appeared with such acts as Smokey Robinson and The Miracles, Little Anthony and The Imperials, and-more significantly-Gladys Knight and The Pips.

Gladys Knight and The Pips

"Michael picked up all our dance steps," Gladys Knight recalled. "He was like a sponge taking it all in. It was amazing how he could watch a routine and then make it part of his own repertoire, giving whatever he'd learned an original twist."

The Jackson brothers struggled to acquire an education while constantly performing, often far away from home.

"Most of our lives we had private schooling," Michael said. "I only went to one public school in my life-and that was in Gary. I tried another one in Los Angeles, but it didn't work out. We'd be in our class and a bunch of fans would break into the classroom. We'd come out of school and there'd be a bunch of kids waiting to take our pictures. Stuff like that. I stayed at that school for only one week. That's all we could take. After that, we had to enroll in private schools."

Katherine feared that time might be running out for her boys. "In a few years they'll look old and fat. They've got to make it now, especially since Michael looks so adorable." She forced her husband to record a demo tape and send it to Motown's founder, Berry Gordy Jr. But nothing ever came of it.

Bobby Taylor and The Vancouvers

By July of 1968, success of a modest sort had come for The Jackson 5 when they made another appearance at the Regal in Chicago, opening for Gladys Knight and The Pips. That performance earned them their most recognition to date as well as acclaim in the press.

"Everyone thinks we started at the top," Marlon said. "But we traveled around for five years before that. Five brothers and two sisters, all crammed into a Volkswagen van."

Gladys even called Gordy, her boss at Motown, to come and look at the show. He agreed to attend just to see her perform. He arrived in time to catch the end of The Jackson 5 appearance. "A very derivative act," he later said. "I'm underwhelmed. Let them keep learning their trade on the chitlin' circuit."

Role model, Diana Ross

He was referring to Apollo clone theaters across America that booked only black acts. On that chitlin' circuit, the Jackson brothers continued to find gigs-at least sometimes-but no stardom.

Over the years the accusation that Michael was a "midget" has been attributed to such popular acts as Sam and Dave or the Isley Brothers. It is not clear at this point who started the rumor, but word soon traveled the circuit that Michael was indeed a midget, and that Papa Joe was palming him off on audiences as a child.

In spite of Gladys Knight's promotion, Gordy at Motown sent word that "ol' Joe could take his boys and shove them where the sun don't shine." But another producer, Gordon Keith, agreed to sign the boys to his Steeltown label.

In April of 1968, their record, "Big Boy," was heard over WWCA radio in Indiana. "It didn't set the world on fire," Joe later recalled, "but it sold some copies."

Bypassing Gordy, Gladys Knight and performer Bobby Taylor got Ralph Seltzer, also a producer at Motown, to grant Joe's talented sons an audition in Detroit, not only headquarters of the U.S. automobile industry, but the home of Motown Records. In this unlikely setting, the studio was turning out hit records for Marvin Gaye, Stevie Wonder, and, of course, The Supremes with Diana Ross.

If Katherine became jubilant at the sound of Heaven, Joe responded in equal fashion to the word "Motown." It was not only the hottest record label in America, but evoked just how far a black entertainer could advance in show business. Joe once told Berry Gordy Jr.: "To me, Motown means that a black man can live in a fancy mansion with white servants, have money in his pocket, a hot pussy in his bed, and three big cars in the garage. It also means that my sons might one day have the name recognition of Frank Sinatra, Bing Crosby, and Dinah Shore."

Michael remembered "shakin' like a leaf in the wind" when he was brought before Seltzer to perform at the same sound studio where The Supremes, Stevie Wonder, and The Four Tops had scored big. After the band's performance of several songs was filmed, Seltzer thanked the boys for coming and shook Joe's hand. "We'll call you," he said, making it sound like a dismissal. Seltzer wasn't going to commit himself until he got the tape to Gordy.

Gordy was "forced" to sit through the film. At its end, he immediately instructed his staff to "sign them up. That little Michael's going to be a big star. Bigtime, that is."

When Gordy signed The Jackson 5, Michael was only ten years old. "But he had as much talent as Sammy Davis Jr., and Sammy boy was about as good as it gets," Gordy said. "In time, Michael will be even bigger than Sammy."

Thanks to earnings from their road trips, the Jackson family finally had a phone to receive the call from Seltzer, telling them to "get your asses back to Detroit," where boilerplate contracts awaited The Jackson 5. Without reading it, Joe signed for his sons on March 11, 1969. Gordy himself had bought out The Jackson 5 contract from Steeltown Records for a small amount of money. Gordon Keith later referred to the settlement as "peanuts."

If Joe had read the contract he'd signed, he would have learned that his boys would be getting a royalty of only 2.7 percent, the industry low.

Gordy mandated that, for the purposes of PR and media, he wanted it to be broadcast that The Jackson 5 had been discovered not by Gladys Knight but by Diana Ross. Ross had just achieved her 12th Number One hit for Motown, and was "hot." Already famous, Ross would, in time, become the best-selling female vocalist in music history. As such, her fictitious involvement in their "discovery" would add an attention-getting boost to Motown's introduction of The Jackson 5.

Michael idolized Ross. "She moves on stage like a panther and when she smiles her teeth shine like diamonds," he said. Before meeting her, he changed his clothing five times before arriving at a Christmas party at the Gordy mansion in Detroit. Gordy had booked the Jackson brothers to entertain his starstudded party held at this million-dollar residence with its marble floors and Grecian columns. Actually, at the time of the party, the house no longer func tioned as Gordy's main residence, as he'd moved to Los Angeles where he was deeply involved in a romance with Ross.

In her white silk gown, with sparkling diamond earrings, Ross made her appearance before the Jackson brothers. She was truly "The Supreme" of The Supremes.

She immediately gravitated to Michael, sensing he was the star of the family. "Cute boys are so delicious," she said, bending down to plant a kiss on Michael's cheek.

"I'll never wash my face again, Miss Ross," he told her.

"I insist on most people calling me Miss Ross," she told him. "But to you, it's Diana."

"Yes, Miss Ross."

"As Humphrey Bogart told Claude Rains in Casablanca, I think this is going to be the beginning of a beautiful friendship."

"Who is Humphrey Bogart?"

"Bogie?" she asked in astonishment. "You've never heard of him? Kid, I've got to take you under my wing. You've got a lot to learn."

For the early part of the evening, Michael followed Ross around the mansion. He was shown a portrait Gordy had commissioned of himself as Napoleon, dressed in full military regalia.

She felt uncomfortable with this young boy because of his constant stares. "He was soaking up my every move like a sponge with his wide eyes," she later said. Finally, she pinched his cheek aggressively, nicknaming him "saucer eyes."

The Jackson brothers, with Michael front and center

Wandering through Gordy's mansion, Jackie was also awed. "I'm sure the Queen of England doesn't live in such a big place. Out back was a golf course. There was also an indoor swimming pool. I'd heard rumors about nekked swim parties. I was scared shitless. All the big Motown stars were there that night to hear us. And here we were. So many little black brothers singing the same songs these dudes had already made famous."

> The night was a success as the Jackson brothers performed before such Motown pros as Smokey Robinson and The Temptations. Joe later told Katherine, "I think these high-ridin' daddies were just a bit nervous hearing my boys for the first time. Maybe jealous, as they witnessed firsthand tomorrow's competition."

Miss Ross

> While the careers of the Jackson brothers were being launched, there was trouble brewing in the family, if published reports are to be believed. In 1994, Simon & Schuster published Unauthorized, a book about Michael Jackson by biographer Christopher Andersen, whose other works include Madonna Unauthorized and Jagger Unauthorized.

In this shocker, which we assumed was vetted by S&S's attorneys for libel, appears this quotation: "While La Toya lay shivering next to Rebbie in bed, Joe would, according to La Toya, climb in with them."

Around the time Ross was introducing the brothers in Detroit, Andersen quotes La Toya as claiming that her father molested her and her older sister, Rebbie. "My father was like an animal," La Toya allegedly said. "I was ten or eleven at the time," the quote continues. "He'd say dirty things and touch my body inside my clothes. And I had to touch him in certain places."

The older sister, Rebbie, as well as family members, have denied these accusations. On the surface, they are libelous. But no charges were ever brought against Joe, and he never sued Andersen or S&S for libel.

As serious as these charges are, there were even more explosive accusations that followed.

At the time of Michael's sham marriage to Lisa Marie Presley, his publicist, Bob Jones, had to deal not only with that make-believe union but with another story that a newspaper tabloid was set to reveal. A reporter had come upon charges that Joe also molested Michael when he was a small child. Jones categorically denied such charges and was able to suppress the story, even though accusations were aired over late-night talk radio.

Of course, Jones would have no way of knowing whether these accusations of molestation were true or not. In his book, Michael Jackson: The Man Behind the Mask, Jones did report on a confrontation he had with Michael.

He quotes the singer as saying, "How do you know that thing with Joseph never happened?" A valid question, of course. Not getting a straight answer from Michael, Jones asked himself a question: "Was he telling me the story was true? He certainly acted in a manner that wouldn't confirm or deny."

Jones, who knew Joe Jackson, found the molestation charges "hard to believe."

But the rumors persisted. Some pop psychologists in talk shows have pointed out that child molesters in case studies were often the victims of molestation in their youths. Like many other episodes in Michael's life, these molestation charges, including those from La Toya, remain a mystery.

No sooner had these charges that Joe molested Michael been suppressed than yet another shocking story emerged. Whether true or not, the Jackson family could be counted on by tabloids for a scandal du jour. Although much has been written about the family in "Second Coming headlines," some of the most explosive stories were never printed.

Also around the time of his marriage to Lisa Marie, there were allegations floating around that as a pre-pubescent, Michael was "pimped" to pedophiles within the record industry as a means of promoting the advance of The Jackson 5. There is no evidence that this is true but the rumors-some of them quite convincing-still persist.

To our knowledge, the only person who tried to sell such a story was a sleazy record producer we'll call John Stoffer, who worked the Detroit music industry for some twenty years. He approached the National Enquirer with a very detailed account of how a nine-year-old Michael was allegedly delivered to his hotel room in Detroit. His account didn't specify who made the delivery.

For a fee of ten thousand dollars, Stoffer was willing to tell all. In his report, he gave a very detailed and specific account of how he'd allegedly sodomized young Michael. "The boy cried through the ordeal and even bled," Stoffer claimed. "But I liked that. You see, I'm quite small down there. I used to be basically straight, but several women laughed at the size of my organ. I turned to young boys-very young because I achieved great satisfaction in penetrating their tight, virgin butts. Michael was no exception. He was real tight. When I saw the pain I was causing him, it goaded me on and made me feel like more of a man."

Although Stoffer offered times, dates, and places that checked out, his charges could not be proven. The staff at The Enquirer decided not to publish the scoop, considering it too undocumented for publication. However, Stoffer did help promote and publicize The Jackson 5 and was instrumental in getting radio stations to play the group's records. In his dossier, Stoffer said that Michael was "delivered" to him on three different occasions, and that "each time the boy cried when he was penetrated."

A member of the Enquirer staff said, "We've published more stories about Michael Jackson than about any other modern celebrity, enough for our own book about the star called Freak! But what we've published is only a grain of sand on the beach. The Enquirer has been approached countless times by people trying to sell stories about Jacko. Some of them were obvious frauds. Others were quite convincing, but too shocking even for the Enquirer. Incidentally, I no longer work there."

On the road, traveling from "blood bucket" to "blood bucket," Michael learned about sex from his father. It wasn't exactly a healthy introduction.

Joe was a known womanizer. With Katherine safely tucked away at home, he could indulge his passions with other women, often quite young ones. Many women found him attractive, and he did possess sexual charisma.

Joe often flaunted his dates in front of his boys, sometimes bringing them back to his sons' bedrooms where the young women could give "my boys baby kisses and tuck them in for the night." Whenever that happened, Michael would turn over and bury his head in the pillow so he wouldn't have to kiss "one of Joe's whores." The other brothers were only too willing to be kissed on their mouths.

When the brothers stopped playing the honky-tonks, they were booked into black theaters as opening acts for performers who included James Brown, The Temptations, and Gladys Knight and The Pips. The Jackson 5 appeared in theaters from Boston to Kansas City, and from Washington, D.C., to Tucson.

Motown stardom wasn't forthcoming as month dragged into endless months. Gordy just wasn't pleased with any sound The Jackson 5 recorded. One song-a rip-off of The Temptations-was recorded forty times with no satisfaction. The boys still lived in Gary, whose streets were giving way to the violence of an increasingly powerful drug culture. One night two thieves cornered Joe staggering home in the early hours. Thugs hit him over the head, removing the fifty dollars he carried in his wallet.

In Gordy's bank vault rested the contract that Joe had signed without reading it. Motown's chief honcho was now ready to start exercising the options granted to him. He decided the time had come to order the Jackson brothers to Los Angeles, where they would be directed to start recording at Motown's new studio. Gordy told Ross, "If Jackson had read the fucking contract, he would have found that I owned his gold teeth and the air the Jackson boys breathe. The only one in the group that's got any talent is the midget." This was an obvious reference to Michael. "That one's gonna set the world on fire. Sooner than later."

In a large van-made in Detroit, of course-Joe drove to California carrying Johnny Jackson (no relation), the group's drummer, and Ronny Rancifer, the keyboardist. Michael, along with three of his brothers, were given economy class air tickets to Los Angeles.

Along with eight-year-old Randy, the Jackson sisters as well as Katherine were left behind in Gary until Joe "could get the lay of the land," in Gordy's words. Later, a Motown executive in Los Angeles privately said, "California wouldn't be the only lay that Joe was scoping out."

As the plane flew over America's heartland, Michael was only ten years old with a birthday fast approaching.

On a smog-shrouded morning in Los Angeles-August 9, 1969 to be exact-Michael and his brothers landed in Los Angeles. On the way into town from the airport, Michael looked in awe at all the fast-moving cars, the palm trees, the oranges, the grand mansions. His eyes widened as he told Jermaine: "I have truly found Oz. No harm will ever come to me here."

One of Gordy's assistants delivered the boys not to a mansion but to a "hot bed" hotel on Santa Monica Boulevard, which was teeming with hookers, both male and female. Michael was given a room to share with Jermaine and Marlon. On the way to the dump, he heard through the paper-thin walls one woman telling someone: "That's twisted!"

In five weeks Gordy ordered that the boys be moved to another seedy address, the Hollywood Motel, which stood across from the famous Hollywood High, which so many children of stars had attended. By the late 1960s, the neighborhood had deteriorated. Drug pushers had moved in along with pimps recruiting the best-looking boys and girls to work as prostitutes. In a back alley, Michael spotted a blue-jeaned boy of sixteen or so standing against a wall while a balding, late middle-aged man performed fellatio on him.

It was while living at the Hollywood Motel that Michael began his famous practice of wearing sunglasses, even at night. "It's best to keep shaded day and night," he told Marlon. "That way no one can see the whites of your eyes. What you're really thinking. With sunglasses, you can hide from the world."

The boys worked almost constantly in Motown recording studios, although their songs still didn't please Gordy. On their first weekend off, Joe drove his sons to Disneyland. Michael fell under the spell of The Magic Kingdom. Joe laughed when Michael vowed that he was going to make so much money one day that he'd create a Disneyland just for his own pleasure.

On a command from Gordy, Joe drove his boys to the home in the Hollywood Hills where Diana Ross was living until Gordy could arrange for more luxurious digs in Beverly Hills-"a residence that is more fitting for a star of your magnitude."

As the boys sat in awe within Ross's living room, Gordy gave them the good news. "I know I haven't really liked anything you've recorded so far. But hang in there. I'm gonna make you black brothers the greatest thing since shit on a stick."

Gordy was a genius in sensing the gap in American culture that the Jackson brothers could fill. As British critic Simon Frith put it: "What Gordy realized was that out there was a generation of black kids with money to spend and feet to dance and walls to hang pictures on. There had never been soul idols for clean-living black teens before, only sports figures and Martin Luther King Jr. Motown was going to give these kids idols and music and posters and fan magazines and T-shirts and TV shows and everything else."

At her home in the Hollywood Hills, Ross made a more spectacular appearance before Michael than she had at Gordy's Detroit mansion.

Michael would always remember her outfit, a black bolero jacket, a purple-colored lace blouse, and skin-tight toreador pants, along with towering stiletto high heels still known at the time as "Joan Crawford fuck-me shoes."

He compared her to a "Black Venus," whereas Jermaine told his brothers, "I got a hard-on that lasted for three days and nights."

Michael read that "the sensational eight-year-old Michael Jackson would be featured." "Miss Ross," he said. "There's a mistake. My age is given wrong here. On August 29, I'll be eleven years old."

As her surprise, Ross told the Jackson brothers that she was going to present them at the famous disco of the moment, Daisy, on North Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, the nighttime stamping grounds of stars that ranged from Mia Farrow to Peter Lawford. Ross handed Michael an invitation she'd sent out to tout Hollywood to attend the gala on the night of August 11, 1969.

Michael, aged 16

"As an eight-yearold, you'll be even more of a sensation," Gordy said. "This is show business, kid. It's all about image. The press will think you're a child prodigy like Mozart."

"Darling," Ross told the impressionable boy, "a certain liberty must be taken with the truth. It's not exactly a lie. It's just a mask to wear. Everybody in Hollywood uses a mask to deceive the world. You'll get the hang of it. One day you'll be deceiving the world like a pro."

In addition to being a great entertainer, Ross could have made a decent living as a prophet.

"Speaking of images, kid," Gordy told Michael. "Forget all that crap about you little studs being discovered by Gladys Knight. What a pip! Forget Bobby Taylor. That dude's history. From now on, it was Diana Ross who discovered you. Chalk that one up for the history books."

By the official count, 312 "intimate" friends of Ross crowded into the chic disco cum private club known as Daisy. The fire department had posted a warning, allowing the club to hold only 250 patrons at one time. It was rumored that Frank Sinatra even slipped in that night unnoticed, although other reports placed him in New York.

Exactly at ten o'clock in their Sherwood Forest green suede boots with forest green vests, the "Jackson brothers looked like dancing black faggots as they zip-a-dee-do-dah-ed on stage," a stoned writer from Rolling Stone said privately. The audience of show biz veterans went wild in their enthusiasm.

The most unlikely guest in the audience was Charlton Heston, who would later become a friend of Michael in a case of "the odd couple." Heston, an advocate of "a gun in every home," later claimed that, "I was awed by their performance. The Jacksons project a squeaky clean image. They were making their debut at a time that rock-and-roll reigned supreme. All the hippies were taking drugs but the Jacksons proved there was hope for American youth yet. In my opinion, The Jackson 5 can be an antidote to all the poisonous shit going on."

As the chic crowd milled about after the show, Ross became a one-woman public relations factory for the Jackson brothers, especially for Michael, who was introduced as "the sweet one."

"Jermaine is the sexy one," she claimed.

In front of one woman from a Los Angeles magazine, Ross ran her hand through Michael's Afro. "Don't you just adore it?" she asked.

The greatest accolade came from a Hollywood newspaper which proclaimed: "We predict The Jackson 5, especially pint-sized Michael, will dominate popular music in the 70s."

"Whatever it took to get the song done right, he was willing to go the distance. And that was impressive, since he was still just a little kid. "

--Hal Davis

"He spends a lot of time, too much by himself. I try to get him out. I rented a boat and took my children and Michael out on a cruise. Michael has a lot of people around him, but he's very afraid. I don't know why. I think it came from his early days. "

--Diana Ross

"Just the other day, you were a 9-year-old kid auditioning for me, and now here you are, the greatest entertainer in the world. Here you are the greatest entertainer in the world, presenting me with an award. Michael, Michael, I believed in you when you were nine. I believe in you now. And I will never stop believing in you. "If Michael Jackson came in this room right now, there would be no one in this room who could not stop looking at him. As long as you've got that power, you're never damaged. He has that power over anybody. If people can't stop looking at you, you're so interesting to people, there's no way you can be damaged. "

Chapter Two

In just a few short weeks, as the first winds of autumn blew into Southern California, The Jackson 5 would make their TV debut on ABC's Hollywood Palace. When asked about her alleged "discovery" of the Jackson brothers, Ross told the press, "I don't mind letting the boys ride to fame on my skirttails."

Wanting money and glory for his sons, Joe demanded twelve-hour daily rehearsals. He controlled the group's every move, utterance, song number, and first press conference. "You've heard of stage mothers," said Gordy. "Joe was the granddad of all stage fathers. At times I got so mad at the fucker, I thought he'd descended directly from Hell." Gordy also claimed that he felt Joe wanted to isolate his sons from the outside world.

Gordy wanted to launch the boys with a hit record, and Joe was determined to see that the Motown honcho got his wish.

Gladys Knight was not credited as the eagle eye who'd first spotted the talent of the Jackson brothers. She also saw a potential hit song, "I Want to Be Free," taken away from her by Gordy and reshaped for The Jackson 5. It was later retitled, "I Want You Back."

"I was angry," Knight recalled. "Really angry. I felt I'd become chopped liver at Motown. Ali, show business! It's all in the game."

Gladys Knight and The Pips had been added to the Motown "stable of Soul" in 1966. From Atlanta, they scored many hits and stayed with Motown for seven years. Ironically, their biggest hit, "Midnight Train to Georgia," would come after the group bolted from Motown and signed with Buddha.

Although he hadn't officially moved out of Detroit, Gordy had purchased a home from Tommy Smothers, also in the Hollywood Hills. That way, he could slip away for nights spent in the arms of Ross, who lived nearby.

One night as he was watching Michael rehearse with his brothers, Gordy told Joe: "Michael's just a kid but he sings James Brown's `I Got the Feelin' with such feeling, inspiration, and pain. It's like he's experienced everything he's singing about, even though he's too young to know about adult emotions. Brown, on the other hand, knows all emotions."

That night, Gordy decided that Michael needed a lot more polish. At dinner the producer had noticed Michael still eating with his hands instead of using a knife and fork. "The kid is going to be a star," he told Joe. "To achieve that goal, he's gotta learn to behave like a star. I'm moving him in with Diana. He can watch what she does. Her polish and refinement will rub off on the boy. I just know it."

Miss Ross

Although Katherine objected, Joe moved Michael into Ross's Hollywood Hills home. The self-absorbed diva had little time for a growing boy, as she was completely involved in her own career. She was at a pivotal point, breaking away from The Supremes to become a solo performer.

Katherine's primary objection involved having her impressionable young son live in the same household where Ross was carrying on "a tumultuous Ava Gardner/Frank Sinatra type of affair." Gordy was married at the time.

The first night Michael spent in Ross's house, she warned him about the dangers of show business. "I think you're going to make it in show businessand make it big. For a while, fans will build you up-even the media. But there's a dark side to all of this. The press likes to build up people only to tear them down. Show business brings many things, fame and fortune among them. But it also exposes you to the world. Your darkest secrets might end up one day on the front page of some tabloid. Show business can hurt you, it can devastate you. It can become your worst nightmare. Fame carries such a terrible price that I sometimes wonder if it's worth it."

In her warning to Michael, Ross might have been seeing a vision of her own future. In the years to come, it became popular to bash her in the press. Both her persona and her music were trashed. She was often referred to even in print as a "bitch." Many of her black fans attacked her for "losing her blackness" by marrying white men. In the words of a security guard at Chi-Chiz, a black men's gay bar on Christopher Street in New York City, "There are three subjects so controversial, you should never, ever bring them up: Religion, politics, and Diana Ross."

Michael listened politely to his mentor, perhaps not truly believing her. Later he'd say, "To me, performing is like a dream come true. You live in grand mansions. You're driven around in fancy cars. You can buy all the clothes you want. You never have to go hungry again. No more settling for a bowl of tomato soup with a sweet roll for a meal. How can show business harm you? It can only reward you. As for the press, I think those guys will find me adorable. After all, I'm sorta cute. Besides, I have no dark secrets that would make tabloid headlines."

After a night spent in Ross's guest bedroom, Michael woke up refreshed and eager to get on with his career. Over breakfast, he told Ross, "I dreamed of a Neverland called California, never really knowing it existed. Maybe it was all a dream, like Oz." Once again, he compared California to Oz. "Now, this morning, my dream has come true."

Impatient to get to a recording studio, Ross patted his head after eating one scoop of low-fat cottage cheese and a dry piece of Melba toast. "Just you be careful that dream doesn't become a nightmare." As a final warning, she said, "And don't leave any doors and windows open. Stay in the house!"

Instead of "California Dreaming," most Hollywood celebrities at the time were obsessed with serial killings.

Ross herself seemed to live in fear and had stationed two security guards outside her home along with ferocious, man-eating guard dogs. The rich and famous of Hollywood, Bel Air, and Beverly Hills were also hiring bodyguards. When the supply in Los Angeles was exhausted, many guards were flown in from as far away as Tennessee.

Sharon Tate and six of her guests had been slaughtered by the drugcrazed, Satan-worshipping "family" of a lunatic, Charles Manson, who originally wanted to kill Doris Day and her son, Terry Melcher. Celebrities feared that other death squads in that drugged era would emulate the Manson family and also go on killing sprees, torturing and murdering victims. At every Hollywood party, the grisly tales of the murders were retold, even exaggerated, with a vivid recounting of the tortures the victims were forced to endure before their slaughter.

"Imagine," actor Gregory Peck asked friends, "being forced to eat our genitals before dying."

Michael didn't listen to all this talk and felt no fear. "I feel California is the safest place in the world," he said. "I saw a lot of horrible things before coming here. Those terrible dives that Joe booked us into. Here the sun shines brightly on us. America's going to love us, especially me."

During his first week in Ross's home, Michael watched her rehearse "Someday We'll Be Together," which would not only be her farewell song with The Supremes but would become a hit record.

Michael's first insight into heterosexual marriage had come from his own dysfunctional parents. In the Ross household, he learned about the rocky course of straight, off-the-record love affairs. When they weren't making love, Gordy and Ross were often fighting.

At Gordy's suggestion, her group was already being billed as Diana Ross and The Supremes instead of The Supremes. Under that label, the group with Ross as its lead singer had racked up at least a dozen hit records. Ross believed that she could do even better on her own.

Gordy and Ross had intense, often violent, arguments about the course of her career. He wanted her to be a crossover success, reaching more affluent audiences such as the largely white fans who flocked to hear big name entertainers in Las Vegas. She feared she'd lose her following of black devotees if she appeared to desert them. She also wondered about the future of The Supremes without her.

Perhaps Michael learned his lessons well ... or not. He too would one day break from his brothers to pursue a solo career, and he, too, would be charged with deserting his black audiences in pursuit of pop-read that "white"-fans.

In the days ahead, little Michael hid behind draperies or behind a sofa as he watched Ross's every move performed before a full-length mirror. He was spying on her every gesture, her every subtle motion. She was the embodiment of feline grace. He listened for every note coming from her thin voice, and in time would incorporate every oooh into his own music.

"Michael was Eve Harrington to Diana's Margo Charming," Gordy later said. He was referring to the 1950 movie, All About Eve. In that film, Bette Davis played an aging actress, with Eve (Anne Baxter) waiting in the wings to go on stage in her place.

Michael was a fast learner. "He took the best of Diana Ross and the best of James Brown, and threw in every move Jackie Wilson ever made," Gordy recalled.

One day Smokey Robinson showed up at the Motown studios and watched the Jackson brothers perform.

Having seen them on stage before, he was awed at how they'd improved and perfected their act since coming to California. In his autobiography, Smokey-Inside My Life, published in 1989, he wrote that Michael was the biggest talent since Ross-"and the accompaniment of his brothers, bad-ass singers and dancers themselves," only sweetened the stew pot.

On the few nights Ross was ever alone with Michael, she discussed her career concerns with him, especially about breaking from The Supremes. Even though he was at a tender age, she sensed he had a "gut instinct" about show business. After urging her to perform solo, he told her to "Go, girl go!" And she did.

The Jackson 5

On October 18, 1969, on Hollywood Palace, she introduced The Jackson 5 to America. Much of black America tuned in. So did millions of white Americans-potential new fans-hearing The Jackson 5 for the first time. A soul ballad, "Can You Remember?," was undistinguished. But when Michael sang, "Oooh, baby, give me one more chance," a line from "I Want You Back," he went over big. At long last, black teenagers in America had someone to identify with in an era of black pride. "The kids identified with them not as stars, but as contemporaries fulfilling their own fantasies of stardom," said Steve Manning, a long-time Jackson family retainer.

When the song was released as a single, it climbed slowly up the charts, becoming number one in the nation by January of 1970, when it topped "Raindrops Keep Falling on My Head" on Billboard charts.

"`I Want You Back' took off like an aural steamroller," wrote Stewart Reagan. "It took off like a rocket and exploded with a nervous, frenetic pace that wouldn't let up. Its energy and freshness was made irresistible by the desperate passion of Michael's vocal. Here was a boy screaming for mercy as if his life depended on it. It reached the parts other records couldn't reach."

At first The Jackson 5 appealed to prepubescent jumpers and screamers.

Rolling Stone joined in high praise for Michael after the release of "I Want You Back," still considered one of his greatest records. "Catalyzed by a red hot performance from ten-year-old Michael," a critic wrote, "the record explodes off the turntable with an intricate Sly-influenced arrangement featuring some of the toughest bass, drum, piano, guitar playing on any soul record anywhere."

All the Jackson brothers, especially Michael, owe a debt to Freddie Perren, a writer-producer who worked on such hits as "I Will Survive," recorded by Gloria Gaynor. Perren produced and co-wrote that mega-seller, "I Want You Back." Assisting him to make pop music history for the Jacksons were his partners, Deke Richards and Fonce Mizell. Of course, Berry Gordy was also looking over the shoulders of his creative team, who were scoring one pop single hit after another for the Jacksons in the early 70s. The team that produced these early Jackson hits was nicknamed "The Corporation."

Sammy Davis Jr., whom Michael had always idolized, was also a host on Hollywood Palace that night, and Michael met him there for the first time.

Davis had already heard of the boy's prodigious talent, which evoked his own memories as a child entering show business when he was far too young.

"Did anyone ever tell you you have Shirley Temple dimples?" he asked Michael. Michael was dumbfounded at meeting Davis and couldn't immediately formulate an answer.

Davis invited the boy to his dressing room. Around Davis, Michael didn't have to talk ... only listen.

"I paved the road for you, kid," Davis told him. "When I started out, I was told that a nigger could never make it big in show business, except on the chitlin' circuit. I crossed over and won over whitey. You can do the same. Of course, you'll always have the haters and hecklers in the audience. I face those nightly."

"But I want people to like me because of my talent, not judge me by the color of my skin," Michael said.

"A worthy ambition," Davis said. "Keep that thought."

At the end of their talk, there was a knock on Davis's door. It was the stage manager, announcing the arrival of the performer's date for the evening. Michael stepped aside as a shapely young woman, who evoked Marilyn Monroe, brushed past.

"One thing a crossover career means," Davis said, "is that after you've made it you can always fuck white. Which brings up the big question of the night: Are you gay?"

"If you mean homosexual, I am not!" Michael said adamantly. "I'm a Jehovah's Witness. Our religion is strongly opposed to any form of homosexuality. It is against God's teaching."

Davis laughed. "I didn't expect such an answer. Not in show business where all of us guys, even the straight ones, get our dicks sucked from time to time. Even Sinatra told me he lets a gay stagehand occasionally cop his joint."

"Good night, Mr. Davis," Michael said. "An honor meeting you."

As Davis watched Michael rush off to join his brothers, he turned to the stage manager and said, "The kid's definitely gay, even if he don't know it yet.

As Michael departed, Davis called to him, "This is the last time I'm gonna share the stage with a scene-stealing, thirty-five-year-old midget. Try to upstage me, will you?"

When a startled Michael turned back, Davis smiled, claiming, "I was just joking!"

Only fifteen minutes earlier, Michael had kept dancing when Davis clearly wanted him off the stage. Davis practically had to take the boy by the nape of his neck and shove him out of the spotlight.

There would always remain a friendly rivalry between Davis and Michael, but they became friends of a sort.

In an interview with People Extra, Davis said of Michael: "He takes a step that you've been doing and then by the time he switches it around, you don't even recognize it. There is nothing new about thrusting your hips out, but when he does that with quick moves, the high kick out and that slow back-up step he does, people say, `Jeez, what is he doing?' And he never lays on a move long enough for you to figure it out. I'm sure if he worked with Nureyev or Baryshnikov, he would come close to that level. Can he tap dance? I don't know. But then again I'd hate to leave my dancing shoes in his vicinity."

In Davis's autobiography, Why Me?, he said: "Michael used to come by my house-'Can I borrow some of your tapes, Mr. D.?' And he'd go to my library and take what he wanted of the shows I'd done. Visiting me in Monte Carlo in July of '88, he said, `Y'know, I stole some moves from you, the attitudes.' I'd known that. It's terribly flattering for the young to feel that way about you. Especially Michael, who I think is the ultimate professional. A lot of young performers have become multimillionaires on ten big records, but they don't know how to bow and get themselves off a stage. Everything Michael does on a stage, though, is exactly right."

After his boys appeared on Hollywood Palace, an angry Joe confronted Berry Gordy. "What is it with Ross?" he asked. "She introduced my boys as Michael Jackson and The Jackson 5. Michael is no more a star than any of my other sons. All my kids are stars. Jermaine one day will sell more records than Michael."

Gordy later asked Ross why she'd made such an introduction, virtually renaming the group. She said: "You've heard of Diana Ross and The Supremes? Now you've heard of Michael Jackson and The Jackson 5." She turned and walked away.

One night when Ross came home late, she was startled to hear the sound of her own voice. Live. She had to pause for one minute before she realized that wasn't her voice but that of Michael. She slowly slipped into the room where she rehearsed her music.

There in front of her full-length mirror was Michael dressed as herself in her red toreador pants and bolero jacket. He even wore her Joan Crawford fuck-me stiletto heels. He was singing in perfect imitation her "Rock-A-Bye Your Baby with a Dixie Melody," just as he'd heard it in 1966.

Ross walked over and abruptly cut off the music. Frightened, Michael turned around so fast he almost fell from his perch on those stiletto heels.

"Forget it, kid!" she said harshly. "There's room on this planet for only one Miss Ross." She stormed off toward her bedroom to call Gordy. "The kid's gotta go!" she shouted into the phone when she reached her lover.

In spite of this rejection, Michael was not to be deterred. In the years to come, he would continue to imitate Ross. When he became the chatelain of Neverland, he even insisted that his staff refer to him as "Miss Ross."

As the years went by, Michael began to rewrite the history of his stay at the home of Ross.

When he was in his late teens, he carried his imagination too far by suggesting that he had shacked up with Ross. "Diana Ross was my mother, my lover, and my sister-all combined in one amazing person." Mother, perhaps. Sister, perhaps. But not lover.

When Ross heard that, she was more amused than angry. "In his dreams!" was her only comment.

Gordy was shocked. "That's like Liberace claiming he had a long affair with Ava Gardner, and she told Twinkle-Toes that he was better in bed than Sinatra."

The story about a physical relationship between Michael and Ross is pure bunk. For starters, Ross is not a child molester. She never possessed any sexual interest in Michael, who was only eleven years old when he lived under the same roof with her. "He was just a cute kid I helped along the road to stardom," Ross said-and accurately so.

Motown Records' Berry Gordy, Jr.

Even though she has never publicly commented on Michael's sexuality, as a very hip woman she must have known for years where Michael's inclinations lay.

Ross had a more believable story to tell years later. "I looked at this little kid whirling around up there on stage, and I thought I was looking at myself. I couldn't believe it. I saw so much of myself as a child in Michael. He was performing all the time. That's the way I was. He could be my son."

After years of struggle, fame at last came to The Jackson 5. By December of 1969, the brothers made their debut album, trading once again on the fame of their sponsor, Diana Ross. Released in time for the Christmas buying market that year, the album was called Diana Ross Presents The Jackson 5, although she'd wanted to call it, Diana Ross Presents Michael Jackson and The Jackson 5. The album became the fastest-selling group record in the history of Motown.

To prick this promotional balloon, a critic for Rolling Stone wrote: "Given any kind of decent material at all, The Jackson 5 should be able to give us many years of good tight music. Who's this `Diana Ross' anyway?"

The opening sounds of "Zip A Dee Doo Dah" on their first album were played around the world. James Barker, a business traveler, remembered hearing the song at Heathrow Airport in London. When he got off the plane in Lagos, Nigeria, the same "Dee Doo Dah" sounds were heard. "My God," Barker said, "this Michael Jackson was just a kid and he could deliver a song with the evocative emotion of Marvin Gaye."

Barker, among millions of others, sensed what was happening. In spite of his age, the voice of Michael Jackson, a magnificent instrument, was destined to become an icon of pop music in the 1970s. Long before the release of his bestseller album, Thriller, Michael became a powerhouse at Motown, turning out some of its most memorable music. The Jackson 5 helped create a type of music called "bubblegum soul." Other "bubblegummers" included their white rivals, the Osmond Brothers, and the Partridge Family with David Cassidy and his stepmother, Shirley Jones.

While making Diana Ross Presents The Jackson 5, the entire Jackson family moved into a house that Gordy had leased for the brood at 1601 Queens Road in Los Angeles. Katherine and the other children arrived from Gary to hook up with family members. Ross personally drove Michael to his new home and said a brief "hello" to Katherine, who flown to Los Angeles with La Toya, Janet, and young Randy.

For Katherine, it was her first plane ride and her first palm tree. She hugged Michael to her breast. "With your real mother now in California, you will no longer need a substitute mother like Miss Ross. There's nothing like the real thing."

Less than two weeks before Christmas, Michael and his brother appeared on The Ed Sullivan Show singing not only "I Want You Back" but "Can You Remember?" It wasn't quite the sensation that Elvis Presley and The Beatles created. But all eyes were on Michael that night, which was fortunate because his brothers performed awkwardly-Jermaine, for example, warbling off-key. At his TV set, Berry Gordy, along with sixty million Americans, watched the program with avid interest. He later said, "Their tempo was off. I was devastated." As always, Gordy was being too much of a perfectionist. The public ate it up, heralding the arrival of a phenomenal new group.

Gordy demanded that the Jacksons come up with a second hit, and that's what he got when Michael and his brothers recorded "ABC." Michael's perfect voice sang, "Shake it, shake it, baby." Michael knew the moment he heard the lyrics that "ABC" was going to be another hit. Gordy was skeptical. Michael turned out to be right.

On February 24, 1970, "ABC" was released. The song featured a rapid and driving bass line underneath a shrill but dynamic vocal by Michael. Amazingly, he could be surprisingly convincing when he sang about love, even though sounding like a castrato.

In less than two months, it had knocked The Beatles' song, "Let It Be," off the top of the chart. Bubblegum boys or not, The Jackson 5 sold nearly 2'/z million recordings of that solo. The third recording of the Jackson boys sold nearly two million copies.

In Las Vegas when he heard all three songs, Frank Sinatra was livid.

"Teenybopper shit!" he proclaimed in anger, forgetting that in the early 40s, he, too, was a favorite of bobbysoxers.

From his suite, Sinatra asked two of his henchmen, "What do I think of Michael Jackson? I'll tell you: he's a God damn faggot pickaninny!"

When he heard of that insult from Sinatra, Michael shot back:

"Sinatra's very overrated. I just don't understand why he has fans. He might be a living legend, but it's not because of his voice, `cause he's not much of a singer. When was the last time he had a hit? Back in 1942?"

By June, the third solo of The Jackson 5, "The Love You Save," broke out at the top of the Billboard chart, knocking out The Beatles with their "The Long and Winding Road."

Jacksonmania swept America. With success came bookings all over the country, beginning with their first concert appearance on May 2, 1970 in Philadelphia. "My God," one policeman said, "you'd think Elvis has arrived in town with The Beatles as his back-up. I've never seen such pandemonium. I rescued one girl, no more than thirteen, who was almost trampled to death."

The same hysteria greeted the Jackson brothers wherever they went. In one case, police foiled the plot of some overeager girls to rush the stage and strip the brothers "buck-assed naked." At some of their more unruly concerts, fans disrupted the performance. One night, a loud-voice teenage girl shouted: "Whip out your big black dicks!"

With the release of their next album, also called ABC, The Jackson 5 continued the tour. The hysteria mounted. Michael tried to get used to screaming fans, the flashing dome lights, the sirens wailing, and limousines pushing forward into dense crowds. But he couldn't quite seem to adjust. His brothers adapted but he didn't, often breaking into tears or else sobbing screams when he felt he was going to be killed by the mobs.

In contrast, the older brothers enjoyed the adulation, especially from hysterical female fans eager to get laid by one of the brothers. "We are big-time. We'll be on top forever. Legends in the making, and pussy lined up from New York to California, all a man would ever want. Islamic men who sacrifice themselves for Allah are promised forty virgins in Heaven. Hell, man, that many virgins are available to each of us in every town." This quote, most often attributed to Jermaine, may be apocryphal.

When the neighbors got a petition together complaining about the noise from the Jackson's Queen Road house, Gordy moved them to an ugly but comfortable motel-like house on Bowmont Drive. The stucco house rested on stilts and was filled with chocolate brown shag carpeting and plastic furniture in neon colors of green and pink.

Even though reunited under one roof with his family again, Michael years later admitted the depth of his loneliness. "I used to sit in my room and cry. It was so hard to make friends. I was cut off from kids my own age, except for my brothers and sisters. They never had the same interests that I did. I had a lot of feelings in me that I could never talk about. I didn't even understand some of my own yearnings. I wanted to talk about them with someone understanding. I certainly couldn't go to my father. He would understand nothing, maybe even beat me up if I confided too much. I loved my mother but she was bound by her faith, one of the most faithful of the Jehovah's Witnesses. If I told her things, she might think the Devil had taken over my soul."

"An understanding heart" was on the way. When both Katherine and Joe were out of the house late one afternoon, Michael was sitting alone in his bedroom staring vacantly out the window.

Frank Sinatra, bobbysoxer favorite of the 40s.

All of a sudden, a Lincoln Executive limousine pulled into the driveway of the Jackson home. A pink-uniformed chauffeur in black boots with a gold hat got out from behind the wheel to open the door for the passenger in the rear. It was the next door neighbor, Liberace, at the time one of the world's most famous entertainers. Stepping out of the limousine, he was a vision in white silk lame. In the foyer, he announced to a Jackson household servant that he'd arrived to "see the wee one."

Michael rushed downstairs to meet one of his show biz idols. But Katherine didn't trust the effeminate, flamboyant entertainer alone with her son, although she was eventually persuaded to leave them together in the living room.

Holding Michael's hand, Liberace told the young boy that he couldn't stay as he was already late for a party at the home of Rock Hudson. He giggled at the thought of it. "I'll probably be asked to play an organ or two tonight." He giggled away, then flashed a wide grin. Michael was almost overcome by the heavy intoxicating smell of Liberace's perfume.

He invited Michael to come to dinner next week to "meet a special friend-she's more outrageous than moi," he said, "if that's possible." He jotted down Michael's phone number. "I'll call you to set up a night. Toodle- loo!" The performer sashayed out of the living room, descending toward the driveway where the dashingly handsome chauffeur already had the rear door open.

Michael could not contain himself with excitement waiting for the invitation to come through. He kept wondering who the special guest would be, figuring that Liberace by himself would be entertainment enough.

Knowing that Katherine would never let him attend a dinner party at Liberace's house, Michael kept the news of the invitation from his family. When Liberace called and set the date, Michael still remained mum. On the Tuesday night of the dinner, he pretended to have a headache and went to his bedroom early. But he slipped out of his room and walked down the street to the entertainer's house.

The young man who opened the door was the chauffeur, except this time he was attired in forest green slacks with a white shirt open to his six-pack waist. He introduced himself as Paul Richardson, and it is because of him, and his later revelations, that the world knows what transpired that night.

Emerging from the rear of the house was Liberace himself, wearing scarlet-colored lounging pajamas. To Michael, he extended a hand on which rested a large jewel-encrusted ring on each finger.

Before his special guest arrived, Liberace insisted on taking young Michael on a tour of the house. As he made his way toward the garden down a long hallway, Liberace pointed out the pieces of value, including a desk he claimed once adorned Versailles, the property of Louis XV. He also showed Michael his sumptuous bedroom. "The bed belonged to Rudolph Valentino. He was before your time. The great lover of the silent screen. Both of his wives were lesbians." Michael was impressed with the garden, particularly its large piano-shaped pool.

Back in the house, Michael had to go to the bathroom. Paul led the way. After carefully locking the door, Michael took in the chandelier-lit room, the walls covered with murals of naked men, some with excessively large genitalia.

Michael waited alone in the living room. Paul stood nearby ready to take the drink orders. Michael noticed the young man observing him closely. It was fifteen minutes before Liberace appeared again. "I had to change into something more spectacular," he said. "I called my guest, and she's wearing red. I decided to get rid of my own red and wear these champagne-colored lounging pajamas. That way, I'll blend in." Michael couldn't help but notice that the entire room was in champagne colors.

Liberace pounced on the sofa next to Michael, and took the boy's hand. "First, let me tell you that I love your music. You're gonna be a big star. Not as big as me, darling. But real big."

"Thank you, sir." Michael checked out the ruffled silk. "You look great!"

"Thanks," Liberace said. "After Elvis came along, I have to appear more outlandish than ever, topping him every time. Of course, my onstage outfits are far more fabulous. I have a different outfit designed every month because they tarnish so fast. I do, however, remove the diamond buttons from suit to suit."

"When I start having stage clothes designed for me, I'll stick to sequins," Michael said. "Right now Katherine buys for my brothers and me off the rack."

Liberace

Liberace looked over at Paul and winked lasciviously. "A Scotch for me and a Shirley Temple for Michael." When Paul came back, Liberace was lamenting about how many charity events he was asked to play at every week. "The same will happen to you," he predicted to Michael. "Don't do any. Never... but never associate yourself with some kind of disease."

Liberace had more advice. "Never take sides in anything, especially politics. If you take sides, you'll alienate large segments of your audience. No one knows if I'm a Republican or Democrat. Come to think of it, I don't know that myself."

"I'll remember that, sir."

"Just call me Cuddles, dear boy."

At that point the doorbell rang, and Paul went to answer it. Michael could hear the sound of male voices, but only a lady was ushered into the living room. He stared in awe as a bejeweled Mae West in a floor-length red gown with a white sable coat pranced in. "Liberace invited me to come up and see him sometime," West said, just assuming Michael knew who she was. "Tonight I'm here to check out Liberace's gold organ." Liberace was at her feet kissing a white-gloved hand. Taking note for the first time just how young Michael was, she issued a command. "Kid, write down everything I say tonight. When you grow up, read it. You'll understand it then."

As West seated herself in a winged armchair across from the two men, she carefully arranged herself. "I saw Liberace on one of his early TV shows and fell in love. When reporters asked me what I wanted for my birthday, I said Liberace. One day he shows up on my doorstep wearing a large red bow. `Here I am!' he said. `Your birthday present.'"

A dog ran into the room and headed for Michael where he proceeded to raise his leg and issue a squirt of piss. Liberace looked on, amused. "This is my favorite pet. A Lhasa Apso."

"I think he likes me," Michael said.

"I like you too," West cooed. "I caught your act on TV with that Ross creature. That one is a bit too uppity for her own good, but you were terrific."

Liberace seemed jealous that he was no longer the center of attention. Reclaiming the floor, he jumped up and headed for a 19th-century piano. "It once belonged to Frederic Chopin." He sat down and played "Mad About the Boy" from Noel Coward's repertoire, beaming his famous smile at Michael.

When Paul signaled that the butler was serving dinner, Liberace took a bow. Michael applauded. West did not. "Tonight we're having dear of Mum's potato pancakes," Liberace said. "I made the rock Cornish game hen with cherry sauce myself. All these recipes are going to be in my new book, Liberace Cooks!"

"I'm not the domestic type," West said, rising to her feet. "The boudoir is where I show my expertise. How about you, kid?"

"I just sing and dance," Michael said, following Liberace and West into the dining room lit by three antique Venetian chandeliers, one of which depicted a series of faces, each fashioned from black glass, that resembled Aunt Jemima.

Before seating Michael and West, Liberace pointed out the K on his silverware. "The set once belonged to President John F. Kennedy."

Somehow West made a romantic link in her head. "You know, that Marilyn Monroe bitch-speak of the dead-stole her whole act from me. I was singing about diamonds before she was born."

Over dinner and champagne-Michael was allowed to have one glass of bubbly-Liberace, his eyes twinkling, leaned over toward West. "There's this one rumor I want to know about. Do you have African-American roots? Did one of your ancestors pass for white?"

"I've heard that one a million times," she said, smiling at Paul who hovered nearby. "I'm not black. The rumor probably started because of my affinity for black music." She leaned over and patted Michael's hand. "Black music is the best there is."

"My parents always had progressive racial attitudes," she said. "We once entertained Bert Williams-of course, he was famous. I was just a little gal when I realized that black people are just like us, only of a different color. I've always believed that white men should not exploit women, black people, or gays." She smiled at Liberace.

"I grew up listening to ragtime," she said, continuing her monologue. "Ragtime is certainly rooted in African music. I remember when the Cakewalk, created by blacks, was the rage of the nation." She leaned toward Michael again. "Let me give you some advice, kid. You should develop a distinctive walk on the stage."

Did Mae West inspire Michael's future Moonwalk?

"I was a champion of blacks before it became fashionable," she went on. "I fought to get Duke Ellington cast in The Belle of the Nineties. I even was seen dining alone with Louis Armstrong, my reputation be damned. When a black performer was injured in a car accident in Las Vegas, I intervened and got treatment for the poor soul in a whites-only facility."

Mae West

When dessert arrived, West shooed it away, although Michael went in a big way for the baked Alaska.

West almost never drank alcohol except on this rare occasion. The champagne had made her tipsy. As the three of them settled into the living room, with Paul still hovering nearby, she provocatively asked Liberace: "Are you still against homosexuality like you said in that British court a decade ago?"

"Just because I wear fancy clothes and am a nonconformist, people always judge me," Liberace said.

"Let's cut out this horse manure," West said, "You're talking to your mama here. You're just as gay as those male chorines I cast in my play, Drag, way back when. Without you boys, I wouldn't have any fans left."

"You must understand, Mae, I'm trying to set a fine example before this impressionable young boy here."

He looked over at Michael. "You're just a little boy, and already I'm hearing rumors about you. Regardless of what the press writes about you, no matter how cancerous the innuendo, deny that you are a homosexual."

"Liberace's got a point," West chimed in. "I've spent years denying I'm a drag queen! Personally, I adore homosexuals. You might say I launched the gay movement by writing the first gay play. But, to me, homosexual sex is just a form of masturbation. A temporary relief of tension. No real satisfaction."

"Oh, Mae darling, if the boys could hear you say that," Liberace said. "They'd take away your crown as Queen of Sex."

"Not bloody likely, dearie," West said defensively. Ignoring Liberace, who seemed to have angered her, she focused once again on Michael. "Clean livin', kid, that's the answer, for a long career in show business. No drugs. Take an enema once or twice a day. There's putrid, poisonous matter in your body. I can't stand to take a shit that smells. Bad for my image. What if someone followed me into the crapper and it was all smelly? When you've cleaned yourself with an enema, and then you answer nature's call, your wastes are fresh - not putrid."

"Mae, are you trying to tell us your shit don't stink?" a drunken Liberace asked.

"It ain't Chanel Number 5," West said. "At its worst, perhaps the smell of beef stew."

"This has been a most enlightening evening for me," Michael said, "and I thank you for it. My parents might discover I'm missing, so I'd better be leaving. Miss West, meeting you and Mr. Liberace has been the grandest evening of my life. From now on, both of you in separate ways will be my role models."

"Thanks, dearie," West said. "The impersonators always do me."

"You couldn't have made a wiser choice than the two of us," Liberace said.

Michael, of course, never became another Liberace and certainly not another Mae West. But he passed his interest in West onto his younger sister, Janet, who in the future would deliver a brilliant impersonation of the fading star.

After his secret visit with two of the biggest legends in show business, it was back to work for Michael.

Michael's single, "Got to Be There," was released by Motown in 1970, following in the wake of the hit solo album by Donny Osmond, Michael's main competitor with young white girls. Michael later called it his "real breakthrough song; it was the one that said, `I'm here to stay!'"

Even though some Motown brass, including Gordy himself, feared that the song would fail, it, like the previous three singles, zoomed to number one on the charts, staying there for five weeks. "Got to Be There" was a ballad, and had "tender soul," in the words of one reviewer. Gordy liked the record but feared it wasn't a sound the public wanted to hear coming from the throat of Michael.

Michael's solo debut sparked jealousy among his brothers, especially Jermaine. A love song, it sold some 1'/z million copies. "It showed the world that Michael could do it on his own," Gordy said. "I felt he could be a big star just like Diana became when she broke from The Supremes. It must have sent a fright through his brothers, deflating their perpetual hard-ons." A month or so went by, but "Got to Be There" scored a bull's eye when Cash Box named it their number one hit.

One Motown executive claimed that "the Jackson brothers, especially that talented little Michael, in spite of his being a bit girlish, had become a meal ticket for Katherine and Papa Joe. He couldn't make it on his own as a musician, but he was living like a fat cat off his sons. He didn't relax either. He wanted more and more, and pushed his sons even harder than he had done in Gary. Michael had been out there on that stage shaking his ass since he was five years old. He was deprived of a childhood. I'm sure the experience ruined his life, as subsequent scandals proved."

In 1972, Michael used this hit song as the title of his first ever album, "Got to Be There," which also included "Rockin' Robin" and "Ain't No Sunshine." Sales were a modest 355,000 albums, although Gordy at Motown had anticipated a larger volume.

The Jackson 5 went on the road to promote their special sound and even broke attendance records at the Los Angeles Forum, selling almost 20,000 tickets. That night Michael did not endear himself to The Beatles, when he introduced "The Love You Save" as: "Here it is, the tune that knocked The Beatles out of number one." Even so, Michael and Paul McCartney would later become friends, then enemies.

Although their music was different, The Jackson 5 evoked The Beatles in the hysteria and pandemonium they caused on the road. One policeman in Los Angeles said, "The problem with The Jackson 5 was keeping them from being trampled to death. Kids pushed and shoved. If one of them fell to the ground, they were practically crushed under foot."

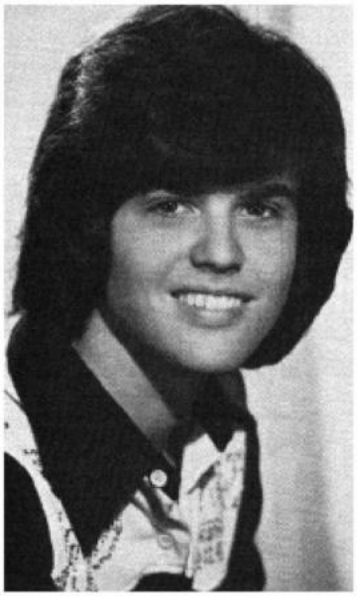
When The Jackson 5 stayed at a hotel, the manager had to double security. Young girls or even young women tried to break into their bedrooms, using any ruse or disguise. Often these impressionable fans pretended to be maids. Even the hotel's legitimate maids would steal the jockey shorts of the boys, not necessarily for themselves but to sell to fetish collectors. If a piss stain or a "skid mark" remained on the underwear, so much the better.

The Jackson 5 launched 1971 with a hit single, "Mama's Pearl," a return to bubblegum. Michael was extremely disappointed that after four number one hits, their latest release peaked at number two. Gordy told the brothers, "This is predictable. There's always next time."

Early in the year, the brothers made a sentimental visit back to Gary. Fans lined the streets of their old neighborhood, as their black limousine pulled up at 2300 Jackson Street, a thoroughfare which had carried that name long before the Jackson family ever made the address famous. After all the grand mansions they'd seen, their family home looked like a small hovel. Outside on the lawn, the neighbors had posted a big sign: WELCOME HOME, JACKSONS. KEEPERS OF THE DREAM.

That same year marked the biggest touring months ever for the brothers, as they played 45 cities that summer, plus another 50 cities before Christmas, an amazing feat. Wherever they went, they were hailed as "The Black Beatles." Berry was overheard telling associates at Motown: "Every time these brothers take a shit, gold nuggets drop out of their assholes!"

When they played Milwaukee, they attracted 115,000 fans to their concert. At New York's Madison Square Garden, all tickets to hear The Jackson 5 disappeared two weeks before they hit town. The night the brothers opened in New York, their show was disrupted after only ten minutes. According to The New York Daily News, "the barriers protecting the stage were smashed like so many pieces of kindling before the idol-crazed charge of pre-teen and teenage girls. Order had to be restored before the Jacksons could finish the concert."



Donny Osmond

As the 1970s dawned, Joe Jackson - the ultimate "stage father from Hell," as he was called - took pride in his accomplishments. All the beatings, all the rehearsals, all the terrorizing of his sons, had not made them love him. But he'd fine tuned the lavish talent of his sons. He had no regrets about his history of violence toward his children. "If I had it to do over again, I'd do it the same way," he said. "I don't want to brag, but looking at the kids, I think I've done a good job. It was hard, but it sure paid off."

In spite of their hysterical touring schedule, the brothers had time in 1971 to release two albums for Motown: The Third Album, featuring the hit record "I'll Be There," and Maybe Tomorrow, with such hit singles as "Never Can Say Goodbye."

The actor and composer Clifton Davis wrote "Never Can Say Goodbye." Unknown to Michael at the time, Davis would later become a key player in a faux scandal with Michael that would sweep the nation and cause consternation among Jacko's fans.

"With their gaudy, psychedelic clothes, their trendy Afros, and their love beads, I thought The Jackson 5 was a hoot," said critic David Breen. "I gave them about eighteen months before they faded into oblivion. I saw no staying power in the group at all. Michael came across as a little faggy, and I thought he'd be too effeminate when he matured. In a way, I was right. But what I didn't understand was that the world was changing. Macho would not always prevail. Johnny Mathis wasn't the most masculine of men - and there were rumors - but he did all right. That `Stormy Weather' was a great hit. But the funniest act in show biz was Michael himself imitating Mathis doing `Stormy Weather. '"

Even though he was only at the dawn of puberty, some press members were writing that Michael was "androgynous." One writer claimed that "the first time I ever heard Michael Jackson sing, I thought he was a young girl. I still think that. Except he grew up to become a woman." Such press put-downs of Michael and rampant speculation about his ambiguous sexuality would in time become media fodder.

Although Berry, a black man, was one of the sharpest judges of pop music in the business, he failed to see the appeal of a new group, sometimes called the "white Jacksons"-that is, the Osmond brothers. This group originated in the closing year of the Eisenhower presidency as a barbershop quartet. By the Kennedy era, they were a regular feature on The Andy Williams Show.

George Osmond, the father of the brood, submitted a song to Gordy but was turned down. Eventually Osmond signed with MGM Records. With the baby of the family, Donny Osmond, imitating Michael's high-pitched voice and sound, the record, "One Bad Apple," became a megahit. Papa Joe went ballistic when he first heard the Osmonds. "They're stealing our act! Those little Goodie Two Shoes with their small white dicks!" He was furious at Berry for turning down "One Bad Apple," feeling it would have been an ideal record for his sons to record.

Executives at MGM Records plotted to launch the "lilywhite Osmonds" in direct competition to The Jackson 5. The word went out to promote Donny Osmond, then only thirteen years old, as a direct challenger to Michael.

Not to be outdone, Berry began to prepare a number of solo releases for Michael to put on the market. "Michael had so much more talent than Donny Osmond - and was so much cuter," a fan, Betty Barkin, said. "At first I loved the Osmonds and had a big crush on Donny, but Michael won my heart. I came to feel that the Osmonds were vanilla, Michael and his brothers chocolate - and I've always gone for chocolate."

The upcoming year, 1972, would see the music market saturated with Michael Jackson singles. His brothers, especially Jermaine, were very envious. "It's called sibling rivalry," Gordy said, pointing out the obvious.

On the road, Michael shared a room with Jermaine, perhaps the most sexual of his brothers, although Jackie too was known as a "ladies man." Disputes and jealousies would eventually drive Jermaine and Michael apart, but they nevertheless bonded together as boys.

Four years older than Michael, Jermaine was a sexual opportunist, as has been reported by many of the people who knew and worked with him on the road. At this point, Michael may have been too young to even know what his sexual proclivities were, but he learned his lessons in sex first hand from observing Jermaine.

In his startling 1994 biography published by Simon & Schuster, Christopher Andersen reported on an explosive claim made by Johnny Jackson. Johnny was called a "cousin" and originally had played drums with the Jackson brothers. "He shared our name but not our blood," Katherine said. Johnny reportedly told the chief of Steeltown Records, Gordon Keith, that he'd once walked in on a male relative of the Jackson family, catching him "sexually aroused" with Michael, who was only twelve years old at the time. The older relative, who was allegedly molesting young Michael, was not named. Of course, "evidence" such as this, even though reported in a book by one of the nation's leading publishers, must still be considered hearsay.

Jackson 5

Unlike many stars, Michael has never claimed that he was molested as a boy. He has been enigmatic in his responses, although on more than one occasion he has held out the possibility, without any definitive confirmation, that he was indeed molested. At this point, the truth may never be known.

What really happened while the Jackson brothers were touring together on the road has now become the stuff of legend, as various people have come forward with tantalizing stories. In his vanilla whitewash and boring so-called autobiography, Moonwalk, Michael portrays life on the road as harmless fun - "pillow fights, tag-team wrestling matches, shaving cream wars, you name it."

A favorite pastime for the boys was dropping balloons and paper bags filled with water off hotel balconies to burst onto innocent pedestrians below, giving them an unexpected shower.

In a rare confession, Michael did admit spying on women while they were on the toilet. In various clubs and chitlin' circuits in which he appeared, male performers would often cut or drill little holes as a means of looking into women's dressing rooms or else their toilets. "You could peek through one of these holes," Michael said. He admitted that he did. "I saw stuff I've never forgotten," he confessed, but left out mention of what kind of "stuff' he witnessed.

Michael's most notorious peep-hole vision occurred when the group was performing in London. One of his brothers urged him to "get a look at this!" Peering through the hole, Michael saw a vision of a completely nude Carol Charming.

At this point in her career, Charming no longer looked as she did when she played Lorelei Lee in the original Gentlemen Prefer Blondes on stage in 1949, the 1953 movie role going to the sexier Marilyn Monroe.

"Ugh!" Michael reportedly said when viewing the aging Channing's fallen breasts. "That's disgusting."

A writer for Rolling Stone later jokingly said, "The sight of Carol Charming in the nude turned Michael off women for life."

Like Mick Jagger and the Rolling Stones, like Elvis Presley, like John Lennon and the other Beatles, the Jackson brothers took advantage of their sex appeal in whatever city they were appearing. Female groupies followed the Jackson brothers back to their hotel suites where all the brothers, except Michael, enjoyed their sexual favors. "I was first seduced by the father, Joe Jackson," confessed Petula Robin, "in Philadelphia. He introduced me to both Jermaine and Jackie, and they seduced me too. I met Michael but seducing him was out of the question. I heard he didn't like girls all that much, and he was far too young."

In some respects, the brothers used their father as a role model. Away from Katherine, Joe reportedly slept with some of the more attractive Jackson groupies, both white and black, as if he were one of the performers himself. Perry Elkins, a stage manager in Milwaukee, claimed that "Joe used his sons as bait - in other words, `you sleep with me and I'll fix you up with Jermaine or Jackie,'" or whichever brother they fancied. "At his young age, Michael was off-limits," Elkins claimed. "One night I heard Michael lecturing his brothers that they were violating the tenets of their religion as Jehovah's Witnesses. If I recall, Jackie, or maybe it was Jermaine, just laughed Michael off. Except for Michael, I never knew one Jackson brother from the other."

The Jackson children

It appears that Jermaine, from the age of 15 or 16, seduced far more girls and women than even his promiscuous brother, Jackie. "Jackie would have his pick of the girls," Elton Jenkins, who once worked for Motown in Los Angeles, claimed. "He'd pick out the most beautiful and bring her back to his hotel room. But Jermaine would top him. On any given night, he'd line up at least three girls - one for midnight, one for one o'clock, and one for two o'clock."

Since Michael often shared a room with Jermaine, he would watch his older brother in action. Jermaine may have been deliberately showing off his sexual prowess to his younger brother. "I think it was part of that sibling rivalry Gordy was always talking about," Jenkins said. "Jermaine might have been trying to show Michael that although his kid brother was the star on stage, in the boudoir, Jermaine was the king."

Adele Ferguson, a secretary who lived in Tampa at the time, claimed that Jermaine was the greatest lover she'd ever experienced "before or since. He must have read the Kama Sutra from cover to cover. In one night he taught me sexual positions I'd never heard of. Until Jermaine, my boyfriends had been the missionary position types. While Jermaine and I were going at it, I just knew that Michael, with his saucer-wide eyes, was taking in all the action. In some ways, it made it more exciting for me to know that we were educating the kid about how to do it. After that night with Jermaine, my husband never really satisfied me. What a lover Jermaine was!"

Jermaine and Michael joined their other brothers on April 18, 1971 to appear on Diana! a TV special featuring Diana Ross. The highlight of the show was when Michael, only 12 years old at the time, came out to do his impression of Frank Sinatra in a tuxedo with a raincoat slung over his shoulder. Like Blue Eyes himself, Michael wore the characteristic Sinatra brown fedora, tilted at a rakish angle. Michael parodied "It Was a Very Good Year."

Carol Channing

After the song, Diana, a vision in a metallic silver lame gown, and Michael presented a skit in which he played her lover who was leaving her.

In a hotel suite, Sinatra watched the skit in disgust. One of his henchmen reported that the singer was so outraged by Michael's imitation, that he took a bottle of bourbon and tossed it at the TV screen. "If I ever catch up with that little fag, I'll break his legs," Sinatra shouted. "No, not that! I'll hire two guys from Jersey to do it for me."

In addition to their career bursting into full bloom, the Jackson brothers experienced another milestone in 1971. They moved into a mansion at 4641 Hayvenhurst in affluent Encino, California, a property Joe had purchased for a quarter of a million dollars. Their Encino neighbors included such celebrities as Mike Connors, Dick Van Dyke, Dennis Weaver, and, Michael's favorite, "Soul Sister" Aretha Franklin.

On beautifully landscaped two-acre grounds, studded with orange and lemon trees, the estate contained six bedrooms, which meant that the Jackson siblings would have to double up.

Katherine herself made the room assignments, saving the master bedroom for Joe and herself. Michael's younger brother, Randy, became Michael's new roommate. La Toya and Janet shared a room, as did Marlon and Jermaine, and so it went. "For me, it would become an Alcatraz instead of a real home," La Toya was quoted as saying later in life when she fled Encino.

In the beginning, Michael was enchanted with the property, which included an Olympic-size swimming pool. He would live for years at Encino until there were too many eyes spying on his increasingly secret private life.

"I once delivered some demos to the Jackson family," Motown's Elton Jenkins claimed. "I must have arrived after a free-for-all. There was evidence of violence. I got out of there as soon as I could. That Joe Jackson had some temper. I didn't want to become a victim. As the years went by and more and more scandals were revealed, I came to realize that the address in Encino housed America's most dysfunctional family."

Chapter Three

Michael would spend the rest of his life fretting over and eventually altering his appearance. His obsession with his looks began in 1971 when he broke out with "history's worst case of acne." At the same time, his body shot skyward. No longer was he mistaken for a midget.

"My years as a cute kid were suddenly over," he said. "I was a gangly adolescent at almost five feet ten inches." He spent a good part of the day staring at his reflection in the mirror. Every night seemed to bring a fresh pimple or two. "It was like having measles," he later said.

He became even shier around people. Some of the business associates in the record business Joe introduced Michael to didn't even believe he was who he said he was, but one of his "uglier brothers." For the first time in his life, he began to think of himself as "disfigured," and he longed to be beautiful like Diana Ross. He was all right as long as he was on stage, because heavy coatings of makeup obscured his bad complexion. "At night I lived with my demons," he said. "I came to hate mirrors as my pimples got worse." He gave up greasy processed foods such as hamburgers and French fries and began to consume a healthier diet, concentrating on fresh fruits and vegetables.

In addition to his acne, Michael had to endure the taunts of his brothers, who, for some reason, had taken to mockingly calling him "Liver Lips" or "Big Nose."

At the same time, Berry Gordy Jr. was putting pressure on Michael to make solo recordings. At first Joe opposed it, seemingly not wanting Michael to be a star on his own. Perhaps Joe thought he'd lose control of his boy if he broke away from his singing brothers. Berry went so far as to urge Michael to start rehearsals for an album all his own.

There were some bright moments along the way. In 1971, The Jackson 5 Show, a Saturday morning cartoon film, was launched on network TV. The brothers recorded the musical numbers for this animated series. Michael later said, "I couldn't wait to wake up on a Saturday morning and see myself in a fantasy cartoon." He was less enthusiastic when he learned that the entire group, including himself, was being paid less than $4,000 per episode. With this series on his own family, Michael began his lifelong fascination with animated motion pictures. He developed a consuming passion for all the commercial products inspired by founding father Walt Disney.

Someone at Motown, the identity of the person not known, showed Michael a Hollywood newspaper with its "Second Coming" headline: WALT DISNEY WAS A HOMO. The underground newspaper was published right before Christmas in 1966, following Disney's death on December 15. Michael apparently had no immediate reaction, but friends reported that he was almost in a state of shock, particularly when he read that Disney preferred to seduce young boys.

Someone suggested that Michael couldn't believe that the one artist responsible for bringing so much joy to young boys all over the world could also be capable of molesting them. At this point in his life, Michael could not have known that the same charges leveled against Disney would one day be brought against him.

Michael's watching of endless cartoons, his fondness for pets, and his silly little pranks, such as locking his brothers out of their hotel rooms without their underwear, were relatively harmless.

Many young performers pursued more dangerous games. At the start of the 1970s, Michael was often compared to the ill-fated young singer, Frankie Lymon, nicknamed "The Golden Throat." He was the first black teenage singing idol, and his success had inspired The Jackson 5 back in Gary.

In the 1950s Lymon was the lead singer for "The Teenagers," a popular group at the time, scoring such hits as "Goody, Goody." By the time he was only thirteen, Lymon could travel anywhere in America and hear his own voice on the jukebox singing "Why Do Fools Fall in Love?"

Walt Disney

Michael's adolescent voice in the early 70s evoked Lymon's soprano sounds. But their lives would take different turns as Lymon succumbed to drug addiction. At the age of eighteen, his career was all but over. In 1968, and only twenty-five years old, Lymon was found dead from a heroin overdose in New York, a syringe by his bed.

When he died, Lymon was survived by three wives. A polygamist, he never divorced any of his wives and remained married to three women up to his death.

Frankie Lymon & The Teenagers

When he heard of Lymon's death, Michael vowed that, "That will never happen to me." At this early age, he saw how drugs or alcohol could destroy promising careers. It is not known if he was also familiar with how a sex scandal could destroy a career as it had done with silent screen comedian Fatty Arbuckle and many other performers.

Instead of acquiring a drug habit, Michael remained deeply religious and committed to his faith as a Jehovah's Witness. He spent a lot of time reading the Bible. When he wasn't doing that, or rehearsing, he escaped into a fantasy world of cartoons or motion pictures that definitely carried the family seal of approval.

When Joe built a 32-seat screening room onto the 22-room Encino mansion, Michael began to spend hours there watching films that an eight-yearold could enjoy. He was addicted to Shirley Temple movies, and he saw The Wizard of Oz with Judy Garland thirty-five times, little knowing that one day he'd be cast in the black version of this classic. He also began to collect animals as pets, and was particularly fond of snakes. Both he and Jermaine owned their own boa constrictors. "Mine is bigger than yours," Michael reportedly told his brother Jermaine, referring to his pet snake. "Dream on, girl!" Jermaine said. "I'm the best hung of all the Jackson brothers. Just ask any gal."

As the Jackson coffer filled with gold, Katherine no longer insisted that her children perform chores around the house. Servants began to appearmaids to keep the place clean, chauffeurs to drive them around Los Angeles (often to the recording studio), gardeners to tend the landscaped grounds and feed the animals, and cooks to prepare their favorite foods. Even though Michael had switched to a healthier diet, his siblings still preferred the soul food that Katherine had once fed them back in Gary.

Because fans held the Encino property under siege virtually day and night, the Jacksons had walls, iron gates, and police dogs to keep them out. Even so, the most ingenious fans found ways of getting onto the property. Occasionally, they even managed to invade the Jackson living quarters, and had to be forcibly ejected by armed security guards.

Michael's efforts to attend public school failed. He had been enrolled for less than two weeks as a sixth grader at the Gardner Street Elementary School in Los Angeles when fans crawled through the windows to get at him, seeking his autograph or a piece of his clothing.

When he was enrolled in Emerson Junior High School in elegant Beverly Hills, some fanatic called the principal of the school and threatened to bomb one of Michael's classrooms, killing him and all the other students. Subsequently, Katherine made a decision to withdraw Michael from Emerson. After that, a chauffeur drove him more or less regularly to The Buckley Private School in Sherman Oaks, where wealthy Californians, including an assortment of movie stars, placed members of their brood.

"That school had more faggots-in-training than Bill Gates today has quarters," said Buddy Epson, years later. He attended the school very briefly. "When we first met Michael, we just assumed that he was gay like us. I checked him out. If it walks like a faggot, talks like a faggot, acts like a faggot, and looks like a faggot, then what were we to assume? We had circle jerks in those days. We also went into the heavy stuff. A friend asked Michael to join one of our parties. Apparently, Michael not only turned down my friend but lectured him on the evils of being gay. He even brought religion into it. He was a Jehovah's Witness, or some such shit. Michael got really offended-at least according to my friend-when he was asked if black dicks are bigger than the pricks on white boys. We had some really big boys at that school, even though they were still pubescent, and we wanted to know how Michael measured up. But he came on like a preacher's son. We didn't pursue him after that. We got the impression he was some religious fanatic."

Actually, Michael only attended class occasionally, living on the road with his brothers most of the time. Joe had hired Rose Fine, a white tutor who gave the brothers private lessons, even traveling with them to and from their bookings. "I feel I was a mother to the boys in another life."

Michael never really got an education. To this day, his spelling is atrocious, as is his grammar, unless it's written out for him. (A rather scurrilous article in The New Republic, published in 1984, claimed that Michael was illiterate, which isn't true.)

When he did go to school, Michael was delighted to see his unpimpled image marketed on everything from T-shirts to lunchboxes. "I liked the red lunchboxes," he later said, "not the yellow or blue ones."

Newly organized fans waited outside their schoolroom doors or massed to ambush them when the brothers emerged from the Cow Palace in San Francisco or the Convention Hall in Philadelphia. "There is an explosion of adolescent chemistry that rivals the first teen bombs detonated by The Beatles," wrote author Albert Goldman. "Sheets of screams hang in the air, hysterically contorted mouths and hands rise to the lights, scrimmages clog the aisles-the air of the corrida, the cockfight, the gladiatorial combat fills the plastic vastness."

Katherine called her son "sensitive," and Bob Jones, who once was charged with hyping Motown's stars, referred to Michael as an "introvert," who stayed alone in his hotel room or in his Encino bedroom while his brothers were often out "raising hell." Sensitive and introvert are words often used to describe a young homosexual in the making, but Jones and Katherine apparently didn't mean to suggest that.

Sammy Davis Jr. had been right in fearing future competition from the "midget." Originally, Davis was to have recorded Maybe Tomorrow.

Gordy intervened and gave the song to The Jackson 5, thinking it would be a mega-hit for the brothers. He was disappointed, although the song did make it to the Top Ten but at the bottom of Billboard's chart.

Davis was "seriously pissed." But Sinatra, who liked to tease his pal, found it amusing. "You're being replaced as the hottest dancing Jungle Bunny in show biz," he jokingly chided his friend. Davis always hated it when Sinatra called him a Jungle Bunny, but smiled as if those words didn't hurt him.

In the wake of their successful album, Maybe Tomorrow, taking its title from the hit single, The Jacksons also recorded another album, sentimentally called Goin'Back to Indiana, which included a single with that name as well as their hit, "I Want You Back," and once again, "Maybe Tomorrow."

Goin' Back to Indiana was also the name of an ABC-TV special, which included, among other footage, film of the Jackson brothers during their triumphant return to Gary.

A comedy and variety show, it featured Diana Ross (then pregnant), Bill Cosby, Tommy Smothers, and a badly shaken Bobby Darin who arrived at the studio after a violent fight with the alcoholic star, his ex-wife, Sandra Dee, whom he'd foolishly married in 1960, divorcing her in 1967.

The Jackson home in Encino

Michael was delighted when Katherine applauded the show, although Joe told his sons that they "could have done better." Before Katherine's eyes, her sons were growing up and trying to break away from the harsh influence of Joe. Michael avoided his father whenever he could, but "stayed tied to his mama's apron strings," Gordy said.

It would take Michael a long time to escape the bondage of his family. The way out for many of the older siblings was marriage. At the age of eighteen, Tito broke away to marry Delores Martes on June 17, 1972. Called "Dee Dee," she was only seventeen at the time. He'd met her at Fairfax High School in Hollywood. Katherine and Joe only reluctantly agreed to welcome this Mexicana into the family and were turned off by her ghetto upbringing in the Dominican Republic and in New York's Harlem. Fearing that she might be "a gold digger," they insisted that Tito force her into a prenuptial agreement.

Maureen (Rebbie) had been the first sibling to flee the nest when in 1968, at the age of eighteen, she fell in love with Nathaniel Brown, another Jehovah's Witness. Joe opposed the marriage, but Rebbie stood firm, marrying Brown and moving to Kentucky. "She fled Joe's prison," La Toya claimed.

After he'd crashed his Datsun 240-Z, and incurred Joe's violence, Jackie didn't marry right away but moved out into his own "bachelor pad."

It was only natural that the older brothers spent more and more time thinking about girls-or, in some cases, their wives-and less and less about their music.

Michael was only thirteen when a reporter for Crawdaddy magazine inquired about his love life. He claimed he was "not old enough" to have a girlfriend. But even at that age, he could have had one if he wanted to. But he wasn't interested.

Female groupies were readily making themselves available to the Jacksons, even to Joe himself. One girl, Elizabeth Ashe, claimed that "I had Jackie first, then the daddy, then Jermaine. Jermaine was the best in spite of lover boy Jackie's reputation. Joe didn't turn me on at all. I just went along with it to get to the brothers."

Many of the sexual adventures of Jackie and Jermaine were conducted directly in front of Michael, in the same room. He feigned sleep, but the moans would have awakened the soundest sleeper.

Although Jermaine often preferred more than one girl per night, Jackie would select "someone special in the audience." That object of his eye would then be invited backstage and introduced to Jackie. In almost every case the girl ended up in Jackie's hotel room for the night.

Michael tried in vain to uphold the morality of his brothers. Often he would approach girls going to his brothers' bedrooms and beg them to go home. "It's against the teachings of God," he would tell a startled groupie. "It's a sin."

"Get out of my way," one determined fan, Betty Pittsfield, told Michael in Cincinnati, pushing him aside. "What are you? Some little faggot? I'm gonna sleep with both Jackie and Jermaine tonight."

Before heading for one of the bedrooms, Betty turned to Michael. "I bet you want to sleep with your older brothers yourself. You're such a little wimp." All she remembered was Jackie answering the door in tight-fitting white jockey shorts, nothing else. She looked back at Michael. Sobbing, he turned from her in disgust and ran down the hallway.

A poster for Ben, the movie

Over the years many female fans have come forward to discuss their one-night stands with the Jackson brothers. Some have claimed the boys were gentle, skilled lovers; others have spoken of violence.

One white girl, who was only sixteen at the time, claimed that she was brutally raped-"both front and back. I was a virgin. I was also made to perform oral sex on the brothers. Michael was in the room at the time watching everything. At four o'clock I left the room in tears. I felt used. They were no longer the sweet, clean-cut brothers they were on stage. They were monsters. I went home and found that I had bled all over my pants. I was afraid they'd made me pregnant. But I switched my loyalty. From then on, it was Mick Jagger and the Rolling Stones for me. No more Jackson brothers. After that ordeal, I never had sex with another black man."

It was not as a sexual adventurer but as a singer that Michael had a breakthrough as a solo artist when he turned fourteen in 1972. He followed "Got to Be There" with another hit, "Rockin' Robin," a revival of Bobby Day's 1958 rock 'n' roll novelty song. "Rockin' Robin" shot to number two on the charts, proving once again that Michael, like Diana Ross herself, could make it without a group.

His next big single, Ben, also in 1972, was actually a paean to a rat. Most of his fans who bought the record didn't know that. Michael always had an affinity for rats or mice, feeding the hapless creatures live to his pet boa constrictor. In spite of its dedication, the song was a beautiful ballad, winning a Golden Globe award and an Academy Award nomination. Michael also recorded the theme song for the film version of Ben, which was released in 1972, telling the story of a boy who befriended a rat, the leader of a pack of vicious rodents. Ben was a sequel to another film, Willard, released in 1971. In an understatement, Michael said, "A lot of people thought the movie was a bit off," referring to Ben, "but I was not one of them."

The Jackson brothers meet Queen Elizabeth II

At one point in Ben, it sounds as if Diana Ross is singing. And for a few brief moments, especially in the melodrama of the lyric, Michael evokes Barbra Streisand.

Michael made Ben the title of his second solo album, released by Motown in 1972. This album included such favorites as "People Make the World Go `Round," "Everybody's Somebody's Fool," and "Shoo-Be-Doo-Be-Doo-DaDay." Even so, sales remained at the same relatively modest 350,000 or so that his first album, Got to Be There, generated. Three years would go by before Michael released another solo album. This time the results would be disastrous.

Michael was furious that in his acceptance speech on Oscar night, the writer of "Ben" didn't "thank me for singing the song that made it a success."

As an artist, Michael was growing increasingly rebellious. He complained to Gordy that, "They want me to sing in a certain way, and I know they are wrong." In Moonwalk, his autobiography, he claimed, "No matter what age you are, if you have it and you know it, then people should listen to you."

Joe regarded Michael's newly found independence with a certain dread. He welcomed the extra money that Michael was earning for the family through his solo recordings, but he feared that if his young son became too successful he might break away from his brothers. Actually the group could have been renamed "The Jackson 6," as "Baby Randy" had joined his brothers on stage.

Before Thanksgiving in 1972, The Jackson 5 (plus Randy) moved onto the world stage, as they flew to London's Heathrow Airport for a royal command performance in the U.K. for Queen Elizabeth II. Unaware of their popularity abroad, the brothers did not anticipate the extent of their fame. Jacksonmania in London reached mass hysteria, even threatening lives. Michael later reported that he was nearly strangled to death at the airport when two strong girls grabbed different ends of his bright red scarf. Show biz vets, facing screaming, souvenir-collecting fans, had long ago learned never to wear a scarf into a crowd. It was rumored that Michael nearly lost more than a scarf. One London commentator noted that a fanatical young girl had "grabbed Michael's weenie and had held onto it for life" until a security guard pushed her aside.

"There wasn't enough security," Marlon was quoted as saying. "Screaming fans completely blocked our silver Rolls Royce limousine. The car couldn't move forward without killing someone. Finally, we were forced out of the Rolls just in time. The screamers tipped it over. We could have been killed. We were grabbed everywhere-and I mean everywhere-as the police hustled us off to different transportation out of the hellhole. I was practically choked to death by one girl. Our Afros were pulled out by wads of hair. I was scared shitless."

From the very beginning, Michael was never good at interviews, and often ended up being ridiculed. In London, he told a reporter for The Daily Mail: "I'm glad to be in England because I've always wanted to learn more about Napoleon."

Fans surrounded the Churchill Hotel in London where the brothers had been booked. On the night of their appearance at Albert Hall, the brothers feared they could not get through the crowds and into their limousine. The hotel's security called the London police. Officers arrived with water hoses to turn back the crowds.

To complicate matters, "some insane fool" booked the Osmond brothers into the Churchill at the same time. Fights broke out between the two warring camps of fans: the Osmond devotees vs. the Jackson fans. A doorman at the Churchill was knifed by a rabid twelve-year-old girl who'd run away from her home in Lincoln.

Things went more smoothly when The Jacksons flew to Glasgow for a command performance at King's Hall in honor of Queen Elizabeth II's Silver Jubilee, and the brothers performed brilliantly. "We're making history," Michael said gleefully.

Her Majesty was ushered backstage to greet personally each member of the group, including its star, Michael. He was shy and embarrassed in the presence of Her Royal Highness. One London reporter claimed that Michael "curtsied like a girl" when introduced to Queen Elizabeth.

Michael seemed even more jubilant when The Jacksons performed in Liverpool, hometown of the "Fab Four." The brothers broke even the attendance records set by The Beatles themselves. When they appeared at the London Palladium, The Jackson 5 concert was sold out. In the future, whenever the name of Elton John would come up, Michael was arrogantly dismissive of the performer. "Oh, yeah, him! He was our opening act at the Palladium."

Flying out of Heathrow and once again facing hysterical fans, The Jacksons met "wild mobs" in such cities as Amsterdam, Frankfurt, Brussels, and Munich. In Munich, a limousine carrying the brothers was overturned and stripped so bare by souvenir hunters that it was left as a piece of junk. Fortunately, the brothers had been ushered out of the vehicle before it was ripped apart.

The mobs greeting The Beatles on the Continent of Europe years before showed some similarities in the mobs who turned out for a viewing of The Jacksons. But whereas the mass hysteria associated with the arrival of The Beatles translated into platinum records, it didn't apply to sales for The Jackson 5.

In fact, sales of The Jackson 5's singles began to fall on Billboard charts. Their song, "Sugar Daddy," barely made the Top Ten, appearing at the bottom of the list.

"Little Bitty Pretty One," a rhythm-and-blues number, had been a big hit when Bobby Day recorded it in 1958. By ripping off another Bobby Day number, also introduced in 1958, Michael had scored a hit single with "Rockin' Robin." But lightning did not strike twice. "Little Bitty Pretty One" never got beyond number thirteen on the charts.

The band's next single, "Lookin' through the Window," sold about a halfmillion copies, the same as "Little Bitty Pretty One." "Corner of the Sky," from the Broadway musical, Pippin, was a complete disappointment, selling about 350,000 copies, never moving beyond number 18 on Billboards charts.

"What's happening?" Joe asked Gordy, blaming him for his lack of promotion. Joe, with some degree of accuracy, suspected that Gordy was devoting most of his creative energies to the launching of Diana Ross as a big-time black film star. "The fans are mad for my sons," Joe said. "I just know the public is buying their singles."

Back in the United States, even a special for CBS didn't help their record sales. "The Jackson brothers are aging, becoming men, and they seem to have lost their special appeal," wrote critic Gavin Spacey. "Michael is the only one with any real talent. He seems dedicated, his brothers distracted, just going through the motions. The kid should break away from his brothers and become a bright star in his own right. His brothers are just extra baggage he has to carry onto the stage."

Ross had made a film, Lady Sings the Blues, a biography of jazz vocalist Billie Holiday, which had been financed by her lover, Gordy. The film opened in the autumn of 1972 at Loew's State in New York, breaking the attendance record previously established in 1970 by the sappy Love Story starring Ryan O'Neal and Ali MacGraw.

Michael reportedly resented Ross's success with "Good Morning Heartache," a single release from the film's track album. "Gordy should have given me that number," Michael said. "I could have done it so much better."

Early in 1973, Lady Sings the Blues received five Oscar nominations, including a Best Actress nomination for Ross. Michael was envious, plotting to become a movie star himself. Gordy and Ross were heartsick when it was announced at the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion in Los Angeles that the Best Actress Oscar had been won by Michael's future friend and confidant, Liza Minnelli, for her brilliant performance in Cabaret. Michael reportedly danced a jig upon hearing the news, although in public he said that "I'm rooting for Diana. She deserves it!"

Whenever he could break free from his rehearsals, Michael visited Ross on the set of Lady Sings the Blues. "He gave me a creepy feeling when he stood watching Ross perform," said Larry Winsfield, who'd worked on the film in a lowly job. "Mostly I brought coffee to the crew. But I was fascinated by watching Michael's face. He seemed oblivious to everyone else. He was studying Ross with such concentration that it looked like he was stealing her soul. It was obvious to all of us who saw Michael on the set that he wanted to be in front of the cameras like Ross, not watching from the sidelines."

Long after the Oscar ceremonies, Michael was overheard telling a sound crew, "If I'd been given a chance like Diana, I wouldn't have lost the Oscar to nobody. I have the talent to re-create any black male entertainer. Can you imagine how great I'd be in The Sammy Davis Jr Story? For that matter, if they ever film The Diana Ross Story, I'd make the ideal choice as the star even though I'm a man. With the proper makeup and some plastic surgery, I could create Diana. When the movie of her life is made, she'll be too old to play herself. But I have the kind of face that will be forever young."

A movie career lay in Michael's future. But in the meantime, there were serious career problems that faced both him and his brothers. The release of "Hallelujah Day" in February of 1973 had been a disappointment, generating a sale of only 200,000 copies. That same year, another single, "Doctor My Eyes," went nowhere.

Michael himself, in his autobiography, Moonwalk, wrote of his own disappointment in such Jackson 5 singles as "Skywriter." In spite of its advanced musical arrangements for strings, Michael maintained that the song was not a good choice for his brothers. "Skywriter" also became both the lead song and the name of the latest Jackson album, released in 1973 and featuring such other songs as "The Boogie Man" and "I Can't Quit Your Love." Sales of the Skywriter album were disappointing, coming in under 120,000 copies.

As Michael moved deeper into the mid-seventies, he feared that The Jackson 5 might be on the road to becoming a "Golden Oldies" act, playing Las Vegas clubs and going on nostalgic tours. "I had this fear even when I was a young teenager," Michael claimed.

Joe shared Michael's concerns, despite the initial success of The Jackson 5 and their screaming fans. "If we don't play it right from now on, my boys might end up a flash in the pan," he warned Gordy. Joe had grown increasingly resentful of Motown, complaining that the company did not let them choose their own songs or even play their own instruments. He began to plot a means of breaking away from Motown and signing with another record company.

One possible explanation for the fall-off in sales was oversaturation of the market. Between Thanksgiving of 1969 until Christmas of 1971, Motown flooded the market with eight Jackson singles, plus a solo by Michael. They also released an astonishing five Jackson 5 albums, a total of 54 songs. Another factor involved the product's pricing: Teen fans of The Jackson 5 could afford the one dollar price of a solo recording, but not the five dollar cost of an entire album.

The rapid rise and almost fall of The Jackson 5 was not unique in the music business, where most teenage groups rarely last more than two years. The critic Pablo Guzman explained it: "The basic problem of teen idolatry is that teens grow up. Subsequent waves of new teens usually consider last year's model passe."

Selma Davis worked briefly at Motown, but overheard some heated discussions when Gordy was overseeing the filming of Mahogany, starring Diana Ross. "First, I learned that Jackie, Marlon, and Tito were viewed as having no talent, certainly not as solo artists. The bosses (at Motown) thought that Jermaine and certainly Michael could be successful as solos. But even before Joe Jackson bolted from Motown, the brass there knew that the end was coming. It was just a matter of time."

Along the way, and at an unexpected moment, came some hope. When "Get It Together" was released following "Skywriter," sales picked up. There was talk of a comeback for The Jackson 5. Michael himself liked "Get It Together," and it became the group's biggest success in the past two years. Discos throughout the land played the song. "It had a good, tough, low har mony," Michael wrote, "a sharper wah-wah guitar, strings that buzzed like fireplaces." Released in time for Michael's fifteenth birthday in 1973, "Get It Together" sold more than 750,000 copies, but reached only number 28 on Billboard's charts. Even so, The Jackson 5 were back-sort of thanks partly to the promotional efforts of producer Hal Davis.

At one point, Gordy may have dreamed of creating black versions of Paul McCartney and John Lennon out of Michael and Jermaine. But that dream, of course, was never to be realized. From the beginning, Jermaine was called the sexiest of the Jackson brothers. That seemed especially accurate when Jermaine's charms were compared to the boyish appeal of the androgynous Michael.

As critic Dave Marsh wrote: "Jermaine was cute, but his voice lacked the expressiveness of Michael's, and since he was not much of an instrumentalist and the group wrote none of its own music, it was difficult to present him and Michael as black analogues of Lennon and McCartney."

In spite of this, Jermaine later claimed "I had everything that Michael had and more," perhaps a reference to his sex appeal. That claim was an idle boast. His first album, Jermaine, was not as successful as Motown had hoped. Writing in Rolling Stone, Vince Aletti said: "Jermaine simply doesn't have the range and assurance of Michael-he's just right on the upbeat, bright number. But he's out of his depth, sometimes desperately, on other types of songs."

In 1973 the press was still writing about the Jackson brothers and their parents as "the ideal American family, a role model for other black families to emulate." But this fantasy was about to come to an end.

Scandal was brewing when Tito was arrested on April 17, 1973 by the Los Angeles Police Department. The charge was the purchasing of stolen TVs and stereos. Johnny Jackson, the group's drummer, was also arrested. Freed on $2,000 bail, along with Johnny, Tito was arraigned on October 12.

He refused to talk to the press that day. There were rumors that Joe had severely beaten him for destroying "the image of The Jackson 5."

By February, 1974, charges against Tito were dropped when Johnny pleaded guilty. There was speculation-pure heresay-that the drummer took the rap for Tito. Michael was horrified that one of his brothers "would even get messed up in something like this," and he vowed to Joe and Katherine that his own good name would never be attached to any scandal.

Joe might have worried about the reputation of The Jackson 5, but he had marital problems of his own. Michael was horrified when on March 9, 1973 Katherine filed for divorce in the Los Angeles Superior Court. She had been willing to overlook her husband's one-night stands, but not his ongoing affair with Cheryl Terrell, a fan of The Jackson 5 who reportedly had had a crush on Jackie, before Joe, then 46, grabbed her instead. Gordy warned Katherine that a nasty divorce would "kill your sons' careers." Katherine held firm in her insistence on divorce, even though she'd agreed to tour Japan with her family, including Joe, that summer. Later that year she would hear reports that Terrell was pregnant with Joe's kid.

In spite of threatened parental divorce, and sagging sales of their records, the Jackson brothers still remained a world phenomenon. They played to record audiences in Japan, China, and Australia, and traveled during a break in their schedule into Africa.

Japan and its people made a deep impression on Michael, who claimed that the country put him more in touch with his spiritual side. He discovered Buddhist temples, serene and beautiful "Teahouse of the August Moon" gardens, and Japanese art.

His brothers discovered Japanese girls, to whom they quickly became addicted. In their suites at the Takanawa Prince Hotel in Tokyo, the brothers reportedly stayed up late watching Japanese porn flicks on closed circuit TV. A picture was taken of the brothers at the Tokyo airport when they were leaving. The photo editor for Soul magazine later claimed that "Jackie still had a hard-on in the picture. Before I could feature it on the cover, I had to do a little air-brushing."

While in Tokyo, Michael had a reunion with Sammy Davis, Jr., who was appearing in a sold-out engagement there. Apparently, Joe had informed Davis that he was negotiating to book his sons into Las Vegas. Davis told Michael that, unlike his pal, Frank Sinatra, who was fascinated with Mafia dons, he, Davis, didn't like them at all. "But don't cross them," Davis warned Michael, "or else you might end up with cement shoes."

The entertainer warned Michael never to borrow money from club owners against future appearances. "I do that all the time to meet current expenses," Davis said. "I'm a big spender. Then when it comes time for me to appear, I've collected all the green ones and end up with nothing. I have to borrow against future earnings. That way, they always have me."

Michael promised him he'd never live beyond his means and go into debt. Obviously, in the future, Michael would not take "Mr. Wonderful"'s advice.

In spite of some jealousy, Michael and Davis would remain friends until the end. When Davis was fighting cancer in 1989, a tribute was hosted by Eddie Murphy. Michael encountered Davis who weighed only 92 pounds at the time. Both men knew that death was near for the entertainer. Michael sang "You Were There," a song that paid homage to Davis's role in helping to carve out a niche for black entertainers.

Backstage, Michael met some of the best-known African-Americans in the country, including Jesse Jackson, Mike Tyson, Richard Pryor, Magic Johnson, and Ella Fitzgerald.

Whitney Houston and Stevie Wonder were also on the bill, which included Sinatra as well. At the end of the tribute, Sinatra knocked on the door to Michael's dressing room and was ushered inside. Michael had heard some of the singer's more sarcastic remarks about him, and didn't look forward to a face-to-face confrontation.

Sinatra was full of compliments for Michael's music. Perhaps Sinatra didn't mean what he said. But when he wasn't mad or feuding, as was often the case, he had a great deal of personal charm, which won over Michael, at least temporarily.

"Kid," Sinatra was overheard telling Michael, "The press will build you up today, because they like to tear you down tomorrow. In show business, you're hot and then oblivion. Very few entertainers can make a successful comeback. I'm the comeback kid. Frankly, I thought you were washed up in the 70s. But who would have predicted Thriller? I'll tell you the truth. I didn't get off on that album. Not my kind of music. But I'm impressed by sales, and you are mighty impressive in that department."

"I think you're the greatest singer in America, Mr. Sinatra," Michael said.

"Thanks, but let's face it: The world doesn't want a voice anymore. They want loud songs. If there's enough noise in the background, anybody can make it today as a singer."

If Michael took that as an insult, he didn't let on. He smiled politely and gave Sinatra a wet, soft handshake, before heading for the next encounter.

Mike Tyson, one of the most frightening human beings ever to step into the boxing ring, was standing next to Goldie Hawn. They were watching a taped tribute from President George Bush (primero). As Michael came into their presence, Tyson extended his hand.

At last the two Michaels had met-one the supreme gladiator, the other a slightly effeminate singer with a soprano voice. Each was a king of pop culture.

When Tyson and Michael met that day, their big troubles and super disgraces were just months ahead of them. Tyson would lose his world championship to James (Buster) Douglas in Tokyo in February of 1990, and he'd be jailed for rape in 1992. Like Michael, in his future, Tyson too would face bankruptcy.

Mike Tyson

A hardened ghetto kid, born in Brooklyn in 1966, Tyson was actually eight years younger than Michael, although Michael looked more the kid. Michael and Tyson bonded at least for that day. "At twelve you were a big-time star," Tyson told Michael. "At twelve I was arrested for purse snatching." After chatting for fifteen minutes, Tyson offered Michael a chance to teach him to box.

"I'm a lover-not a fighter," Michael said. "You should know that."

"Lover of what?" Tyson asked.

"Don't believe the rumors," Michael said.

"Believe me, I don't judge anybody," Tyson said. "All holes are black at night."

Before Michael bid adieu, Tyson grabbed him in a bone-crunching embrace. "Your Thriller was the biggest-selling album in history. I was the biggest draw in the history of boxing. But life isn't about what you acquire. Life is about losing everything." "Iron Mike" could have been predicting both his own future and that of Michael.

Throughout their careers, the names of Mike Tyson and Michael Jackson were invariably linked in such stories as WHO'S THE BIGGEST NUT JOB IN POP CULTURE? Columnist Gino Bona wrote: "While these two celebrities couldn't be further opposites on the exterior, their careers have shared a common pattern over the past twenty years. Both Tyson and Jackson reached the pinnacle of their popularity in the 80s, plummeted into dire times in the 90s, and have spent the first couple years of the new millennium as undeniable weirdos."

Bona mockingly suggested that Michael wants to share his bed with children, whereas Tyson "wants to eat `em." The columnist also suggested that both men faced startling transformations, Michael going "from black man to white hermaphrodite" and Tyson "from the youngest heavyweight champ to America's second most beloved cannibal."

Writing for Knight Ridder News Tribune News Service, Sam Donnelton said that, "One sleeps with little boys, dyes his skin and has shrunk his nostrils to the size of two straws. The other went to jail for rape, has offered to make another man `my girlfriend,' had a big tattoo etched across his face, and disappeared from training one week before his latest comeback fight." Donnelton filed this column in May of 2006, and was referring to Tyson's Showtime and pay-per-view fight with Clifford Etienne, in Memphis, Tennessee. After disappearing, Tyson, at least according to a London tabloid, was seen with an impressive erection at a wild orgy at his Las Vegas residence.

On September 13, 2003, Michael invited Tyson to Neverland for a charity event, although the press would not be allowed inside the gates. Tickets sold for $5,000 each.

This was the first time Michael had ever opened Neverland to members of the public. Reportedly he staged the event to re-establish a positive view of himself in the media.

Looking for but never finding Michael, Tyson showed up with a new girlfriend. He flashed a wide smile but warned photographers he didn't want his picture taken. "The gold in my teeth might interest the bankruptcy creditors."

After touring the grounds of Neverland, Tyson told the press: "I love the gorillas, and the camels in there are just amazing." To end the day, Tyson watched a title fight broadcast from Las Vegas and shown on the super-wide TV screens in Michael's den. As Tyson was leaving, one reporter called out to him: "Did you see Jacko-Wacko?"

"Maybe next year," Tyson said.

Back at the Sammy Davis tribute, and after his encounter with Tyson, Michael was greeting a star around every corner. When asked, however, he said that he didn't want to meet yet another Michael that night.

Michael Jordan.

"Never heard of him," Michael said.

"I guess I'm not Jacko's type," Jordan laughingly remarked when he later heard what Michael had said.

When Clint Eastwood, whom Michael had heard of, explained to him that Jordan was the world's greatest basketball star, Michael went up to Jordan and introduced himself.

By 1996 Michael had become more familiar with at least one aspect of Jordan's career. At Neverland, Michael watched Space Jam six times. In the film, Jordan appeared with some of Michael's favorite "actors": Bugs Bunny, Daffy Duck, Elmer Fudd, and Tweety Bird.

Michael had also been impressed by Jordan when he was chosen by People magazine as "One of the 50 Most Beautiful People in the World." In 1997 People also named Jordan one of "The Most Intriguing People of the Century." Michael was further impressed-and perhaps jealous-when he learned that at the peak of his career, Jordan was earning $80 million annually from Nike and another $35 million a year playing in the NBA.

Michael was astonished when Fortune cited Jordan as sitting on a vast $400 million reserve of cash. "He's a virtual endorsement cash cow," Michael reportedly said. "I should have made those millions. So many of my endorsement deals, unlike Jordan's, didn't work out-and I'm plenty mad."

Michael was particularly impressed that Jordan had developed his own line of sports clothing, called JORDAN in the 1997-98 season. Although they didn't really fit him, Michael ended up acquiring-by means not knownthree of Jordan's custom-tailored silk shirts monogrammed either with "Michael" or just "MJ." They were in the colors of pumpkin, magenta, and midnight blue.

On the way out of his dressing room at the Davis tribute, Michael encountered another survivor of Hollywood's Golden Age: actor Gregory Peck. They talked pleasantly for a few minutes and seemed to genuinely like each other. Peck gave Michael his telephone number and asked him to call him some time. Michael agreed. He'd begun his love affair with stars of Hollywood's heyday. His passion for the older stars would only intensify as he got older himself.

Michael ran into Sinatra once again at the Davis funeral on May 18, 1990 at the Forest Lawn Memorial Park in the Hollywood Hills. Sinatra was talking to Shirley MacLaine and Dean Martin. "Kid," Sinatra told Michael, "we're laying to rest the best black male entertainer America has ever seen. He had more talent in his little finger than all the other small pricks who followed him."

Again, if Michael took this as an insult, he gave no indication. He didn't have to say anything. He was rescued from a response by the sudden appearance of Janet Leigh. She kissed Martin and Sinatra on the cheeks and turned to Michael to shake his hand. "I loved you in Psycho," he said to Leigh.

Before she could thank him, Liza Minnelli appeared, linking her arm with Michael's. "C'mon," she said. "I'll introduce you to Milton Berle if you haven't met him before. He's got the biggest cock in Hollywood, but don't take my word for it. Have you met Burt Reynolds? I hear he's got one of the smallest."

Michael seemed to ignore her remarks, but joined her anyway, mainly to escape from Sinatra. He looked around. "I wonder if this many people will attend my own funeral."

Michael's funeral lay far in the future. After winding up their tour in Japan, the Jackson brothers flew to Australia in the summer of 1973. Once there they would appear at concerts not only in Sydney and Melbourne, but in smaller towns such as Adelaide and Brisbane. While in Australia, The Jacksons also visited the Outback, meeting members of aborigine tribes. Michael later claimed that "they treated us like brothers."

When they returned to America, Joe continued to plot his break from Motown, which he thought would free his sons from bondage-at least musically. Then the unexpected happened.

The Gordy and Jackson families became linked through marriage on a gray, rainy day on December 15, 1973 in Beverly Hills. Hazel Gordy, Berry's daughter, married Jermaine Jackson at a gaudily expensive wedding at the Beverly Hills Hotel. "It was more about showing off than love," said a disgruntled member of Motown who was not invited.

The wedding ended up costing Gordy more than a quarter of a million dollars. Both the bride and groom were only nineteen years old. In its next issue, Ebony proclaimed the Gordy/Jackson link "the wedding of the century." Jermaine chose Marlon as his best man, and Michael was relegated to the role of an usher, a humiliation for him.

In a pearl white tuxedo with bugle beads trimming his lapels, Jermaine said his "I do" to Hazel, who wore a white satin gown with a white mink train "that stretched to Sacramento," one member of the wedding observed. When pictures were taken, the couple almost got lost against an all-white backdrop of 7,500 white camellias and white carnations, with nearly a hundred caged white doves and mounds of artificial snow.

"For a black dude's wedding to a black chick, this was the whitest wedding ever recorded on film," wrote a reporter for Ebony magazine. His words were censored as sounding "too racist." As if all this ostentation wasn't enough, the guest appearance of Smokey Robinson was greeted with loud applause. For the wedding of his friends, he'd written a special ballad for the occasion. Jermaine hugged Robinson, and Hazel gave him a kiss for his efforts.

Under heavy pressure from Gordy earlier that morning, Katherine, a vision in sapphire blue, agreed to drop her impending divorce from Joe to protect the careers of her sons. A vision in mauve and gray, Joe tried to address Katherine at the wedding, but she pointedly ignored him, even when they posed together as the "happy" parents of the groom.

Coretta Scott King, a friend of the Gordy family, was seen mingling with such celebrities as Lola Falana, Billy Dee Williams, Diahann Carroll, and even the Los Angeles mayor, Tom Bradley.

Mrs. King caused a lot of excitement among The Jacksons, particularly with Katherine, who admired her greatly. Michael didn't seem impressed, and Mrs. King may have sensed his alienation.

The widow of the slain civil rights leader, King was overheard talking privately and confidentially to friends. Media had bribed certain staff members of the hotel to report on any indiscretions being uttered by either the Jacksons or their guests.

Hazel Joy Gordy marries Jermaine

"Michael is acting very petulant," Mrs. King remarked. "Dare I say jealous? He told me he was `not gaining a sister, but losing a brother, his best friend.' If you ask me, I think Michael has a crush on Jermaine. I could swear that Hazel's future husband doesn't think of Michael in that way at all. If I didn't know better, I would say that Michael is behaving like a jilted girl who has lost out to another woman. Surely my impression is wrong. Tell me I'm wrong!"

When Hazel-"my first born"-was only fifteen, Gordy discovered that she was in love with Jermaine. Someone on his staff showed him a fan letter his daughter had written to Jermaine: "I love you, Jermaine. You are my prince, my dream. I need you, Jermaine. I will love you forever."

Hazel would not love Jermaine forever, but she did not outgrow what Gordy called "puppy love" and continued her passion for Jermaine until he reluctantly agreed to marry her. At the time of his wedding, Jermaine was "playing the field," having almost any girl he wanted for the night. Some of his brothers speculated that Jermaine would not let a mere wedding band deny him the pleasures that came so easily to him every night.

Michael also had professional fears about the future direction of The Jackson 5. Tito's wife had been rather milquetoasty, never interfering. But Hazel was known for being strong-willed. She could use her influence as the daughter of the boss to push Jermaine into a role as the group's lead singer, thereby relegating Michael to a subservient role.

The sun finally came out, breaking through the overcast sky of southern California. But it didn't brighten Michael's spirit. He confided to Katherine and to others that "no good will come of this marriage."

Hazel and Jermaine flew to Europe for a four-week honeymoon, living in lavish suites and dining at only the most luxe restaurants from Paris to Rome. They spent the most time in Switzerland. Jermaine flew back to join his brothers, including Michael, on a ten-day tour of Senegal in West Africa. "The boys were determined to have a close encounter with their roots," wrote one Senegalese journalist.

And so they did. Michael was especially moved by the native music and the rhythms. He called it "eye-opening," as he experienced the sight of native Africans in tribal dress performing with drums, their music filling the air and mesmerizing him. "I've come back!" he shouted at the top of his lungs at the airport in Dakar. He didn't kiss the ground, but burst into tears of joy instead. In the years ahead, Michael would be accused of trying to change his skin color to white. But during those heady days in Senegal, he "became an African," in the words of the same Senegalese journalist.

Coretta Scott King

From Dakar, the day after their arrival, the brothers took a thirty-minute ferry trip to Gore Island where thousands of slaves were imprisoned during the late 18th century and for nearly half of the 19th century after they'd been captured in the wild. Here these wretched souls were detained under the most horrid of conditions before shipment to the New World, where they'd become slaves. Many of these hapless victims died in chains before reaching America. Reportedly, Michael became so upset at seeing the Maison des Esclaves, the prison for slaves constructed in 1775, that he vomited.

Michael's romance with Senegal was of short duration. He was appalled at the living conditions, especially when he visited a hovel in which a family of nine was crowded. "I've seen where they lived and slept on a dirt floor," he told reporters. "I've seen bigger doghouses in America." He was also horrified when he saw what the family had for dinner. The mother had bought three chicken heads which she boiled in an earthen pot over an open fire for some broth to feed her brood.

Later that night, Michael suffered an attack of diarrhea so devastating that he had to be hospitalized. He told his brothers that he "couldn't wait to get back" to the luxuries of their Encino estate. Their own accommodations in Senegal were horrid. Their bedrooms were not clean, and they didn't even have hot water.

"Stevie might want to live here, but count me out!" Michael was referring to Stevie Wonder, who announced to the press that he was planning to "fly away" from America and settle in Africa. After this grandstand play, the announcement of which was printed in newspapers across America, Wonder decided Africa wasn't that wonderful and canceled his plans to go into exile.

Before leaving Senegal, Michael announced to the press that, "Blacks are the most talented race on earth. They've got the beat. They've got the rhythm. Our music comes from Africa, and we musicians, especially in the United States, owe these tribes an enormous debt of gratitude. We must always remember that."

After making that lofty pronouncement, Michael was overheard by a flight attendant telling one of his brothers: "Now let's get the hell out of here!"

Upon their return to the United States, The Jackson 5 recorded "Dancing Machine," released as a single by Motown in 1974. "Spit out the bubblegum soul and record a song that America can dance to," Gordy told them.

Michael's voice was more mature-"he no longer sounded like castrati," wrote one critic-and the single went double platinum. It shot up to number two on Billboards charts. Young America could actually dance to Michael's high-octane "watch her get down, watch her get down." The more mature sounds coming from Michael's throat ended an ugly rumor that Joe was going to have his son castrated in the tradition of Italy back in the 1600s.

Rumors of Michael's castration became so widespread that on some occasions when he was mobbed by fans, overzealous girls-and in some cases, gay boys-reached out to grope him to see if his male genitals were still intact.

Or if he'd become transgendered.

"Boy soprano becomes a high-pitched tenor," said a Rolling Stone critic. "Dancing Machine" was played around the country as much as their former hit, "Never Can Say Goodbye."

Dancing Machine also became the title of The Jackson 5's latest album, which also featured such songs as "The Mirrors of My Mind" and "Whatever You Got, I Want." Producer Hal Davis, not always a winner, assembled the track for the album Get It Together. He built The Jackson's first disco concept album around this, and it reached only number sixteen on Billboard's charts. This album marked the end of The Jackson 5 being called "teenyboppers," although they still fitted that age category. Critic Pablo Guzman wrote, "Through disco, the Jackson brothers found a way to grow with their audience without puncturing teen fantasy."

On Cher's television series, "Dancing Machine" was heard by much of the nation, who tuned in to watch Cher and her guest, Michael, perform the number as robots. "Both Cher and Michael had hair that would stretch along the full length of the California coast," wrote one critic. "Both of them seemed in dire need of a hairdresser. Cher's pantsuit and a halter top seemed designed by a demented drag queen. Michael in his midnight black cutaway jacket, accented with silver accessories, seemed like a reject from Harlem's Apollo Theater."

Nearly all critics agreed that Michael was practically a Fred Astaire when it came to dancing, but Cher was no Ginger Rogers. "As a Cherokee she could perform tribal dances-and that was about it," another critic unkindly proclaimed.

At the end of the broadcast, Cher was exhausted from the strenuous workout the Jackson brothers had put her through. She was amazed at their seemingly boundless energy. To pay his respects, Michael visited her in her dressing room.

"So tell me, Michael, who in the fuck is the world's top diva: Moi or Diana Ross?"

"You both are big talents," he said, embarrassed at being put in such a spot.

"Okay, I'll concede that she's a better singer. Hell, I don't like the sound of my own voice that much. I'm a much better actress than I am a singer. Singing is like going to a party at someone else's house. Acting is like having the party at your own house." Cher would repeat this sentiment to various figures in show business. "What about you, kid? Plan to stick to singing?"

"I never told this even to my family, but I want to become a movie star like Diana. And not just in singing roles either. I want to win an Oscar."

"A noble ambition, but I don't know about that Oscar," Cher said. "Winning little baby Oscars with their cute butts is my fantasy. My ambition is to win as many Oscars, or as many nominations, as Katharine Hepburn."

"Who is she?" Michael asked. "Another singer?"

"You're in show business and you don't know Kate Hepburn?" Cher asked in astonishment. "Fuck, kid. Get real!" As a joke, she said, "Hepburn, my favorite actress, was Scarlett O'Hara in Gone With the Wind."

Not knowing that Cher was joking, Michael took this as gospel. "I'm gonna see that movie some day."

Again joking, Cher said, "Have the Butterfly McQueen part rewritten for you. You'd be great at it. Repeat after me, `Miss Scarlett, Miss Scarlett, I don't know nothin' 'bout birthin' babies.'"

"I could do that!"

"Listen, take some advice from your mamma mia here. At first people laughed me off as a joke when I was breaking into the business. Some fucking joke! Before my career is over, I'll have one hundred million in the bank." Cher underestimated her potential, ending up with a vast fortune of $600 million.

"I was a shy kid living in a fantasy world," she said.

"I still live there," Michael said.

"Fine," Cher said. "But live in the real world too. I've heard stories about you. You're gonna be ridiculed like I was. But stand up to your critics."

"How can I do that?"

"By becoming so God damn successful that even your harshest critics can't hurt you. You can become so rich and powerful in show business that the hecklers won't matter any more."

Cher

"I hate it when people tell lies about me," he said.

"Deep down, we all do, but don't tell anybody I said that." She looked at the time. "Gotta go now. I've got a date with a hot young boy. A little older than you. You're still a bit young for me. You like girls, don't you?"

"I can take `em or leave `em," Michael said.

"Yeah, right! There's nothing wrong with liking boys. Who in hell wouldn't like boys? The world is filled with holes to stuff. Finding the perfect prick is like looking for the Holy Grail."

Appalled and intimidated, Michael thanked her profusely for letting his brothers appear on her show and quickly hurried from her dressing room.

Cher called after him. "Seriously, boy, I wasn't planning to seduce you."

In spite of their initial introduction, Cher and Michael saw each other from time to time, but never really became friends. Eventually, the publicity about child molestation and other accusations turned her against Michael.

By 2003, she was telling the press, "I don't really care what he does to his face. He could just erase it as far as I'm concerned. I don't like him anymore. And it's because of his children. I cannot imagine putting my children through what he puts his children through. I once saw him with one of his kids rolled up in a blanket, and I was thinking, `What kind of life is this?' He and I were friends when he was little. I watched him grow up and all that, but, you know, you dangle a baby over a balcony, that's it for me. If it was up to me, he wouldn't have those babies now. This guy is nuts. As an artist, I can't fault his art because he was brilliant. I wouldn't buy anything now."

Cher avoided a question about Michael's plastic surgery. Fans of Cher and Michael on the web asked this provocative question: "Which one has had more plastic surgery?"

Appearing on more and more TV specials such as Cher's was only one of Joe's schemes.

To show Gordy that he too could be an impresario, Joe established his own record company, calling it Ivory Tower International Records. "Ivory is not a good name for black groups," Gordy warned him. The first group Joe signed was an "all-gal" singing quartet from Ohio. It took as its name the awkward-sounding "M.D.L.T. Willis." As Gordy predicted, the group bombed. One member of the troupe bombed in more ways than one.

Joe told Jermaine that he felt Michael "is old enough to lose his virginity." Joe persuaded one of the members of M.D.L.T. (the exact identity of whom is not known) to go to Michael's hotel room and seduce him. The singer was only too willing. She also agreed that it was about time that Michael "knew the taste of a woman."

From all reports, the evening was a disaster. Joe secured a pass key and gained admittance to Michael's bedroom. The girl slipped in and apparently tried to get physical with Michael, but a row developed. There was pushing and even wrestling, with Michael fleeing to the balcony. He screamed at the girl to leave his bedroom and even promised "to pray for you." He told her that he wasn't like his other brothers, "seducing every slut in Los Angeles." Highly insulted, the attractive singer stormed out of Michael's bedroom and spent the next few years telling anyone even remotely interested that "Michael Jackson is a fag!"

Joe failed in this attempt to get Michael to surrender his virginity to a woman. But where daddy didn't make it, Michael's brothers hoped to succeed. One night they hired two of the best-looking hookers they could find-one blonde, one black-and sent them to Michael's hotel bedroom. Jackie, in a phone call to Michael, claimed the young women were friends of The Jackson 5 and wanted Michael's autograph.

Up until then, the brothers had been telling reporters that "Michael's no virgin." Tito even claimed that "my little brother's had more girls than all the other brothers combined." Of course, that was gross exaggeration. Perhaps it was done to camouflage the fear that Michael might be a homosexual. Even when he was fifteen, the whispering campaign had only begun and would greatly intensify in the years ahead.

Details are lacking but when the hookers were allowed inside Michael's room, they apparently let their intentions become known, especially when they tried to take off Michael's clothes. In panic, he tried to flee the room, only to find his bedroom door bolted from the outside. His brothers stood in the hallway, catcalling into Michael. "After you've finished with them, we get sloppy seconds," one of the brothers called.

To protect himself from the voracious women, Michael burst into tears. "What a turn-off," one of the hookers said. "Have you ever tried to seduce a guy who's crying like a five-year-old baby? No fun at all!"

The black hooker told one of the brothers, "Your pansy brother was reading the Bible when we left him."

"Getting Michael to surrender his cherry was a daunting task that no woman and I mean that literally-would ever be able to accomplish," claimed a Motown executive. "Even when they invented Viagra, it wouldn't cure Michael. Not that one!"

"Michael just wasn't interested in the opposite sex," the executive continued. "I suspected that he was gay from the first day I met him. I truly don't know how Joe Jackson felt on the subject. I knew that homosexuality was against Katherine's religion. I also saw that the brothers were embarrassed by all this gay talk. They wanted Michael to be a lady-killer. But he wasn't. He just wasn't. Nor would he ever be. Let's face it: unlike his older brothers, Michael is no pussyhound."

Although just beginning his teenage years, Michel became the one Jackson brother that the girls, and even older women, pursued now that Jermaine was married. "I have a son older than Michael," said Alexis Klucker of Alabama, "but I still wanted to seduce that little boy. I don't know why, but I wanted him. Pimples and all, it didn't matter."

One woman, Betty Scaff, was arrested on the grounds of the Jackson's Encino mansion. Somehow she'd managed to elude security and even the guard dogs. When Michael came out through the back door and headed for his own private zoo, she jumped out from her hiding place in the bushes. She attacked Michael and ripped off most of his clothes, demanding that he impregnate her.

Before she was hauled away by security, the woman proclaimed that if Michael would father a child with her, the kid would grow up "to become the second Jesus Christ."

In tears, Michael retreated to his bedroom to nurse his wounds and to brood for three days over this violent attack.

"I think Michael had every reason to fear women from that point on in his life," said Lennox Biggs, who once worked for Motown. "Girls grabbed his groin. They took wads of his hair. They demanded sex from him. And this one bitch even tried to rape him. How could he grow up viewing women as objects of love? To him, all women were sexual predators trying to take his precious virginity. Michael held onto that virginity-at least with women-like it was something worth protecting."

Joe failed to hook Michael up with a woman, but he got all his boys a booking into Las Vegas for the winter of 1974. Conditions were much improved for black entertainers there following the efforts of Sammy Davis Jr. When Davis first appeared in Las Vegas, he couldn't stay in the same hotel where he entertained all-white audiences.

Even during the mid-70s, Vegas audiences were still mainly white. Black acts didn't succeed very well there, unless they were crossovers, as The Supremes had demonstrated. Vegas nightclubs were also a showcase for the stars of yesterday, often booking nostalgic acts like pompadoured Frankie Avalon who sang "Venus" every night.

Gordy predicted that the Jackson brothers would bomb before the allwhite audiences, but Michael was more enthusiastic. "If Sammy can be a hit there, so can I!" he said.

Joe wanted his boys to open at "the top joint," which means the MGM Grand. The Osmonds had been a big hit there, and Michael felt he and his brothers could top them.

For their opening night, Joe ordered La Toya to go on the stage with her brothers. She was only seventeen. Imitating the Osmond act, he also brought in Randy, who was only twelve, and even Janet at seven years old. Joe created novelty acts, having Janet and Randy impersonate Sonny and Cher in a satirical skit.

On her own, little Janet got a standing ovation with her take on the "Come Up and See Me Sometime" gal, Mae West. To hear a seven-year-old say, "It's not the men in my life but the life in my men that counts," made for a hilari ous evening.

La Toya wanted to have more of a star role, but Joe wasn't impressed with her vocal range. He ordered her to lip sync. "Don't let one sound escape from your throat," he demanded, causing La Toya to burst into tears and run from the rehearsal hall. But on opening night, she obeyed her father's commands.

The Jackson 5 wooed the audience, especially Michael's acts, including his brilliant impersonation of Diana Ross. Later, when Ross heard what he'd done, she was "furious" at Michael for holding her up to public ridicule.

Another highlight of the show came when The Jackson 5 imitated The Andrew Sisters, the favorite singers of the boys who won World War 11.

Caught unaware by the sudden success of The Jacksons in Vegas, Gordy told the press, "I wanted to see the boys expand their musical horizon." Joe was furious when word got back to him. "The fucker predicted we'd bomb. Now he's taking credit for my success."

When the show opened at Radio City Music Hall in New York, Vince Aletti, a critic, was one of the first to write about the "new" Michael on stage. "No matter how much I love the other Jacksons, it is Michael who is the group's aesthetic focus. His stylized show-biz posing (the bends and turns, arms outstretched and sweeping the air in front of him; little self-hugs with his head thrown back) is becoming a little disturbing, at moments even grotesque for a boy who's still a very skinny sixteen. But when he isn't being Engelbert Humperdinck, he's supreme and so controlled it's almost frightening. In his motel room, when he tells you he's in the 11th grade, it might seem strange, but it's believable. Seeing him onstage, dancing, and striding confidently out to the edge, you just know he's lying."

In the wake of the Cher special, the Jackson brothers continued to appear on national television, including a Bob Hope special. The Jackson brothers were booked to go on with John Denver and Ann-Margret. One Jackson brother was overheard backstage telling what he'd like to do with busty, leggy AnnMargret should he ever get her alone. "I don't think she's all that sexy," Michael said petulantly. "Just because you can't handle it," Jennaine said, "doesn't mean your older brother can't. Never call in a kid to do a man's work."

Although he had middle-of-the-road humor before the camera, and never said anything offensive on stage, Hope could be raunchy once he was in his dressing room. He could also tell very indiscreet stories about his rivals.

He informed Michael that Milton Berle also always stole his best jokes. "Uncle Milty dresses in drag all the time," Hope said. "Putting on women's clothes comes natural to him. He's got a real gay streak in him. In New York years ago, when we were both struggling, I shared a hotel room with Berle. He came on to me. Don't ever let him get you alone, kid. You'll be in for a surprise."

On their night off, Joe booked a private plane to fly his sons from Vegas to Lake Tahoe to the Sahara Hotel and Casino to hear one of their all-time favorites, Elvis Presley.

Elvis appeared dazed on stage that night, at one point looking in vain for his band but not really sure where they were. He wandered about bloated and drugged in a white jump suit. But the fans were loyal. One critic wrote, "Elvis Presley could have appeared last night with his big belly in a wheelbarrow, and his devoted fans would still adore him." One critic was even harsher: "Presley on stage last night looked like a bloated go-go girl from the 60s who had just been gang-raped by a rock band."

At one point Elvis stopped the show and walked forward toward the stunned audience. "You know where I might have ended up?" he asked the silent audience. "Flipping burgers in Memphis." That's all he said before launching into "Hound Dog," the lines of which he'd seemingly forgotten after having sung them countless times.

Michael was particularly shocked by the sound of Elvis's voice. "I didn't recognize it. It was not his `Hound Dog' voice of the 50s. More a childlike voice. Almost like I used to sound. He talked, instead of sang most of his song."

"Elvis was up there on that stage last night like a man crying out for someone to come and save him-yet knowing that no help would ever come," Joe said.

After the show, the manager personally came to the Jackson table to escort Michael backstage. He was terribly shy and almost shaking with nervousness, but Michael followed the director.

"The King wants to meet you," the manager told Michael.

As he was ushered into the dressing room of Elvis Presley, Michael could hardly have known that he was meeting his future father-in-law.

"Kings are supposed to compete with their predecessors and kings are supposed to marry other royals. Elvis's widow, Priscilla Presley, makes clear that she saw Michael Jackson as a scheming pretender, building Neverland to top Graceland, then courting Elvis's daughter to secure his lineage. But why shouldn't Lisa Marie Presley want the only man in the world as famous and powerful as her father? A man who might help her find her own way as a singer-songwriter, yet keep her in the royal arena to which she was accustomed?"

"I've recorded a whole lot of these pop musicians and Michael's the straightest of the goddamn lot. Ok, Michael's got a few quirks but everybody in California does. "

"One of the oddest things about Michael Jackson is that this 45-year-old former Motown child prodigy has remained a superstar despite all the Peter Pan fantasies, Potemkin marriages, cosmetic surgery, spending sprees and now criminal charges of child molestation. He is both a popular entertainer and a tabloid freak show. In that sense he is the perfect icon for the shame-free age: a television twofer. "

Chapter Four

Freddy Briggs, who worked at the Sahara, has been the only one who has come forward to give a personal account of the historic first and only meeting between the King of Rock-and-Roll and the King of Pop. Briggs attended to Elvis's wardrobe and other personal needs. "I even made him several peanut butter and jelly sandwiches," he said. "Elvis liked creamy peanut butter and preferred blackberry jam, at least during his stay at Lake Tahoe."

As Briggs later revealed, Michael was "tongue-tied around Elvis," calling him "Sir" and letting Elvis do most of the talking through slurred speech. Ironically, Elvis used to address men as "Sir" in his earlier days, but no more. "After he became King, he didn't need to be subservient to anyone," Briggs said.

Elvis greeted and was polite to all the Jackson brothers, but he knew where the talent lay, so he paid most of his attention to Michael, whom he spoke with privately.

The Elvis Presley that Michael encountered in Lake Tahoe was in a foul mood, although respectful of Michael. He'd just taken some unknown medication which seemed to wake him up and put him in a talkative mood. Based on his performance on stage, Michael expected Elvis in private to be a zombie, but instead the singer was strangely articulate, at least as long as the medication lasted.

"They all come to me for advice," Elvis, according to Briggs, told Michael. "If I have any advice to give you, it's `go solo.' You're the star of the act, the only real talent. You're letting your brothers and all that background music drown you out. I never let that happen to me, and you shouldn't either. Tell them to go fuck themselves. You're the show, boy, and don't forget it."

Michael politely thanked Elvis for this advice, looking at Elvis with a devotion that seemed so genuinely sincere that Briggs believed that it had touched Elvis in some deep way. At one point during their encounter, Elvis reached for Michael's hand. "I owe a debt to all you black boys and your music. Without the music of `the brothers' I heard back in the Forties, there would be no Elvis Presley today." He turned around and looked at himself in the mirror. It appeared that he couldn't formulate his next thought. "Who am I kidding? There is no more Elvis Presley. Like yesterday, Elvis Presley is dead and gone. The bastards killed him long ago. This bag of shit you see before you is all that's left of the great Elvis Presley."

"To me, you'll always be the greatest," Michael said in a soft voice. "Your music will live forever."

"That sounds like a suck-up to me, boy," Elvis said. "But even if you're lying, what you just said is appreciated."

"Do you have any other advice to give me," Michael said. "I mean, you've gone so far in the business."

"Sure, I have more advice, but I don't expect you to follow it. No one ever does. Don't become a really big and famous star. If you do, you'll live to regret it. Stardom-I mean really big stardom, not the Ann-Margret stuffmakes you pay such a price that it will destroy you. Nearly all really big stars have to suffer indignities and invasions of their private lives to such a degree that it's not worth it. If you become super famous, every little asshole in the world will be out to get you. They'll resent your fame and want to turn it into infamy, particularly if they can make a buck off you. Speaking of bucks, if you make the big ones, the world-or at least someone in the world-will figure out how to take it from you. It's happened to me. It'll happen to you. The press used to say I was a sweet Southern boy. No more. Have you read the shit written about me?"

"I don't read stuff like that," Michael said.

"I don't read it either," Elvis said. "If you do become big, don't read the papers, the tabloids, and those magazines. If you start reading what the fuckers write, it can destroy you. You won't even have enough courage to go on the stage if you read the shit."

Elvis: The Farewell Months

There was a knock on Elvis's door, which Freddy went to answer. Joe, along with his other sons, was waiting to take Michael away.

"Gimme your phone number, boy," Elvis said to Michael. "I'd like to call you some night, real late, and talk more with you. There are so many things I could tell you. I have this great hunch that in the 80s you're gonna become what I was in the 50s. Revolutionary. But with a totally different kind of music than mine."

As Michael headed for the door, Elvis reached to shake his hand but decided instead to lock him in a warm embrace. "Be good now, you hear?"

"I stayed up with Elvis until late in the night after Jackson left," Briggs said. "He seemed lonely and I was a big fan. At first when he invited me up to his hotel suite, I thought it was for sex, and I was most willing, even though I'm basically straight. You don't turn down a star. He didn't want sex. He wanted company. During the night he had me place several calls for him around the country. I called numbers but I didn't know who they were to. On the phone, Elvis talked for hours. He was incoherent. I think he made up a lot of things. He was paranoid, claiming the FBI was trying to kill him because `I know too much.' He also claimed that everybody who even remotely knew him was writing a book to expose him. There were three phones in the suite. At one point Elvis ripped one phone out of the wall and tossed it at the television set. I forgot what program was on, but Elvis didn't like what he was seeing."

From all reports, and there have been dozens, Elvis continued his habit of calling people in the middle of the night and babbling into the phone. At times he was completely irrational. Acquaintances reported that there would be long periods of silence before he started talking again. "Perhaps some of Elvis's stories were true perhaps not," Briggs said. "Those I heard sounded farfetched to me. But, considering Elvis and all the crap that happened to him, they just might have been true."

"I know for a fact that Elvis planned to call Jackson," Briggs said, "even though he referred to him as `the little nigger boy.' That was such a put-down of Jackson, but the way Elvis said it-and I know this sounds crazy-it was an affectionate reference."

"Like, would you tell your secrets to Michael Jackson?" Briggs asked Elvis.

"There's no way that Michael Jackson is gonna write a book about me," Elvis told Briggs. "No way. You can trust people who don't write books. From what I know, the kid can't even read and write. I hear his brothers never went to school. Not that I got much education myself. Living a life like I've lived is all the education I need. I've seen it all!"

"I don't get it," Briggs said. "Why would you tell Michael Jackson your secrets?"

"The kid has an honest face, and I know I can trust him with my most private secrets," Elvis told Briggs.

"Secrets are dangerous things," Briggs warned Elvis. "Why tell them to anyone? They might use them against you."

"Don't you think I know that?" Elvis asked. "But I've got to confess them before I die. It's a compulsion with me. I can't stop myself. I know it's crazy. I have to unburden myself, and I'm playing with fire telling all this shit about myself. I know it'll get in print one day for the world to learn about. There's a war going on inside myself. The good side of me wants to protect myself from all harm. But there's another side of me that is trying to destroy Elvis Presley. Not only abusing his body, but telling his darkest secrets so my fans will know what's really going on and will be revolted by me."

It was seven o'clock in the morning before Briggs finally left Elvis's hotel suite. Dawn had come, but you wouldn't know it if you were in the suite, because heavy black velvet curtains blotted out the day.

"When I was putting Elvis to bed, I couldn't resist," Briggs said. "I just had to slip off his jockey shorts and see what it looked like. After all, he'd been the sex symbol of the 50s, and I wanted to see what drove all those girls crazy-and also how I stacked up against the King. The first voyeur who's willing to give me five-thousand dollars will get a complete description of it, in all its uncut glory, even a description of Elvis's balls. So that I would never forget, I even sketched what I'd seen that morning. Before becoming a 'gofer' at some fucking hotel, I had wanted to be an artist. Here was my chance. I plan to sell reproductions of my sketches of Elvis's privates for big bucks to collectors."

Contrary to what he had told Elvis, in the months leading up to the death of the singer on August 16, 1977, Michael read every item he could find that had ever been written about Elvis. But calls from Elvis to Michael, spilling out dark secrets, never came to be.

After Elvis's demise, Michael became even more obsessed with the circumstances surrounding the death of the former truck driver from Memphis. In the immediate hours following Elvis's death, Michael repeatedly played such hit songs as "Jailhouse Rock" and "Love Me Tender." And ghoulishly, Michael became obsessed with learning the most minute details of the autopsy performed on Elvis by Dr. Eric Muirhead, chief of the department of pathology at the Memphis hospital where Elvis was taken. Michael learned that Dr. Muirhead, in an inch-by-inch study of Elvis's corpse, found that the skin was "pitted" with numerous needle marks, almost too many to count accurately.

What allegedly fascinated Michael even more was when he learned that Elvis's rib cage had been cut open with a saw, exposing his lungs and heart. Painstakingly, each organ was examined after removal from the body cavity. The organs were weighed and studied carefully. Elvis's much-abused liver was found to resemble "pate de foie gras," the French goose liver specialty served in luxe restaurants.

The large intestine was clogged with fecal matter. One intern at the hospital morbidly joked, "The doctors learned that the King was full of shit, maybe forty feet of it."

Michael also learned that Elvis's heart was greatly enlarged. More than a dozen drugs, including significant amounts of codeine, were detected in Elvis's blood stream. Quaalude appeared in a toxic amount.

The staff at the hospital seemed particularly concerned that the autopsy on Elvis would not become the source of scandal the way it had on the one performed on the slain John F. Kennedy in 1963. Therefore, they proceeded to conduct the procedure on Elvis with extreme caution and meticulousness. Even so, the debate over Elvis's death would rage for at least a quarter of a century and beyond, evoking the usual lawsuits, book exposes, and even medical disbarment.

The usual procedure in an autopsy is to examine each organ exhaustively and remove tissue samples, placing them into bottles filled with preservatives. After that gruesome procedure, the brain is returned to the skull and the displaced organs "stuffed" back into the body the way a cook might assemble a Thanksgiving turkey.

In the wake of Elvis's death, there was a rumor that his body parts had not been returned to his corpse, but were still preserved in a laboratory. Rumors also spread that Michael made an attempt to secretly purchase Elvis's enlarged heart. Allegedly Michael also wanted Elvis's large intestine with the fecal matter intact. These stories may have been just scurrilous gossip at the time, and they cannot be confirmed. But in his future, Michael would be accused of similar ghoulish acts with the dead.

After his now legendary meeting with Elvis, Michael's life began to spin out of control. A fan, Theresa Gonsalves, pursued Michael to Las Vegas. Only sixteen, she was invited by Katherine to stay with the Jackson family. At first she was disappointed with Michael, finding him "arrogant and stuck up." But she finally warmed to Michael and they became friends, a relationship that would last for four years. Finally, when The Jacksons went to dinner and Michael stayed behind, Theresa got to be alone with her idol. As dreams of romance played out in her head, she was disappointed when Michael took out his Jehovah's Witness Bible and lectured her. "It's a sin to have sex outside of marriage," he told her, promising to pray for her redemption.

Following Michael's appearance with his brothers in Las Vegas, he was eager to abandon the group. He decided to pursue another solo album, Forever Michael, which would be released in January of 1975.

But he was distracted in rehearsals when Joe announced to his sons that they had a half-sister. Cheryl Terrell had given birth to a daughter, Joh Vonnie. Joe was the proud father.

Still married to Joe, Katherine referred to the Terrells as "that whore and her bastard child." Michael later claimed that the news of the addition to the Jackson family "made me want to vomit."

Not to be deterred, Joe purchased a midsize but tasteful home for his unmarried girlfriend and his new daughter only a short drive from the Jackson's Encino mansion. After enduring her humiliation for weeks, Katherine finally exploded. She drove to the Terrell household and attacked her rival when she appeared in her driveway. Her husband's baby was fastened into the Terrell car for a shopping expedition. Katherine yanked the hair of Joe's mistress, slapped her face, and knocked her down on the gravel.

Hearing the news an hour later, Michael rushed to Katherine's bedroom to console his mother, to whom he was still devoted. He pleaded with his mother to call her attorneys and reinstate her divorce proceedings against Joe. Katherine agreed to do that and packed her luggage, flying to stay with her mother. Three weeks later, after Joe pleaded with her on the phone, telling her that "You are the only woman I've ever loved," Katherine reluctantly returned to the household. Michael was disappointed at her capitulation to Joe.

The Jackson family continued to expand when Jackie married Enid Spann, age twenty. Her father was black but her mother had been born in Korea. The family, especially Joe, opposed Jackie's marriage, which was eventually celebrated on December 6, 1974. Jackie was extremely casual about his wedding, showing up in denim and gym shoes, with a wedding band he'd purchased at K-Mart.

Even though he'd recorded Forever Michael during a period of turmoil, Michael hoped for its success. But the album bombed, never going beyond 101 on Billboards charts, selling fewer than 100,000 copies. Joe was furious when he heard of the disappointing sales. "No more solo albums for Michael," he said. Joe blamed the failure of the album on Gordy and his lack of promotion.

Forever Michael would be the singer's last album for Motown. Although the album was a failure, one song surfaced: "One Day In Your Life."

In a rare act of defiance, Michael called Gordy and arranged to meet with him alone. This had never happened before. Eager to hear what the real star of the Jackson family had to say, Gordy set up an appointment with Michael and didn't let Joe know what was going on.

Michael himself has admitted that his reputation is one of shyness. Although that is true, when he wanted something, he could have the resolve of a steel magnolia. The day Gordy met with Michael, the promoter saw a determination he'd never seen in any of The Jacksons, certainly not in his son in-law, Jermaine, and a resolve unmatched by that of Joe himself.

"After that day, I never thought of Michael as a wimp," Gordy later said.

The secret rendezvous took place at the Gordy manse in Bel Air, California, on May 14, 1975. The meeting went badly, with Michael threatening to organize his family's abandonment of Motown, in spite of family ties through marriage. He poured out his frustration and unhappiness with the way Motown had controlled the group, not letting the brothers chart their own course with their own songs and instrumentation.

"Listen to me, kid," Gordy shouted at Michael in anger. "I picked you boys up in some Rust Belt hellhole in Indiana. You were playing stripper joints before I discovered you. Remember, without Berry Gordy, you'd be flipping burgers."

Finally, Gordy sighed. "I even let your brothers live in my own home. I moved you in with Diana Ross, a class act. I treated you like family. How can you even contemplate walking out on me after all I've done for you?"

That angered Michael. "Let me restate that. I respect you greatly. You're a genius in the business. But it's not a question of what you've done for us. It's what we've done for you. We worked our hearts out for one of the lowest royalty rates-perhaps the lowest in the business. A pathetic 2.7 percent." With that, Michael stormed out of Gordy's home. Their face-to-face encounter had utterly failed, and had, in fact, led to a lot of damage.

When Michael arrived home after the meeting, Joe had been tipped off by one of Gordy's household staff. He was waiting to beat Michael with a large thick leather belt with a steel buckle. When Michael came into the house, Joe didn't wait to have an argument. The sting of the whip slashed across Michael's face. When he realized what was happening, he fled from the house, outrunning his father. His whereabouts remained unknown for ten days.

To this day, no one knows where he went. But he was seen on Hollywood Boulevard three days later in a large sedan driven by an older man. When Michael finally did return home, Joe had cooled down considerably. He told Michael that he had decided that The Jackson 5 was "bolting Motown. It's our fuck-you to Jermaine's father-in-law."

Michael had nothing to say.

Joe called a meeting of all his sons, except Jermaine. Because of his marriage to Hazel, Joe didn't think he could trust Jermaine since "he's in the enemy camp." Michael joined in a vote with Jackie, Marlon, and Tito to split from Motown. Joe promised his sons that there was big money to be made at a much higher royalty rate at another record company. "You guys are big now because of me," Joe boasted. "I can make the deal of the century for you."

But other companies were not forthcoming with deals. The failure of Michael's recent album and the hit-or-miss sales racked up by the Jacksons didn't impress Atlantic Records, which nixed any hopes of linking their future to The Jackson 5.

Joe found a more receptive home at CBS Records, especially at its branch, Epic Records, which specialized in African-American entertainers.

Joe was happy to receive a check for $750,000 in upfront money. He also walked away with another half-a-million dollars for a development fund to produce Jackson 5 albums. Not only that, but he managed to negotiate an astonishing $350,000 per album as a guarantee against future sales, even if those sales didn't happen.

The advances were to be recouped from royalties, in a style that mimicked procedures that were prevalent in book publishing, but that rate was raised from 2.7 percent to 27 percent. "The decimal just disappeared," Joe boasted. And if sales shot up beyond the half million mark on an album, The Jackson 5 would get a 30 percent return. Epic did not grant complete artistic freedom, however, but allowed the brothers to select a trio of songs for each of their albums.

The bolting of The Jackson 5 from Motown was hailed as "the divorce of the century." Already in decline, Motown had lost such stars as Gladys Knight and The Pips, The Isley Brothers, The Four Tops, and The Temptations. Gordy had also witnessed the decline of his other acts, including the once-supreme Supremes.

Gordy told a reporter, "The Jacksons say they aren't being paid enough. Hell, they've made millions off me."

Jermaine faced a painful dilemma: To remain, professionally speaking, with his wife, Hazel, and her father, or else break from Motown, following Joe and his brothers. "Jermaine voted with his dick," said a raunchy Motown exec. "He stayed in Hazel's bed and told old Daddy-Pooh to go fuck himself, which he should have done long ago. Besides, I heard that Gordy had promised to make Jermaine a star in his own right, instead of appearing in Michael's shadow."

Jermaine explained it differently to the press. "I wasn't choosing between two families. I was making a selection between two rival recording companies. Motown or Epic."

Angered by Jermaine's decision, Joe blasted back. "It's my God damn blood that flows through Jermaine's body-not Berry Gordy's."

The farewell performance of The Jackson 5 occurred in Las Vegas in a final show in the summer of 1975. Michael suffered more from Jermaine's loss than his brothers. "I depended on being next to Jermaine. And when I did that first show without him there, with no one next to me, I felt totally naked onstage for the first time in my life."

Berry Gordy had been a smart executive. Even though he lost the Jackson brothers, he still owned the entire Jackson 5 catalogue. He was also sitting on a mountain of unissued recordings that the group had stockpiled over the years. Had he wished, he could have flooded the market with these recordings, potentially wiping out the sales of future Jackson 5 records through oversaturation of the marketplace.

That didn't happen, and The Jacksons, especially Michael, were set to move on into what one critic called "a record-busting future."

Regrettably, Joe had to abandon the name "The Jackson 5." Thanks to not having read the fine print when he'd signed the contract with Motown, Motown owned the rights to the use of the singing group's name. Consequently, Joe had to rename his boys "The Jacksons."

At a somber press conference during the summer of 1975 at New York's Rainbow Grill, the Jackson brothers, along with Joe, but without Jermaine, announced to the world they were leaving Motown. The announcement was premature, as The Jackson 5 contract would continue until March of 1976. The brothers had jumped ship before they were actually free to do so, an act of disloyalty that wasn't lost on the ever-sharp Gordy. Nonetheless, at the conference, Joe claimed that Epic, unlike Motown, which had often focused on the release of their songs as singles, would concentrate on issuing albums.

Gordy fought back, ordering his attorneys to file a $5 million breach of contract suit. Later, in his rage, he upped the ante to $20 million, his claim for damages. Almost immediately, Joe countersued.

To show he was still in control of The Jackson 5, Gordy ordered the release of a new Jackson 5 album, called Moving Violation. As if to show that Joe was wrong in his charges of neglect, Gordy worked personally to promote and distribute the album. But even so savvy a promoter as Gordy could not make Moving Violation a hit.

Gordy had hoped for a breakthrough single on the album-perhaps the solo version, "Moving Violation" itself-or else "All I Do Is Think of You." But no such luck.

That September, Gordy, exercising the rights of his contract, demanded that Joe bring the brothers back to Motown for another recording session. Joe adamantly refused, calling Gordy "a bastard," "an asshole," and a "son of a bitch." Wiser than his father this time, Michael urged caution. "A contract is a contract," he told Joe.

Michael was right. It would take years for Motown's lawsuit to be resolved, but it finally was, when Gordy got $600,000-not $20 million-in damages he'd legally sought.

Gordy later said, "At that time, I didn't know the full extent of what losing an act like The Jackson 5 would mean. I also did not know that in the industry it was hunting season, and Motown was the biggest game in town. They were all after us."

Joe had been savvy about moving over to Epic. Their first Jackson single, "Enjoy Yourself," sold a million copies. Their second recording, "Show You the Way to Go," topped the charts in Britain, the first time the brothers had ever accomplished that. Randy, by this time, had joined the group, playing the bongos.

Billed as The Jacksons, the brothers released their first album for Epic in 1976. To introduce America to the group's new name, the album was entitled simply The Jacksons. "Enjoy Yourself," a rollicking disco-style song, was the number one single on the album. The album only reached number 36 on Billboard's charts. And as if he wanted to intentionally sabotage sales, Motown released Joyful Jukebox Music, another Jackson album compiled from previously recorded songs. Despite the fact that the competing album failed, it nonetheless diluted the allure of Epic's release. Meanwhile, on his own, Jermaine recorded his first Motown release, My Name Is Jermaine. It never got beyond number 164 on the charts.

Without Jermaine, Papa Joe moved ahead with what he thought would become "a big deal" for his sons.

Over Michael's objections, Joe signed his sons to star in their own TV series for CBS. Michael called it "that stupid summer replacement," fearing that overexposure on the tube would damage sales of their recordings. He protested the "ridiculous outfits" he and his brothers wore and the "silly comedy routines" played to canned laughter.

In spite of Michael's complaints, the four-week series of 30-minute programs was a groundbreaker for black entertainers, as no African-American family had ever starred in a series for TV.

The funniest moments on the show involved Janet's impersonations of Mae West. She stole all the lines West, with her hourglass figure, had made famous: "When I'm good, I'm very good. But when I'm bad, I'm better." After watching Janet on TV, producer Norman Lear cast her in the sitcom Good Times. A new star had emerged in the Jackson family.

After an initial flurry of success, CBS canceled the Jackson TV series in January of 1977. It had landed at the bottom of the Nielsen chart, ending up in 70th position. Michael later claimed that the show was canceled because he wouldn't agree to a new contract, but that was not true. The Jacksons weren't the only series booted. Variety show after variety show was canceled, including Sonny and Cher.

In New York the Jackson brothers performed at the Nassau Coliseum, setting box office records there. In spite of their hit-and-miss career so far, plenty of fans, often black teenagers, were willing to shell out big bucks to get a look at the Jackson brothers.

With the obvious sex symbol of the group, the more studly Jermaine, out of the picture, the girls began to fantasize about a date with Michael, in spite of his impossibly thin figure and fey manner.

Michael had seen The Wiz on Broadway an astonishing five times, little knowing that he'd eventually co-star in the movie version. Backstage he'd been introduced to Stephanie Mills, a small package of talent with a voice that was sometimes compared to that of the Broadway legend, Ethel Merman.

Promoters for Michael had been advising him to invite a girl out on a date to combat rumors of homosexuality, but Michael had steadfastly refused. Under growing pressure, he decided to give in and pop the question-a request for a date, that is-to the petite Mills, considering her harmless enough.

Stephanie was only fifteen when she starred as Dorothy in The Wiz, and was very disappointed when she lost the film role to Diana Ross, who was "far too old to play Dorothy." As a performer, Stephanie had been discovered by Michael's brother, Jermaine, and she had signed with Motown in 1974. Even after her eventual break from Motown, Michael continued to listen to Stephanie's songs, as, for example, when she recorded the highly danceable "Put Your Body In It" and "What Cha Gonna Do With My Lovin'?" Before their date was over that night, she'd told Michael: "God touched my soul and told me he was going to make me a star!"

Amazingly, perhaps to protect himself in case Mills got "too familiar" on their date, Michael also invited a most unlikely guest, Andy Warhol.

It's not exactly clear how Michael met the pop artist. The introduction perhaps had occurred through their mutual friend, Liza Minnelli, but there have been other claims as well.

The setting for the late-night outing of this "threesome" was Regine's on Park Avenue, then the most sophisticated nightclub in New York.

Of Sephardic North African descent, Regine was already of "a certain age" as she greeted Mills, Warhol, and Michael at the door of her club. Warhol had already kept Michael waiting for one hour. In front of Regine, Warhol explained why he was so late and thanked her for holding their table. "When I went to take a shower, I thought I detected crabs. And it took some time to get rid of them. I have a special solution. All gay men who sleep around know about it."

Dubbed La reine de la Nuit Parisienne, Regine seemed enchanted by Michael, although most of her attention was directed to a table of Brazilian millionaires who were demanding her presence. They had paid one-million dollars for five people to fly from Rio to New York for a glorious weekend. One busty, blonde American movie star, whose career was fading, had agreed to fly in from Los Angeles and fuck all five millionaires for a fee of $100,000 per customer.

Michael seemed entranced to watch Regine "work the room," as she mingled with the famous and the infamous, including both American and British "royalty." She seemed as comfortable with titans of industry as she was with upscale hookers, the idle and bored, the terminally jaded, and the socially ambitious.

To Michael's dazzled eyes, the setting was a gathering of the glitterati on New York's apres-midnight scene.

"It's all style without substance," Warhol told Michael. "A viper's nest of roiling ambition. All of it horrendously snobbish and artfully arch, and how I love it! A feeding frenzy for the tabloids."

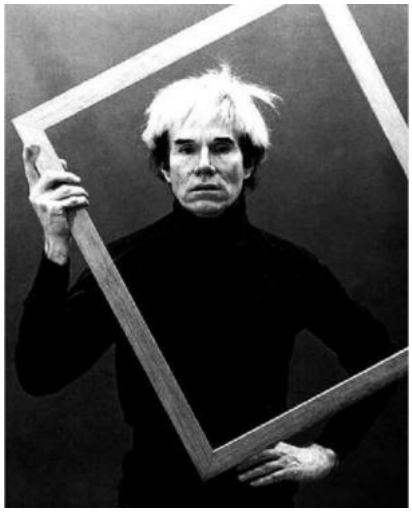
On the way into Regine's, Michael had passed the demimondaines of Europe (later known as Euro-Trash), shivering in gossamer dresses for the signal that would let them come inside.

At table, Mills made several obvious plays for Michael, but as Warhol would later tell Bianca Jagger, "The boy showed no interest at all."

At one point in the evening, Warhol startled Michael by saying, "I understand you Jackson brothers have to work like niggers in the cotton fields because you have no real money."

Michael politely asked him not to use the word "nigger."

"Please, this is no civil rights rally," Warhol said. "I am using the word as a form of endearment. You see, I'm always in the avant-garde. One day the word `nigger' will be perfectly acceptable. Right now queer is a bad word. But one day gays themselves will refer to themselves as queer. I know about such things."



Andy Warhol

When Mills got up to go to the ladies room, Warhol leaned toward Michael to whisper something confidential. "I want you to star in my next movie."

Michael's eyes lit up. The idea of making an Andy Warhol movie intrigued him. He wanted to know more.

"It's very experimental," Warhol said. "My film will show only your face in close-up for twenty minutes."

"And what am Ito do for that long?" a perplexed Michael asked.

"Forgive me, but I understand you're a virgin. I mean, I was told that your rectum has never been penetrated. In my film, I want to photograph only your face as a young and wellendowed model penetrates you for the first time. I also want to record every sound coming from your throat, including your cries of pain as you lose your cherry."

Stephanie Mills

Michael was rescued by Regine herself, who appeared in a stylish but old Chanel gown and asked him to step with her onto the dance floor. As she whirled around, she still greeted both friends and acquaintances. She even managed to continue dancing with Michael when one of her very handsome and blond French waiters handed her a crystal glass of champagne.

"No one can play the night as well as Regine herself," she whispered into Michael's ear.

Later, after Michael saw to it that Mills was delivered safely back to her room, Andy pressed an invitation onto him.

"It's a very special event I've been invited to, and I want you to go with me. Arnold Schwarzenegger is in town. He's German, maybe Austrian. He's got the world's most gorgeous body. He was Mr. Universe or something. Absolutely gorgeous. Tonight he's going to take off his posing pouch and appear nude in a number of poses for wealthy fans of body builders. It'll be thrilling. Tonight you'll get to see exactly what Mr. Universe is packing in that posing pouch. He's tantalized us long enough. I hear it's a thick, uncut Teutonic sausage."

"No, thank you!" Michael said abruptly. "I really must go. It's long past my bedtime."

Months later, Warhol would neither confirm nor deny if such a party for bodybuilder fans ever took place.

In the wake of Mills, Michael would soon be linked to another "girlfriend."

He may have brushed past actress Tatum O'Neal at a party Paul McCartney tossed in 1975 aboard the Queen Mary in Long Beach, California. She would have been only twelve years old at the time. Michael was seven- teen-"and ripe for plucking, darling-that's plucking with a P," said a gay friend of Cher's who had unsuccessfully tried to seduce Michael. "I wanted to be the first, but, alas, I got a lecture on morality instead."

Michael's relationship with the famous Beatle, and with Tatum herself, lay in the future.

It wasn't until April of 1977 that Michael and Tatum launched a much misunderstood friendship. It began at Jack Nicholson's On the Rox Club on Sunset Strip when Tatum showed up with her handsome, sandy-haired father, actor Ryan O'Neal, still remembered for his portrayal in that drippy 1970 film, Love Story. Tatum's father was one of the great womanizers of Hollywood. His seductions had included Mia Farrow, Melanie Griffith, Anjelica Huston, Bianca Jagger, Ali MacGraw, Liza Minnelli, Joan Collins, Oona Chaplin (widow of Charlie), and even Margaret Trudeau, wife of the Canadian prime minister. His most famous affair was with Farrah Fawcett. Both Berry Gordy and O'Neal had competed for the favors of Diana Ross. Gordy claimed that O'Neal had "the whitest damn teeth I have ever seen in my life."

Michael and Ryan were talking confidentially about the need for privacy. O'Neal told Michael, "I'm as moody and complex and private as anyone I ever knew-except you!"

In Moonwalk, Michael recalled, "I was sitting at this table and all of a sudden I felt this soft hand reach over and grab mine. It was Tatum. She touched me." He later claimed "I fell in love with her" and made the preposterous statement, "and she with me." Once again, as with Ross, Michael invented a love relationship that didn't really exist. Call his so-called "affair" with Tatum a friendship. She certainly characterized it as that.

Tatum had appeared in the 1973 film, Paper Moon, opposite her real-life father. She stole the picture from him as the tough-talking, cigarette-smoking orphan. At the age of ten, she became the youngest performer to win an Oscar. Before her subsequent decline and eventual marriage to tennis player John McEnroe, she was considered a "hot child actor."

As unbelievable as it sounds, twelve-year-old Tatum called Michael and asked him out on a date. He accepted. To his surprise, she took him to a dinner in Holmby Hills. It turned out to be within the notorious mansion of Hugh Hefner, the Playboy publisher. Ryan O'Neal was a frequent visitor to the mansion and a favorite of the "Bunnies," allegedly because of his great skill in the sack. On their first night together, Tatum and Michael watched part of the TV mini-series, Roots, by Alex Haley.

Michael was enthralled by Roots, relating his own experiences in Senegal to Tatum. At one point she became distracted and invited Michael to join her in Hefner's "hot tub," where male movie stars often cavorted in the nude with Playboy Bunnies.

When he protested that he didn't have a bathing suit, she called him a "square," but finally secured one for him from one of Hefner's waiters.

Apparently, a waiter at Hefner's mansion that night tried to sell a story to the National Enquirer that he'd spotted a "totally nude" Tatum and a "jaybird naked" Michael fornicating in the hot tub. The rumor spread like wildfire. One underground paper in Hollywood carried the headline: TATUM BUSTS MICHAEL'S CHERRY. Yet another scurrilous rag, skirting the laws of libel, proclaimed that GAY MICHAEL SAMPLES STRAIGHT SEX WITH UNDERAGE TEEN STAR.

Ryan O'Neal

Michael later suggested that all Tatum and he did that night was "look for shooting stars and share our deepest secrets." He later asked a question of a reporter for the Los Angeles Times: "Why do people insist on always finding something dirty in the most harmless pastimes?"

Tatum left early that night to go home, but Michael was invited to stay on by Hefner himself. The original Playboy had just emerged from one of the upstairs boudoirs where he'd been occupied for most of the evening.

"You're a virgin, I hear," Hefner asked Michael as a way of introducing himself.

Michael blushed but did not directly answer the question. "We've all got our dark secrets."

"I can introduce you to one of my `Special Ladies' tonight," Hefner offered. "She will rob you of your virginity forever."

"No thanks," Michael said.

"Come on, boy, live a little," Hefner urged. "I never recommend a brunette for the job of cherry stealing. A brunette is a type of woman you marry or at least take for a mistress. For the initial seduction, blondes are preferred, as they are always dangerous and forbidden, whether bottle or natural. They represent the forbidden sexuality, danger. As for redheads, they are a mere variation of the blonde. Also, danger. So what will it be: blonde or redhead."

"Mr. Hefner, I'm sure your Bunnies are wonderful," Michael said in a soft voice. "But at my age, the only Bunny I'm interested in is Bugs Bunny."

"Oh, I get it," Hefner said. "You're gay. Don't worry, I have several handsome waiters here who are most accommodating."

"Excuse me, Mr. Hefner," Michael said, getting up. "But I've got to go. I really thank you for your hospitality."

Their personalities could not have been more different, but after that night at the Playboy mansion, Michael and Tatum developed an unlikely friendship.

Sassy and precocious, Tatum was the very opposite of Michael. She was hip whereas he was square. She was cynical, Michael dreamy-eyed. But nonetheless, Tatum and Michael bonded, perhaps because of the childhood trauma each had endured. Both had "distant" fathers.

But there were differences: Michael claimed that his mother, Katherine, was a saint. Tatum's own mother, actress Joanna Moore, was an alcoholic, drifting in and out of her daughter's life, often destructively.

As their friendship deepened, Tatum poured out her past angst to Michael. She described how her Darvon-addicted mother once left her and her brother, Griffin, locked away in a room for hours. "We had no choice but to defecate on the floor," Tatum said. One time Joanna went away for a weekend, according to Tatum, having locked Tatum and Griffin in a bathroom. "She simply forgot about us." Once Joanna left them locked in a garage where they had to eat dog food to survive. Tatum's life with her mother made Christina Crawford's upbringing with Joan Crawford, as related in the 1981 Mommie Dearest, seem like a garden party. In her memoirs, A Paper Life, Tatum claimed that Joanna "was freewheeling with her fists, coming from a generation that was big on beatings."

Oddly enough, both Michael and Tatum had adopted rats as pets. At a ramshackle ranch where Tatum lived with her mother, Tatum set out food for the rodents along with water. Her brother, Griffin, and Tatum adopted the rats as pets and gave them names.

Michael's love for his pet rats ended badly when he came home one day and saw Father Rat eating his young babies. Tatum's love affair with rodents ended when her mother's fifteen-year-old boyfriend claimed that rats had rabies and threw them in a pond "and made us watch them drown," Tatum claimed. "Since rats can swim, it took a very long time, and it completely freaked us out. I grieved for days."

With such an unlikely beginning, Michael and Tatum continued this "odd couple" relationship that he'd repeat with both genders throughout the rest of the 20th century.

Tatum did admit that she found her long drawn-out conversations with Michael so boring that she would often hand over the receiver of the phone to a friend who listened as Michael droned on and on.

She found Michael "incredibly sweet and innocent," surprising, she admitted for a world-renowned performer. "His usual subject was sex," Tatum said, although admitting that at the age of twelve, even though worldly for her years, she didn't have a lot to contribute on the subject, except what she'd heard coming from her father's bedroom next to hers.

If Tatum is to be believed, the so-called seduction that Michael once bragged about didn't really happen, and Tatum is most trustworthy, having written such a candid memoir. Having rarely, if ever, viewed a girl's bedroom before, Michael asked to see where Tatum slept. "He sat on my bed, and we kissed very briefly," Tatum confessed, "but it was terribly awkward." All she remembered was Michael, "sweating profusely," jumping up and apologizing, claiming he had to go.

At the time of Michael's so-called "affair" with Tatum, various publications were offering good money to the first girl-or woman-who seduced Michael, taking his virginity. Various bets were placed, and some incidents of dubious authenticity were reported in headline news in such national publications as The Star. Various actresses, models, and singers were said to have attempted to seduce Michael-but to no avail.

Even Margaux Hemingway got in on the act. Born in Idaho, she was the daughter of Jack Hemingway, son of the Nobel Prize winning author Ernest Hemingway. She met Michael at the height of her fame when she had a budding movie career and a one-million-dollar promotional contract with Faberge perfume. Her face was appearing on magazine covers around the world.

In Key West, Florida, in 1996, a few months before her suicide by overdose in Santa Monica, California, Margaux told her hostess, Hazel Triplett, that she once had a standing bet with Tatum as to which one could seduce Michael first. Margaux, who stood six feel tall in her bare feet, claimed that she had encountered Michael on several occasions. She even took to calling him "Boopsie" and invited him to go hiking with her in Idaho-"I know all the best trails."

"I completely struck out, and as I understand it, so did Tatum," she said. "I tried everything, but Michael eluded me. I hear he was as fleet footed as Mercury and outran his father to escape beatings. He got away from me, too, even though I was fast on my feet in spite of my size."

Later in her life, as she plunged into drugs and alcohol, Margaux in her decline sent several urgent appeals to Michael to help her. It is not known if these letters were even delivered to him. Once she invited him to Cicada, one of Hollywood's hippest restaurants, to hear her sing the blues, but he never showed up. Margaux was desperate for money and was forced to declare bankruptcy and to appear in sexually kinky 13movies. At one point, she lent her endorsement to a psychic hotline and supported herself by autographing nude photos of herself in Playboy.

Griffin O'Neal

Margaux confessed that her last attempt to seduce Michael occurred one night at Studio 54 in New York. "He was there with the Liza Minnelli and Warhol crowd, and I went for him but he didn't go for me, although he did dance with me. I loved to dance. But somehow after he rejected me, I ended up feeling like a big potato from Idaho."

"Many doors were open to me because my last name was Hemingway," she once told Michael. "But to tell you the truth, I never cracked one of Papa's books. I have dyslexia."

Although Michael attacked rumors about himself for most of his career, he deliberately encouraged speculation about a romance with Tatum. Tout Hollywood wasn't to be fooled. At cocktail parties, some insiders of the industry were circulating far different rumors about Michael and his involvement with the O'Neals. As one made the party circuit in those days, the word was out that Michael had fallen not for Tatum but for her cute little brother, Griffin. If there were a crush-and this is pure speculation and gossip-it was strictly on Michael's part, not on Griffin's.

Griffin admired Michael's musical talent, and perhaps a friendship developed, but that was it. Tatum herself called her brother a "musical savant," and he was known for his skill not only at the drums but on the guitar. "He wasn't Liberace, but he could play a mean piano," his father said. Even Michael was impressed with Griffin's talents, and he would play the drums with Griffin, seemingly enjoying time spent with him instead of with Tatum. Tatum didn't seem jealous in the least, since she harbored no romantic fantasies about Michael.

These concerts between Michael and Griffin took place at 9897 Beverly Grove Drive in a house that had once belonged to John Barrymore. At the time, Griffin was small for his age and had a slight frame. Since this was the type of young boy Michael was allegedly drawn to, rumors were rampant, although completely untrue. "When did rumors ever have to be true in Hollywood?" a future friend of Michael's, Marlon Brando, once asked. "In fact, rumors often reveal more about the people spreading them than the subject of the gossip."

According to Tatum, within the text of her autobiography, A Paper Life, Michael lectured Griffin on the evils of pot-smoking and tried to get him to give up the habit. But Griffin refused. An intimate of the O'Neals, Michael quickly learned the family secrets. It brought back painful memories of his own father when he witnessed Ryan physically striking Griffin. As the boy cried from his beatings, Michael tried to console him, wishing someone in his own family, especially Katherine, had done the same for him.

Also within her autobiography, Tatum revealed that her father had sometimes sent Griffin on drives in her BMW to secure drugs. Even though he was at the time too young to even legally drive a car, Griffin carried out these dan gerous drug runs anyway, and was once returned to the Barrymore/O'Neal house by the police. Michael seemed horrified when learning of these stories. Griffin was just thirteen at the time.

Michael was saddened by later events in Griffin's life as he struggled with substance abuse. In 1986 that would lead to a tragic boating accident that snuffed out the life of Gian-Carlo, the son of Francis Ford Coppola. Griffin was indicted for manslaughter in connection with that accident. The charges were later reduced to negligent boat operation, of which Griffin was found guilty.

Margaux Hemingway

At the time, Ruth Joanna Coffine, a Torontobased journalist, was attempting to write a book about the dysfunctional O'Neal family. She eventually abandoned the project, but not before completing a chapter devoted to the "Michael/Tatum affair," which she described like this:

"Michael was a virgin when he met Tatum, and a virgin when he left her," Coffine claimed. "There are two reasons Michael Jackson refuses to have sex with a girl in spite of literally hundreds of offers, most often from white girls. First, he's afraid of sex. His mother, Katherine, taught him it's a nasty thing to indulge in. Secondly, he doesn't give a damn for it. When his interest eventually surfaces, it might not even be a girl that Michael is attracted to, and I don't mean an older woman either. Tatum was ripe for the plucking, and stunningly beautiful. Her soft blonde hair and `bassinet pink skin' was desired by every Lothario in Hollywood who had a Lolita fantasy. I really feel Michael could have seduced her-certainly one of his brothers would have gone for her-but Michael is, if you can believe him (and I don't), saving it `until the right woman comes along.' Yeah, right!"

Tatum was known as a "disco baby," dancing the night away at clubs, with older friends: the far more sophisticated Bianca Jagger, Cher, or Margaux Hemingway.

"Tatum was younger than Michael," Margaux once said. "In terms of experience, Michael seemed as naive as a nine-year-old girl, whereas Tatum talked like she had a track record to match that of Jayne Mansfield."

The faux romance between Michael and Tatum ended when he invited her to the premiere in New York of The Wiz, in which he'd been cast as the Scarecrow. Michael wanted to show up with "arm candy"-in this case, Tatum-and asked her to go with him. Tatum claimed that her talent agency protested violently, telling her, "You can't go to a premiere with a nigger." Tatum turned Michael down, and he was so insulted he would go for months without speaking to her again.

Michael's relationship with Tatum had begun impulsively and it eventually flickered out. However, in 1980, he would write the song, "She's Out of My Life." It was said to have been inspired by his so-called love affair with Tatum.

In the years ahead, Tatum had an outing or two with Michael and that was that. But she resurfaced in his life in 2003 when she went public to denyonce again-Michael's seduction claims. In a documentary, Living With Michael Jackson, Michael told Martin Bashir, a British journalist, that Tatum attempted to bed him, but he couldn't go through with it because he was overcome with shyness. Jackson claimed, "She told me to go over and lie on the bed. I lay on the bed and she slowly walked over, and she touched the button on my shirt to open it."

In the interview, aired on both British and American television, Michael said he covered his face with his hands and wouldn't let them down. "She just walked away," Michael said. "I was afraid." Tatum lashed back, claiming "Michael has a vivid imagination. Michael did come over to my house when my father was home, but at twelve years old, there was no way I was capable of being as mature or as sophisticated as he claimed I was."

Michael's encounters with Tatum were mild compared to other rumors sweeping the nation. Another faux romance. Rumors even made the headlines that Michael was going to undergo a sex change operation and become the "bride" of Clifton Davis. These allegations first appeared in Jet magazine.

Davis was a most unlikely "husband" for a future transgendered Michael. Born in Chicago at the close of World War II, Davis is familiar to TV addicts who saw him in the lead role in Thats My Mama in the 1970s and on Amen in the 1980s. He won a Tony Award for Best Actor in 1972 on Broadway for his performance in a musical version of Two Gentlemen of Verona. He was also a songwriter, writing The Jackson 5 hit, "Never Can Say Goodbye."

An ordained Seventh Day Adventist Church minister, Davis was astonished to be linked with Michael in a rumored homosexual relationship.

Marlon Brando, who always had his ear tuned to a good rumor, said, "If you're going to tell a lie, make it a big one. Whoever started this rumor wasn't satisfied with a potential same-sex marriage. They had to go all out and throw in the sex change. In a way, the rumor had a strange kind of logic. Davis is straight. If he ever were to marry Michael, he would insist that our friend transform himself into a woman."

Michael was unaware of the rumor until one afternoon on Hollywood Boulevard when he was casually browsing through a record store. One young man, perhaps no more than fifteen, rushed up to him: "Please, don't cut it off! Don't become a girl."

Without an explanation, the young man then ran screaming from the store. Later that night, Michael learned of the rumor linking him with Davis and the sex-change operation.

At the time, Michael had never met Davis. That meeting came later, in Las Vegas, when Davis, accompanied by Leslie Uggams, came backstage to congratulate Diana Ross on her spectacular appearance at Caesars Palace. Davis shook Michael's hand.

Unlike Michael, Davis was confident in his own sexuality and could regard the rumors with a certain detachment after his initial astonishment. "Michael," he said at the time of their initial meeting, firmly shaking his hand, "I think you'd make an ugly girl. You really don't have to go to such an extreme to have me become your husband." He laughed at the absurdity of it all.

"I am not a homo," Michael announced heatedly to Ross, Uggams, and Davis.

"We're all God's children," Davis said. "Be what you want to be."

"There's nothing gay about me!" Michael was overheard saying.

In the years to come, much of the world would disagree with Michael's assessment of his sexual preference and label him gay whether he was or not.

Although rumors about the sex change and his upcoming "marriage" to Davis eventually died their predictable death, the gay charges would remain forever.

In the political correctness battle, Michael lost the first round when he told one reporter for the Los Angeles Times that he found "homosexuality disgusting, and it's completely against my religion."

Being a homosexual himself, the reporter was immediately offended.

Some officials at Epic were horrified as well. Market surveys had shown that homosexual men and women formed one of the largest blocs of record buyers. The day he pronounced homosexuality disgusting, thousands of gay men agreed to boycott any of his future records. Public relations men in the record business apparently got to Michael, warning him "to cool it."

In subsequent statements to the press, he toned down his inflammatory rhetoric. "I am well aware that plenty of my fans are gay, and I appreciate that. I am not bothered by their choice of lifestyle. However, such a lifestyle is not suitable for me-I'm not gay! And that's that! I know the media will print what they will, but when they print that I'm gay, they are lying to the American public. There's not even the slightest gay streak in me. Just because I have a high, soft voice doesn't mean I'm gay. Millions of men throughout the world have soft, high voices-and aren't gay but married with children."

At times throughout his career, Michael seemed sensitive about his speak ing voice. Naturally, its high pitch inspired more rumors, one being that he took sex hormones to heighten the pitch of his voice, if such a thing were possible. Again, these rumorsperhaps accurately-were vehemently denied. "What people spreading those rumors were really saying," said an executive at Epic, "is that Michael is not a real man."

Clifton Davis

Like many Jehovah's Witnesses, Katherine herself was a homophobe. "I go nuts when I hear people calling my son, Michael, gay. He is not! A mother knows. He follows the teachings of our church which condemns the homosexual life. Michael reads his Bible every night. In it he reads that homosexuality is a sin against God's wishes. Michael does not disobey the will of God."

These protestations fell on deaf ears. Hundreds upon hundreds of fans stopped buying Michael's records. "How could I have boyfriend fantasies about him any more?" asked Alexis Philip, who was the president of Michael's fan club in one of its Ohio branches. "I was shocked to learn that he wanted to have a vagina instead of a dick-that's one of the most sickening things I have ever heard in my life. Before I learned the truth, I used to think Michael was a great singer. Today if I hear his voice on the radio, I cut off the station. I have also urged my girlfriends never to buy another Michael Jackson record."

Confronting a member of the press in Los Angeles, Michael faced a barrage of questions, all of which dealt with the gay issue. "I am not gay!" he shot back angrily, a denial he was repeating more and more. "I'm not a homo. Not in the least. People make up stories claiming I'm gay just to sell papers. The idea of me having sex with men is absurd. I would never do that. I refuse to cheapen myself like that. Just because I'm not seen in public with a lot of girlfriends doesn't mean that I don't have them. But I like to keep my private life private. I believe in protecting the privacy of the young girls I date."

The biographer, J. Randy Taraborrelli, once wrote: "Michael Jackson would never allow himself to have homosexual relationships, even if he did have feelings for other men. He is much too puritanical, a result of his religious background."

Of course, no one could ever make such a statement about another human being without inviting ridicule. As one more astute journalist put it, "We can never know what is going on inside the heart of another human being. We can't share their dreams and desires. Some people are homosexuals and haven't even faced up to it. It is foolish for one person to claim that another person does not have homosexual desires. How could we possibly know that? I've led a completely straight life all my years except for one or two very early and very tentative experiences with another boy when I was fourteen. It was nothing, really. But every few weeks or so, I ask myself if I'm not a secret homosexual. But I try to wipe it from my mind because I don't want to go there."

One night Michael Bennett and playwright James Kirkwood were discussing the casting of a Broadway musical, A Chorus Line, in a bar at the Astor Colonnade in New York. Kirkwood was the first to suggest Michael for one of the roles, and Bennett, after thinking it over for a while, finally agreed.

When the role was offered to Michael, he was thrilled but finally decided not to take the part of a dancer, who at the show's climax, reveals himself to be gay, with all the trials and controversies that his sexual preference has cost him. Michael's reason for turning down the role was "because people will think I'm actually gay myself-and not just playing the part of a gay in a musical." What Michael didn't seem to realize was that thousands of people were beginning to think he was gay whether he played gay on the stage or not.

The press speculation about Michael's alleged homosexuality began to reach unprecedented heights for an entertainer, a situation that would "become nuclear," as Kirkwood put it, in the years ahead.

In a cover story for Time magazine, Jack Cocks wrote that Michael's "high-flying tenor makes him sound like the lead in some funked-up boys choir, even as the sexual dynamism irradiating from the arch of his dancing challenges government standards for nuclear meltdown. His lithe frame, fivefathom eyes, and long lashes might be threatening if Jackson gave, even for a second, the impression that he is obtainable. But the audience's sense of his sensuality becomes quite deliberately tangled up with the mirror image of his life. Undeniably sexy. Absolutely safe. Eroticism at arm's length."

Michael spoke candidly to his vocal coach, Seth Riggs, about the popular conception that he was gay. "The other day a big, tall, blond, nice-looking fellow came up to me and said, `Gee, Michael, I think you're wonderful. I sure would like to go to bed with you.' I looked at him and said, `When's the last time you read the Bible? You know you really should read it because there is some real information in there about homosexuality.' The guy said, `I guess if I'd been a girl, it would have been different.' And I said, `No, there are some very direct words on that in the Bible, too.'"

If that statement were reported accurately, Michael was not only admitting that he would not practice homosexuality because "the Bible says not to," but would not partake of straight sexual encounters as well. His randy brothers obviously did not share Michael's reserve.

"Could it be true?" writer Phoebe Foggin asked. "Is Michael neither gay nor straight but asexual? He sure sounds that way. Or does he use religion as a shield to protect himself from reporters' probing questions?"

As time went by, Michael was having a hard time reconciling his "notorious" show business career with a draconian "Armageddon-around-the-corner religion," as defined by the Jehovah's Witnesses. Not only were Easter and Christmas "outlawed," and homosexuality forbidden, but extramarital intercourse between heterosexuals was condemned as well. Of course, oral and anal sex were out of the question, because gays indulged in such pastimes. As Barbara Grizzuti Harrison wrote in her book, Visions of Glory, Witnesses make it clear that, "you don't have to perform a homosexual act to qualify as a homosexual. If you have homosexual fantasies, you are a homosexual in your heart and God sees your heart."

Michael couldn't spend all his days denying that he was a homosexual. He also had to make music-and so he did, either with his less-talented brothers or without them.

Still known as "The Jacksons," the brothers, with Michael as lead singer, released their second album, Goin' Places, for Epic in the winter of 1977. It reached only number 52 on Billboards charts, which did a lot better than Jermaine's album at Motown. Consequently, executives at CBS began to have serious second thoughts about the Jackson brothers.

"Goin'Places performed dismally," said an officer at Epic. "We were bitterly disappointed as we had high hopes. Even so, we decided it was too early to boot The Jacksons. We rolled the dice and gave the boys much greater control over their next album. For all we knew, if it failed, it would be the last of The Jacksons. As for me personally, I never liked black music. I like my music just like I like my women and my coffee: White!"

Katherine particularly liked one single on the album, "Man of War," a plea for peace. She noted that when her sons were at Motown, Gordy steered them away from any kind of "black power" material, but she was glad to see her boys record a "message song," feeling it was a sign that the Jackson brothers, even Michael and Randy, were growing into men who took stands for what is right.

Tito claimed that people in the business began telling him that "your career, and that of your brothers, is history."

Everybody was disappointed except Michael. At least on the surface, he appeared both defiant and confident. "We'll come back bigger and better than ever," he assured both his mother and his brothers.

Greg Phillinganes, who had toured with Stevie Wonder, was recruited by CBS to work with The Jacksons on their new album, Destiny, helping them with the arrangements. Arriving at their Encino house, Phillinganes found the brothers "real enthusiastic and excited because this was the first time in their entire careers that they controlled the music. All of them could write, but I thought Michael and Randy were probably the strongest of the brothers."

Michael repaid the compliment by naming Phillinganes "Mouse," for some odd reason. The artist was anything but. The nickname was completely inappropriate, "except he did eat cheese," Joe claimed.

With hopes for a comeback, the Jackson brothers recorded their third LP for Epic. Destiny was released in 1978 and was reviewed as a "coming-ofage" album for The Jacksons. In that sense, it evoked The Beatles' album, Revolver. Michael himself selected the peacock as the symbol to use on the back of the album. "The peacock is the only bird that integrates all the colors of the rainbow into one. It can produce only this radiance of fire when it's in love. Love is what we're trying to represent in Destiny. To unite the races through the enduring symbol of love. Since politics can't save the world, give music a chance." The name of the production company handling The Jacksons' music became known as Peacock Productions.

"Ron Alexenburg of CBS Records made a total leap of faith in us," Michael later said, "and let us write and produce our own material, something Gordy at Motown had never done."

Alexenburg "showed the faith" that none of the other top brass at CBS had-in fact, the studio had seriously considered buying out The Jacksons' contract for $100,000 and assigning them to the dustpan of the music industry as a faded, not-very-significant act that belonged to yesterday. "We had about as much faith in the revival of the Jackson brothers as we did in reviving the so-called singing career of Tab Hunter," said one CBS executive.

Randy claimed that doing the Destiny album "was the greatest test for my brothers and me." Marlon Jackson vowed, "We'll show the fuckers that we're not washed up in the business."

All of The Jacksons were collectively credited for five of the eight songs on the album. The first single release on the album, "Blame It on the Boogie," flopped, but the brothers hadn't written that one. The song was written by three writers from Europe. One member of that trio, ironically, was named Michael Jackson (no relation).

Their own song in solo release, "Shake Your Body (Down to the Ground)" peaked at number seven on Billboards pop chart, selling two million records. Dick Clark declared it "the great dance record of the 70s." It was a joint effort of both Michael and his younger brother, Randy, and it shot up to become a platinum disc, generating across-the-board play on radio, becoming one of the most requested disco singles of 1978. Even Truman Capote and Lee Radziwell (Jackie's sister) were seen dancing to it at New York's Studio 54.

The final song on the album, "That's What You Get (For Being Polite)" was almost about Michael himself, in that it laments the woes of a "sensitive" young man who remains emotionally unfulfilled, as Michael was in his own closeted life.

After the release of the Destiny album, The Jacksons went on a nationwide tour, which left Michael so terribly exhausted at one point that he lost his voice. A specialist pronounced that his throat was coated with blisters. Marlon, standing close to Michael, had to sing some of his words for him. The audiences didn't detect that Michael was merely lip-synching.

The tour grossed $750,000 but Michael claimed, "I was very unhappy and stayed in my hotel room when I wasn't on stage. I came alive only when I was performing. That's the only time in my life I'm happy."

Joe forced Michael to grant interview after interview to reporters or magazine feature writers. Michael agreed although the questions had to be funneled through Janet. Sitting next to her, Michael would listen to a reporter's question, then would hear Janet repeat it. He then told his answer to Janet, who relayed it to the reporters sitting across from Michael and his sister. "It was so bizarre," said Steve Demorest of Melody Maker magazine.

It was with Demorest that Michael first expressed his "very strong interest" in children, although he made the claim that, "I would never father one myself."

One reporter found that Michael offstage showed "no masculinity at all. He had mastered that breathless whisper of Jackie Kennedy which he interspersed with Marilyn Monroe's pre-coital, come-hither voice-with a few Minnie Mouse caught-in-a-mousetrap squeals thrown in for good measure. If he talked like that in a bar in Broken Bow, Nebraska, he would have been hauled out into a back alley and beaten up as a faggot. In other words, Michael didn't speak like John Wayne at all."

Despite the many rumors, instead of a hot sex life, Michael was devoted to his music. On the dawn of his 18th birthday, he found solace in his work.

Still fighting to gain more artistic control over his own voice and the words he sang, he said: "There's a lot of music inside of me that I haven't brought out. We put our hearts into other writers' songs but they're not the cure. They're not really us."

Michael used music to escape from his own personal insecurities about his looks. Acne continued to plague him. "I seem to have a pimple for every oil gland," he said. "My skin is too dark, my nose too wide." He knew that in time the pimples would go, but not his looks. He dreamed of having lighter skin. "As for the nose," he told his mother, "there are surgeons who can do something about that."

When Katherine told Joe that Michael might possibly be considering plas tic surgery on his nose, he replied: "If he goes through with that, I'll bash his face in, new nose and all, and then he'll really need to go to one of those butchers."

His brothers continued to tease him, making him feel even more insecure. All of them had learned to drive except Michael. For some reason, he was petrified to get behind the wheel of a car. "In that case," Joe told him, "you'd better earn enough money so that you can always afford a chauffeur in your future." Michael finally got a driver's license. By then, he was twenty-three years old.

During the 70s, Michael lived in an escapist world. Unlike some performers, such as Warren Beatty or Barbra Streisand, he had no interest in politics or the outside world. Robert Redford might express concern over the polluting of the environment, but all Michael saw of America was a hotel suite or else an auditorium.

After Gerald Ford became president following Richard Nixon's resignation, one newspaper reporter was startled to learn that Michael still thought Nixon was president. "Just who is president now?" Michael asked. The astonished reporter told him it was Gerald Ford. "I didn't know that," Michael responded, "but I never read newspapers, not even Variety. I find cartoons more interesting."

Michael's lack of education also showed up in his speech. He was still using such expressions as "don't got no."

But during the filming of The Wiz, co-starring Michael, Diana Ross topped even Michael in her ignorance of American presidents. When he noticed that Ross was edgy and nervous about a scene, director Sidney Lumet told her: "You have nothing to fear but fear itself."

"Catchy line," she said. "Did you make that up or steal it from someone?"

Lumet admitted stealing it from Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

"Never heard of him, but you should hire him to rewrite all my lines in this film."

Not satisfied with being a "mere singer" (his words), Michael harbored a secret dream of becoming a movie star. His chance for film stardom came when Lumet offered him the key role of the Scarecrow in The Wiz, a 1978 black version of MGM's 1939 The Wizard of Oz. The Wiz had been a smash hit on Broadway, winning seven Tony awards. Budgeted at thirty million dollars, the film version of The Wiz would be the most expensive film ever produced with an all-black cast.

Jermaine was dead set against Michael accepting the role, even though at the time he was still married to Hazel and still at Motown with a career going nowhere. "You'll fuck it up!" he warned Michael.

Joe also was against Michael accepting the role, fearing that it might "make him into a big movie star-and then he'll bolt from his brothers." For years, Joe had been searching for the right film script in which "all my sonsnot just Michael-would be the stars." So far, he'd come up with no acceptable script.

The role of the Scarecrow seemed ideal for Michael, who admitted that he was "too bouncy for the Tin Man and too light for the Lion."

Michael nearly lost out on the role right before filming began when he suffered a lung attack on the beach on July 4, 1977. "They had to rush me to the emergency hospital," he later recalled. "The doctor said it was pneumothorax. That's bubbles on the lungs. Many slim people have this condition. The doctor also told me I had a mild case of pleurisy." At the time Michael stood five foot nine, a mere 105 pounds spread across a skeletal frame.

When he recovered and arrived at the studio to shoot the movie, he found make-up a grueling task and a painful ordeal. It took five hours every morning for make-up artists to transform Michael into his role. When they were finished, Michael faced the camera in a fright wig with a tomato nose. The heavy makeup left his skin blotched and marked. "My eyes were red and sore," he said. "At the end of the day, my fans outside would point at me and say, `Hey that guy's on drugs-look what it's doing to him!'"

The Wiz was inspired by the film that had brought fame to Judy Garland, who wandered far from Kansas and over the rainbow. Michael dreamed that The Wiz would launch him into a successful movie career as well. Even more than he wanted to be a singer, he craved fame on the screen, much as Madonna would do.

In The Wiz, Michael faced a tough act to follow. The Scarecrow role had brought screen immortality to actor Ray Bolger, who painfully had to see Michael's rendition of what had been his piece-de-la-resistance. After watching it, Bolger said, "The Wiz shortened my life by five years."

A savvy show biz entertainer, Bolger instinctively knew that Michael had not been inspired by his own interpretation of the Scarecrow, but by Charlie Chaplin instead. Like Chaplin, Michael too would later be accused of child molestation. Chaplin remained his favorite actor. "I wanted some of the quality of The Little Tramp in my Scarecrow," Michael claimed.

Michael had seen all available copies of Chaplin's films, including his favorite, The Gold Rush, released in 1925. In the words of one writer, Michael borrowed Chaplin's "disjointed, floppy movements and his shy, retiring onscreen character."

"I love acting so much," Michael told a reporter from The New York Daily News. "It's fun. It's just neat to become some character on the screen, another person different from yourself. That's especially true when you really believe you're the Scarecrow and not just acting. At the end of the day, I hate to take my makeup off. Sometimes I go home and keep it on while I watch old movies starring Katharine Hepburn or Fred Astaire. I've always hated the word `acting.' Or `I'm an actor.' What one should say is not that but `I'm a believer.'"

MJ with Miss Ross and Quincy Jones, 1973

The filming of The Wiz began in October and lasted until Christmas of 1977. The site was the old Astoria Studios in Queens, where the early greats of the silent screen had emoted. "It had a lot of dusty memories and cobwebs," Michael said. The studio had not been used since the heyday of the Roaring Twenties and the virtual birth of the cinema on a grand scale.

Michael's "girl friend," Stephanie Mills, who had played Dorothy on Broadway, desperately wanted to do the movie version. But one night Diana Ross woke up and decided she wanted to play Dorothy. She had star power back in those days, and the studio was willing to pay her one-million dollars.

Her Svengali, Berry Gordy, pleaded with her to abandon the dream of playing Dorothy. "You're not the right age."

"Dorothy is ageless!" Ross countered. At the time of her signing for the film, Ross was thirty-three years old. Ross claimed she could "outdazzle" Judy Garland in the part. Fresh from directing Equus with Richard Burton, Sidney Lumet knew Ross was wrong for the role, but signed on as director of The Wiz anyway.

An all-star black cast was signed up, including Nipsey Russell as the Tin Man, Ted Ross as the Lion, Richard Pryor as The Wiz, and even the legendary Lena Horne as Glinda the Good. Quincy Jones, who was to play a vital role in Michael's future singing career, signed on as musical director.

From the very beginning of their relationship, Michael was impressed with Jones, who grew up on the mean streets of Chicago's South Side, watching his mother descend into madness.

His credentials were awesome, including having played backup for Billie Holiday and touring with Lionel Hampton. During the course of his long career, he would arrange albums for Ray Charles, Dinah Washington, Sarah Vaughan, and Count Basic, even Frank Sinatra. Jones would also master virtually every form of American popular music, including African, jazz, urban, gospel, and, later, hip-hop.

Michael's one command to his musical director was: "I don't want our music to sound like The Jacksons. I want to be different."

During the filming of The Wiz, Jones "saw a depth that was never apparent in Michael before. I saw that Michael was growing up right before my eyes."

Jones found that Michael "had the wisdom of a sixty-year-old and the enthusiasm of a child." He also said,

"Beneath that shy exterior was an artist with a burning desire for perfection and an unlimited ambition to be the biggest entertainer in the world-make no mistake. He would watch tapes of gazelles, cheetahs, and panthers to imitate the natural grace of their movements. He wanted to be the best of everything-to take it all in."

Michael told Jones that "the curse of my life is that girls are always after me, even climbing over the walls in Encino to get at me." Later in their work together, he related an incident in which one young woman, escaping the Jackson security guards, slipped onto the property and lounged by the pool for hours before she was discovered and ejected. Later, the woman sued, claiming Michael was the father of "just one of my twins."

Although their dialogues would be fraught with future tension, the relationship between Ross and Michael went fairly smoothly during filming. "I owe her a lot she was my 'main' on the set," he said. "Always there for me with a helping hand or some advice. We were really close. I have to say, I love her!"

In spite of these protestations of devotion, jealousy reared its head between Ross and Michael. In the ballroom of the St. George Hotel in Brooklyn, Michael learned the dance steps too quickly to please Ross, who was struggling with even the simplest of routines. She called him aside one afternoon and charged him with deliberately trying to embarrass her. "I take much longer to learn the steps, and you get them right away. You're doing this just to show me up. Stop it!"

Michael apologized. In the next dance rehearsal, he deliberately flubbed the steps one time after another. Ross smiled proudly at his "mistakes."

Michael secretly watched in delight as two great divas, Lena Horne and Diana Ross, came together and clashed. "It was not a love-in," Michael said, seemingly taking glee at the bitchery going on between them.

Michael had great respect for the Brooklyn-born Lena Home, who was ethereally beautiful with a lucid singing voice. He knew the contribution she'd made to the advancement of black entertainers in America. During her early days as a performer, Horne had been identified as a "cafe au lait Hedy Lamarr" and "the chocolate chanteuse."

During her short time on the set with Michael, Home shared with him some of her triumphs and failures in show business, going back to the days when she was a chorus girl in the famed Cotton Club in Harlem. "And, yes, darling," she told a wide-eyed Michael, "I was one of the Blackbirds of 1939."

She explained to Michael that even when she appeared before the cameras in Hollywood of the 1940s, her songs did not blend with the plot. "That allowed racist theater owners in the Deep South to remove my segment without interfering with any of the action."

"You mean they wouldn't even let black singers entertain the devils?" Michael asked in astonishment.

Home also told Michael that when she was photographed for her original screen test at MGM, her face appeared so light that the studio feared that she'd be mistaken for a white woman.

Jackson and Ross, Los Angeles, 1984

"Is that cameraman still around?" Michael asked. "I want to photograph as white."

"Your own color is perfect the way it is," she told him. "I'm addicted to Godiva chocolates. Be what you are. It's a different time now for black entertainers."

Horne explained that the make-up genius, Max Factor, created a whole new line for her called "Dark Egyptian." Hedy Lamarr used this same make-up in White Cargo in 1942 when she played a half-caste African native.

Home laughed that Lumet, her son-in-law-soon to be her exson-in-law-was married to her daughter, Gail Jones. "I'm the wicked mother-in-law. A little nepotism never hurt nobody, honey. If you got it, use it. Press on with it."

On her last day on the set, Horne took Michael's hand and sang to him her signature song, "Stormy Weather."

Before their final good-bye, she gave him some advice. "It's not the load that breaks you down, kid, but the way you carry it. And, remember, be smarter than the people who hire you."

Horne would resurface once again in the lives of the Jackson family. Following Janet's so-called "wardrobe malfunction" debacle at the 2004 Super Bowl, Horne demanded that Janet be dropped as the star in a television biopic portraying Lena Horne's life and career. At first ABC executives resisted Horne's demand, but Janet's representatives told Variety that she abandoned the role willingly after Horne and her daughter, Gail Lumet, asked that Janet not take the part.

Michael dreaded it when The Wiz was completed and "cried all day," according to a crew member. "You could hear him sobbing in his dressing room."

After watching the final cut of The Wiz, Lumet called Michael, praising him as "the most brilliant actor since James Dean."

"Who is this Dean?" Michael asked.

The Wiz opened across the country around Thanksgiving in 1978 and was one big disappointment. "About as airy as an elephant dancing in quicksand," wrote one reviewer.

At least one hit song came out of it: "Ease on Down the Road," which Michael recorded with his mentor-"and my only one true love," Diana Ross.

Lena Horne

Many critics praised Michael's performance as the Scarecrow, blaming Lumet and Ross for creating "the bomb."

Michael cried for days in his bedroom in Encino. Katherine tried to get him to eat, but he refused food, subsisting on fruit juices. "I dreamed of being a movie star. Now it's all over for me." There was even an unconfirmed report that Michael attempted suicide.

The movie did rather well among black audiences but most white film patrons stayed away. Some critics thought that The Wiz "suffocated in its own lavish production," and that it missed the freshness and sparkle of the stage show.

Michael loved the film, feeling that it was "far superior to the Garland version," which it obviously wasn't, of course. "We made the story and the point more recognizable," he said somewhat enigmatically.

Ross, commenting on the film's failure at the box office, claimed, "I don't care that it didn't make the big bucks. The Wiz wasn't about some stupid movie as much as it was about moil"

That was her public front. Privately, she was reported to have been almost "suicidally disappointed" over the critics's attack on her interpretation of Dorothy.

Liza Minnelli went to see the film and privately told friends, "Thank God mother never lived to see this travesty." As an afterthought, she diplomatically added, "Michael was wonderful."

Despite the financial collapse of The Wiz, many film projects for Michael reached the planning stage. Michael himself felt he would be perfect cast as Bill Bojangles, the famous black dancer, but the movie was never made.

"I wanted the filming of The Wiz to last forever," Michael said three years later. "Working on the movie was the happiest time of my life. From now on, I'm going to dwell forever in the Land of Oz."

"It's the combinations that really distinguish him as an artist. Spin, stop, pull up leg, pull jacket open, turn, freeze. And the glide where he steps forward while pushing back. Spinning three times and popping up on his toes. That's a trademark and a move a lot of professionals wouldn't try. If you go up wrong, you can really hurt yourself. "

Chapter Five

During the making of The Wiz in New York, Katherine moved La Toya and Michael to a luxurious rented apartment on chic Sutton Place on Manhattan's East Side. Here Michael was to enjoy the taste of freedom and independence for the first time in his chaperoned life.

He also arrived in the New York of 1977, which, arguably, was the most decadent year in that city's history in the entire 20th century. Right before the AIDS epidemic struck, hip New Yorkers-both gay and straight-were on a sex binge. "If you couldn't get laid in New York at that time," said Truman Capote, "you had two heads and a lizard's tail."

In the apartment, La Toya took the luxury suite, a showplace boudoir with a large bed and a mirror above it. The decorator had been inspired by Mae West's bedroom in Los Angeles. She assigned Michael to the simple "maid's room," although he-not her-was the star.

The leased apartment rented for $2,500 a month, and was located on the 37th floor of a luxe apartment building "It was the type of place Joan Crawford might have rented," said Quincy Jones.

The apartment opened onto a balcony with a railing. To distract La Toya from her new addiction to eating chocolates day and night, Michael tried to frighten her by dangling himself precariously over the balcony, threatening to let go and fall to his death. He would, of course, later become notorious for dangling one of his children over another balcony.

Reclusive and shy for most of his life, Michael, at least temporarily, became "fun, outgoing, and a dancing fool," in the words of Wiz director Sidney Lumet. "I heard that he and La Toya were going out to the clubs every night. I was concerned if Michael could get up for early call at the studio. But regardless of how late he stayed out the night before, he was always on time for his appointment with the makeup boys."

One night at the Rainbow Grill, Michael was introduced to Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, who would play an important role in his future. "All memories of his goddess, Diana Ross, were forgotten when he encountered Jackie 0," said the gossipy Capote. "He developed a fixation on her. All he could talk about was her voice, which sounded a bit like Michael's own whispers. Her clothing. Her glamorous hair styling. Her manner. Her polite manners. Her sophistication. Until that meeting at the Rainbow Grill, I think Michael had wanted to transform himself into Miss Diana. But after meeting Jackie, I think then and there Michael raised the bar on his transgendered dreams. Instead of a black diva like Ross, he apparently decided that he wanted to transform himself into a white woman like Jackie. After all, she was the most famous and most admired woman in the world at the time. Who wouldn't want to walk, act, talk, and look like Jackie? Even moi. Actually, to tell the truth, if I could become a woman, I would want to be Marilyn Monroe. As Marilyn, I would fuck Warren Beatty, Robert Redford, Steve McQueen, Paul Newman, Burt Reynolds, Nick Nolte, Tom Jones-big dick that one-Robert Goulet, Rock Hudson, you name it. But I was more realistic than Michael. I knew I was trapped with my own voice and physicality and could never escape it. Even though a Little Black Sambo, Michael felt no such limitation. He truly believed the American Dream-in his case, that you could be born a poor black ghetto boy and grow up to become a rich white woman."

Michael's interest in Jackie was first piqued weeks before he actually met her. Bob Weiner, a reporter for the New York Daily News, invited Michael to his apartment for an interview and a home-cooked meal. While Weiner was in his kitchen preparing a chicken and rice dish, Michael amused himself by "grazing" through the wealth of books and photographs that were scattered across the apartment.

At one point, Weiner heard Michael let out a yelp. Rushing in from the kitchen, he spotted Michael staring at a celebrity nude calendar. One of the snapshots was of a nude Jackie. "I can't believe what I'm seeing!" Michael said. "Why would a woman like Mrs. Kennedy pose nude for the paparazzi?"

Weiner patiently explained that the picture had been taken on Skorpios with a hidden camera. Jackie had no idea that she was being photographed and that her privacy had been invaded.

Later, the former First Lady found out that her husband, Aristotle Onassis, had hired a Greek photographer to take the picture. Apparently, her husband felt Jackie was getting "too grand," and he hoped to embarrass her-"bring her back down to earth," as he allegedly said at the time.

Weiner later expressed surprise that he had "encountered an eighteenyear-old millionaire with his innocence intact."

After their first meeting, Michael virtually "stalked" Jackie, if the not always reliable Capote can be believed. "He showered her with invitations. If she had agreed, Michael would have taken her out every night. I don't know what she saw in this inexperienced black boy from somewhere in the Middle West, but Jackie told me that she was intrigued with Michael and his sheer audacity."

Truman Capote

"Of course, Jackie was a pro at gracefully turning down invitations and keeping ardent pursuers at arm's length," Capote claimed. "Everybody tried to fuck her after John Kennedy died--some succeeded. Marlon Brando, William Holden, Frank Sinatra, and, of course, such `family' as Robert Kennedy and Peter Lawford. She was far too hip to suspect that Michael's motives were sexual. That would have been laughable to her. But she was aware that she'd become his new role model."

"As of yet, I have no opinion of Michael Jackson," Jackie allegedly told Capote. "I am just formulating one. I can't figure him out. It seems he's stalled on the bridge between boyhood and manhood. He also seems strangely asexual. I honestly believe that even though Michael is an adult, he hasn't completely figured out for himself yet if he wants to be gay or straight. I, naturally, have my own ideas about where he's going, which road he'll take. I think his future sex life-that is, if he has a future sex life-is going to be very difficult for him. Fraught with hazards."

If Jackie did say that, and Capote maintained that she did, it was a perceptive observation about where Michael was heading in his future.

Jackie invited Michael to accompany her to the Robert Kennedy Tennis Tournament where she introduced him to her children, John Jr. and Caroline. Later, Michael would invite his newly formed friend, Capote, to escort him to another tennis match to watch young John play.

The son of the slain American president was just a teenager at the time, and had not come into his full male beauty with a chiseled physique that would contribute to his being referred to as "the hunk" in American media.

"Even though John-John was quite young at the time," Capote later recalled, "he was still a Prince Charming, even with all that long hair. It was obvious that afternoon that Michael was smitten with John-John. I was only becoming aware of Michael's interest in teenage boys. I'd met John-John once or twice through Jackie, but had not paid much attention to him until that afternoon."

After the game, Capote said that John invited both of them to join him at some grill along Ninth Avenue because he said he was ravenously hungry. "But, first, we were also invited to join him in the locker room where he had to shower and get dressed. At the time, I didn't know that John-John was an exhibitionist. The world learned that much later. Before both Michael and me, John-John peeled off. He might have been just a boy at the time, but that was a man's cock he was flaunting at us. The kid was hung ... and hung big. Michael appeared fascinated. Jack Kennedy often took nude swims-Rose did too-at their estate on Palm Beach. Anyone who was interested knew that the President wasn't hung at all. So where did John-John get this octoroon dick? I think I know. From Jackie's daddy, Jack Bouvier-called `Black Jack.' His many girlfriends claimed Black Jack was hung like a horse."

John-John, grown up, with his brainchild, George Magazine, and Jay Leno

Capote admitted that he did not know the outcome of Michael's attempt to forge a relationship with the handsome young teenager. "I understand that Michael pursued John-John, and they were seen together on a few occasions. As everybody knows, President Kennedy's closest friend, Lem Billings, was a homosexual and was madly in love with John Kennedy all his life-a oneway affair, I might add. But John-John didn't seem ready, willing, or able to use his father's relationship with Lem as a role model for Michael and himself."

"Exhibiting himself in front of Michael was one thing-he did that in front of any number of gay guys-but carrying it farther than that was out of the question," Capote claimed. "Jackie always had homosexual panic fears about her son, especially when he wanted to become an actor. She may have intervened and nipped Michael's friendship with John-John in the bud. Somebody told her that Michael was collecting pictures of `the hunk,' all shirtless, and decorating his bedroom walls with them. I don't know for a fact if that were true or not. But it was enough of a rumor to cause concern in Jackie's head. In the future, she would continue to pursue her own relationship with Michael, at least on a professional level. But at a point not known to me, John-John faded from Michael's life. Unlike Madonna, Michael never really got a piece of John-John. In that kid's case, the line formed on the right and the left."

Capote, Michael's original guide to Studio 54, called the legendary dance club "very democratic, boys with boys, girls with girls, girls with boys, blacks and whites, capitalists and Marxists, and everything else-all in one big mix!"

And so it was.

In 1977, Studio 54 was the hottest night club in the entire world. You never knew who might show up on any given night: Jackie Onassis, Gregory Peck, or even Doris Duke, the planet's richest woman. Andy Warhol was a regular. During the making of The Wiz, Diana Ross appeared frequently, even Elizabeth Taylor, Betty Ford, and Mikhail Baryshnikov, who wanted to dance with Michael as a lark but was politely and shyly turned down.

One night, Capote invited Michael to his favorite spot, the deejay's booth overlooking the dance floor. From this crow's nest, he had an ideal viewing spot. He told Michael that, "Proust would have loved this place. Too bad he's not around to record it. I think about all the dead who would have loved 54: Toulouse-Lautrec, Baudelaire, Ronald Firbank, Carl Van Vechten, Oscar Wilde."

"Who are all these people?" Michael asked, "And what did they die from?"

Capote stared incredulously at Michael. "They were lost souls who died for love," he finally said.

Constructed in 1927, the building itself was an old theater and TV studio. Before that it was once the home of the San Carlo Opera Company. The address was at 254 W. 54th St., off Broadway. Steve Rubell and Ian Schrager were the welcoming hosts if you were rich, famous, infamous, or just merely gorgeous. They invited "the right people," turning all others away.

Around the dance floor were silver banquettes. Under the balconies was a mirrored diamond-shaped bar. Overlooking both the balcony and the large dance floor was the infamous "Rubber Room," designed with thick rubber walls so they could be washed down with soap and water after a night of sex and drugs.

In the basement was the very private, invitation-only VIP Room, called the "sanctum sanctorum." With chain-link fences lining its perimeter, it evoked a prison. But night after night it was the most sought-after den of those denizens of the night who came here to pursue private pastimes devoted to drugs and raw sex.

Gloria Vanderbilt

The waiters from upstairs appeared frequently, but not to serve drinks down here. They were shirtless, wearing only white silk basketball shorts. Clients, both male and female, brought their toy boys of the night here to pull down those shorts and to fellate them. Minnelli got Rubell to let Michael enter into this chamber. He was reportedly shocked yet fascinated by the coke-snorting and the wild sex in various combinations of sexes, including three- or four-ways.

"The lounge made Sodom and Gomorra look like kindergarten," said a former employee.

"We just assumed that Michael was gay," said one of the busboys. "With that voice, that mincing manner, what else could he be? But he turned down guys who came on to him. It was rumored that even Calvin Klein invited Michael to his lair in the Pines on Fire Island but Michael rejected the invitation of the great underwear king."

Michael often spent hours on the dance floor. One night he was seen dancing with Gloria Vanderbilt, the heiress once known as "the poor little rich girl." Gloria was also known for her affairs, including liaisons with Marlon Brando, Howard Hughes, and Frank Sinatra.

Night after night, Michael watched in fascination as Rollerena, one of the most amusing drag queens in New York City history, endlessly circled the floor on her roller skates.

On the main floor on any given night, Madonna might be seen chatting with Salvador Dali. Elton John might be spotted trying to pick up Patrick Taylor, a busboy who, regrettably, turned out to be straight. At the time, patrons treated the handsome busboys and waiters like Playboy bunnies. "Everyone, guys and dolls, tried to bed us, and most of them succeeded," said a former waiter.

The co-owner, Steve Rubell, personally welcomed Michael and La Toya to the club, where a cocaine-snorting, neon-lit man-in-the-moon would descend from the ceiling five or six times a night, his flashing red eye approving of all the coke-snorting going on. The smell of amyl nitrite cut the night air.

Michael and La Toya were there at the famous May, 1977, birthday bash for Bianca Jagger. She rode onto the main floor on a white horse led by a naked man.

A far greater tour guide to Studio 54 than Capote was Liza Minnelli. She became a "fixture" in Michael's life during the frenzied nights she spent at Studio 54, doing cocaine and partying the night away. Her health was fragile, and she was deep into relationships with both Martin Scorsese and Baryshnikov. When Michael caught up with her, she'd already missed seven performances of the musical, The Act, simply because she was not able to go on.

On one of Liza's "good nights," Michael had gone to see her perform in the Broadway musical, and had been deeply moved by her voice and movements on the stage. The next day, someone, perhaps La Toya, showed him a review written by John Simon, theater critic for New York magazine. In the harshest terms, the acerbic Simon had attacked the look of Liza's face, mocking it, especially her wide eyes.

"Like myself, Liza has always been insecure about her looks," Michael said. "After reading that mean-spirited attack, she was devastated and didn't even want to go on the next night. I know how she felt. When I was fourteen, a so-called fan mocked me for my awful acne. I stayed in my room for days with the curtains drawn. I couldn't even stand to look at my own face in the mirror. I cried day and night. I was ashamed to show my face to the world again. Poor Liza. Poor me. A performer's appearance is everything. When your look is mocked, it cuts into your heart like a sharp knife."

Michael remained steadfastly loyal to Liza, even though he could obviously see the toll that alcohol and drugs were taking on her. He dared not ask her to change her lifestyle, even though he suspected she was heading for a fall. The designer Halston told Warhol, who then told Michael, that Liza had arrived one night at his Upper East Side townhouse. Her face was partially concealed by a black felt hat to hide the damage. According to Halston, "Liza barged into my house and demanded that I give her every drug I had."

Liza Minnelli 1984

In spite of her drugs, heavy drinking, and her horrible appearance (at least according to John Simon), Liza still managed to snare what was then considered the sexiest man in New York. The Russian dancer, Baryshnikov, was hit upon by both men and women wherever he went. One night as Capote and Michael were observing Liza dancing with Baryshnikov on Studio 54's floor, Capote turned to Michael. "Unlike Rudolf Nureyev, Mischa actually likes women. He's also notoriously virile. I'm dying to sample that thick Russian sausage for myself. So far, no luck. But one night when he's really drunk down in the basement, I'll get him yet."

"How do you know if he can perform if he's all that drunk?" Michael asked. "The word is out," Capote said. "Mischa can get it rock hard even if completely wasted. He's Russian, my dear boy. Russians are always soggy with vodka."

In their private moments away from the frenzied heat of Studio 54, Liza and Michael bonded. Their friendship was forged partly because of their equivalently horrid showbiz childhoods.

Michael might have scorned his chain-smoking, Scotch-and-Coke drinking new friend, but he found her the most fascinating woman he'd ever known. Liza entered that rare pantheon of "friends for life" that would eventually include Elizabeth Taylor.

Compared to Judy Garland, Michael's father, Joe, was a pillar of stability. By 1969 Judy had attempted suicide twenty times, finally dying alone in the bathroom of her London townhouse.

Michael was impressed with the intensity of Liza's survival instinct, even though she currently was on a self-destructive binge. She told him that once when she was sixteen, her mother kicked her out of the house. "I had my plane fare and a $100 left over," she told Michael. "I went to New York, and I've never taken another penny from my parents."

Michael was mesmerized by her stories of growing up in Hollywood. She told of the fabulous parties thrown by Judy and her then-husband, Sid Luft. "At one of them, Lauren Bacall sang while Humphrey Bogart looked on in amusement. Judy had invited this newcomer to Hollywood. At least I thought she was a newcomer. Turns out she'd been around for quite awhile. Her name was Marilyn Monroe. She sat alone. No one would talk to her. I felt lonely, too, and I came over to sit with her and talk to her. She was so grateful for the company she practically cried."

Michael confided that he too had moments of great loneliness such as that.

Sometimes Liza could be seen sitting alone even at Studio 54 with Michael, just holding his hand, although romance was not part of the equation. "I'm vulnerable," she told him.

"It's one of your most appealing qualities."

"But I don't want to be vulnerable," she protested. "It's a secret. I don't want the public to find out I'm vulnerable. Oh, my God, the last thing I want to become is the second Judy Garland."

Michael was once asked what had drawn him to Liza since they were such different personalities. "She gives. Everyone else in my life takes."

One night, high on cocaine, Liza turned to Michael and said, "I'm tired of talking about myself. What do you think of me?"

"I like the way you crawled out from behind your mother's shadow."

Michael's devotion to Liza even earned her a paragraph in his autobiography, Moonwalk. "Liza Minelli (sic) is a person whose friendship I'll always cherish. She's like my show business sister."

Michael, who claimed "I love her," loved her so much he never learned to spell her name. But his editor, Jackie 0, should have known to spell Minnelli with two n's. The line, "my show business sister," was very revealing. Capote sometimes referred to Michael and Liza as "soul sisters."

"We get together and talk about the business," Michael wrote. "It comes out of our pores. We both eat, sleep, and drink various moves and songs and dances."

Michael, however, wasn't spending all of his time with his "soul sister." He was making the scene with other cultural icons eager to see what he was about. "Michael was on the long path to his own liberation and independence from his domineering family," Sidney Lumet allegedly said. "Michael was the meal ticket for the Jacksons, so they wanted to keep a close eye on him even though he was experiencing New York on his own terms."

At Studio 54, Michael met some of the cultural elite of the era, although he wasn't certain who some of the celebrities were. Truman Capote introduced him to Gloria Swanson. Michael was found under his Afro wearing a pale shantung-weave shirt and a scarlet-colored Ascot. The silent screen vamp, who immortalized herself by playing Norma Desmond in the 1950 Sunset Blvd., said, "Young man, in my day men went to a barber."

He also met the great diva of modern dance, Martha Graham, who sat next to Betty Ford. By that time, Michael had come to realize that her husband, Gerald, had been president of the United States.

Escorted by her mother, Teri, Brooke Shields was pointed out to Michael, but their relationship lay in the future. Years later, he could not recall meeting a brunette Madonna, but he did wonder who that old man was sitting next to her. It was William S. Burroughs, that "literary outlaw," junkie, wife murderer, and author of the underground classic, Naked Lunch.

Studio 54 functioned as Michael's major "Combat Zone," but he was spotted at other venues as well. He appeared at avant-garde gallery openings on the arm of his "date," Andy Warhol. At one such gathering in Soho, Warhol was overheard talking to Michael about what he wanted to do as a filmmaker.

"I want to depict homosexuality, lesbianism, sadomasochism, masturbation, drug use-even douching, and most definitely every known sexual permutation in the universe."

On another night at Studio 54, Warhol confided to Michael, as he had countless others, his plans to stage a musical on Broadway to be called The Velvet Underground.

Mick Jagger

"Mick Jagger and I have been planning this for years," Warhol said. "There's a great role in it for a black singer. In nearly all artistic productions today, you have to cast a token black. Perhaps you'll agree to take the part and make it your Broadway debut."

"As the token nigger?" Michael asked, seemingly offended by Warhol's remark. "I don't know about that."

"My protege, Paul Morrissey, wants me to produce a film starring Mick and Bianca Jagger," Warhol said. "It's to be based on Andre Gide's The Caves of the Vatican. Bianca and Mick will be cast as brother and sister. I guess I'll have to rewrite Gide because I want Mick and Bianca to commit incest in the film. Of course, I haven't read Gide. Maybe he's already come up with the incest thing all by himself."

"Actually, I heard that David Bowie and Jagger are considering dressing in drag and doing a remake of Some Like It Hot," Michael said. "I'm sure they'd be better than Tony Curtis and Jack Lemmon. Some Like It Hot is my favorite Marilyn Monroe movie."

"Mine too!" Warhol chimed in, as he cruised the main dance floor of Studio 54. Suddenly, he showed astonishment. "Speak of the Devil! Here comes darling Mick now. I'll introduce the two of you."

As Mick Jagger talked to Michael for less than twenty minutes, he seemed to grow bored and invited both Warhol and Michael to go with him to Max's Kansas City Dance Club. Michael only reluctantly agreed to go along.

At Max's, Jagger continued to drink heavily. At one point Jagger asked Warhol to dance with him, and the two men took to the floor, creating a spectacle. Michael sat on the sidelines.

Warhol returned to table, but Jagger headed for the men's room. He was trailed by a string of gay guys hoping for a "sighting."

"Mick is hot!" Warhol told Michael. "Every time he goes to take a piss, a lot of guys follow him inside the toilet, hoping to get a look at his dick. I don't have to revert to such tactics. I've slept with Mick on several occasions. In fact, I'm mad about the boy."

Michael didn't know if that were true or not. He'd learned that Warhol often exaggerated. But as he later confided to La Toya, among others, "I think this time Andy was telling the truth."

For his part, Jagger always seemed to have mixed feelings about Warhol. In Robert Frank's film, Cocksucker Blues, Jagger called Warhol "a fucking voyeur"-and did so with a certain accuracy.

After meeting at Studio 54, Mick volunteered to introduce Michael to "the scene" in New York, taking the innocent young man to clubs Michael had never heard of.

"There's no way in hell that Mick could have found a simpatico soul in Michael Jackson," Keith Richards was reported to have said as an explanation for the time they spent together. "Mick is very bright, and I think he sensed future competition in Jackson. He wanted to study his every move, figure out what he was up to, what he was like, what he had that the world wanted to buy. 11

A music industry insider, Butch Wohlin, who worked briefly with both Jagger and Michael, said, "Mick was worldly wise. To him, Jackson must have looked like a prissy little baby. Almost everything about Jackson must have turned off Mick. That religious fanaticism. That little girl voice. His fear of drugs. His fear of sex. Jackson was the very opposite of Mick."

After touring the New York clubs with Michael, Jagger told Richards, "Jackson is a limp-wristed bore. Or at least I think he is. I never heard one word he ever said in that whispery voice of his. At the clubs I took him to, the music was too loud, and I'm not a lip reader. The kid is a total lightweight. He's like froth on beer. I'm the golden liquid itself. The alcohol that makes you drunk. The kid doesn't drink. Doesn't do drugs. I think the strongest drink Jackson ever ordered was a Shirley Temple."

As time would reveal, Michael may have learned more from Jagger than the rock star did from him.

"Long before Madonna grabbed her pussy on stage, long before Michael fondled his dick in front of an audience, Mick was crotch-grabbing years before," Wohlin said. "In Mick's case, and I've seen it, he had a lot more to grab. Jackson experienced a meltdown if it was suggested that he was gay. He appeared like such a sissy on the whole subject. Throughout his career, Mick has been exposed as a bisexual in print. Whether he is or not is another matter. But he didn't give a damn. Did Mick sleep with David Bowie? How in the fuck do I know? I wasn't concealed under Mick's bed with a recorder. Mick has a certain androgyny. So does Jackson. But what Mick had and Michael never would have was raw masculine power. You inherit that. You're born with it. When God handed out those male genes in Heaven, Michael was at the end of the food chain that day and got none of them. Madonna is far more masculine than Michael. The kid just doesn't have it. There's a rumor going around that he was born a hermaphrodite-and I believe that. He's certainly caught in that twilight zone between the sexes-neither girl nor boy. On the other hand, Mick got more male hormones than he knows what to do with."

"Mick may have given Jackson a few lessons in androgyny," Wohlin claimed, "but the kid didn't learn his lessons well. I think Jackson envied that Mick could wear lipstick and sashay around like a queen, yet still keep his image as a macho rocker. Jackson desperately wanted to learn from Mick what his secret was. How did he get away with that? Jackson never learned the secret. When he went out on stage with all that lipstick, all that sashaying around, he still hadn't learned the secret. But I'll let you in on the secret. Mick's public knew that behind the androgyny was a rocker with balls. Mick has balls. Michael Jackson does not!"

One night at a club in the East Village, Jagger showed up with Rudolf Nureyev, whom he'd met years before when he'd gone backstage after one of the Russian dancer's performances with Margot Fonteyn. In the great heyday of ambisexual New York in the late 70s, rumors were all over town that Nureyev and Jagger were "sometimes lovers."

At the club, Jagger introduced Nureyev to Michael, who later told friends, "Those two even look alike. God gave both of them the same mouth."

That night Michael was fascinated to hear an argument between Jagger and Nureyev. Jagger maintained that it took more talent to be a pop star than a ballet dancer. Looking over at Michael, Nureyev said, "Anyone can be a pop star. It takes incredible talent to be a ballet dancer."

Nureyev, at least for that night, won the argument.

Michael turned down Nureyev's offer of marijuana, but Jagger went for it. Again ... and again ... and again.

Within the hour, Jagger and Nureyev had taken to the dance floor, as the other dancers in all combination of sexes parted to make room for them.

"Those two pressed their bodies so close to each other that night I'm sure they both got erections," said Tom Felison, club manager. "They weren't dancing. They were fucking each other in front of everybody. It was the most overtly sexual dance I've ever seen. Nureyev ran his hands across Jagger's bare chest, then kissed him. It was Big Mouth meeting Big Mouth."

According to the manager, Michael witnessed the whole event with wideeyed wonder.

Suddenly, Nureyev, showing a big erection in tight pants, broke from Jagger and headed for the table where Michael sat on the edge of his seat, taking in all the action. With the grace of a swan, Nureyev reached for Michael's arm, pulling him onto the dance floor.

As an amused Jagger stood by, Nureyev began "the dance of love" with Michael, rubbing his well-endowed crotch against Michael's flaccid package.

"It was the most suggestive dance I'd ever seen," Felison claimed. "And I've seen boys and girls, even boys and boys, fucking each other on my dance floor. I realized that night that the suggestion of sexual mating can be far more erotic than the actual fucking. In the midst of all that heat, generated almost entirely by Nureyev, not by Michael, Jagger moved in from the rear. He too had an erection which he rammed up against Michael's butt encased in jeans. God, what a hot scene. Nureyev reached into Michael's shirt and rubbed his skilled hand across the nipples as he'd just done with Jagger. From the rear, Jagger was plowing his fingers into Michael's hair before lowering them to Michael's lips, presumably for him to suck on them. Michael was having none of that shit."

When Michael tried to break away, Nureyev yelled, "We've got ourselves a virgin, Mick."

With a sudden force, Michael bolted from the "human sandwich" of which he was a part. Bursting into tears, he fled from the club.

Not missing a beat, nor even seeming to care about their friend's departure, Nureyev resumed his erotic dance with Jagger.

"From the looks of things, those two climaxed in their pants before leaving the dance floor that night," Felison said. "Talk about two hot men!"

A long time would go by before Jagger would enter Michael's life again.

When not out with Jagger or Liza, Michael would continue to accept "dates" from Warhol. He was proud of the friendship, viewing Warhol as "The King of Pop Art."

Michael told Warhol that when he'd lived with Diana Ross, "she taught me how to appreciate art, and we often painted together, going out to record scenes from nature."

Warhol laughed in amusement, not really believing Michael. "How could Ross have taken time out for that?" he asked. "The only art Ross appreciates is what is staring back at her in the mirror."

When Warhol heard that Michael was bragging about his friendship with the "King of Pop Art," he corrected him.

"I'm also an artist myself, a filmmaker, a writer, publisher, interviewer, photographer, fashion consultant, set designer, record producer, and the world's greatest jet-setting trendsetter," Warhol claimed.

"You left out dog lover," Michael jokingly chastised him.

Warhol seemed to mull that over for a moment. "That too!" he said.

Warhol took Michael to the Sanctuary, a former church on 10th avenue where the altar had been turned into a sound booth. The DJ was dressed as a priest. "Look at those hookers over at the bar," Warhol pointed out to Michael.

"They're nuns!" Michael said, astonished.

"They're merely dressed as nuns," Warhol said. "They're actually drag queen hookers."

Warhol also pointed out that most of the boys dancing with each other on the floor weren't gay. "They just look gay. Actually, the Sanctuary has pioneered a new lifestyle. Here straight boys can dance with straight boys, and no one ridicules them for doing what they want to."

Warhol also took Michael to the Tambourlaine, a Latino night club that flourished briefly in the East 50s. He told Michael that their mutual friend, Capote, once showed up at the club with both Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis and Lee Radziwell. "Those sisters were wearing Hermes scarves to disguise themselves, but they were spotted and mobbed before the night was out," Warhol said.

Later, Warhol sadly informed Michael that the Tambourlaine had closed when a drug dealer from Harlem castrated one of his clients, a drag queen from Havana, for failing to pay him the five hundred dollars she owed him. "I made the bitch into a real woman," the drug dealer bragged, as he emerged from the women's toilet. The screams from the transvestite could be heard throughout the club.

One night Capote took both Warhol and Michael to Stage 54, a gay bar near the United Nations that attracted mainly black homosexuals serving the UN staffs of such countries as Nigeria and Haiti.

"Michael was turned off by the place," Capote said. "I suspected that Michael's desire was to fuck white."

The Studio 54 era and the New York scene were just a brief interlude in Michael's life. "It was a momentary diversion for him," Capote recalled. "In time, we would learn that he was far more interested in taking little boys to Disneyland than he was in hanging out with denizens of the night such as Bianca Jagger, Andy Warhol, Liza, and Mick. Or even moi as far as that goes. Foolish boy! With me, he was with the best. Going high class. I'm invited only to A-list parties. I also introduced Michael only to A-list people. Regrettably, the child didn't know how to behave. He was not meant to conquer high society as I'd done before him."

Capote might have been referring to, among other incidents, the coming together of Michael with the great designer, Halston.

Halston

One night at Studio 54, if Truman Capote is to be believed, the fashion designer, Halston, was mesmerized as he watched Michael dance across the floor. Before the evening ended, Halston confided to Capote: "I'm in love with that boy. I'm taking him for my next lover."

Halston (actually Roy Halston Frowick, born 1932 in Des Moines, Iowa) was in his mid-forties when he first encountered Michael. "A bit long in the tooth for Michael," Capote cattily remarked.

At the time, Halston was still being celebrated for the pillbox hat made famous by former First Lady Jacqueline Kennedy. "He's designed hats for everybody from Gloria Swanson to Deborah Kerr," Capote said. "I'm sure if he plays it right, he can become Michael's milliner."

Halston never ended up designing hats for Michael, although he'd designed masks for Capote's famous Black and White Dance in the Grand Ballroom of the Plaza Hotel in 1966.

Halston made a striking, somewhat mysterious appearance with his mirrored sunglasses and all black attire. In the years to come, society's top dressmaker was accused of "looking like Darth Vader."

On the first night of hawk-eyeing Michael, the singer disappeared before the designer could meet him. On another night at Studio 54, under pressure from Halston, Capote finally introduced Halston to Michael. On this night, it was Michael who was dressed entirely in black, Halston appearing in a russetbrown ultra-suede jacket and tight-fitting red suede trousers.

He didn't really have to, but Halston tried to impress Michael, who at first didn't seem to know who the designer was, at least according to Capote. "The talk was of scent. . .perfume, my dear. Halston's perfume was the rage of New York. I wore it myself. Halston told Michael and me that he expected sales in the coming year to go beyond one hundred million dollars."

"He filled Michael in on the secrets of the fashion industry," Capote claimed. "We learned-actually I already knew this-that only three thousand women in the world could afford to buy a designer dress. But he felt his scent could reach millions around the world. At one point, Halston asked Michael if he'd wear his new perfume, and Michael agreed. Halston promised to send him a case."

That night, as Capote remembered, Halston showed his disdain for other designers. Both Gloria Vanderbilt and Calvin Klein were at Studio 54. Halston looked at each of them with a sneer. "Only a pig would put his name on a pair of blue jeans," Halston sneered.

Capote said that he, at Halston's request, left the designer alone to talk to Michael. "I learned some of the details later," Capote said. "After a long, apparently harmonious chit-chat, Michael suddenly arose from a banquette and abruptly left the club."

"What happened?" Capote asked when he rejoined Halston.

"I don't know why he got so huffy," Halston said. "All I said was, I want to fuck your beautiful cafe au lait ass all night. What's wrong with that? I ask many boys the same thing. No one turns down Halston but this uppity boy."

One night at Studio 54, Nureyev introduced Michael to his friend, Sterling Saint Jacques, an Afro-Italian singer with whom the dancer was having a tor rid affair. Son of the famous black actor, Raymond St. Jacques, Sterling was tall, handsome, and "lean and mean," as he put it. Michael seemed intimidated when the singer leaned in close to him as if he were going to kiss him. "And they call Frank Sinatra of blue eyes. I should be called young blue eyes. Have you ever seen eyes as blue as mine-and in a nigger's head too?" Michael quickly drifted away. Years later, Michael read of the singer's death of AIDS in 1984.

Michael had long since fled Studio 54 when "this mad, mad, mad world" ended abruptly. By the end of 1979, Rubell and Schrager were arrested by the IRS for income tax evasion and were sentenced to three years in prison. They served 13 months before parole. But Studio 54 would never be the same again.

A closeted homosexual, Rubell was diagnosed HIV positive in 1985, but denied his condition and continued his lifestyle of heavy drinking and drug taking. This led to his death in 1989. Calvin Klein wept openly at the funeral. Michael was invited but chose not to attend.

On January 22, 1979, months after Michael's flirtation with Studio 54, the Jackson brothers, with Michael as the lead singer, embarked on another world tour, beginning in Bremen, West Germany. It was on to Nairobi, Kenya, with stops in Madrid, Paris, and London to follow.

In London, Michael learned that the latest Jackson album, Destiny, had gone double platinum. Michael's prediction of a comeback for the Jackson brothers was now a reality-in fact, long before the 1992 presidential campaign of Bill Clinton, Michael was calling his brothers "the comeback kids."

In England Michael turned a dangerous curve in his personal life.

Somehow evading security, star-struck Terry George, a 13-year-old Yorkshire lad, came knocking on Michael's hotel door in mid-February of 1979. With his tape recorder, Terry had come to interview Michael, his favorite singer, although the boy may also have told Paul McCartney that he was the favorite.

At the Dragonara Hotel in Leeds in the north of England, Michael himself came to the door but didn't open it until Terry told him that he was "only a boy of thirteen."

Michael invited him in and chatted pleasantly with the boy for nearly an hour. When Terry got up to leave, Michael invited him to return to his hotel suite the following day. Terry came by and was there to say good-bye to Michael when he returned to London. Before he left, Terry gave Michael his home address and phone number.

Three days went by before Michael called from London. A series of phone calls followed after Michael returned to California, mostly trivial talk but with many specific references to religion. Michael told Terry that he was a Jehovah's Witness and promised to send him a Bible.

By April the long phone conversations between Michael and the boy, some of which stretched out to more than three hours, had turned to sex. "Do you ever play with yourself?" Michael asked. Terry later said that, although red-faced at first, he finally admitted to Michael that he did masturbate on occasion.

Terry later revealed that he and Michael engaged in what is the equivalent of phone sex. According to Terry, Michael admitted to him that he often masturbated during their marathon transatlantic phone conversations.

Today, a grown-up Terry George has a website in England. Among other pursuits, he is a photographer, and his website features some of the best-looking hunks in the UK, most often in tight-fitting, basket-revealing swimwear. He's only a photographer of males in his spare time; otherwise he owns several companies and is said to be a multi-millionaire. One of his most successful projects has been the "Mr. Gay UK" competition, a pageant which he sponsors with his partner, Michael Rothwell.

After molestation charges against Michael surfaced in the 1990s, Terry was contacted by the press. The Mail on Sunday ran revelations about Terry's friendship with Michael. Terry called his interview with The Mail on Sunday "more like an interrogation." Soon UK readers by the millions were treated to a headlined interview: I HAD PHONE SEX WITH JACKO.

"I do not feel like a victim and I never did feel like a victim," Terry told the press. "We only stopped talking on the phone when my mum got a £350 phone bill. That was what put an end to the relationship, not anything Michael did."

On his website, Terry admitted that he had been contacted by detective Paul Zelis of the Santa Barbara County Sheriff's department and told that Michael had pleaded not guilty to child molestation charges.

A defense of sorts is posted on the web. "It isn't illegal to love boys," the site claims. "It isn't illegal to hug and kiss them, unless they don't want you to. Even then it isn't illegal if you happen to be an older female relative. Ask any ten-year-old boy right after a family gathering. There is no age of consent law for hugging and kissing. It isn't illegal to sleep in the same bed with them, or for unrelated men and boys to see each other naked. Each person who is attracted to boys is different from every other, and some of these dissimilarities are important. There are some whose exclusive interest (or nearly so) is in their own gratification. They use a boy with little or no regard for the youth's well-being, satisfaction, or happiness. The kidnappers, torturers, murderers, and real as opposed to statutory rapists come from this group. For boy lovers, the boy's gratification is important. The pleasures the boy lover derives, in no small part, from his role in the well-being, satisfaction, or happiness of the boy. Those who have long-term, loving relationships with boys come from this group. If you call a dog's tail a leg, how many legs does a dog have? The correct answer is four. Calling a dog's tail a leg doesn't make it one. It is the same with statutory rape. The law may call it rape, but it isn't. The failure of society to make reasonable distinctions between these two groups creates gross injustices."

When reached by the press during Michael's child molestation scandals, Terry said, "I have not been in contact with Michael since 1983, but the way he has been treated by the media has been wrong. I do not know whether he is guilty of abusing the other boys. I hope he is not. It has been so sad to see a man with so much talent fall from grace like he has."

As the 70s neared its end, personal pleasures for Michael gave way to career concerns. "I want to show that I can make it on my own," he told producer Quincy Jones. "My talent is my own-not my brothers. It doesn't belong to anybody else but me, and it doesn't depend on anybody else. I owe it to myself to show the world who I really am without any backup singers."

Michael and Quincy had become friends during the making of The Wiz, and Michael was delighted when Quincy signed on to produce an album with him. Michael later revealed that he was so thrilled to snare Quincy that "I didn't sleep for three whole days and nights."

During their long, drawn-out sessions of working together, which often extended into the early hours of the morning, Michael told Quincy: "Give me the ballads like `Mona Lisa' and `Moon River'-they'll live forever. A funky rock 'n' roll song will be number one for three weeks and then it's gone forever. I want to record the songs that last forever."

Quincy described Michael as "writing music like a machine-he could really crank it up." For the album, three of the songs were written by Michael, and many more lay in his bright future which would virtually explode into phenomenal success in the 80s.

Quincy nicknamed Michael "Smelly," because of his habit of calling a piece of music he liked "Smelly Jelly."

Michael deserved the nickname Smelly for other reasons. While recording the album, he refused to change his dirty jeans and T-shirts, even his jockey shorts. The odor got so bad that his fellow musicians in the studio complained of having to work with Michael in close quarters.

During the long recording sessions, Michael experienced two separate panic attacks, crying out that "I'm dying-help me!" On two different occasions, ambulances with dome lights flashing rushed him to Inglewood's Centinela Hospital. Each time he was placed in an oxygen tent and given sedatives to calm him down. The first time he came to, he gripped Katherine's wrist. "If the album doesn't succeed, I'll die-I'll just die!"

The album was originally meant to be called Girlfriend, named after the Paul McCartney song written just for Michael.

Michael and Quincy later agreed to change it to Off the Wall, named for what they speculated would be a hit single from the album.

It was Michael who solicited the former Beatle to write a song for his new album. McCartney's own version was released earlier, followed by Michael's later interpretation. In a surprise to fans, McCartney sings in a higher register than Jackson, and the English singer turned in a better recording in the opinion of Steve and Abes Record Reviews. "Jackson's rendition is light disco, with an awkward saxophone solo and a routine vocal. McCartney gives the song a much broader emotional palette. McCartney's version of `Girlfriend' triumphs all over Jackson's."

This brought world outrage from Michael's fans, including one, Nu On, who posted his opinion on the web. It was typical of the blasts against reviews comparing Michael unfavorably to McCartney. "So your conclusion is that McCartney is a better singer, performer and artist than Jackson? Get fuckin' real. Maybe McCartney was a greater `artist' (his songwriting is amazing), but you can forget calling The Beatles better performers or singers. When it comes to their performances and singing, The Beatles (and McCartney) are untalented and lame, while Jackson is pure electricity. Have you ever seen The Beatles dance? They look like stiff, rhythm-less, epileptic puppets. And their `live' singing is mostly screeching. The Beatles are mostly a studio band that relied on `electronic chemicals' and a thousand different tricks to sweeten their sound. Next you'll claim that Paul McCartney is a better guitar player than Jimi Hendrix."

Ever the perfectionist, Michael worked for days to get the title track, "Off the Wall," just right. Within months, Michael introduced that song to the world with a piercing falsetto that his fans hadn't quite heard before.

Carefully directed by Quincy, Michael performed most of his vocals live.

"He wasn't at all sure that he could make a name for himself on his own," said Quincy before "Off the Wall" was released. "And me, too. I had my doubts."

Upon its release, "Off the Wall" sold eight or thirteen million copies, depending on which source you want to believe. Regardless of its actual sales, it is believed to be the largest selling album ever recorded by a black artist at that time.

The hit single from the album, suggestively titled "Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough," was released as a single in September of 1979, shooting up immediately to number one on Billboards charts. Unlike the other records on the album, this single featured Michael's own overdubbed vocals. In essence, he was doing his own backup singing. "You might call it Michael Jackson and the Michael Jacksons," one critic jokingly suggested.

Privately the musicians in the studio speculated that Michael was still a virgin-at least with women-when he recorded "Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough." But as one musician said, "Michael had seen that sexy Jermaine pound enough pussy in those hotel rooms to understand the meaning of the song."

Quincy had a hard time getting Michael to complete "She's Out of My Life," because he'd weep before the song's finish. "This went on for a month," Quincy said. "He could never get through the record without crying. Finally, in desperation, I left in the crying bit."

"She's Out of My Life" went top ten on the pop Hot 100, as did "Rock With You." After the release of these hit singles from the album, Michael Jackson became the hottest male recording star in the world.

In spite of its sales, "Off the Wall" is hardly a Michael Jackson tour de force. As critic Nelson George put it: "`Off the Wall's' aura is sweet, sunny and bright and characteristic of so much middle-of-the-road black 70s Pop-and offers philosophical bromides about rockin' the night away in place of any real personal vision."

Michael Jackson Album Reviews found their star giving off an aura of "undeniably adult sexiness." But then the critics later added a cautionary note-"that was before the words `Michael Jackson' and `sexy' became mutually exclusive."

The cover of the Off the Wall album pictured Michael nattily dressed in a tuxedo. As a unique touch, he wore white fluorescent socks, which were destined to become his trademark.

For the first time, fans were treated to a discernibly thinner nose. No longer could his brothers nickname him "Big Nose." "It wasn't quite Diana Ross's button nose," said an executive at Epic, "but Michael had obviously had some cosmetic surgery." In the years ahead Michael would become a regular customer of beauty butchers.

Later, it was revealed how this change in Michael's face came about. On the Destiny tour with his brothers, he'd had an accident, falling down on stage and smashing his nose. With his broken nose, Michael went to a plastic surgeon in Beverly Hills in the spring of 1979.

He ordered the surgeon to "transform my nose-I don't want my father's nose." When the bandages came off, "Joseph's nose"-at least on Michael's face-was history. It was the beginning of countless plastic surgeries in his future.

After the surgery, Michael asked the doctor, "What are you going to do with the part of my nose you removed?"

"Discard it, of course," the surgeon told him.

"No, I want to keep it," Michael protested. "It's my nose and it belongs to me."

As he was driven to Encino to recuperate, Michael gripped in his hand a glass vial. In it was preserved a bloody purple-red piece of nose cartilage. Beginning with this simple vial, Michael would, over the years, expand his bizarre collection of preserved medical oddities.

At this same time he also began the bizarre habit of collecting mementos of his seven nephews and nieces, all fathered by his brothers. The collection ranged from a discarded plastic replica of Donald Duck to soiled diapers-or so it was reported-from each child. The crusted brown contents from each child were still intact and carefully labeled and dated by Michael, members of the household staff at Encino later testified.

Even though Michael had gradually matured into an adult, his music was still geared to the youth of the world.

The greatest fan of Off the Wall was a fifteen-year-old girl, Roberta Flackson, born of trailer camp white trash somewhere in the Florida Panhandle. Her mother was a prostitute, her father of "unknown origin."

Since her mother had had sex, often of the unprotected variety, with so many men, she could not be certain who the father was.

Roberta suffered a background of child abuse. Her mother was not only a whore, but a drug addict who allegedly prostituted her own daughter to johns who wanted someone really young.

Eventually, when she was thirteen, Roberta fled the Panhandle, arriving in New York with money stolen from her mother's nightly earnings. When that money ran out, Roberta herself became a prostitute, allowing middle-aged men to pick her up and carry her to seedy motels in New Jersey or else to one of the hot-bed hotels that used to exist in midtown Manhattan in the 1970s.

Once, when arrested and questioned by the police, Roberta admitted that she was a prostitute, a profession she pursued for two reasons: one, to make a living; another, to buy all the Michael Jackson records and memorabilia she could. In an apartment on the Upper West Side that she shared with a much older prostitute, Roberta had stuffed every room with Jackson memorabilia. She played Jackson records day and night, especially Off the Wall.

When not plying her trade, she'd show up frequently on the set of The Wiz, and had to be forcefully removed by security guards. Somehow she learned that Michael and La Toya were living on Sutton Place. Between her nightly rounds, she hung out in front of the apartment building, hoping to get a glimpse of her idol. Even though he tried to avoid his number one fan, Michael frequently had run-ins with her when he was attempting to flee from her presence.

Finally, thanks to the urging of his friend, Theresa Gonsalves, Michael invited Roberta up to his Sutton Place apartment for tea. The girl was mesmer ized by Michael and didn't know what to say. Even so, it was difficult to get her to leave. Theresa had thought that once the fan met Michael, and her curiosity was satisfied, she'd leave him alone.

Not so. With money earned from whoring, Roberta flew to the West Coast. Whenever she wasn't working, she stood at the gates to the Jackson Encino mansion hoping for a glimpse of Michael coming and going. Her presence became such a problem for him that he slipped in and out of the Jackson manse without her detecting him. He even used disguises to throw her off his trail.

Three weeks after she'd flown to Los Angeles, Roberta was found dead in a seedy motel off Santa Monica Boulevard. In her room was found all the Jackson memorabilia she'd collected. It is not known if Michael was even informed of the apparent suicide of his number one fan.

After the success of the album, Michael retreated to his room and rarely ventured out, except for secret visits to Disneyland. He donned several disguises, but finally decided the best camouflage was the enveloping black chador of a traditional Muslim woman. The only incongruity were those white socks and tennis shows which appeared right below the hem. Ironically, that was the same disguise he'd wear in the 21st century as an expatriate in the Middle Eastern country of Bahrain.

At the Grammy Awards in 1980, Michael expected many more prizes but won only a single Grammy as the best male R&B performer. Bitterly disappointed, he burst into tears in front of the audience. "One sore loser," a member of the staff of Rolling Stone was overheard saying.

"I was robbed!" Michael shouted, making a public spectacle of himself. "It's racism!" He vowed with amazing accuracy that his next album would be "the biggest in history."

Following the awards, Michael entered a deep depression and wouldn't leave his darkened room. It took a family tragedy to drive him from the house.

It was almost four o'clock in the morning, March 4, 1980, when an emergency call came in to the family home at Encino. Police had used equipment called "The Jaws of Life" to rescue the mangled body of Randy from the wreck of a Mercedes-Benz. At the wheel, Randy had lost control of his girlfriend's car along Cahuenga Boulevard.

It had been raining during the early morning hours, and the road was extremely slippery. Apparently, Randy had been driving at ninety miles per hour when he'd lost control of the car. "Like sailing on ice," in the words of one policeman, the Mercedes had glided across the street and into a telephone pole before coming to a jarring stop. Without his safety belt on, Randy was thrown forward into the windshield, cracking his pelvis and crushing both of his legs.

When the call came in, only Janet, La Toya, and Michael, along with both Joe and Katherine, were at their Encino home. All five piled into a family vehicle for the nervous ride to St. Joseph's Medical Center in Burbank.

At the hospital, the presiding doctor told a stern-faced Joe, "Your son may have less than twenty-four hours to live. We're doing all we can to save him."

Upon hearing the news, Michael burst into uncontrollable sobbing. "My baby brother!" he shouted. "Randy!" A nurse was asked to sedate him.

After Michael was brought under control, Joe also learned that the doctors might have to "amputate one or both" of Randy's legs.

"He's a performer and a dancer," Joe shouted at the doctor. "How can he do that without legs? You'll amputate over my dead body."

When a sedated Michael was brought in to see Randy, he started to cry again. Randy lay on blood-soaked sheets, with shards of glass from the windshield still imbedded in his face. In fright, Michael turned from the sight of him.

Later, he joined the rest of his family for a deathbed vigil. By ten o'clock, Randy had rallied but only slightly. Later, Michael learned that a male night nurse had nearly killed Randy when he'd administered a dose of methadone to the crash victim. The injection had been intended for a black heroin addict two rooms down.

After two days and nights, doctors determined that Randy's legs would not have to be amputated after all. "But I doubt if your boy will ever walk again," the doctor told Joe. "He'll be forced to live in a wheelchair for the rest of his life."

"There goes the fucking tour," Joe shouted angrily at the doctor. He'd wanted to send his sons on a national tour that summer, hoping to considerably beef up sagging family finances.

Michael paced the hallways at the Jackson's Encino home at night. "Why Randy?" he kept asking out loud and to no one. "Why, God, couldn't the accident have happened to someone not important? Someone who doesn't need legs to go on stage?"

During the uncertain duration of Randy's recovery, Michael would often break into uncontrollable sobbing of the kind he'd displayed upon hearing of Randy's dire condition. "It could have been me. Everybody in this household has been urging me to get a driver's license. I might be the one who will never walk again."

Katherine maintained an almost constant ritual of prayer. But, of the siblings, Michael was the most loyal. He stood by Randy, offering moral support as he went through a therapy so painful that he often cried out. Bravely he told Michael, "Fuck what the doctors say. I will walk again! You'll see."

The months went by, and Randy's legs seemed to improve every day. Katherine got to see her son not just walk on a stage again, but dance as well. "My prayers have saved my son."

When Katherine's mind wasn't occupied with Randy's recovery, she had to deal with an increasingly assertive Michael.

Now that he was a full-fledged adult, Michael decided to replace Joe as his business manager. He told Katherine what he planned to do. "It'll break your father's heart," she warned him, urging him not to fire Joe. Normally, Michael listened to his mother. Not this time.

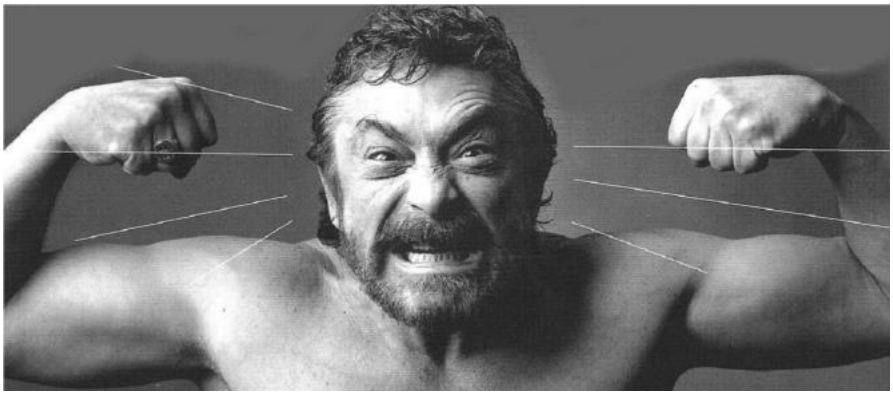
He appealed to David Braun, hailed as one of the best attorneys in the music industry. Diana Ross had recommended Braun to Michael. His other clients included Neil Diamond, George Harrison, and Bob Dylan.

As president of PolyGram Records, Braun in the fall of 1980 recommended John Branca, an aggressive 30-year-old New York tax attorney, to handle Michael's account. At the time of his first meeting, Michael liked Branca and stated his ambition-"to become the wealthiest entertainer on the planet and, last but not least, the biggest star in the world."

If Branca was shocked by such bold ambition, his face gave no indication. On the way home that night, he stopped off in a record store and purchased both Jackson singles and albums. Previous to their meeting, he had never heard Michael sing.

From that night on, Branca became almost more familiar with Michael's music than the artist himself. He certainly knew more about Michael's financial affairs than Michael did himself. Branca would dominate Michael's career for more than a decade, and he'd become the single key figure in his success in the music industry. "Michael stated his goal to me on our first meeting," Branca later said, "and I saw that he achieved both those ambitions expressed to me."

Immediately after signing with Michael, Branca barged into the office of Walter Yetnikoff, the controversial monarch of CBS Records who ruled over pop music's heyday in the 70s and 80s. Yetnikoff emerged as a key player in the careers of Bob Dylan, Billy Joel, Paul Simon, Barbra Streisand, Bruce Springsteen, and the Rolling Stones. In time he would become "the father confessor" to Michael.



Walter Yetnikoff

John Branca

One of Yetnikoff's secretaries confided, "He was in a constant state of blazing combustion," a condition usually fueled by alcohol and cocaine. Known as "the bully of the record industry," he was flamboyant, volatile, and tone-deaf.

"Two famous people came out of Brooklyn," he was fond of saying. "Mae West and Walter Yetnikoff. She's washed up. I'm still in there slugging away."

Yetnikoff originally had wanted to fire all the Jackson brothers, including Michael, but had become convinced that Michael could be turned into the biggest pop star of the 1980s. "Listen," he told Branca, "I can talk down Barbra Streisand, so I'm sure I'm up for any challenge the little Jackson boy will toss my way."

Before leaving Yetnikoff's office that day, Michael's new attorney secured for him an amazing contract. In an astonishing "giveaway" by CBS, Michael walked away with a 37% royalty rate. Michael had instructed Branca "to get me what Dylan gets," and that's exactly what Branca got.

Branca also negotiated with Johnny Mason, the lawyer representing Joe and his sons, a provision that Michael could break away from his brothers at any time without penalty. Joe ranted for days when he heard the terms, but didn't immediately confront Michael, fearing he might bolt from the group right away.

In addition to Branca and Yetnikoff, Frank DiLeo eventually became "the man behind Michael Jackson," forming a triumvirate that would take Michael to the zenith of his success in the 1980s. "Uncle Tookie," as Michael called him, would go on to orchestrate two hit albums for Michael, Thriller and Bad, plus two world tours that each met with overwhelming success.

A native of Pittsburgh-he once wanted to be mayor-DiLeo went from serving spaghetti and meatballs in a seedy Italian trattoria to becoming national director of promotions for RCA Records when he was only twenty-one. He was known for his foul mouth, "assholes" being one of his favorite epithets. With this blustering, outspoken record hustler, Michael would form yet another of the many "odd couple" relationships in his life.

Michael and DiLeo were a study in contrasts. A secretary who worked for DiLeo said, "to see the two of them together at lunch was a sight to behold. Michael would order a glass of carrot juice and a spinach salad. DiLeo pre ferred a `triple bypass' burger smothered in onions, bacon, and Cheddar along with three Buds to help all that cholesterol go down his gullet."

In contrast to razor-thin Michael, the 275-pound DiLeo looked like a bookie left over from the cast of the film, Guys and Dolls, that had starred Michael's friend, Marlon Brando, and Michael's enemy, Frank Sinatra. "DiLeo smoked the kind of cigars Castro preferred, and at times I think he liked stogies better than women, although I'm not sure," said Luciano Pellegrini, who had met DiLeo in Pittsburgh. "He was more masculine than a bull in the ring, yet would be associated with the careers of two boys of dubious sexuality: Michael Jackson and Boy George." In addition to those artists, DiLeo also promoted Meat Loaf and Cyndi Lauper.

In time, Michael was so pleased with the promotional efforts of Uncle Tookie that he rewarded him with a Rolls Royce and a gold, diamond-studded watch among other prizes.

To celebrate signing a deal that granted him the highest royalty rate in the business, Michael joined the homeless.

Dressing up like a bum in soiled, ragged, and smelly clothing, he was driven to one of the seediest and most dangerous parts of Los Angeles. There he wandered among whores, pickpockets, winos, and bums, many of whom had contagious diseases. Attaching himself to a hobo who had managed to reach his 60s, Michael followed him on his rounds from garbage can to garbage can, scrounging for food or any object that could be used in an endless quest for survival. For some reason, the hobo had acquired the curious nickname of "Bearded Liver." Part of the pathetic figure's face seemed eaten away with cancer that was raging out of control and had never been treated.

When Katherine learned of Michael's disappearance, she sighed, "That Michael! He always was an inquisitive child."

"The next time he pulls a stunt like this, he's liable to get killed," Joe predicted.

When Michael later became friends with Marlon Brando, the actor confided in him that, "I did the same thing in the late 40s when I survived among the clochards of Paris. I didn't even have one franc on me. It was the happiest time of my life."

Michael got through his life as a hobo in seedy Los Angeles without incident. He wasn't so lucky months later in 1981 in Atlanta, Georgia, when he appeared in rags at an antique store, behaving strangely. He refused to halt when the store's owner, a Londoner, John Nolan, told him to. Instead of that, Michael concealed himself in a "Scarlett O'Hara armoire" rescued from some old plantation house.

Nolan called the police. Finally, Michael emerged and reached inside his breast pocket. The owner thought he was drawing a gun to shoot them. Nolan bashed his fist into Michael's reconstructed nose. Blood spurted out. While they were struggling, the police arrived. There was a station around the corner. Officer Jeff Green recognized Michael in spite of his disguise. "That's no hobo," Green said. "It's Michael Jackson in person."

When order was restored, Green considered charging Michael with criminal trespass, and Nolan with assault and battery, but charges were dropped.

Before leaving Georgia, Michael had another hostile encounter in the town of Macon. In a convenience store waiting for his vehicle to be filled with gasoline, a white man screamed "Nigger!" at him and accused him of stealing a candy bar. The man began to pound Michael, plowing his fists into him until his bodyguard rushed into the store and rescued the star. Assault charges were considered but never filed.

Back at Encino, enjoying the comforts of the Jackson mansion after his aimless wandering and countless disguises, Michael listened to the final cut of La Toya's first solo album, simply called La Toya Jackson.

Originally, Joe had pressured Michael to produce the album for La Toya, but he'd refused. "If my brothers and sisters want to strike out on their own," Michael said, "they are free to do so. But I'm not going to let them ride in on my coattails."

In spite of his refusal, Joe kept the pressure on Michael until he agreed to co-write and produce one song for La Toya's album, "Night Time Lover."

Suspicions were aroused when Michael heard the final mix and ordered that the song be recorded again. Katherine told La Toya, "Michael's jealous. He's scared that somebody in the family will be bigger than him, so he had to go back to the studio, make it different-and now it isn't as good." La Toya found that hard to believe.

Initially, La Toya had been dismayed when presented with some of the songs, especially her first single, "If You Feel the Funk." As a devout Jehovah's Witness, she feared that by recording some of the more suggestive lyrics, she'd be kicked out of her church. But Katherine, an even more devout Jehovah's Witness, told her to go ahead. La Toya reluctantly agreed.

Brett Stevenson was one of many who had observed La Toya when she was working on her first album. He claimed that, "All of us in the studio thought she was one hot pussy but had no talent as a singer. Instead of recording her songs, we wanted to go to bed with her. I felt that in spite of a poor voice, she had a fierce determination to become the female Michael Jackson. Old Joe showed up once or twice. I don't think he really had much faith in La Toya's talent as a singer either, although he kept goading her to move along with it. Actually, I heard that Janet is the only one in the family with enough talent to become a female Michael Jackson."

In the living room of the Encino home, Michael listened to the final album without saying a word. At its conclusion, he rose from his chair. "The album's a failure," he said to La Toya. "It'll bomb just like Jermaine did with his first solo album." Before heading upstairs to his bedroom, he assured his sister that she was beautiful and might have a better chance if she pursued a career as a model. Of course, Michael surely didn't mean she should pose nude for Playboy, which she would later scandalously do.

Randy's legs had miraculously improved, and he was walking on October 16, 1980, when he accompanied Janet and Katherine to the offices of Joe Jackson Productions at 6255 Sunset Boulevard. For months, Katherine had been hearing that her husband was having another affair, this time with one of his employees, a younger woman, Gina Sprague, who was descended from Mexican and Irish parents. She was only nineteen years old. Having confronted Cheryl Terrell, the mother of Joe's illegitimate daughter, Katherine was prepared to take on this younger and more beautiful woman. Although Sprague would later deny that she was having an affair with Joe, Katherine was convinced that they were lovers, enough so to take matters dangerously into her own hands as part of a public confrontation.

Based on her testimony to the Los Angeles Police Department, Sprague claimed that Randy, then 18 years old, and Janet, only 14, came into her office and attacked her.

In her testimony, Sprague told police that Katherine pulled her hair as Janet grabbed her wrist. Allegedly, Randy knocked Sprague from her desk chair, and she fell on the carpeted floor.

Apparently the victim was dragged out of the office, while Katherine pounded her face, calling her a "bitch" and threatening her if she didn't stop seeing her husband. Sprague also testified that Katherine took some blunt but unknown object from her pocketbook and hit Sprague nearly twenty times on her back and neck. Janet, Katherine, and Randy finally got Sprague to the stairwell of the office building, where her screams alerted security guard James Krieg, who came to her rescue.

The commotion created such hysteria that other employees began to gather to see what was the matter. Katherine, along with her son and daughter, fled from the building. Before going, she reached for a gold necklace around Sprague's neck, yanking it from her. "This belongs to me, bitch," Katherine was heard to shout at Sprague before running away.

When Michael was called and told what had happened, he was reading all the material he'd collected on "The Elephant Man." Upon hearing the news about his mother, he didn't believe it. He claimed that his "Kate would never do that," in spite of the fact that she'd once attacked Joe's other mistress, Cheryl Terrell.

"My mother would never harm anyone," Michael said. "There is no gen tier person on the planet. This incident is a lie. It never took place. I know my Kate." For months afterward, Michael denied that the attack ever happened, referring to it as "a rumor spread by my worst enemies."

Despite Michael's denials, in the wake of the attack, Sprague filed a $21 million assault-and-battery lawsuit against Katherine, Janet, and Randy. Surprisingly, Sprague also named Joe in her lawsuit, although he was not one of the family members who ganged up on her. Later, Sprague testified that she was blackballed from working in the music industry. Five or perhaps six years went by before she was offered a job in the industry once again.

Michael refused to talk about the incident, although privately he voiced his concern, fearing that this scandal, which became the talk of Hollywood, could seriously damage his career as it was about to take off big-time.

In court, and in contradiction of eyewitness testimony, Katherine, Janet, and Randy maintained that the attack never took place.

That case could have been one of the sensational domestic trials of the decade, holding the Jackson family up to ridicule. Wisely, Joe's attorneys urged him to settle out of court. Various estimates have put the settlement as low as $75,000 or as high as $100,000. On July 21, 1983, Sprague's lawyers filed for a dismissal of the suit against the Jacksons.

When not agonizing over family woes, Michael buried himself into the story of John Merrick, the so-called Elephant Man, the English Victorian deformed by neurofibromatosis.

The story of Michael's fascination with the Elephant Man is a bit hard to piece together, because there has been so much written about it, so many misconceptions, and, last but not least, a series of lies from the Jackson camp itself.

During a live interview with Oprah Winfrey in 1993, Michael said that the story of the Elephant Man "touched me profoundly-it made me cry because I saw myself in the story. But, no, I never tried to buy the Elephant's Man's bones. What would I do with a bag of bones?"

He was being a bit disingenuous during that interview. On the question of bones and body parts, Winfrey might have asked, "Why do you need to keep a pickled human brain in your bedroom? Or a piece of preserved cartilage from your own nose?"

When director David Lynch released The Elephant Man in 1980, Michael is reported to have seen the film a dozen times. John Hurt played John Merrick, with other lead roles interpreted by Anthony Hopkins, Anne Bancroft, and John Gielgud. Michael was not alone in appreciating the film, as it was nominated for eight Oscars. But Michael seemed the most obsessive. He was reported to have purchased clothing and artifacts that had belonged to Merrick.

If a maid who worked at Encino is to be believed, Michael actually sat by his window for hours staring into space. He despondently and rhythmically tapped on the arm of his chair, holding his left hand in a distorted position. As the hours deepened, he pretended that a painful crippling was taking over his body. He kept repeating this verse:

'Tis true my form is something odd,
But blaming me is blaming God;
Could I create myself anew
I would not fail in pleasing you

"Merrick was a sideshow attraction," Michael is reported to have said. "Just what I am to the world. But in the end he was beloved by the Victorians. In time, I too will be loved, not by high society, but by the children of the world."

As the years went by and the world began to regard Michael more and more as a "Freak"-actually the title of a National Enquirer book about him-his identification with The Elephant Man grew and grew.

The Elephant Man would figure in Michael's future before the release of his album, Bad, in 1987. Wanting to attract bizarre publicity and make headlines, he arranged to view the bones of John Merrick kept in a glass case at the London Hospital Medical College.

Michael asked Frank DiLeo, Epic's production director, to announce to the press that he'd made a bid to purchase the skeleton for $500,000.

DiLeo sent ahead and even prepared a press release, claiming that "Michael Jackson has read and studied all material about The Elephant Man, and visited the hospital in London twice where Merrick's remains are found. His possible purchase of the skeleton of John Merrick is not for exploitation. Mr. Jackson cares about and is concerned with The Elephant Man as a dedicated and devoted collector of art and antiques."

John Merrick

The announcement generated millions of dollars of publicity. But an alert London reporter checked with the hospital and learned that no such offer had been made. The press announcement was a hoax.

Fearing a backlash, with his credibility on the line, Michael ordered DiLeo to make an actual offer of one million dollars for the bones.

"One million big ones for a sack of old bones," DiLeo reportedly told the hospital. The administration was offended, turning down the offer. "The Elephant Man is not for sale," said a hospital spokesperson. "In no way do we want to be part of a cheap publicity stunt."

Although free, the publicity generated by The Elephant Man ultimately boomeranged into headlines such as WACKO-JACKO'S IN THE CLOSET WITH THE ELEPHANT MAN.

Ultimately, the publicity campaign generated by Michael himself failed. He would never be taken seriously in the press again, and The Elephant Man only generated more press, most of it unfavorable, much of it devoted to ridiculing Michael as a public figure.

Although he was hardly grotesque like The Elephant Man, Michael himself still dreaded to look into the mirror. He decided that more surgical altering of his face was necessary, and he asked Dr. Steven Hoefflin to perform a second rhinoplasty. "With my new nose, I will never look like Joe ever again-no one will ever say that."

Abandoning the greasy "soul food" he loved, Michael became a vegetarian, losing his baby fat. He claimed he wanted to have a body as lithe as Rudolf Nureyev or Mick Jagger.

Eventually the dreaded acne that had plagued him for years began to clear up. With the second nose job, his face took on a different look. A remarkable transformation had begun. Those close to Michael privately voiced concerns that he was still not satisfied with his looks.

Speaking off the record, an executive of Epic said he felt that "deep down Michael just didn't want to be black like his brothers. He wanted to change his skin color. But how does a black boy become white? If there's a way, I predict Michael will find it, regardless of the cost."

As the 80s rolled in, Michael began to change his appearance drastically. His looks caused massive public interest, analysis, and an outcry from many of his fans, especially black ones.

Author David Buckley wrote, "If David Bowie was about psychic reconstruction through a personal style, then soul singer Michael Jackson was taking it all too literally and way too far. Jackson took home improvements literally and, by redesigning his face and skin tone, allegedly through elective cosmetic surgery, he gave the impression of being ashamed of his colour. Running through all this was a Peter Pan-esque androgyny. Jackson, with the body of a boy and the face of a strategically redesigned white/black, male/female hybrid, made a global impact in the 1980s through his plasticsurgery bisexuality. In a decade in which Western youths were subjected to increasing pressure to reconstruct their bodies through diet and exercise (with often fatal results), Jackson set himself up as the ultimate example of an individual trying to cheat nature. At a time when hundreds of thousands developed eating disorders and became ashamed of their natural size and shape, Jackson's quest for bodily `perfection' was another signal to youth that the current orthodoxy was both righteous and right."

With his increased earning power, Michael not only changed his face but financed the expansion and restoration of the Encino family home. The old lackluster ranch-style house, which Roy Rogers and Dale Evans might have called home, was completely gutted. In its place a Tudor-style mansion sprouted up, a far more luxurious retreat to the increasingly famous Jacksons. Michael owned fifty percent of the house, for which he paid half-a-million dollars, the rest belonging to his parents. Eventually Joe, strapped for cash, would sell his quarter interest to Michael as well, giving him three-fourths ownership with his mother sharing the rest.

Reconstruction of Hayvenhurst would go on for more than two years. While driving through West Sussex in England, Michael had spotted a country estate that intrigued him. He wanted it duplicated at Encino. The leaded stained glass with beveled panes would have made Elizabeth I feel at home.

When the estate was finished, black swans and flamboyant peacocks wandered the grounds along with llamas and deer, even a giraffe nicknamed "Jabar." His favorite pet was "Muscles," a ten-foot boa constrictor.

Michael's "folly," was the inclusion, within the reconfigured Encino estate, of an abbreviated version of Main Street U.S.A., his favorite part of Disneyland, which he continued to visit frequently.

Michael would also spend several hours every week watching films within the estate's on-site theater, a facility that provided plush scarlet-colored seating for 32 guests. His favorite film was Fantasia, which he is said to have seen one hundred times. For comedy, he preferred Charlie Chaplin or The Three Stooges. Fred Astaire movies like Royal Wedding were also among his favorites, as was Katharine Hepburn's Little Women.

The house itself was filled with Jackson memorabilia, including both gold and platinum albums used as wall decorations, along with family pictures, many depicting Michael with celebrities such as Liza Minnelli.

In all, Michael would spend nearly four million dollars "to turn Hayvenhurst into a fairytale."

While reconstruction was going on, Michael in February of 1981 purchased a three-bedroom condo at 5420 Lindley Avenue in Encino for $225,000, giving Katherine a share. Since the condo afforded privacy, Michael would later share it with a series of very young boys he'd invite for "sleepovers."

With his new estate at Encino and his increasingly celebrity status, Michael began to seek out other celebrities, some of whom were the most famous on the planet. Or, rather, celebrities began to seek Michael out.

Unlike many pop stars of his age who had no use for the established stars of the industry, Michael in his future would court some of the biggest stars of the so-called Golden Age of Hollywood.

One night in Los Angeles the most controversial star in Hollywood-at that time-walked across a crowded room and extended her hand to Michael in a firm handshake.

At the time of their meeting, he was aware of her reputation, knowing that she'd been variously ridiculed as a sex kitten in the film Barbarella, and as a political activist for her views on the Vietnam War. Her enemies called her "Hanoi Jane."

Standing before him was one of the most self-assured and beautiful women he'd ever seen, definitely with an independent spirit and a "mind of her own," as he'd later tell Katherine.

She was one of the most recognizable faces in the world. Although they were hardly the type of films he normally liked to see, Michael had sat through Klute in 1971 and Coming Home in 1978, each of which had earned her an Oscar for Best Actress.

"Hello," she said in her perfectly modulated voice, "you must be Michael Jackson. I'm Jane Fonda."

"Michael has a heightened sensitivity for the crying needs of this world. Through his 'Heal the World Foundation,' he works to preserve this planet's most precious resources-children, and the environment. He feels much of the same responsibility a parent feels-his children are all of our children. Michael brings so much to so many, he is one of the world's most precious resources himself. "

--Steven Spielberg

"The world sees me as this monstrous freak who abuses little boys. "

--Michael Jackson to Elizabeth Taylor

"He's taken a lot more control of his own life. When I made 'Thriller' I dealt with thousands of managers and record people and all this stuff and it's pretty clear to me that Mike makes his own decisions now... He has a lot more pressure on him now. There's a lot more jealousy. Michael, you know, is an old pro. People still think of Michael Jackson as little Michael Jackson like little Stevie Wonder, but you're talking about someone who was on the Ed Sullivan show, I mean he was making live performances and working hard from the time he was little.""

--John Landis

"Michael originally rang me up on Christmas day... and I didn't believe it was him. I didn't think it was Michael... eventually I said, 'Is that really you?' He was laughing on the phone, he said, 'You don't believe me, do you?'

Chapter Six

In Jane Fonda's 2005 autobiography, My Life So Far, you can look in the index under the Js, and you'll find Jackson State University. But no Michael Jackson. Since he was the biggest entertainer in the world during the height of their friendship, and they became close personal comrades, it can be assumed that Jane's omission of Michael was a deliberate choice.

Jane devoted several pages to the making of the 1981 film, On Golden Pond, and Michael was a frequent visitor to the set, yet he is not included in her memoirs. She introduced him to her father, Henry Fonda, who was near death at the time, and to the indomitable Katharine Hepburn, with whom Michael formed the unlikeliest of friendships.

Perhaps Jane, and this is pure speculation, was offended by all the subsequent child molestation charges whirling around Michael, and wanted to distance herself from him. Jane has had enough controversy in her life, without having to defend Michael in public as Elizabeth Taylor has done without apologies.

At least before she moved to Atlanta and became a "Born Again," Jane was worldly wise and sophisticated. Born to Hollywood royalty, Henry Fonda and Frances Brokaw, Jane had led a privileged life, meeting screen legends and moving in left-wing political circles. From reports, she was mesmerized by the naivete of Michael. She might have considered him like a child, a very fragile individual, a wounded antelope in private life, but the epitome of a graceful panther on stage where every move is perfect. He might have seemed to be filled with a love for mankind, especially the children of the world.

Sharp, sexy, and strong, Jane could, in succession, play a call girl stalked by a killer, the writer Lillian Hellman, a timid wife involved in an erotic relationship with a paraplegic, a hardened newswoman, or a newlywed in a Tennessee Williams atypical stab at comedy.

Michael eagerly accepted her invitation to come to Squam Lake in New Hampshire where On Golden Pond was being shot.

He recalled the time fondly as they sat "all alone on a boat in the water just talking, talking, talking. We talked about everything: racism, Vietnam, acting, politics, even philosophers. It was like wandering into the Magic Kingdom. Miss Fonda knew so much about everything. Even though young, she was informed about all things, especially politics."

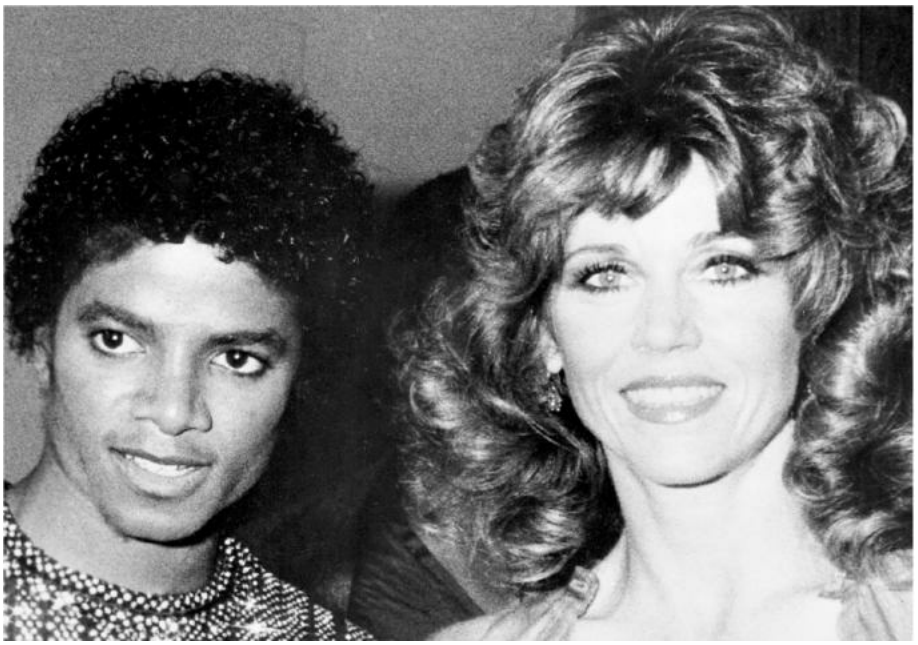
Michael might have listened to Jane talk about politics, and he may have absorbed much, but he was never to commit himself politically. "Unlike Jane, I don't think Michael ever learned the difference between a Republican and a Democrat," Katharine Hepburn once said.

Jane opened up to Michael and shared some of the private trauma she'd experienced in her own life, including the suicide of her mother. She spoke of the coldness of Henry Fonda to her, and how difficult their father-daughter relationship had been.

"We had the same psychic scars," Jane later said of Michael. "The tissue had never healed. We bonded by talking about how emotionally distant our fathers were from us."

Michael shared his own trauma of growing up under Joe's thumb-the midnight terrorizing, the beatings, and the punishments inflicted if he didn't get all dance movements and notes right. At one time, Michael told Jane, "I was so afraid of displeasing Joe that my vocal cords froze."

Although Michael became a far better-known entertainer than even Jane herself, she intervened and tried to help him launch a film career, the one form of the entertainment industry where success had eluded him. As Michael's chauffeur drove his sparkling new, cream-colored Rolls-Royce through the streets of Los Angeles, Jane conjured up the "perfect role for you-Peter Pan, a symbol of youth, joy, freedom."



MJ and Jane Fonda

Michael burst into tears. "How could you know?" he asked her. "You touched on my dream. I've always wanted to be Peter Pan, to lead lost children into a magical world of fantasy. My bedroom is filled with pictures of Peter and memorabilia. At times I dream I'm that lost boy of Never-Never Land."

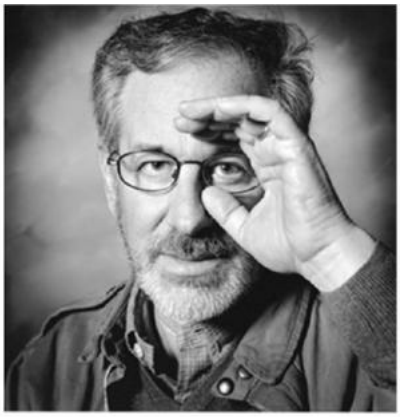
"The more I think about it, the more I know you're Peter Pan. You wouldn't even have to act it since you are Peter."

Jane, who had her own production company, said she'd like to produce the film. Then she learned that Francis Ford Coppola of The Godfather fame was planning a spectacular and costly version of Peter Pan. Encountering the producer at a party, Jane pitched the idea of casting Michael as Peter Pan to Coppola, who had his doubts. "A black Peter Pan-what a novel idea!"

Quincy Jones felt Michael might be brilliant as Peter Pan on the screen. "There's a downside, though," he cautioned. "Michael might keep playing Peter Pan even when the camera is not on him. Children are supposed to grow up-that is, all but one."

Later, when Michael shared his dream of becoming the screen version of Peter Pan with friend Marlon Brando, the actor said, "Forget it! Peter Pan is a wimp. Go for the role of Al Capone instead!" Michael later wondered if Brando was sincere or merely being the prankster he so often was.

Eventually, Steven Spielberg entered the race to film Peter Pan, but ran into trouble securing the rights. He was receptive, however, to casting Michael as a young Peter Pan. Later, an original script, Hook, was written. In this film, the role of Peter Pan called for an older actor, the part going to Robin Williams. Michael was extremely disappointed. At grim times such as this, he retreated to his darkened bedroom at Encino, "where I cried my eyes out."



Steven Spielberg

As the years went by, Jane would pop in and out of Michael's life, appearing at a dinner, a party, or a premiere. But in the 90s, when charges of child molestation against Michael became more shrill, she disappeared from the radar screen.

"She just wasn't there to lend her moral support," David Geffen is reported to have said. "Neither was Katharine Hepburn, Brooke Shields, or Jackie Onassis for that matter. Jane no longer returned Michael's calls, or so I heard." As far as that goes, Geffen too disappeared from Michael's life.

When Henry Fonda published his memoirs, Fonda My Life, in 1981, he too omitted any mention of Michael Jackson. But he'd met Michael during the filming of On Golden Pond, and in some strange way had bonded with him for a few days.

Knowing that her father could be difficult and closed off to people, Jane had been hesitant to introduce him to Michael. "I was in awe of my Dad," Jane told Michael. "As a girl, I used to do naughty things just to get his attention." She related an amusing story about how, when she was cast in the sexually provocative film, Barbarella, in 1968, she discussed with Henry the possibility of his appearing in a cameo role in the movie. "Will I have to take my clothes off?" Henry queried his daughter.

Before Jane introduced them, Michael had never seen a Henry Fonda movie. The taciturn Henry was sitting by a boat dock fishing. During Jane's introduction, her father's face was partially covered by a wide-brimmed hat as he was allergic to too much sun. He didn't look up or even acknowledge Michael on the first meeting. Michael was heartbroken, as he wanted screen legends to like him. It isn't certain that Henry even knew who Michael Jackson was.

"Dad, you must speak to Michael," Jane beseeched him. "He's one of the most important singers in the world."

"If he's so important, why haven't I heard of him?" Henry finally spoke up. "Frank Sinatra, Judy Garland I've heard of."

"People in the music industry think Michael is going to become the biggest star of the 1980s," Jane said.

"What do I care about the 80s?" Henry asked. "I won't be around to live through them."

Henry Fonda and Katharine Hepburn

At that point Michael walked up. "If you give me your address, I'll send you a postcard to wherever you are," Michael said.

Henry looked up at him as if he hadn't quite registered that remark. Finally, he broke into laughter. "Listen boy, I don't want to put up with you today, but come around this time tomorrow and I'll teach you to fish."

Michael showed up at the appointed time, and there was Henry impatiently waiting for him. He wore a different hat. When Michael asked about it, Henry told him that he had been given the hat by his co-star on the film, Katharine Hepburn. "She said it had been Spencer Tracy's favorite hat. Tracy and Kate were supposed to have been lovers. Frankly, in my opinion, I think they were more beards for each other than lovers."

Michael didn't understand what that meant.

According to Jane, Michael and Henry went fishing together every day for three days before either of them opened up to each other. "They would sit for hours in silence as both of them were incredibly sensitive and private people-not really comfortable with strangers."

On the night of the third day, Henry told his daughter, "That Michael Jackson is one strange young man. But, so what?"

Jane granted an interview to Gerri Hirshey of Rolling Stone. "Like Michael, Dad was also painfully self-conscious and shy in life. He really only felt comfortable when he was behind the mask of a character. He could liberate himself when he was being someone else. That's a lot like Michael."

At first, Henry had been unnerved by Michael's falsetto whisper, but later he said, "I guess he can talk like he wants to talk."

On the fourth day of fishing, the normally crusty Henry opened up more to Michael, who wondered when they were ever going to catch a fish. "There are only two fish in this lake," Henry said, "and both of those fuckers are too smart to get caught by us."

Michael sensed that Henry was visibly upset by something, although he wasn't revealing why. Finally, Michael asked, "What's the matter? I can tell something's wrong."

Henry took off his hat and reached for a newspaper article he'd tucked away there. He showed it to Michael. Some supposedly well-meaning friend had sent him an article by one "John Evans," which had appeared in an underground Hollywood paper. It was the most scurrilous article ever written on Henry, and certainly the most invasive ever published on his private life.

Very slowly, Michael read some of the more shocking revelations.

"Just because we perform in public, showing our asses, or at least our faces, to the world, that same public thinks it owns a piece of us," Henry said. "It thinks it's entitled to know all about us, even the most personal things. You'll find that true as you hang around longer in the business."

The article had dredged up rumors about Henry's past, including a report that he and his best pal, Jimmy Stewart, had been lovers when they'd roomed together during their poverty days as struggling actors in New York. It also was reported that Henry had gotten his start in the theater when he'd been seduced by Marlon Brando's mother in Omaha when he was quite young.

The most viperish part of the article quoted his first wife, actress Margaret Sullavan, who claimed that Henry had been a premature ejaculator. She labeled him "the one-minute man," and Evans reported that in his article. He also reported Henry's alleged response: "Maggie can make a man feel like he has two inches."

Henry was known for making homophobic remarks. Once he'd mocked George Sanders for "running after Tyrone Power with his tongue hanging out." When Sanders heard that, he curtly responded, "Henry Fonda is a Don Juan homosexual who has to prove himself with one woman after another."

Crumpling up the article and throwing it in the lake, Henry told Michael, "All the women, except my present wife, Shirlee Adams, have been sexual predators. Joan Crawford, not one of my wives, once called me in my dressing and invited herself by. She told me to be waiting for her in a jockstrap. I'm not impressive in a jockstrap. I fled the studio."

Months later, Michael was watching when Henry won his first Oscar for his appearance in On Golden Pond. Regrettably, Henry was too ill to attend the ceremonies, and his statuette was accepted by Jane. All the Fonda family and Michael knew that the Oscar was the veteran actor's last hurrah.

Michael became so close to the Fonda family that on August 12, 1982, he arrived at their Bel Air home in a black Rolls-Royce to commiserate with family members after Henry's death. That night, Michael got to see his first Henry Fonda movie. It was the 1940s film The Grapes of Wrath. He vowed one day to watch On Golden Pond.

Before Michael had ended his stay with Jane on that New Hampshire Lakeshore, he'd met yet another screen legend appearing in On Golden Pond, an actor even more formidable than Henry Fonda. Once again, the introduction was arranged by Jane.

If Michael needed a role model for a closeted life, or even an example of how to fool the world, he could find no better figure than Miss Hepburn herself. At the time of his meeting with her, she'd retired from the sexual wars and was an imperial diva who demanded that you play by her rules or else you'd be banished from her court.

Her youth was long behind her, and she often claimed that, "I wasted it in the idiot profession of acting."

When Jane had first introduced them, Hepburn had been put off by Michael's wimpy presentation of himself. "Men are worthless creatures," she later told Jane, "but if you are a man, then you should act like one-not some creature trapped in the twilight zone."

She did have one question for Jane, however. "Just who in the hell is Michael Jackson, and why should I bother?"

Gradually she warmed to Michael, even though at first he annoyed her. "He followed me around the set like a puppy dog in heat," she claimed. In him, she found the perfect listener. He had almost nothing to say, at least nothing of importance, and she had "the wisdom of the ages to impart to him."

She delivered one bon mot after another to him, and sometimes he wrote them down. She told him, "If you obey all the rules, you miss all the fun!" She recommended that he live his life on his own terms, not bowing to the social pressures of the world.

When she'd been young-her own father had called her "a raging bull"Hepburn had pursued the bisexual life, her longest affairs being with Laura Harding, the American Express heiress, and with Spencer Tracy, an abusive alcoholic who drank to escape the torment of his own closeted homosexuality. Hepburn invented faux romances with such unlikely candidates as Howard Hughes, while carrying on genuine affairs with women, many of them famous such as Claudette Colbert, Greta Garbo, Judy Garland, and Judy Holliday. Her male lovers had included Charles Boyer, John Ford, Leland Hayward, Van Heflin, George Stevens, and Jimmy Stewart.

"My privacy is my own, and I am the one to decide when it shall be violated," Hepburn told Michael. "Do whatever you want, but only behind closed doors. Don't let the world knock down your closed door. Bolt it if you have to."

Privately she told Henry Fonda and others that "Michael is a homosexual-only he doesn't know it yet. It's an obvious source of torment to him, and will cause him great grief unless he comes to terms with it. I know of such things." Was that a reference to her troubled relationship with the tormented Spencer Tracy?

There were things that Michael did that annoyed her. She didn't like him to wear sunglasses all the time. "A performer must show his eyes to the world. The eyes are the most important feature of the face. You can convey whatever the hell you're trying to just through the use of your eyes. It could be your most effective weapon. Sunglasses keep you hidden from the world. That's okay in private life. But on stage you must let the audience, however briefly, look into the mirror of your soul. Besides, those damn sunglasses make you look like a Harlem drug addict."

At the Grammy Awards in February of 1984 at the Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles, Michael remembered Hepburn's advice. He removed his sunglasses "for the girls in the balcony."

Oddly enough, in a picture that Hepburn consented to pose for with Michael, it was she who was wearing the sunglasses-and Jackie Kennedy's 1960s style at that.

On the set of On Golden Pond in New Hampshire, Michael could sit patiently for hours, listening to Hepburn's "bits of wisdom" acquired over many a decade of what she called "my trials and tribulations. If you survive long enough, you're revered-rather like an old landmark building."

Long after Michael had left the set of On Golden Pond, he continued his phone dialogue with Hepburn. She said, "I always liked bad eggs, always, always-and always attracted them. I had a lot of energy and looked as if I was (and I was) hard to get. I wasn't mad about the male sex-perfectly independent, never had any intention of getting married, wanted to paddle my own canoe, didn't want anyone to pay my way."

In time, Hepburn introduced him to some of her grandnieces and grandnephews, some of whom belonged to the Jehovah's Witness clan. The actress held the cult in total disdain, but introduced her extended family members to Michael anyway. He often went door to door with them handing out pamphlets, many of which attacked "the sin" of homosexuality.

In 1981, at Michael's invitation, Hepburn agreed to go to her first rock concert, starring Michael himself, as staged at Madison Square Garden in New York. Thinking her grandniece would enjoy Michael's performance more than she would, Hepburn took the nine year old with her.

Hepburn wanted to see for herself what "all the fuss was about, all those hysterically screaming fans." Members in the audience that night included Andy Warhol, Victoria Principal, Tatum O'Neal, Jane Fonda, and Steven Spielberg.

"It's not my kind of music," Hepburn later admitted. "I prefer Judy Garland. But the boy can move about the stage. He's got the grace of Fred Astaire minus that bitch, Ginger Rogers, a woman I loathe to this day. That dyed blonde heifer and I competed for the queenly throne of RKO and also for the same beaus until I finally decided to let her have the worthless lot of them. I mean, who would want Lew Ayres for more than a night?"

Bob Jones, Michael's publicist, later claimed that "I saw a man who embarrassed himself at Katharine Hepburn's house." He was referring to the night when Hepburn gave a dinner party honoring Michael at her Turtle Bay residence in New York. Michael had ordered his photographer to wait outside. After dinner, the photographer asked her if she'd pose with Michael for a picture. "Absolutely not!" she virtually shouted at him. "This is a private affairnot something to make the front page of the National Enquirer."

Before the night was over, Michael told her that he'd seen all her films. Several writers, including biographer Scott Berg, later claimed that Michael was "caught with his pants down. He was unable to name any."

Actually that was not quite true. Everyone from Liza Minnelli to Tatum O'Neal, even La Toya, knew that Michael was addicted to Hepburn movies. He loved her voice and her haughty air on camera. Of course, Little Women, with all its sentimentality, would forever remain his favorite but he also liked Adam's Rib and The African Queen. He didn't like Suddenly, Last Summer.

At the time of the Turtle Bay dinner, Michael had not seen the film, Gone With the Wind. When queried about which of her movies were his favorites, he included Gone With the Wind among his favorites. She looked flabbergasted. "That, my dear boy, was a role I lost to one Vivien Leigh. The producer, David O. Selznick, made the mistake of his life by not casting me as Scarlett O'Hara. Vivien won only one Oscar for her performance. I would have won three."

Now it was Michael's turn to look flabbergasted. "But I thought it was possible to carry home only one Oscar per performance."

She laughed at this and took his arm, leading him toward the door since it was her bedtime. "My dear boy, of course, you're right. I was speaking in hyperbole."

"What does that mean?" Michael asked.

"Go home and look it up in the dictionary," she advised.

Later, Michael did just that but never found the word. "How could I look it up in the dictionary if I don't know how to spell it?"

Irene Mayer Selznick, the daughter of Louis B. Mayer, was also invited to that dinner in Turtle Bay, at 244 West 49th Street, but politely turned down the invitation. Selznick told Bob Gottlieb, book editor: "Can you believe what she's done now?" Selznick asked Gottlieb, referring to Hepburn, with whom the bisexual Selznick had once had a love affair. "She's dared to invite me to dinner with-of all people-Michael Jackson! Just how low can she sink? Is Kate insane?"

To others of her friends, Selznick asked, "Just why is Kate hanging out with the likes of Michael Jackson? You've heard of white trash. Jackson and his whole family are black trash. The invitation to dinner is just another attempt of Kate's vulgar, even pathetic, desperation to keep herself in the news columns and to keep up with what she thinks is the current scene."

When Michael wasn't "hanging with" the elite of Hollywood, he was rehearsing, writing his own songs, or recording with his brothers. He still hadn't broken from them. Far from it.

In 1980, Epic released Triumph, the album that would be backed by a nationwide tour. "Can You Feel It?" was one of the hits from that album.

Carried to the far corners of America, the tour included the most intricate "lighting magic" and pyrotechnics of any of the Jackson road show appearances to date. After singing "Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough" (not on the Triumph album), Michael seemingly vanished in a puff of smoke as a special effect created by the great magician Doug Henning.

In Atlanta, a major stopover on the tour, Michael told reporters: "I wish the world was full of children. I plan to have twenty children of my own and adopt kids, too." At the time of his appearance in that southern city, a series of unsolved murders of black children was mysteriously occurring. As a sign of solidarity, Michael requested that about a quarter of a million dollars from his two shows there go to help needy black families.

The tour began in Memphis on the hot summer night of July 9, 1981, ending in a record-breaking four-night performance on other hot nights at the Forum in Los Angeles. When Joe finally tallied up the gross for his sons, it came to an astonishing five million dollars. "My boys are here to stay-they ain't going nowhere," Joe said. "They are the top of the heap, and I'm gonna see that's where they remain."

On the tour, the Jacksons-with Michael, of course, as the star attraction-played 39 cities. Michael hinted that this might be his last tour with his brothers. In an uncharitable moment, he said, "I'm fed up with all the screaming fans, the security problems, the different environments every night. I plan to continue to do records, but I want to devote time to making movies. I plan to become an even bigger film star than I am a singer."

Throughout the tour, Michael was constantly asked by reporters if he planned to split from his brothers and establish himself as a solo recording artist. His answer to Ebony magazine was enigmatic at best. "Yes and no!" Michael said.

An oddity on the Triumph tour was a song called "This Place Hotel." When Michael had originally written it, he'd called it "Heartbreak Hotel," but executives at Epic had insisted on a change of name. Michael later said, "I swear that was a phrase that came out of my head, and I wasn't thinking of any other song when I wrote it." No one believed Michael. How could he not have thought of Elvis's big-time hit when he wrote "Heartbreak Hotel?"

"As important as Elvis was to music, black as well as white, he just wasn't an influence on me," Michael claimed. "I guess he was too early for me. Maybe it was timing more than anything else. By the time our song had come out, people thought that if I kept living in seclusion the way I was, I might die the way he did. The parallels aren't there as far as I'm concerned, and I was never much for scare tactics. Still, the way Elvis destroyed himself interests me, because I don't ever want to walk those grounds myself."

"Heartbreak Hotel" (Michael's version) opens with a scream. The voice was that of La Toya. Michael himself admitted that this was "not the most auspicious start to a recording career."

Michael said that his version of "Heartbreak Hotel" had "revenge in it and I am fascinated by the concept of revenge."

Michael, watching the 1975 Hepburn film, Love Among the Ruins, heard her utter a line that had stayed in his mind. "There's no harm in a little revenge," Hepburn said to movie audiences, perhaps meaning it in her private life as well.

The performance attended by Hepburn at Madison Square Garden was recorded and later distributed by Epic as a two-album set in 1981.

Jacksonmania was sweeping the land. Wherever you went in America, including driving in your own car, you could hear The Jackson 5, The Jacksons, or Michael as a solo artist singing such 70s favorites as "Rockin' Robin" or "Ain't No Sunshine."

Like a Nora Roberts novel recycled from the 1980s to capitalize off her subsequent fame, Motown continued to release Jackson records from its backlog. In 1981, the company reissued the previously recorded "One Day in Your Life," which became Michael's first solo hit in Britain. That same year, Motown also released Michael's single, "We're Almost There."

After seeing Michael perform at Madison Square Garden, Spielberg was impressed. He decided at the end of the show that he wanted to approach Michael about narrating the storybook for the E.T. album for MCA. Michael had seen E. T. the Extra-Terrestrial three times and had cried every time. He was delighted to accept the offer, especially when he learned that he would be working with his friend, Quincy Jones, on the album.

But, first, Michael had one request. He wanted to meet E.T. Spielberg arranged for him to meet the extra-terrestrial robot. "E.T. grabbed me in an embrace," Michael later said. "He was so real that I was talking to him. I kissed him before I left."

Michael told Ebony magazine that, "I really felt that I was E.T., and it was because his story is the story of my life in some ways. He's in a strange place and wants to be accepted, which is a situation I've found myself in many times. He's most comfortable with children, and I have a great love of kids. He gives love, and wants love in return, which is me."

MJ and ET

He also made an astonishing statement in noting that E.T. could lift off and fly away when he wanted to get away from this Earth. "I can identify with that," Michael said. "I also believe that a human being can fly. We just don't know how to think the right thoughts and levitate ourselves off the ground."

In an interview with reporter Gerri Hirshey, Spielberg said, "I've never seen anybody like that Michael Jackson. He's an emotional star child. Those were Michael's actual tears heard on the recording when E.T. lays dying."

Although many in the business have derisively dismissed Michael as a "flighty faggot" or "for being out of touch with reality," others such as Spielberg sensed a strong business sense in him.

Since turning 21, Michael had managed his own affairs, earning more money than any other singer in the history of music. When his contract with Joe expired, Michael took over the reins of his own career.

The downside to Michael's show business savvy is that he also was launched into a lifestyle as a big-spending performer who in time would squander millions and millions of dollars. "As a big spender, Michael would in time cause Elvis to blush in his grave," said Bob Jones.

Michael wasn't thinking about Elvis but the biggest-selling female singing star of all time when he flew the Concorde from London to Los Angeles after a visit with Paul McCartney. Diana Ross needed a hit solo for her new album, Silk Electric, for RCA.

Michael had a pet snake at Encino-called "Muscles"-and as he flew across the Atlantic the nucleus of a song came to him. "I didn't have a tape recorder when the song popped into my head," he said. "So I had to suffer through the faster-than-sound flight until I reached Encino. As soon as I did, I whipped that baby onto tape."

Both Ross and executives at RCA were surprised at the message of the song. It wasn't an ode to a snake but extolled the joy of having the muscles of a man "all over your body."

"If written and sung by a male singer," said an executive at RCA, "`Muscles' would be as gay as a goose, as queer as a nine-dollar bill, as faggy as a drag queen at three o'clock in the morning at an all-male revue where the strippers show it hard. I don't give a fuck what Jacko says. The song is a paean to well-built hunks."

MJ and Paul McCartney

Whether Michael had a pet boa constrictor called "Muscles" or not, music critics found the song a "covert admission of sexual preference on Michael Jackson's part."

Ross more or less agreed when she told an audience of fans in Los Angeles, "I don't know if `Muscles' was supposed to be my fantasy ... or Michael's." The audience broke into catcalls and hysterical laughter at the remark.

"Miss Ross," as Michael called her, wasn't the only world-famous star Michael wanted "to make music with." As a kid, he'd listened for hours to the music of The Beatles. "Somehow," Quincy Jones said, "Michael wanted a piece of the action. Or at least a bond of some sort with Paul McCartney."

Michael had known McCartney since 1969, but they only became casual friends in the late 1970s.

At Michael's request, McCartney flew to the States in the spring of 1982 "to help out on an album," as he announced in London. It was later learned that he was going to record a duet with Michael for his new album, Thriller.

After a meeting at Le Cirque in New York with "an old mate," Yoko Ono, the ex-Beatle flew to Los Angeles for a recording session with Michael. The two stars sang a duet on "The Girl Is Mine," the first of seven smash singles to be culled from Thriller. As Christopher Sandford reported, "McCartney resisted Jacko's pleas for repeated takes of the song, preferring to nail his vocal and then affably sign autographs for the crew."

Recorded in 1982, the mid-tempo "The Girl Is Mine" was composed by Michael and McCartney as they watched Donald Duck cartoons and Fred Astaire movies. In the song, Michael delivers what was to become a famous line: "Paul, I thought I told you, I'm a lover, not a fighter." The song peaked at number 2 on Billboards "Hot 100." Even so, "The Girl Is Mine" is one of the lamest moments in the career of either Michael Jackson or Paul McCartney. It's an insipid melody, with a backing, in the words of one critic, "more appropriate to Barney the Purple Dinosaur than Motown."

There was worldwide interest in the duet between The Beatles' McCartney and The Jackson 5's Michael. In the song, two ardent suitors, Michael and McCartney, engage in a verbal fight for a "dog-gone girl." Their collaboration led to disagreements, and the record was almost never recorded. But in the end they managed to work out their artistic disputes.

Michael arrived in England on February 2, 1983, passing through Heathrow Airport dressed in military garb with a variety of unearned medals and garish sashes. He wore a surgical mask which an Immigration official made him remove. Beefed up by an eight-man security guard, Michael was driven in a stretch limousine to the farmhouse of Paul and Linda McCartney in Sussex. In spite of his impressive reputation, the McCartneys assigned Michael only a small bedroom.

Perhaps McCartney would regret that farmhouse meeting with Michael for the rest of his life. During a long talk in the living room, McCartney told Michael of all the money to be made by getting into the music publishing field and acquiring copyrights to hit songs of the past.

McCartney dazzled Michael with profits to be made from owning standards. He cited some of the songs he owned, including "Stormy Weather," the Lena Horne standard, or else "Autumn Leaves," featured in a Joan Crawford 1956 movie. He even owned that rock 'n' roll classic, "Peggy Sue."

Michael and McCartney sat and listened to many of the standards he owned, including Doris Day's "Sentimental Journey."

In one of the mistakes of his life, McCartney told Michael that "these golden oldies of yesterday brought in an annual income of nearly forty million dollars." Michael's eyes widened at the prospect of a whole new business opportunity for him, but he discreetly said nothing. "Paul's revelation gave Michael a terrible resolve," Yoko Ono was reported to have said later.

McCartney might have been the wealthiest man in show business, but Michael wanted to wear that honor for himself.

To McCartney's surprise, Michael, as savvy as he was about the music industry, didn't understand that a song earns money for its composer and copyright owner each time it sells in a recorded format, is played on the radio, or sung by another artist. The owner of the copyright can also license the song to advertisers, in some cases for large sums of money.

A return visit was in order for the McCartneys. This time Michael arrived on their doorstep dressed in a gold lame astronaut's suit. On this visit, Michael would record yet another song, "Say Say Say," at the Abbey Road Studios in London.

"Say Say Say" demonstrated both McCartney and Michael at the peak of their talent. Steve and Abe's Record Reviews claimed that the two performers "rode a great melody with a surprisingly chattery accompaniment to pop glory. It's a great arrangement that fills every corner with a different touch, combining the hallmark sounds of each performer." Produced by George Martin, "Say Say Say" as a duet for the unlikely pair evolved into a 1983 hit single for both McCartney and Michael. As a single, it stayed for six weeks at the top of Billboards "Hot 100" chart. Despite the high praise and glory it received, it contains such inane lines as "You know I'm crying oooh ooh ooh ooh ooh!"

This record was followed by "The Man," the third duet from Michael and McCartney, which was released on the former Beatle's Pipes ofPeace album. "The Man" sounds like a Michael ballad with limited input from McCartney. But who knew what the lyrics were about? One critic found them "so vague they must have been written by McCartney."

During this second visit to Sussex, Michael did not reveal his intention, at least not to McCartney, of acquiring the rights to the greatest of The Beatles' songs. With his Machiavellian intentions completely hidden, Michael blended into the local neighborhood, meeting the children who lived nearby. They called him "Mr. Mum," and he always had treats for them. Later in the day, he would help Linda prepare vegetables in the farmhouse kitchen, and end the afternoon reading Winnie-the-Pooh stories to the kids who flocked around him.

Months later, long after Michael's departure from his home, McCartney received a phone call from a reporter seeking his reaction to Michael's purchase of the ATV Music Catalogue. McCartney was stunned by the news. A quick call to Lee Eastman, and McCartney knew the tip from the reporter was true. Michael had outbid Warners, the Coca-Cola Corporation, and CBS, thereby acquiring control over each of The Beatles' songs written or released between 1964 and 1971.

When he first became aware that The Beatles' songs were available for sale, Michael had done a "hop, skip, and a jump," eerily evocative of Hitler's dance steps after the fall of France.

Many years before, John Lennon and McCartney had foolishly sold their copyrights to a publisher, Dick James, when they were young and naive about the music business. James went on to make a fortune from their music, which was controlled by a company called Northern Songs. In time James sold Northern Songs to Sir Lew Grade's ATV Music, Limited, for tax reasons.

McCartney himself had attempted to purchase this same catalogue for $20 million in 1981 when he tried to convince Yoko Ono to become his partner in the deal. But the widow of John Lennon turned him down.

Yoko thought her $10 million share was too much money. She would eventually have made tens of millions. One executive at ATV said Yoko's decision was one of the worst ever made in terms of money in the music industry. "With her profits, she could have fucking bought the Dakota." He was referring to the luxury apartment building on Manhattan's Central Park West, in front of which her husband, John Lennon, was murdered.

Headlines in 1984 blared the news of Michael's acquisition of the songs for $47.5 million, the largest publishing takeover by one person in the history of the music industry.

Many Beatles fans around the world reacted with outrage when they heard that Michael now owned The Beatles' songs. One fan wrote, "It's a humiliating kick in the crotch to Paul. It's sickening to know that he has to pay that little twerp royalties every time he sings a Beatles song. Jackson stabbed him in the back but good."

One music executive who didn't want to be named, said: "In spite of that little girl voice and that oh, so delicate manner, Michael Jackson is one hardnosed son of a bitch in business. But whereas old Joe made one stupid decision after another, Michael is more calculating. The smartest move he ever did was to hire John Branca, one hot-shot lawyer, to acquire old standards and not just The Beatles' catalogue."

"A fish gets caught by opening its damn mouth," McCartney later said. "I should have kept mine shut."

McCartney went on to additional feelings of betrayal when he discovered that Michael even owned a $5 million insurance policy on his life. "My God, he'll make millions when I'm 64 and dead and gone." ATV itself had collected a life insurance policy on Lennon after he was assassinated.

McCartney was particularly enraged to learn that, as part of the deal, Michael would get fifty percent royalties for any performance, anywhere, on any Beatles' songs, with a 25% royalty going to him. Yoko took the final quarter-share, thanks to her role as Lennon's widow and heir.

The official date of Michael's acquisition was September 6, 1985. When he woke up the next morning, he owned 250 Beatles' songs, including such famous classics as "A Hard Day's Night," "Help!," "Eleanor Rigby," "Penny Lane," "Yesterday," "Strawberry Fields Forever," "Let It Be," "Good Day Sunshine," "Yellow Submarine," "Revolution," and "Hey Jude."

Yoko Ono, "A later portrait"

When Michael was told that he was now the owner of all of those Beatles' songs, he said, "I've found the Holy Grail, although I'm not sure what the Holy Grail is."

The ex-Beatle-and now "former friend" of Michael felt betrayed and used. He was understandably bitter about the way Michael had done business. "Our friendship suffered a bit of a blow," McCartney said in a statement noted for its restraint. "I've hardly spoken to Jackson since then, except to ask, `Will you give me a deal? I'm under a slave agreement.' Talk about stonewalling! He's worse than all of them."

When Michael was in Los Angeles shooting a clip for "Dangerous" in 1991, years after the infamous deal was concluded, he agreed to meet with McCartney. "Jackson was friendly enough but hardly in a mood to accommodate my request," McCartney said.

"You know, I've cried so much about this," Michael whimpered.

"Ok, but please, Michael, see your people," McCartney beseeched. "Give me a promise that you'll talk to your people about this." According to McCartney, Michael said, "I've tried. I have told them." In reporting his meeting with Michael, McCartney did not make it clear exactly what compensation he was seeking from Michael, but no doubt it was an increased share of the royalties.

In an interview on ABC, McCartney said, "Michael's the kind of guy who picks brains. When we worked together, I don't even think he'd had the cosmetic surgery. I've got photos of him and me at our house, and he looks quite different. He's had a lot of facial surgery since then. He actually told me he was going to a religious retreat and I believed him. But he came out of that religious retreat with a new nose. The power of prayer, I guess."

Branca seemed to understand McCartney's position and why the exBeatle was sad. "Whether Paul likes it or not," Branca reportedly said, "he has to pay Michael every time he performs a song he himself wrote between 1964 and 1971. Of course, he's pissed. But that's the law."

Under his so-called "slave manifesto," McCartney was to face more disappointment, especially when a trio of "old favorites" from The Beatles were turned into commercials. "Revolution," for example, was used to promote Nike.

In a long, handwritten letter to Michael, the ex-Beatle complained that "my good name, the reputation of The Beatles themselves, is being blown on rubber soles." He pleaded with Michael to respect their music and "my wishes" and stop exploiting the catalogue he'd acquired. McCartney never received an answer from Michael.

When Michael was confronted with charges of exploiting The Beatles, he looked surprised. "Why, I don't understand what Paul is belly-aching about. After all, he taught me everything I know about acquiring copyrights."

"I heard that Michael had told Branca to turn a deaf ear to Paul's protests," a music executive claimed. "Apparently, Michael told Branca to `let Paul rage, kick, and scream. Paul had his chance to buy the records. He was too cheap to part with $20 million of his $560 million fortune. He let that chance fly by. To hell with him. Exploit the catalogue! Make more money for me to add to the millions I already have.'" Branca did as he was told.

Michael continued to sell Beatles' songs to commercial concerns, with "All You Need Is Love" going to Panasonic. "Good Day Sunshine" went to Sunshine Bakeries. On hearing this, McCartney lamented, "My God, he's turning the song into an ode to an Oreo cookie-real cheeky of him."

"Jackson has trashed the reputation of The Beatles," McCartney charged. "He seemed so nice and polite when I met him. But he has a heart of gold, and I don't mean that as a compliment."

He also is reported to have said, "I'm in a shit deal and can't get out of it. Each day with Michael Jackson in charge, I take another bite from the shit sandwich he offers me."

Yoko Ono seemed comfortable with Michael's ownership of the catalogue, since it was generating millions for her, but not the potential millions she could have made with co-ownership with McCartney. She once was quoted as saying, "If I owned the catalogue, the press would say, `the dragon lady strikes again. '"

McCartney, or so it was rumored, felt greatly betrayed by Yoko when she allowed her son, Sean, then 12 years of age, to appear as one of the "lost boys" saved by Michael in his 1988 film, Moonwalker. The video closed with a rendition of "Come Together" from The Beatles.

Even though losing on the deal, McCartney also revealed that he would go to court to prevent what he viewed as unfair use of his legacy. He did win a court order barring sales of three bootleg Beatles movies. He also denied the Beastie Boys the right to use The Beatles song, "I'm Down." The group wanted to add new lyrics to the song, which McCartney found "too salacious."

In spite of the bitterness that McCartney still felt over Michael's purchase of The Beatles' songs and his use of them, McCartney spoke kindly of Michael when he first faced child molestation charges in the early 90s. Speaking to the Clarin, a newspaper in Buenos Aires, McCartney claimed, "Michael is not that kind of person."

When asked about Michael's drug dependency, McCartney said, "It's all very L.A.-I mean, Judy Garland and Elizabeth Taylor-these are people who became stars at a very young age. We, The Beatles, we were ordinary guys. When fame arrived, we went a bit crazy, but even so we had our feet on the ground. We had roots. We knew about life. Michael, instead ...Ah, well!"

As the years went by, McCartney became less reserved about Michael. In 2001, on The Howard Stern Show, McCartney claimed that Michael "won't even answer my letters, so we haven't talked and we don't have that great a relationship."

In a statement made in April of 2003, McCartney expressed greater reser vations about Michael, calling him "an unusual guy" and questioning his parenting skills. The interview was broadcast over the BBC. He claimed he felt sorry for Michael's children "being brought up under those veils."

That remark seriously angered Michael, who shot back: "I like some of Paul's songs. But he's a lousy performer. I can pack a stadium. He can't."

Songs by the Beatles were not, by any means, the first that Michael acquired. Long before his purchase of the ATV catalogue, Michael had ordered Branca to buy the rights to recordings by Sly & the Family Stone, a group that began in San Francisco in 1969 and eventually achieved worldwide fame before they disbanded in 1975. The band is credited with a critical role in the development of soul music, funk, and psychedelia.

The group's fourth album, Stand!, had been a runaway success, selling more than three million copies and giving birth to one hit single, "Everyday People." The Jackson 5 had performed a number from Sly's album during their first appearance on The Ed Sullivan Show.

The success of Sly & the Family Stone peaked in the summer of 1969. Sly's intense drug abuse began to affect his career but not before he became celebrated as the "J.D. Salinger of pop music."

Michael also acquired the rights to some of the recordings of Dion & The Belmonts (named after Dion's neighborhood in New York City's northern Bronx). Dion's most memorable song, released in 1968, was "Abraham, Martin & John." Two of Dion's biggest hits, "The Wanderer" and "Runaround Sue," were also purchased by Branca for Michael, as was Len Barry's "1-23" and the Soul Survivors' "Expressway to Your Heart."

At Encino, in the wake of his massive purchases, Michael could be heard listening to some of his new acquisitions. He played "He's So Shy" several times, a recording made by the Pointer Sisters. An R&B group from Oakland, California, they were a big hit in the 70s and 80s. Michael had something in common with them, as both he and the sisters had come from archly conservative religious backgrounds and had been taught that rock 'n' roll was "the devil's music."

Dion & The Belmonts

The ATV catalogue also contained some of the greatest hits of Little Richard, the selfproclaimed "Queen of Rock 'n' Roll." With a public persona marked by bisexual ambiguity, he would make his mark with such suggestive hits as "Tutti Frutti" and "Great Balls of Fire." He was voted the eighth greatest Rock 'n' Roll artist of all time by Rolling Stone, and The New York Times called this Georgia-born entertainer "the original wild man of rock 'n' roll."

Some critics claimed that both Michael and Elvis Presley "stole Fort Knox" from Little Richard's music and on-stage persona. When an interviewer once asked Michael what he thought of Little Richard, and if he were influenced by him, Michael delivered another one of his enigmatic responses: "Awop-bob-a-loo-mop-alop-bam-boom."

Although Michael surely has had conflicting feelings about Little Richard, Michael once said: "Without Little Richard's blueprint to follow, Elvis wouldn't have had a kingdom or been a king of anything."

When he acquired "Tutti Fruitti," Michael learned that the original lyrics contained this line: "Good goddamn, Tutti Frutti, good booty, if it don't fit, don't force it, you can grease it, make it easy." And all this from a Seventh Day Adventist minister "who devotes all my life to God."

The flamboyant Little Richard once told Michael, and the public in general, that "Rock 'n' roll is evil, because rock 'n' roll makes you take drugs, and drugs turn you into a homosexual." Aware of homophobia among his black fans, he renounced his own homosexuality, but since has back-pedaled in his anti-gay proclamations. Like Michael, he once was a Jehovah's Witness but only briefly. Like Michael's friend, Elizabeth Taylor, Little Richard also embraced Judaism.

On certain occasions, Little Richard and Michael ran into each other at social gatherings, but no great friendship ever seemed to develop between the two performers, often viewed as rivals. Little Richard could not have been happy when he heard the news that Michael had acquired the rights to some of his biggest hits and could exploit them any way he wished.

As Michael's career zoomed skyward, he faced family dilemmas. Once again, on August 19, 1982, Katherine quietly filed for a divorce from her errant husband, the man of many mistresses. She told Michael, "I can't take it any more." She was particularly infuriated that Joe was siphoning money from their joint funds to pay for his girlfriends.

The Pointer Sisters

During the divorce proceedings, Joe refused to move out of the Encino house. Michael accurately predicted that his mother would never escape her marriage. And so she didn't, the legal maneuvering over a divorce eventually sputtering, unresolved, to an end. Joe continued on the same path he'd traveled before-that is, to other women.

Little Richard

At the same time, Marlon, who was a year older than Michael, was also filing for divorce from Carol, his wife of seven years. "I still love my husband... desperately" she testified. Michael believed that, unlike Joe and Katherine, Marlon and Carol had a chance to work out their marital difficulties.

Michael was right. Marlon and Carol managed to iron out their problems and are still married today, making him the only one of the Jackson brothers to avoid the divorce courts.

After the "Victory" tour, Marlon grew disillusioned about performing with his brothers, especially Michael. On the last Jackson album, 2300 Jackson Street, he, like Michael, did not join in. Through a deal with Capitol Records, Marlon released his one and only solo album, Baby Tonight. It bombed, but in time he became a successful real estate agent in Southern California and a part owner of the Black Family Channel, a cable TV network.

Family problems were all but forgotten by Michael on one hot, muggy and overcast morning in Los Angeles when he was driven to Westlake Studios. The date was August 29, 1979.

Michael had once again teamed up with Quincy Jones to record an album. Only Michael seemed convinced at the time that they were going to make music industry history. From a stockpile of 600 songs, they narrowed the field to nine. At a cost of $850,000-perhaps a lot more when the final bills came in-they produced an album called Thriller.

Before he'd recorded the album's first song, Michael told Quincy and Rod Temperton, who was working with them, that "I want Thriller to not only do better in sales than Off the Wall, but to become the biggest selling album of all time." Both Quincy and Temperton smiled indulgently. Temperton, in the words of Quincy, was the only man in Hollywood whose body contained "not one drop of bullshit." But this breakthrough album Michael was demanding sounded like bullshit to him.

McCartney had already contributed "The Girl Is Mine," which was the first solo release from the album. The song peaked at number two on Billboard's chart, but it was a mere warm-up act, not a harbinger of what was about to happen to this album.

Songs written by Temperton ("The Lady In My Life" and "Baby Be Mine") were also selected for Thriller, as was "PYT (Pretty Young Thing)," a joint effort of Quincy and James Ingram. All these songs were solid pop numbers and contained in the words of Nelson George, "snappy rhythm tracks and bright, immaculate arrangements."

The title cut was another Temperton tune, and it appealed to Michael's fascination with the supernatural. The recording was climaxed by a camp horror rap by the actor Vincent Price, "king of the macabre." Despite his towering height, large body, and a propensity to marry, Price was quite effete. Tout Hollywod knew he was gay. Upon meeting Michael, Price was so attracted to him that he made a pass. Informing Price that he was a Jehovah's Witness, a cult that "abhorred homosexuality," Michael turned down the proposition.

The star of countless horror films, Price worked on both the song on the album and in the video of the same name. For his work, he agreed to accept a flat fee of $20,000. If Price's agent had made a deal for his client to get a percentage of the total sales, the actor would have "won lotto," as he himself later admitted.

"Jackson gave me the shaft," Price later charged, "and no pun intended." He recalled that two of the Jackson brothers-"I can't remember their names"-showed up at his doorstep with a gold record plaque. Price was gracious to the brothers. But once the door was closed in their faces, he went into a rage. "What in the fuck am I supposed to do with this shit? Erect a shrine to it?"

Although initially attracted to Michael, Price became more and more bitter as Thriller went on to become the biggest selling album of all time. In the early 90s, when a reporter asked Price if he thought the child molestation charges against Michael were true, Price had a sarcastic reply. "They must be true," he said. "After all, Michael Jackson fucked me too."

In "Wanna Be Startin' Somethin'," Michael rants against gossip and unwanted babies and compares himself to a vegetable on a buffet that fans can take a bite out of. He was obviously referring to fans grabbing and tearing at his hair and clothes.

The gorgeous dance ballad, "Human Nature," was the creation of John Bettis and Steve Porcaro. It allows Michael to express a certain sexuality. Back in those days he was still a handsome black man and could be taken seriously by young girls as a sex object.

But in retrospect, most of the success of Thriller as a whole was because of Michael's own songs, notably "Billie Jean," which even today is still his signature. In the song, Billie Jean is a bad lady, accusing Michael of fathering her child ("but the kid is not my son," the song claims). In real life, such an event would happen to Michael several times, as young girls showed up at the gates of Hayvenhurst with children in tow, each claiming that Michael was the father. One white woman evaded security guards and was eventually discovered inside the compound. The two sons who accompanied her were very Nordic looking, each boy with almost platinum blond hair.

Such women were said to be the inspiration for Michael to write "Billie Jean." But there is a more compelling story. "Ms. Paula Abdul is the infamous `Billie Jean' of the song," Enid Jackson once charged. She was married to Michael's brother, Jackie. "Michael wrote the song to vent his anger against Abdul and Jackie for having an eight-year affair while Jackie was married to me."

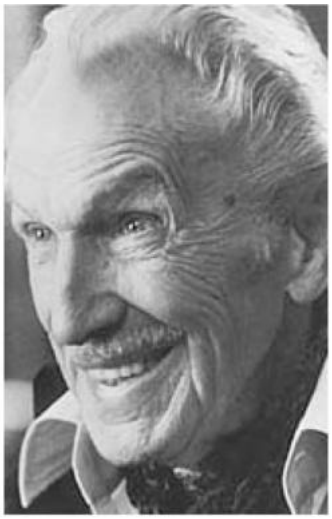
Other critics have suggested that Michael wrote the song to deflect suspicion about his own sexuality.

Before she became one of the most famous pop singers in the world, Paula Abdul-known for such hits as "Forever Your Girl," "Rush Rush," and "Straight Up"-had been an LA Lakers cheerleader. One day at a basketball game, she approached Jackie to ask him for his autograph. It wasn't long before Abdul was getting more than Jackie's autograph.

Even while still a teenager, she was also making a name for herself as a very talented choreographer. Jackie hired her to do the choreography for the video of the song, "Torture," in which Michael did not participate. Janet was so impressed with Abdul's work on the video that she also hired her to do choreography on her album, Control.

By then, Michael had long ago heard of his brother's affair from Enid. Reportedly, he was "uber-pissed" at what he felt was a betrayal from Janet.

Enid alleged that Abdul once called her from the hospital, claiming that she was having an abortion and naming Jackie as the father.



Vincent Price

When confronted with this allegation, Jackie denied the affair. But secretly, he continued to meet with Abdul. A suspicious Enid trailed her husband one night and caught Jackie with Abdul in the back seat of the Jackson family's Land Rover, a confrontation rumored to have ended in violence.

In time, this long-running affair between Jackie and Abdul would end in a divorce that was finalized in August of 1987.

Enid was Michael's favorite sister-in-law, and he deeply regretted the break-up of her marriage to his brother. Some of his bitterness about the affair definitely spilled over into "Billie Jean."

One of the most ridiculous rumors ever circulated about Michael was that Abdul had abandoned Jackie and moved in with Michael at Neverland. When questioned about this, Michael said, "I admire the talents of Miss Abdul on a professional level. As a person, I hate her!"

In 2005, Abdul made a comeback as a judge on Fox Television's Reality Show, American Idol.

Although he may not have admitted this lapse of musical judgment in his memoirs, Quincy Jones reportedly did not want to include "Billie Jean" in the Thriller album. Angered that his judgment was being questioned, Michael telephoned Yetnikoff, demanding that Quincy's name be removed from the album. The music mogul tried to pacify Michael, knowing that Quincy could have sued if his name had been erased.

In its own way, "Beat It" made history in the music industry. In a crossover move, "Beat It" was suddenly played throughout the land on "white rock stations" that rarely featured songs by black performers. "Beat It" was a heavy-hitting rock song that featured Eddie Van Halen, the rock guitar genius.

Quincy remembered that at one point the music was so hot that an electronic amplifier burst into flames. "I've never seen anything like that in forty years in the business." Ever since, "Beat It" has been singled out as the first song that cracked the rock radio color barrier.

Released as a single, "Billie Jean" began at a lukewarm number 47 on Billboard's chart of the top 100, but within six weeks shot to the top. The third single release from the album, "Beat It" also shot to number one on the charts. Michael became the first artist in Billboards history to have number one records on both the black and pop charts.

But the phenomenal success of Thriller lay in the future. When Quincy, Michael, and the crew first assembled to hear the final mix of the album, Westlake Studios was permeated with gloom and doom. The album was pronounced a disaster.

Paula Abdul with Maria Shriver, 1991

"After all the great songs and the great performances and great mixes and a great tune stack, we had a 24-karat sonic doo-doo," Quincy said. Sobbing hysterically, Michael ran from the studio. It was decided that the album was not releasable.

Quincy knew how to save the album. It was back to work for all concerned, especially Michael who seemed desperate to have a hit. "It was like he was going to make it this time or die trying," Quincy said.

When Walter Yetnikoff heard the final cut of Thriller, he told Michael, "You deliver like a mother-fucker." In a whispery little voice, Michael replied, "Please, Walter, don't use that word with me."

On hearing the album, critic Vincent Aletti of New York's Village Voice had an ominous prediction. "In Thriller, Jackson has begun to part the shimmering curtain of his innocence-it's magic, it's unreal-to glimpse darker, deeper things. Once that curtain is ripped down, the view could be astonishing."

The album that both Quincy and Michael were once too embarrassed to release went on to chalk up a worldwide sale of 50 million copies, outdistancing such mega-sellers as Grease and Saturday Night Fever. It would also spend more than seventy-five weeks at Number One on the Billboard album charts, longer than any other modern pop recording. It also produced seven Top Ten hits, beating the records previously held by Bruce Springsteen and Fleetwood Mac.

No other album in the history of music had ever sold like that. Ten-yearolds purchased the album, as did some seniors who were young in 1917. Michael-mania spread around the planet.

The decade of the 80s belonged to Jacko, "King of Pop," and to Ronald Reagan, who was president of the United States as the Soviet Union entered its twilight zone. The name of Michael Jackson became one of the most famous in the world-or, as his fans claimed, "The most famous."

In listening to the album today, the songs make for a good pop album music, fun to sing and dance to, but Thriller doesn't quite "live up to its legendary reputation," in the words of Michael Jackson Record Reviews. The success of the album depended largely on Michael's imaginative videos, much of the action inspired by his own visions.

Michael lived, breathed, and ate Thriller, devoting his entire life to guarantee its success. His "drive bordered on the psychopathic," in the words of Yetnikoff. Michael called the mogul day and night, demanding to know the latest figures of its worldwide sales. He was an artist obsessed with his own success, demanding more and more promotion. After weeks as number one, he wept uncontrollably when Thriller fell to number two position.

Quincy traveled with Michael on a world tour to promote Thriller, concentrating on Japan and Europe.

In Rome, Michael learned that his huge upcoming concert had been simultaneously scheduled for the same evening that Leonard Bernstein was conducting an orchestra at Vatican City. Michael had long been impressed with such smash hits as On the Town and West Side Story. Michael's own dance moves had been greatly influenced by West Side Story in particular. On a more personal level, perhaps Michael was intrigued by how a homosexual pursued a career-that of conductor of a symphony orchestra-that demanded a heterosexual facade.

Eddie Van Halen

The coming together of Bernstein and Michael did not exactly transpire as Michael had planned. When he met Michael, the conductor "virtually reached the bottom of Michael's throat" with what came to be called history's most prolonged tongue kiss. Michael should not have been flattered. Bernstein did that to many handsome young men he was introduced to.

When Michael finally broke away, he was astonished to hear Bernstein say: "I hear that AIDS can be acquired by an exchange of saliva. Let's hope that both of us are not entertaining something really wicked in our blood streams."

Bernstein invited Quincy to a private viewing of the Sistine Chapel which he'd arranged through his Vatican connections. Both men lay on the floor looking up at the Michelangelo masterpiece. Studying the artist's figures carefully, Bernstein exclaimed: "Look at that! Michelangelo doesn't know what a woman looks like. He was as gay as I am. Those are just guys with tits!"

At the end of the world tour, plans went forward to make a video of "Thriller." But the 14-minute video would be delayed by a year and a half after the release of the album.

Sales had slumped, but after the release of the video, the album once again repeated its steady climb up the charts. Fans around the world treated the arrival of the video like the premiere of a major film. Quincy Jones claimed that Michael's video "made a sensation in tandem with the rise of video as an art form."

In a very short time, Michael would become even more celebrated because of his videos. One eyewitness on the set where "Thriller" was filmed recalled the moment. "Jackson's body tenses. Energy shoots through his body like a bolt of lightning. As he faces the camera, he seems to spit out the lyrics. His usually fragile voice suddenly takes on a dynamic tone. He can be heard over the deafening playback. He grips his left sleeve with his right hand and jerks it upward. He growls the chorus to the camera. He doesn't dance but seems to glide. He launches into one of his famous spins-a trio of turns in succession."

In the video, Michael is transformed into both a zombie and a werewolf, thereby challenging its director, John Landis, who had previously directed An American Werewolf in London. Landis cast Ola Ray as Michael's girlfriend. Because of Michael's strong religious beliefs, she concealed from him that she had been a Playboy centerfold in 1980.

Before she was tapped to appear with Michael in the "Thriller" video, Ray, who came from St. Louis, had appeared as a hooker in the 1981 film, Body and Soul. She'd also appeared as hookers in the 1982 Night Shift and in 48 Hrs., released the same year. "Thriller" was obviously the highlight of her career, but she continued to do minor film and TV work, appearing as a Playboy playmate in Beverly Hills Cop II, released in 1987.

In the "Thriller" video, choreographed zombies perform with Michael. He and the "undead" stage a fantastic song-and-dance number, which the Pulitzer Prize-winning critic for The New York Times, Margo Jefferson, called "Walpurgisnacht in suburbia."

The choreography in the "Thriller" video would have taxed the talents of Jerome Robbins. The dance sequences were filmed within the underground concourse at the Rockefeller Center subway stop in Manhattan. The video cost a million dollars.

After the airing of "Thriller" on MTV, and its subsequent worldwide success, all major stars-both black and white-demanded a music video to promote their recordings. A tie-in video with the release of an album became mandatory. Michael single-handedly had revolutionized the music business.

Two shorter but still successful videos were released from the Thriller album, "Billie Jean" and "Beat It."

By the time of his release of the video "Billie Jean," Michael had a new "wet look" to his hair. He'd plucked his eyebrows, now heavy with eyeliner. His dancing was slicker, his clothing more "with it." On one occasion he wore black leather trousers and a black leather jacket like Elvis Presley himself.

"Thriller"

The video, "Beat It," was a sort of mini-version of West Side Story, with the urban violence updated to the 1980s. It was the most viewed video during the summer of 1983.

With its theme of gang warfare, "Beat It" was as stunning as "Billie Jean." Actual gang members from the streets of Los Angeles appeared in the video along with professional dancers.

MJ in "Thriller"

The "Thriller" video had been paid for by Branca's skillful negotiations of distribution deals. Meeting with Michael, the two men conceived an even more daring plan: they'd make a documentary on the making of the hit video, and would call it "The Making of `Thriller.'"

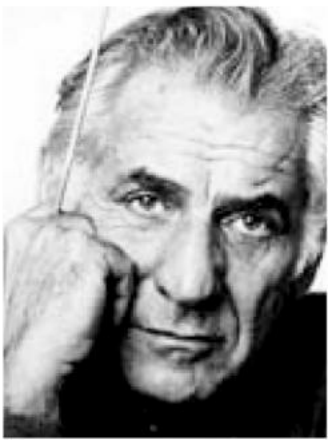
Yetnikoff was instrumental in getting MTV to participate financially. Before that, he'd denounced MTV as "racist assholes" for presenting only white performers. But MTV, recognizing the unprecedented appeal of Michael, finally came around, even putting up some of the money for the financing of the second "Thriller" video. These videos opened the doors of MTV to other emerging black performers.

Jerry Kramer was called in to direct "The Making of `Thriller.'" "As a professional, Michael is like a Zen monk," Kramer later said. "He's focused on a singular goal, his work, his art, which he constantly tries to take to a celestial level."

Long after the release of the "Thriller" video, a story leaked out to the press that under threat of expulsion from the Jehovah's Witness cult, Michael once ordered Branca to destroy the "Thriller" video, even though it had been financed by Vestron, Showtime, and MTV. Branca, at least in front of Michael, agreed to do that, but he had no intention of actually destroying the video. Finally, a last-minute compromise was reached thanks to the insertion of a disclaimer: "Due to my strong personal convictions, I wish to stress that this film in no way endorses a belief in the occult-Michael Jackson."

Later on, to pacify the more fanatical of the Jehovah's Witnesses, Michael, in an issue of Awake! on May 22, 1984, tried to distance himself from "Thriller." He promised, "I'll never do a video like that again! In fact, I have blocked further distribution of the film over which I have control, including its release in some other countries. There's all kinds of promotional stuff being proposed for `Thriller.' But I tell them, `No, no, no. I don't want to do anything on `Thriller.' No more 'Thriller.'"

Not all the Jehovah's Witnesses disapproved of Michael, although church leaders did. A radical cult within the sect itself came up with the startling belief that Michael was "an incarnation of the Archangel Michael, a symbol of the arisen Christ."



Leonard Bernstein

Wearing a pink shirt and a red bow tie, with black leather pants and a jacket, Michael appeared live at the 1983 hoedown celebrating Motown's 25th anniversary. Michael at first refused to appear, but was eventually cajoled into performing. He electrified audiences.

On stage Michael had a reunion with his errant brother, Jermaine, who had voiced criticism of Michael for "trying to be white" to the press. Berry Gordy pleaded with Michael to do a solo number from Motown's long list of hits, but Michael adamantly refused, preferring to lip-sync his rendition of "Billie Jean."

It was take that choice or leave it," Gordy later said. "I caved in just to get Michael out there on stage."

Some fifty million people tuned in to watch Motown 25: Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow. Michael startled audiences with his "Moonwalk." Actually he'd ripped off the dance, in which he seemed to be gliding in opposite directions simultaneously, from inner-city black break dancers in the 1970s.

From that night on, Michael also became known as "The Gloved One." Many fans thought he'd introduced the lone white-sequined glove that night. But he'd been wearing such a glove since the late 1970s. Sammy Davis Jr. thought Michael was paying homage to old-fashioned black minstrel shows, or making a tribute to Al Jolson. Motown 25 turned out to be the highest-rated variety show in the history of TV.

In less than a decade after Michael's Motown 25 appearance, Entertainment Weekly hailed the performance as one of the greatest entertainment moments of the 20th century. The article wrote of "a delicate young man with a choked voice, a white glove, and magic shoes. He took the microphone and began to write the next chapter of American music history. The moment Michael Jackson ripped into his single, `Billie Jean'-squealing, moaning, spinning, and finally taking the viewer's breath away, with his Moonwalkthe music industry had to throw away its old yardsticks of success."

Two of the greatest dancing stars of all time, Fred Astaire and Gene Kelly, watched Michael's "Moonwalk." The next day, each of them called Michael, asking to meet him. Although shy about meeting two of his all-time favorites, Michael eagerly set up times to see each of these talented stars of the Golden Age, from whom he had stolen so many of his own dance steps, adapting them, of course.

Both Gene Kelly and Fred Astaire were idols to Michael, and he also understood the different artistry of each dancer. Critic Steve Vineberg once noted that the two performers were a study in contrasts with different personal styles. He called Astaire "a natural aristocrat, movie musicals' closest equivalent to Cary Grant."

"If Fred Astaire is the Cary Grant of dance, I'm the Marlon Brando," Kelly said.

"Astaire was astonishingly lithe, perhaps the most graceful man who ever walked-let alone danced-across a movie set," Vineberg claimed.

On the other hand, Vineberg found that Kelly evoked Jimmy Cagney. "Kelly's style was rooted in vaudeville and the brash, crowing apple-pie musicals of George M. Cohan," Vineberg said. "He was an athlete, a two-fisted Irishman."

The first telephone call of the morning to Michael at his Encino home was from Astaire. The dancer told Michael that he'd taped the show and had gotten up early that morning to watch the program again.

"You're a hell of a mover," Astaire told Michael. "Man, you really put them on their asses last night."

After Michael thanked him, Astaire said, "You're an angry dancer. I'm the same way. I used to do the same thing with my cane."

In the days to come, Astaire invited Michael over to his Beverly Hills home. There, Michael taught Ginger Rogers' former dance partner how to Moonwalk. Astaire was eighty-four years old at the time. So impressed was he with Michael's steps that Astaire asked Hermes Pan to come over one night, as he wanted Michael to teach the dancer/choreographer also how to Moonwalk.

Michael admired Astaire, but he also had great respect for the talent of Hermes Pan, the Nashville-born artist responsible for choreographing every one of the nine Astaire-Rogers 1930s gems as well as Fred and Ginger's 1949 screen swan song, The Barkleys of Broadway. Pan also choreographed Betty Grable musicals in the 40s and danced on screen with both the "Blonde Bombshell," as she was called, and Hollywood's princess, Rita Hayworth.

Michael asked Astaire how he climbed the walls and danced on the ceiling in the 1951 Royal Wedding.

Astaire finally admitted how this trick shot was done. "The whole room revolved, and I was on the ground the whole time. The camera, the cameraman, and the room all turn, and I'm the one who does the climbing. It required a special set. We called it the Iron Lung, and it was constructed by Bethlehem Steel. Not only did the camera and cameraman revolve 360 degrees, the light for the set revolved as well. It's too difficult to explain. But don't you dare copy it from me. That scene belongs just to me."

"I always remember the song you sang," Michael said, obviously in awe.

"You're All the World to Me," Astaire said. "I remember it well."

Long after he gave up dancing in public, Astaire still put on private shows, as he did one night for Michael. He sat at his drums and pounded out some rhythms, before getting up and performing a few dance steps for Michael.

"Better watch out!" Michael warned. "I'll steal those steps from you too."

"Feel free," Astaire said. "At my age, I'm glad to be walking."

Michael confessed that he used to sit in front of his television, using his video cassette's stop-and-rewind switches to dissect every dance step his mentor made.

"I stole that idea of going up on my toes from those classic movies you made back in the 30s," Michael told Astaire.

"Those were the days," Astaire said with a touch of nostalgia.

"Anybody who can sing and dance at the same time-and do both wellis pretty darned good," Astaire said. "And that's what Michael does."

Michael would later be nominated for an Emmy Award in the musical category. Even though he lost to Leontyne Price, he felt Astaire's compliment took away some of the sting of defeat.

When Michael's so-called autobiography, Moonwalk, was published, he dedicated it to Fred Astaire.

After Astaire's death in 1987, and when Michael was preparing his 1988 Moonwalker, a full-length feature film, he received a major disappointment. Michael choreographed a dance sequence in which he'd superimpose himself onto one of Astaire's films, becoming in essence the dancer's Ginger Rogers. It was a brilliant idea and would have made for a first-rate film memory. But the female jockey who Astaire married at the end of his life, Robyn Smith, refused to give Michael permission to use the footage.

When Sarah Giles composed her collection of remembrances about Astaire, she asked Michael to contribute. In Fred Astaire. His Friends Talk, Michael wrote: "I could only repeat what has been said and written about Fred Astaire's perfectionism and enormous, one-of-a-kind artistry. What I can reflect on is the inspiration he afforded me personally, being privileged as I was to see him work his magic. Nobody could duplicate Mr. Astaire's ability, but what I never stop trying to emulate is his total discipline, his absolute dedication to every aspect of his art. He rehearsed, rehearsed, and rehearsed some more, until he got it just the way he wanted it. It was Fred Astaire's work ethic that few people ever discussed and even fewer could ever hope to equal."

In the 1980s, many critics and writers called Michael the Fred Astaire of his era. Such a tribute was expressed by Sandy Duncan in People Extra: "Fred Astaire was to that era and that music, the way the music moved through him in the 30s, what Michael Jackson is to this era. You could put him behind a scrim and see his silhouette and you'd know who he was. It's like he's got a direct connection to God, because those moves just come from within him and through the music."

In the wake of Astaire's approval, Michael's other idol, Gene Kelly, also paid him a visit at Encino. Michael estimated that he must have watched Kelly dance with the cartoon figures, Tom & Jerry, at least a hundred times in the 1945 film, Anchors Aweigh.

Gene Kelly

In time Kelly would return the compliment, filming a taped tribute to Michael for his self-serving lovefest broadcast on Showtime cable TV.

Kelly enthralled Michael with his insider show business stories, admitting, "I wasn't nice to Debbie-it's a wonder she still speaks to me." He was referring to working with Debbie Reynolds on the 1952 Singin'in the Rain. Michael told Kelly that he thought this was the greatest movie musical of all time.

He warned Michael that if he ever became a musical star in films, he should get used to being overlooked by The Academy. "It's a form of snobbism," Kelly said. "Members feel that drama is more deserving of awards than comedy."

Michael complimented Kelly on his all-ballet film, Invitation to the Dance. "I was never allowed to complete the picture," Kelly said. "The plug was pulled on me. The version released in 1956 was never finished. I was furious. Of course, I got disastrous notices. I took to bed for three weeks."

He blamed the director, Vincente Minnelli, for the disappointing Brigadoon, released in 1954. "You see, Vincente was in love with me .. . always was. When you're in love, you can't be objective as a director."

Kelly expressed his regret at his treatment of Judy Garland during the shooting of The Pirate in 1948. "She and Vincente were breaking up, and she was on the verge of a nervous breakdown and the beginning of a long and protracted illness," Kelly said. "Vincente didn't help matters by spending all his time in my dressing room panting after me like a puppy dog."

Michael appeared shocked at these revelations.

Kelly warned Michael, "Don't get carried away with your own brilliance in the studio. Both Vincente and I thought The Pirate was going to be the greatest musical of all time. At least we thought that for forty-eight hours. Perhaps only six people in America understood where we were going. In fact, Vincente kissed and licked my toes in gratitude for the performance I gave."

Before departing, Kelly told Michael: "So many men-women, toohave fallen for me. Judy herself, Peter Lawford. Noel Coward. Every chorus boy I've ever danced with developed a crush on me. As a lover, I never returned love. An artist can only love himself, and I'm sure you agree."

"How do you cope with all those gay rumors," Michael said. "They say bad things about me. That I'm a homosexual, and I'm not! How do you answer such questions?"

"Enigmatically," Kelly responded. "I tell my inquisitors that I'm not gay. Merely an Irish leprechaun. There's a difference you know."

At the door, Kelly gave Michael a warm embrace and a theatrical kiss. "You're going to be king in the 80s. For Fred and me, there's not much left except accepting lifetime achievement awards."

"Can you believe it?" Michael endlessly asked of anyone even remotely concerned. "The great Fred Astaire, the great Gene Kelly told me that I was just as great a dancer as they were in their prime. What can any future award mean to me when I get praise like that?"

Astaire and Kelly might approve of Michael, but not the members of his church, The Jehovah's Witnesses.

Michael might have tried to appease members of Jehovah's Witnesses and distance himself from Thriller, but he wasn't going to let the fanatical religious sect deter "me from the greatest night of my life." He showed up at the 1984 Grammy Awards to receive all those accolades for Thriller, and it would mark the pinnacle of his career. It would also turn into one of his most infamous appearances, launching him on the long road toward a forever tarnished reputation.

When Michael walked into the auditorium to receive his Grammys, he had child star Emmanuel Lewis on his left and the beautiful Brooke Shields on his right. The trio was, in the words of Walter Yetnikoff, "a menage a trois to make the Marquis de Sade blush."

"I didn't get destroyed by the press and fan mania and neither will Michael. He's very talented. He knows how to make records that people like. But he's a very straightforward kid. He has a great deal of faith. He's got a great deal of innocence and he protects that especially. Michael looks at cartoons all day and keeps away from drugs. That's how he maintains his innocence. "

--Paul McCartney

"I did it as a favor. I didn't want nothing. Maybe Michael will give me dance lessons some day. I was a complete fool, according to the rest of the band and our manager and everybody else. "

--Eddie Van Halen, on playing 'Beat It' for free

"No dope-oriented album ever sold as much as Thriller, and no vulgar artist ever became so famous as Michael has.

"

--The Rev. Jesse Jackson

"Thank God for Elizabeth Taylor. She protected me."

--Michael Jackson

"He wasn't ever really interested in money. I'd give him his share of the night's earnings and the next day he'd buy ice cream or candy for all the kids in the neighborhood. "

--Papa Joe Jackson

"My Lord, he's a wonderful mover. He makes these moves up himself and it's just great to watch. Michael is a dedicated artist. He dreams and thinks of it all the time. "

--Fred Astaire

Chapter Seven

The Grammy Awards in 1984 alerted keen observers to Michael's interest in young boys. In his future, these boys-with an occasional exceptionwould be white. Not so Emmanuel Lewis, an African-American who was born in Brooklyn in 1971, which made him thirteen years old when Michael took him and Brooke Shields as his "dates" to the Grammys.

Michael met the pint-sized actor-known at the time as "The Tallest 40 Inches in Hollywood"-at an awards ceremony. They became intense friends, a relationship that would last for many years. It was another odd coupling for Michael. Lewis was rumored to be a midget, but endocrinologists claimed he had all the potential for normal growth.

Speculation about the relationship became rampant when Michael and Lewis appeared in public dressed alike. They spent many happy hours even days-together. When Lewis went somewhere with Michael, he was often mistaken for Gary Coleman, the Diff'rent Strokes TV child star. Both of these performers are short, African-American in origin, and had starred in sitcoms about trans-racial adoptions.

Emmanuel Lewis

Lewis was twelve years old when his sitcom, Webster, premiered in 1983. The series finale would come just one day after his 18th birthday. Michael was a faithful fan of the series.

Before hitting it big on Webster, Lewis had starred in TV commercials, hawking fruit juice, glue, soup, toys, stereos, coffee, puddings, pizzas, and Burger King. He told reporters, "Though I'm still little, my heart and dreams are as big as ever."

It was during the making of those TV commercials that Michael became "smitten" (La Toya's words) with Lewis. Brazenly, Michael called the talent agent, Margaret Lewis, the young actor's mother, and asked her permission to allow her son to spend time at Hayvenhurst. Not suspicious at the time, she seemed delighted that a big star like Michael had expressed an interest in her son.

It was all fun and games, as they wrestled on the lawn at Encino, played cowboys and Indians, or petted the animals, including the boa constrictor, "Muscles," in Michael's zoo. Michael claimed that although boa constrictors could not devour the average person whole, Lewis was "just the right size for a tasty snack." In response, the child actor would run screaming into the house. Much time was spent in Michael's darkened bedroom watching movies. Sleepovers-later to become a notorious fixture in Michael's lifefollowed.

Steve Howell, who became Michael's unofficial videographer, captured on film many intimate moments between Lewis and Michael. "Yes, hugging and the most intimate cuddling," Howell was quoted as saying. "It's all on home video."

In March of 2005, In Touch Weekly, a tabloid, shocked Michael's fans by publishing a photograph of him, along with Lewis, lying in bed sucking on the nipples of baby bottles. "How retro!" a fan wrote Michael. "How could you? Talk about trying to relive your second childhood."

When he turned thirteen, Lewis received a diamond-and-gold "friendship" bracelet from Michael that allegedly cost $15,000. "It weighed more than Emmanuel did," said a Jackson family member. This was a great exaggeration, of course, but at the time, Lewis weighed only forty pounds.

Michael was twenty-five years old when he launched this strange friendship with a boy about half his age. Some family members, including La Toya, were often embarrassed by the whispering and giggling between the two, but Michael refused to talk about Lewis and asked that the Jacksons not probe into his personal relationships.

Freddie Mercury

Unlike La Toya, Michael's sister, Rebbie, always denounced those who speculated that her brother was gay. "That's inconceivable. Homosexuality is against the tenets of our faith," she said, referring to the Jehovah's Witness cult. "Anyone who turned out to be gay would be disfellowshipped, cut off right away." The statement is only startling in its naivete.

In 1983, Michael invited Lewis to attend a concert with him at the Los Angeles Forum to hear Freddie Mercury, the flamboyant lead singer of the group, Queen.

Previously, Michael had urged Mercury to release "Another One Bites the Dust" as a single. Soon after, it shot to number one on the charts, and since then, Mercury had been urging Michael to record a duet with him, as he had with Paul McCartney and Mick Jagger.

Michael and Mercury were often compared to each other, one critic claiming that, "Both artists have an androgynous image.. .their appearance has blurred the conventional and traditional barriers surrounding gender, race, and age in society."

Watching Mercury perform, Michael reportedly was awed by this BritishIndian singer, who was impressive not only for his powerful vocal abilities but for his charisma as a live performer. Later Michael went backstage for a reunion with Mercury, in the process introducing him to Lewis.

In his dressing room, Mercury was on the phone talking to his cats-yes, that's not a misprint. The mercurial singer was devoted to his cats and even dedicated his solo album, "Mr. Bad Guy," to his felines. Michael noted that Mercury was wearing a vest on which he'd painted portraits of each of his cats. The song, "Delilah," was written about his favorite cat.

Slamming down the phone, Mercury turned to Michael and Lewis. "Don't either of you ask my hand in marriage. I can't cook, and I'd be a terrible housewife. I'm just a musical prostitute, my dear." He uttered those lines to many visitors. Perhaps in deference to the presence of the obviously underaged Lewis, he didn't express another one of his favorite quips: "The bigger the better-in everything."

After Michael and the pint-sized actor had departed, Mercury turned to the stage manager. "I'm gayer than Michael, but I like my men six feet tall with twelve-inch dicks."

A reporter, David Rowland, once asked Michael who his closest friends were. He said, "Freddie Mercury, Diana Ross, Elizabeth Taylor ..." Rowland claimed that Michael then added the name of a kid standing beside him. "I didn't get his name. He looked ten years old, very cute, very blond, and blueeyed. It certainly wasn't Emmanuel Lewis."

Michael said, "My grown-up friends and this boy here are the only people in the world who don't want anything from me. They love me for myself."

When Mercury learned that he had AIDS, seven years before he eventually died from the disease, he was reported to have said: "I should have used Michael as a role model and dated only ten-year-old virgins."

In public, Michael sometimes defended his unusual friendship with Lewis. "I was Emmanuel's form of inspiration-he loved my humor and just hanging out and having fun. Not just with me, but my whole family."

"Michael is not only my friend, he's my family," Lewis claimed.

Michael's nickname for Lewis was "Manny."

Initially, Margaret Lewis didn't think that there was anything wrong about her young son pursuing a relationship with a big star like Michael. But when reports reached her that Michael and her son had checked into the Beverly Hills Hotel, registering themselves as father and son, she moved to sever the relationship. "There was something wrong here," she reportedly said. "The friendship didn't seem right. Michael was getting obsessional about my son."

Years later, in 2003, when Lewis was on The Howard Stern Show promoting the TV series, The Surreal Life, the controversial interviewer noted that Michael used to carry Lewis around like he was a little baby. Stern asked Lewis if Michael had been in love with him. Lewis seemed to want to drop the subject but Stern was persistent, asking Lewis if Michael used to bathe him. Stern also wanted to know if Michael ever "came on to you or fondled you?" Lewis denied that any incident like that ever happened. He later said, "I was ready to go over and kick Howard's ass for asking such questions."

Michael's other "date" at the 1984 Grammy Awards was Brooke Shields. Respected in later years as a Broadway actress, she was known at the time as a young Hollywood goddess, a sex kitten, a sensual starlet, an undergraduate at Princeton, and the scandalous star of 1978's Pretty Baby, 1980's The Blue Lagoon, and 1981's Endless Love.

In some ways, their early lives had run along roughly parallel courses. Michael had Papa Joe beating, pushing, and shoving him into early stardom. Brooke had a small-time actress, Teri Shields, the ultimate stage mother, placing her daughter in front of the camera before she was even one year old. As the Ivory Snow pin-up, Brooke was once hailed as "the most beautiful baby in America." Francesco Scavullo, the celebrated photographer who changed her diapers for the Ivory Snow ads, once said: "Brooke was born beautiful, she stays beautiful, and she gets more beautiful every month."

Brooke's first biographer, Jason Bonderoff, described a startling event that happened to Brooke when she was only two years old. One afternoon in Central Park, Teri Shields was guarding the baby carriage containing Brooke. An elderly woman in large sunglasses and an Hermes scarf strolled by and peered inside the carriage. Teri thought that the woman's face looked vaguely familiar. Staring at the baby, the woman said, "The child is magnificent. She'll go far." Teri recognized the husky Swedish accent. Greta Garbo had predicted Brooke's future before walking on without another word.

Reportedly, Michael had refused to see Pretty Baby, a movie in which Brooke played a child prostitute living in a brothel. There were numerous nude scenes. The release of the film caused an outcry from right-wing fundamentalists and groups attacking child porn. Michael was also said to have boycotted The Blue Lagoon because of its nude scenes. The release of this film led to Brooke's testifying at a U.S. congressional inquiry, where she insisted that older body doubles had been used during the filming of her nude scenes.

Brooke had created a sensation, and made a cool million, when she'd posed for Calvin Klein in his jeans, plugging the slogan, "Nothing comes between me and my Calvins."

Neither Brooke nor her stage mother, Teri, seemed to have a problem with Brooke becoming romantically linked in the press with "a man of color," as one public relations agent privately commented years later. "Of course, in Michael's case, if a girl didn't like him black, he could switch to white," quipped one reporter.

Michael, perhaps because of his lower class origins, was intrigued by Brooke's aristocratic background. She was a descendant of Lucrezia Borgia, one of the Holy Roman Emperors (Charles V), King Henri IV of France, Prince Rainier of Monaco, and the Marquis de Sade.

Michael was said to have been jealous when he learned that Brooke was dating John Kennedy Jr. When Capote heard this, he said, "He's only jealous because he can't have John-John for himself."

Before her arrival at the Grammys, the actress had unsuccessfully sued photographer Garry Gross in an attempt to stop him from exhibiting or selling nude pictures of herself for which she'd (voluntarily) posed when she was only ten years old. She had tearfully testified in court that the photographs embarrassed her. But despite Brooke's tears, and despite the fact that some commentators had defined the pictures as "child porn," the court decided that Gross had the right to display the pictures.

After her 1983 disaster, the film Sahara, for which she'd been paid $1,500,000, Brooke took a four-year sabbatical from pictures to attend Princeton. Nonetheless, her promoters jockeyed, during that era, to keep her name in the press. What better person to date than Michael Jackson himself, as he rode the crest of his fame?

"Dating Michael was a way to get Brooke's picture on the front page of every newspaper in America," a publicist said. "And Michael needed to show up with a beautiful woman to prove he was straight. It was a match made in heaven."

Except it wasn't, as subsequent events on the actual night of the Grammys revealed.

Michael had already escorted Brooke as his date to the January 1984, American Music Awards, produced by "eternally young" Dick Clark. She had to share Michael with his other escorts of the evening, Emmanuel Lewis and La Toya. All four of them sat smiling as Clark claimed, "If 1983 wasn't the year of Michael Jackson, it wasn't the year of anybody."

According to La Toya, Michael was very reluctant to take Brooke once again to the Grammy Awards in February. His sister remembered Michael coming into the kitchen of their Encino home, joining Janet and her for a "confessional." Meanwhile, Brooke sat in the living room of the Jackson home, "cooling her heels," as Janet remembered. La Toya's claim was that Brooke was trying to cajole Michael into taking her to the awards ceremony, which was destined to attract worldwide press coverage.

It isn't known why Michael was reluctant to take Brooke to the Grammys. Even if she were only "arm candy," he could use his association with her to defend against rumors that he was gay. And she would get national publicity. Even so, many members in the press, even thousands of Michael's fans, were suspicious of this coupling. Speculation appeared that Michael had paid Brooke anywhere from $10,000 to $25,000 for each of their joint appearances. None of the allegations from those provocative web postings was ever proven.

Janet Jackson may have referred to Brooke as "giraffe butt," but she was one of the most beautiful teenagers to emerge in the 1980s. Garbo had been right to an extent. Brooke did go far, but, as is usually the case in Hollywood, not as far as she dreamed. She did not, for example, become the next Ava Gardner, as some had predicted.

In one of the more fanciful paragraphs in his autobiography, Moonwalk, Michael falsely claimed that in addition to Diana Ross, "another love was Brooke Shields. We were romantically serious for a while."

Brooke has denied that there was any romance or love affair between Michael and herself, and she did so on national television. She'd met Michael when she was only thirteen, and they had bonded in their discussions over the difficulties associated with being a child star.

"There were a handful of child stars at the time-actress Jodie Foster, Michael, and myself among them-and we were friends because we shared an understanding of how difficult life was in the public eye," Brooke said. "When we were together, we were in a safe place. We could be ourselves."

Accompanied by both Emmanuel Lewis and Brooke, Michael arrived customarily late on the biggest night of his life, the presentation of the Grammys on February 28, 1984, at the Los Angeles Shrine Auditorium. The televised event would be watched by sixty million viewers.

Michael's major competition of the evening, Lionel Richie, spotted him backstage. Destined to become the big loser of the evening, Richie was overheard talking to Quincy Jones, "My God," he allegedly said upon seeing Michael's costume, "It's Sergeant Pepper and he's wearing more makeup than Brooke Shields."

Michael arrived at the glitzy gala, the music industry's Oscars, in full military uniform, his thin waist encased in a gold sash. A black sequined jacket with wide lapels fitted tightly over a pair of black sequined pants. Across his chest he'd hung a gold bandolier, and on each shoulder rested a mammoth epaulette. He skipped the tie but wore a white wing-collared dress shirt. Of course, he had on his trademark white socks and a spangled glove on one hand as well as a spangled wrist band. His eyes were concealed from his millions of fans behind dark aviator sunglasses.

Michael had been nominated for a dozen Grammys, and no star in the history of the academy had ever received such accolades, not even Elvis Presley. Even The Beatles had received only four Grammys, which one critic of the music awards called "a scandal."

The evening began with Michael winning Best Rock Vocal Performance by a Male for "Thriller." He had fully expected to win Best Song of the Year for his rendition of "Billie Jean," but he lost to The Police for "Every Breath You Take."

He bounced back, hitting the stage with Quincy Jones to accept Grammys as Producers of the Year for the Thriller album.

In many ways, the most meaningful Grammy was Michael's win for Best Children's Album honoring his work on E.T. the Extra-Terrestrial. As he accepted the award, his fans in the balcony broke into hysterical screaming as they rose to their feet shouting, "We love you, Michael."

More Grammys waited in the wings for Michael to pick up. Best R&B vocalist went to Michael for "Billie Jean," and he also won the Best Record award for "Beat It" and Best R&B Song Award for "Billie Jean."

One of the biggest awards of the evening, Best Pop Male Vocalist, went to Michael for "Beat It." Sisters La

Toya, Janet, and Rebbie joined him on stage in his great moment of triumph. He said, "My mother's very shy, she's like me, she won't come up." For this award, he even removed his sunglasses, as Katharine Hepburn had suggested to him. One male fan called from the balcony, "Take it all off, Michael."

The highlight of the evening, the Grammy for Record of the Year, also went to guess who?-Michael. Before millions, he was like a happy kid, jumping up and down. One of the presenters, pint-sized Mickey Rooney, called the ceremony "the Michael Jackson Show." He also entered the history books, having won more Grammy awards than any other musician before him, breaking the record set by Paul Simon, who in 1970 had walked away with seven Grammys for his album, Bridge Over Troubled Water.

When Michael in his falsetto announced, "I love all the girls in the bal cony," a member of the audience sitting behind Lewis and Brooke could be heard saying, "Yeah, right!"

This was also the night the infamous Pepsi commercials were aired for the first time. Since news of Michael's hair catching fire had been flashed around the world, more people watched his commercial than any other TV commercial in the history of the medium. "The executives at Coca-Cola were getting diarrhea watching it," said one of the producers of the Grammys.

Even as the commercial for Pepsi aired, lawyers for both Michael and the soft drink company were in negotiations about the fallout from this disastrous filming.

Despite the events transpiring on the stage, everyone in the auditorium seemed to be staring at the strange trio who sat up front: Michael, Lewis, and Brooke. What caused Brooke distress was Michael's insistence that Lewis remain perched on his lap. Finally, when she couldn't take the scrutiny any more, Brooke was seen tugging at Michael's arm. "Let's get out of here! Everybody's looking at us. I'm so embarrassed I think we should make a run for it."

Michael cuddled Lewis in his arms as he left the auditorium, heading for a waiting limousine surrounded by his bodyguards. An apparently enraged Brooke trailed them, looking neither left nor right as she made her getaway.

His previous "girlfriend," Tatum O'Neal, made two attempts to reach Michael, but was shoved aside by security guards. Behind his dark glasses, Michael either didn't see her-or didn't want to see her. "How quickly they forget," Tatum told her friends, perhaps jokingly. "Without me, there would be no Michael Jackson."

Later that night at the Rex, a deluxe restaurant, where a post-Grammy bash was held, Michael tasted caviar, drank a glass of champagne, and was embraced by Arnold Schwarzenegger, the future governor of California. He even received a kiss from Julio Iglesias, who was rumored to "have the hots" for his sister, La Toya. Orange-haired Cyndi Lauper greeted Michael with a wet kiss, as did Eddie Murphy, known to appreciate a "trannie" when he spotted one.

"Michael, darling," came a familiar voice. He turned to confront a still beautiful, but aging, Joan Collins. "Tell me, dear heart, the name of your plastic surgeon. I simply adore your nose job."

Neil Diamond approached him, reminding him that "your role models," Diana Ross and James Brown, had never received a Grammy-"and now you're carrying home eight." Music legend Bob Dylan also came up to Michael, expressing his ongoing disappointment that his revolutionary Highway 61 Revisited hadn't received a Grammy in 1965.

Michael not only won all those Grammys but over the years he would also bank a total take from Thriller that may have gone beyond the $150 million mark. "Move over Paul McCartney," Quincy Jones was reported to have said. "Show business is getting a new rich daddy-and he's black."

When Michael in his limousine dropped Brooke off at her hotel, L'Ermitage in Beverly Hills, she is reported to have said: "Why don't you, Emmanuel, and I get married? That will give the press something to write about!" The quote might have been apocryphal.

Back in his bedroom at Encino, Michael spent the rest of the evening talking to "my only true friends in life," a series of six mannequins. Brooke herself had considered the manufacture of a mannequin as a present for Michael until she learned that she'd have to devote three weeks of her life posing for it.

One week after the awards, one insulting reporter asked the question on everyone's lips, "Who do you love? Brooke or Emmanuel?"

Michael didn't answer but launched into an excuse for not marrying. "I don't like some of the things my brothers do to their wives. I'm never going to marry. I just can't take it. It's awful, marriage. I don't trust anyone enough for that."

Later, when he published Moonwalk, Michael had other comments about the lack of a woman in his life. "My dating and relationships with girls have not had the happy ending I've been looking for. Something always seems to get in the way. The things I share with millions of people aren't the sort of things you share with one. Many girls want to know what makes me tickwhy I live the way I live or do the things I do-trying to get inside my head. They want to rescue me from my loneliness. But they do it in such a way that they give me the impression they want to share my loneliness, which I wouldn't wish on anybody, because I believe I'm one of the loneliest people in the world."

When Brooke was promoting a romance in the press with Michael, she suggested there was some "real boy-girl interest" there. Years later, she'd be very candid and admit it was "only a friendship." Before "dating" Michael, she'd had another highly publicized romance, this time with the Saturday Night Fever himself, John Travolta. Like Michael, Travolta would live to see rumors of his alleged gay life splashed throughout the tabloids in blaring headlines.

When Michael was seriously questioned about his romance with Brooke, he admitted that he was still a virgin at the age of twenty-five despite his dates with the so-called Sex Kitten.

For the Grammy Awards, Michael-hired by Pepsi Cola-agreed to film what was to become the most controversial and highly publicized commercial of the 1980s. This Pepsi ad received more publicity than the Grammy telecast itself. One of the two Pepsi commercials became such a news event that many TV stations ran it for free as part of the evening news.

Michael turned out to be a hard bargainer with the soft drink company. Katharine Hepburn and Paul McCartney had urged him not to do commercials, fearing it would cheapen his image, but he went against their advice. He wrote new lines for "Billie Jean," helped conceive the Pepsi lyrics, and agreed to perform the new jingle, "You're a Whole New Generation," in the ads. Privately, he told Pepsi executives that he didn't drink Pepsi and that he'd refuse to do so on camera. "For that matter, I also don't drink Coca-Colahave no fears about that. I prefer natural beverages such as carrot juice or bottled water."

Michael's comments met a grim reception at Pepsi. "At the rate we're paying the mother-fucker," one disgruntled executive said privately, "he should down a whole God damn case of Pepsi in one gulp on camera. The arrogant little faggot." Even so, the company official emerged in public with a smiling face to welcome Michael aboard.

The commercials were to be filmed at the Los Angeles Shrine Auditorium in front of three thousand or so fans.

Throughout the filming and editing, Michael turned out to be a domineering diva. It was said that he made Bette Davis appear comparatively docile and cooperative. In complete dictatorial control, Michael demanded that Pepsi hire Bob Giraldi, who had directed him in the video, "Beat It." He also wanted and got the services of Michael Peters, who had worked on the videos for "Beat It" and "Thriller."

At first Michael refused to take off his sunglasses during taping. Giraldi urged, "But Michael, Pepsi is paying to see your face." He shot back that he would allow his face to be shown in close-up for only four seconds.

That too didn't go over with Pepsi executives. "If a TV viewer blinks, he'll miss the jerk's face," the same disgruntled executive said. "Jackson should take a lesson from Gloria Swanson in Sunset Blvd. about how to deliver a close-up."

Michael also complained about the lighting, claiming it was as dark as the "Thriller" graveyard scene. An early version of the sequence showed Michael in a dance step that incorporated two spins. He demanded that it be cut. "I will allow Pepsi to show me in only one spin." On seeing the first cut, Michael sent word to Pepsi, "I hate the commercials and everything about them." He cited one segment that "made me furious. I am smiling in one of my dances, and I am never known to smile when I dance."

The astonished executive asked, "But Michael, if you never smile while dancing, how did the camera catch you smiling?"

Michael slammed down the phone.

Before the beginning of that day's filming, Michael had dropped his glove in the toilet when he went to urinate and had "screamed bloody murder," in the words of one of the cameramen.

"It sounded like a shrill woman," said a sound engineer, "one who had just had a 14-inch black dildo shoved up her tight ass. It was even more convincing than Janet Leigh's scream for Alfred Hitchcock in Psycho."

The famous glove was fished out, dried off by wardrobe, and placed back on Michael's hand.

Michael later told Giraldi that the accidental dropping of the glove in the toilet "is a bad omen. Maybe God is telling me not to go through with this Pepsi thing. It is, after all, a lie since I don't drink Pepsi. Maybe God will punish me for lying."

The first commercial was filmed without incident, depicting a group of children dancing in the street, one of whom is dressed as Michael in a red jacket from his "Beat It" video. Suddenly, the young actor, Alfonso Ribeiro, confronts the Moonwalker himself, and looks absolutely astonished. Then Michael and his brothers join the children in a song-and-dance routine that honors the Pepsi generation.

Michael became enchanted with the handsome young boy, and the professional relationship blossomed into a private friendship. When Ribeiro released his first single, "Dance Baby," in 1984, it was dedicated to Michael. Ribeiro went on to TV sitcom fame when he played Carlton Banks in the 1990s series The Fresh Prince of Bel Air, produced by Quincy Jones. Because of their age difference, there was speculation about the relationship between Michael and the young boy, but nothing approaching the "scandal" caused by Michael's association with Emmanuel Lewis.

Ribeiro, who today has developed a passionate interest in auto racing, was descended from parents who immigrated to New York from the Dominican Republic. In January of 2002 he married his girlfriend, Robin, and they have a daughter named Sienna.

In the second commercial, it was agreed that Tito-not Michael-would be seen drinking a Pepsi. In lieu of his face, Michael agreed to allow his gloved hand and his sequined socks to be filmed. "My fans will know it's me just by looking at my glove and socks."

The re-shoot began as Michael appeared at the top of the stairs in his famous cocksure pose with hip jutting out "like a Saturday night whore" in the words of one critic. The writer for Rolling Stone would have a different slant, calling the celebrated stance "a whole physical catechism of cool."

It was 6:30pm on the night of January 27, 1984. Michael faced a worn-out crew, exhausted after four days of filming and reacting to his often outrageous demands. But it was Giraldi who was holding the crew after hours. He wasn't satisfied with the intensity of the flash bombs in the previously filmed sequences. After the first bomb went off, Michael headed down the steps, dancing to the tune of "Billie Jean." For the second blast, the technical staff increased the intensity of the pyrotechnics. Suddenly, a piercing scream came from Michael, a sound that dwarfed his earlier yell from the toilet.

"Tito, Tito, I'm flaming," Michael shouted.

After a magnesium bomb was detonated two feet from Michael's head, his face disappeared in a cloud of bluish smoke, like the kind of haze that filled New York speakeasies in the Twenties. The intense heat of the magnesium bomb, amplified by the klieg lights, had ignited his hair. Flames shot from Michael's head as he screamed in horror. Yanking his jacket up over his head, Michael attempted, unsuccessfully, to put out the fire.

Security guard Miko Brando rushed to rescue him, putting out the flames with his bare hands, but badly burning his own fingers in doing so.

Michael was in such panic that he fought off rescuers trying to save him. They had to wrestle him to the ground, spraying him with a fire extinguisher. Jermaine later recalled that he thought at first that Michael had been assassinated by some crazed fan.

Michael defied the men wanting to slip him out the back exit of the theater. Although in pain, he still had enough media savvy to demand that he be taken out the front. He wanted the medics to let him keep his sequined glove on. A video of him on a stretcher covered with blankets, his head bandaged and taped, but with the gloved hand protruding from the wrappings, was shown on television broadcasts around the world.

With dome lights flashing, Michael, with Miko at his side, was rushed to Cedars Sinai Medical Center.

"Michael Jackson was no brave soul," one of the ambulance drivers later told the press. "He screamed all the way like a pig at castration time. I thought he was a complete sissy. I'd served in Vietnam and had seen patients with missing arms and legs, with their guts split open, bravely enduring their death. From Jackson, we got screams loud enough to curdle blood. Forget about any macho image for that boy. The kid is a piece of lavender-colored cotton candy."

Inside the hospital, Michael was well enough to take charge, refusing to wear the standard open-at-the-back green gown. "He felt it would expose his ass," a nurse said, "and he absolutely wouldn't put it on. We found another gown for him without the opening. He also didn't like the color of the first gown, calling it a `pissy green.' He told us he had to have a turquoise blue gown instead. He also refused a doctor who wanted to examine his entire body for any stray burns. Jackson was insistent that no one on the hospital staff be allowed to see his penis or ass. I don't know anyone who wanted to see them-I sure didn't."

Michael's plastic surgeon, Dr. Steven Hoefflin, arrived at the hospital and made a decision to transfer his client to the Burn Center of the Brotman Medical Center at Culver City. During the preceding months, Hoefflin had executed three separate nose job operations on Michael.

Later Hoefflin assured the press that his patient was doing fine and, except for some pain, was in no danger at all.

Under Hoefflin's skilled hands, Michael would later undergo laser surgery to burn off the scar tissue and presumably to allow his hair to grow back.

During his first night in the hospital, doctors tried to give him painkillers, but he fought them off, claiming, "I'm opposed to drugs of any type." But as the night lengthened, and his pain from the head burns grew more intense, he called one of the doctors back to administer those painkillers. Regrettably, Michael's decision to take the painkillers led to his becoming hooked on what Jacqueline Susann called "dolls" in her best-selling novel, Valley of the Dolls.

As Michael's most loyal fans maintained an all-night vigil outside his hospital, thousands of calls came in from around the world. Liza Minnelli, Diana Ross. Even Jackie Onassis, soon to be his editor, called to wish him well.

A special delivery arrived from President Ronald Reagan, dated February 1, 1984. "1 was pleased to learn that you were not seriously hurt in your recent accident. I know from experience that these things can happen on the set-no matter how much caution is exercised."

Following the accident, Michael threatened "to destroy Pepsi-Cola." A colleague told attorney John Branca, "If you play this right, your client will end up owning Pepsi."

When Michael first watched the tape of his hair catching on fire, he claimed, "They wanted to turn me into a human torch. I could have been disfigured for life, my career ruined. Pepsi will pay for this! When my fans watch this video, they'll never drink another bottle of Pepsi again!"

"But Michael you can't release that video of you on fire," Branca protested. "It's grotesque. Your fans would be horrified."

"I want revenge!" Michael shouted at his lawyer.

In the days ahead, Branca prevailed upon Michael to drop his plans to release the video with "the halo of fire." The version that was eventually released to the Associated Press was a short version that was greatly blurred.

Fearing Michael might sue, lawyers at Pepsi worked overtime to investigate the accident, They concluded that Michael might have caused the accident himself by dressing his hair with a very flammable oil. This line of reasoning, more than anything else, enraged Michael, who swore he wore only natural products on his hair.

Michael threatened Pepsi with a lawsuit. When executives offered to set tle for half a million dollars, Michael sent word, "I don't come that cheap."

After many negotiations, Pepsi finally agreed to give Michael $1.5 million in damages. That money came in addition to the most expensive celebrity contract in the history of advertising. For making the two commercials, Michael got $5 million. The commercials were so successful that they sent shock waves through Coca-Cola, the market leader. Privately, an official at Coca-Cola conceded that, "It was because of Michael Jackson that we agreed to come up with a new formula after nearly a century of towering success."

Less than ten days after Michael's release from the Burn Center, as a means of celebrating the ever-growing success of the album Thriller, CBS sent out invitations printed on white gloves to a $300,000 bash at the Museum of Natural History in New York The coveted ticket didn't quite equal the prestige of Truman Capote's black-and-white ball at the Plaza Hotel, but for tout New York, the party was the talk of the town.

More than 1,600 guests arrived, the men looking smart in designer tuxedos and the women in the latest couture. Michael showed up, most of his face concealed under a midnight black fedora, wearing a pair of jeans that contrasted with a commodore jacket that had more braid than that of the former dictator of the Dominican Republic, Rafael Trujillo.

Michael made a dazzling entrance, his recent burns concealed by a wigmaker's toupee which had cost $5,000 and was made with human hair that matched Michael's own.

Walter Yetnikoff had begged Michael to sing for the occasion, but he arrogantly refused. Instead of a song, Yetnikoff read a congratulatory telegram signed by both President Reagan and his wife Nancy. Michael did stand up to accept the latest edition of the Guinness Book of World Records, listing him as the hottest selling solo artist in the history of music.

Once again, Michael's "date" was Brooke Shields, all six feet one inch of her.

The black-and-white duo met, among dozens of other luminaries, Donald and Ivana Trump. "For more than five minutes, The Donald and Jacko stood talking to each other," said Barry Evanston, who'd attended the party as a security guard. "I think each of them was trying to figure out how they could use the other one-in other words, The Donald was wondering how much money he might one day make off Jacko, and The Gloved One was trying to figure out how he could get The Donald to part with some of his dough. It was a friendship made in a Heaven where The Jacko/Donald yellow brick road was paved with gold bars."

Michael found Trump, one of the world's richest men, debonair, extravagant, and cocky. The billionaire real estate developer was also smart, funny, and lived an extravagant lifestyle. Before Michael and Trump parted for the evening, he made a statement that startled Michael: "Let's face it, you and I are media fodder. You know, it really doesn't matter what the press writes about you as long as you've got a young and beautiful piece of ass."

At the party, Michael approached Calvin Klein, whom he'd known from his Studio 54 days, accompanied by Klein's favorite model, Brooke. "Calvin," Michael said, "I've got on a pair of your jeans. Unlike Brooke here, there is something that comes between me and my Calvins."

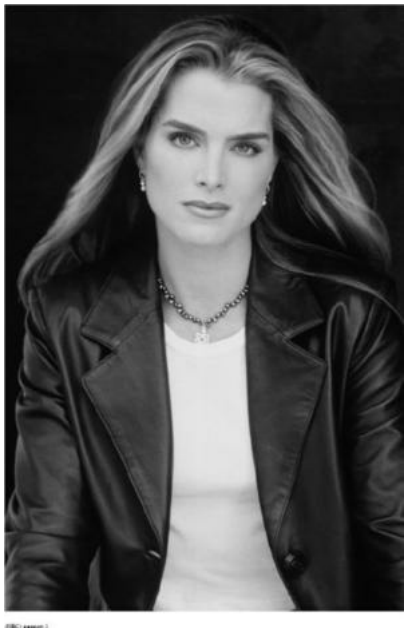
Brooke appeared delighted that she didn't have to share the evening with Emmanuel Lewis, who had stayed in Hollywood to film a segment of the TV sitcom, Webster.

As the evening progressed, she moved, with Michael to a private party, accessible only to the most important of the VIPs at the event, being held in Michael's honor within an inner sanctum of the museum.

There, her hopes were dashed when Brooke encountered Michael's other "date" for the night. Looking adorable in a custom-made tuxedo, an eightyear-old Sean Lennon rushed toward Michael for a big hug. Brooke looked around but found no Yoko Ono. Instead, young Sean was being protected by a bodyguard who looked like one of Al Capone's henchmen. Lewis would, in time, fade into history as the son of the slain John Lennon evolved into the role of Michael's new special friend.

"It's all too obvious," Brooke reportedly told Ivana Trump. "Michael prefers the company of young boys to me."

Ivana looked the statuesque Brooke up and down and suggested that, "You should get a real man, honey. I know at least eighteen at this party that would give their right nut to date you."



Bombshell Brooke, circa 1998

"Thanks, but no thanks," Brooke said.

Since the assassination of John Lennon on December 8, 1980 at 10:50pm in New York City, Michael had privately expressed a secret wish. "Some day I hope to become the second father to Sean."

In the months ahead, Michael's wish would come true.

A friendship would also emerge between Trump and Michael after that gala night. Associates of the highly articulate Trump often wondered what the two friends talked about, as they seemed to have so little in common. But Trump often bragged about his close friendship with Michael, although intimates in both camps wondered if that were really true.

As the 80s rolled on, Michael and Trump called each other occasionally. Despite the fact that Trump was one of the richest and most publicized men on the planet, Michael felt no embarrassment about breaking appointments with him at the last minute. "Just call Donald and tell him I have a headache," Michael would order a staff member on more than one occasion.

"If Michael could stand up Jackie Onassis, why not Trump?" David Gessler, who once worked for Trump, said. At first, Trump would respond with fury, but always seemed to forgive Michael for his rudeness.

In 1990 Trump showed the world that he could get Michael to fly into Atlantic City to open his new Taj Mahal Casino.

The paparazzi delighted in the photo ops at this lavish event. Michael showed up with a "special friend" who was quickly hustled upstairs out of camera view. After posing for pictures, Michael retreated to the lavish $12,000-a-night Alexander the Great penthouse suite on the 50th floor. Of course, the most expensive suite in Atlantic City came compliments of Trump himself. He knew what a small price that was to pay for the publicity Michael's appearance would generate for him.

Throughout their long relationship, Trump was always protective of Michael, even granting him "a secure address," protected from the press and paparazzi, when he housed him at New York's Plaza Hotel during the child molestation scandal of 1993.

And when Michael went on trial in 2005 on child molestation charges, Trump defended him during an interview with Larry King. "He's lived in Trump Tower, and I know him very well. And I knew what was happening with Michael Jackson. You know what was happening? Absolutely nothing. I had many people that worked for me in the building, and believe me, they would tell me if anything was wrong. I'm going to stick up for him, because nobody else is. I don't believe the molestation charges filed against Michael."

As late as the summer of 2005, when news about Michael's scandals had spread around the world, Trump realized that he'd be a sell-out in Las Vegas. He offered Michael a long-term contract for a series of ongoing performances, and the establishment of a personal headquarters for him in Las Vegas, evocative of deals made by Wayne Newton and Celine Dion.

Trump's Las Vegas partners, Phil Ruffin and Jack Wishna, courted Michael aggressively, offering terms for performances at the New Frontier Hotel and Casino. Wishna warned that if Michael signed on with them, "There will be moral clauses in the contract." He predicted that Michael would draw more than the $80 million Dion grossed in 2004.

On his next trip to New York after the CBS party, Michael checked into the Helmsley Palace. He paid $2,000 a night for a triplex which only CEOs, oil sheiks, and A-list movie starts rented. Efforts were made not to alert the press that he was in New York.

Hoping not to be recognized on the street, he adopted various disguises. At a Kool and the Gang concert at Radio City Music Hall, he was spotted wearing a beard and a bushy Afro. His date was Tatum O'Neal, which came as a surprise to his fans, since earlier, he had dropped her.

During that trip, a staff writer for The New York Daily News spotted Michael shopping on Fifth Avenue dressed as a woman. Outfitted in a chic woman's pants suit, he wore false eyelashes, heavy coatings of pancake makeup, scarlet red lipstick, and mascara.

Soon after, Michael arrived in a chauffered stretch limo at a Manhattan recording studio. There, he offered Mick Jagger a limp handshake before their rehearsal for a duet, "State of Shock," which had been selected as the first single within the Victory album.

When the idea of their duet had first been proposed to him, Jagger-envious of Michael's success-had refused the offer of recording with him. "You've got your family-you don't need me. Ask Jermaine to record with you." But eventually, Jagger succumbed to Michael's whiny pleas and agreed to make the record at the A & R Studio.

"State of Shock" would go on to become a hit, the only really successful song from the lackluster Victory album. But neither artist left the studio that day with anything good to say about the other.

"Froth on the beer," Jagger told his friends. "The kid's a lightweight, as limp as his handshake and as boring as a pussy that's already been worked over ten times."

Two days later, when Michael heard the recording, he flew into a rage, claiming that "it's so bad it's unreleasable. I'm good. Mick's awful. He can't sing. I don't get it. How could someone with absolutely no talent become a star? Look at his record sales and compare them with mine." Actually, upon its release, "State of Shock" boosted Jagger's career, propelling him farther along on his road to independence from his fellow stoned Stones.

Partly because of Michael's phenomenal success, Jagger became obsessed with him, grasping every detail he could learn both about his private life and his financial deals. Mainly, he wanted to know how many records he sold. Arthur Collins, an executive at Atlantic Records, remembered Jagger storming into his office, demanding to know, for example, how many records Michael had sold in France.

Meanwhile, from her digs at Princeton University, where she was enrolled as a student, Brooke was bubbling with enraged jealousy. Michael had not called her, and it was only through the tabloids that she learned that Michael was in New York. Even worse, instead of selecting her as his date for the Kool and the Gang Concert, he had invited Tatum instead.

As it turned out, Brooke and The Donald weren't the only celebrities who wanted to pose for photographs with Michael. About this time, an invitation arrived from the Reagans, summoning Michael to the White House.

Brooke had a motive for calling Michael. She wanted to be his "date" for his meeting with the Reagans. When Brooke finally got through to him, and learned about his invitation to the White House, she proposed that she accompany him to Washington.

Michael adamantly refused, putting down the phone.

The story behind the story about why Michael had been invited to meet the Reagans was revealed years later.

The invitation to the White House had not originated from the Reagans, but had come about through Elizabeth Dole, the homophobic Secretary of Transportation and the wife of failed presidential candidate Robert Dole, who ran a lackluster campaign against Bill Clinton in 1996 before becoming a spokesman for Viagra.

Dole had called Michael's attorney, John Branca, asking permission to use "Beat It" as background music for a thirty-second TV commercial aimed against drunk driving. When Branca informed Michael of this, he flatly refused. But upon reconsideration, he granted permission, "But only if I'm invited to the White House to receive an award."

When Branca conveyed Michael's request to Dole, she said that she thought the award ceremony could be arranged.

To White House advisors, Dole suggested that Michael receive some kind of humanitarian award, as a means of thanking him for his role in showing young people how successful a life could be if it was "free from alcohol and drug abuse." Later revelations about Michael's own drug and alcohol abuse would make a mockery of this award.

At least one official at the Reagan White House bitterly opposed the idea of an award for Michael. That official would later become one of the most powerful men in America.

In 2005, long after Michael's presidential citation, researchers found several memos from a Reagan White House lawyer, John Roberts. Yes, the John Roberts who now presides over the U.S. Supreme Court. In his memo, he protested the idea of granting an award to Michael, stating that it would be demeaning to the President. "If one wants the youth of America and the world sashaying around in garish sequined costumes, hair dripping with pomade, body shot full of female hormones to prevent voice change, mono-gloved, well, then I suppose 'Michael'-as he is affectionately known in the trade is in fact a good example. Quite apart from the problem of appearing to endorse Jackson's androgynous lifestyle, a Presidential award would be perceived as a shallow effort by the President to share in the constant publicity surrounding Jackson."

Dole managed to short-circuit objections from Roberts by appealing directly to the more star-struck Nancy, who approved the granting of a citation for Michael. She believed that his appearance would benefit her "Just Say No to Drugs" campaign. Consequently, the path was officially cleared for Michael's arrival in Washington for the presentation, which was scheduled for May 14, 1984.

In preparation for his upcoming visit to Washington, Michael ordered several dozen military-style costumes, and spent many hours in his hotel suite trying them on, rejecting one after another.

In grand style, like a visiting head of state, Michael arrived at the White House in the first of three black limos. The other two contained members of his entourage.

Holding Nancy's hand, Ronald Reagan stepped onto a stage on the South Lawn of the White House to greet Michael. "Well, isn't this a `Thriller.' Welcome to our eight-star hotel," President Reagan said. Reagan often called 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue by that name because of the White House's army of butlers, maids, and cooks. Shaking Michael's hand, the ungloved one, he said, "Nancy and I haven't seen this many people since we left China." He was referring to the hundreds of Michael's fans amassed at the gates to the White House. "Just think, you all came to see me! No, I know why you're here-to see one of the most talented, most popular, and most exciting superstars in the music world today."

Nancy stood a few feet from Michael and the President. "Doesn't he know to remove his sunglasses?" she asked in a loud whisper to two guards standing nearby. "You don't greet the President of the United States wearing sunglasses." A sudden thought occurred to her. "I bet he's had an eyelift."

Ronald, the King of Pop, and the former Nancy Davis

Reagan read from prepared remarks actually written by Norman Winter, Michael's publicist. "At this stage of his career, when it would seem he's achieved everything a musical performer could hope for, Michael Jackson is taking the time to help lead the fight against alcohol and drug abuse." At the end of his brief speech, Reagan presented Michael with a hastily made plaque awarded for "your humanitarian efforts."

Michael thanked the President and told him how honored he was. Suddenly, he realized he'd ignored Nancy. In a whisper, he added, "Oh, and Mrs. Reagan too." Nancy beamed.

After accepting the award, Michael raised his white gloved hand to the fans outside the gates. The glove had been designed by Bill Whitten. It had taken 45 hours to sew on 1,500 round Viennese crystal rhinestones. The fans responded by screaming WE WANT MICHAEL.

After waving to the crowd, the President and Mrs. Reagan escorted Michael through the Rose Garden to the Oval Office. Reagan had to excuse himself to answer an urgent call in another room. Michael and Nancy sat together for a brief chat, even though there were several other people in the office, including members of Michael's entourage. Secretaries and other members of the White House had virtually deserted their posts that day to get a look at Michael. Phones went unanswered.

Nancy offered Michael a chocolate chip cookie, which he refused. "They are Ronnie's favorite. I keep them in every room of the White House."

Holding Michael's hand, Nancy told him she admired his bugle-beaded Sergeant Pepper jacket, though she had far too much taste to truly like it. She'd later tell friends that Michael looked like some potentate from a banana republic. He wore a sequined gold sash with sequined gold epaulets, a vision in electric blue.

He returned the compliment, admiring her outfit, which was a white, perfectly tailored, and endlessly chic Adolfo-designed suit.

MJ with Nancy Reagan

"It's hard to know how to dress as First Lady," she confided. "If you dress like a lowpaid soldier's wife, you're Mamie Eisenhower. The press calls you dowdy. If you don't smile enough, like Pat Nixon and Rosalynn Carter, you're a steel magnolia. If you dress up a lot, you're an Imperial Queen Bee. Take a political stance and you're labeled a control freak bitch. Only this morning, a paper in Washington reminded me that I'm not Eleanor Roosevelt and pointed out that I don't have Jackie Kennedy's beauty-or her style. That's not all. The article said that all my movies were bad."

"I didn't know you made movies before coming to the White House," Michael said.

"My movies weren't as good as Ronnie's," she said.

"He made movies too?" Michael asked in astonishment. "You and the President were in movies? I'm amazed this has been kept secret."

"Neither of us were as big a star as Ronnie's first wife. Jane Wyman. Oscar winner."

"The President was married before? Is his wife dead?"

"She's very much alive from what I hear," Nancy said.

"I didn't know a divorced man could become the President of the United States."

"Ronnie did."

"I'm a Jehovah's Witness," he said. "We don't believe in divorce."

"You're against Christmas too," Nancy said, "or so I heard. But don't quote me. Ronnie and I don't want to offend any religious groups. We need all the support we can get."

"I hear your son is a ballet dancer," Michael said. "I admire that. You don't expect the son of Ronald Reagan to be a ballet dancer and take all the heat from the press."

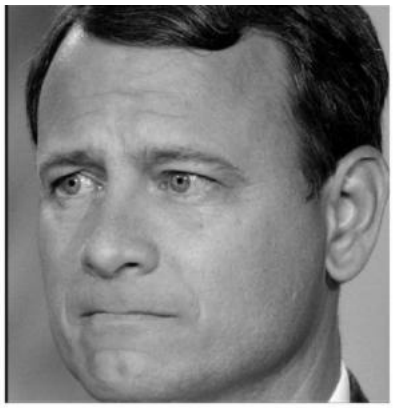
"We're proud of him," Nancy said. "You forget: We were performers too."

Michael and his entourage were escorted out of the room, and Nancy waited behind to join her husband.

Trailing Michael at the White House reception was a handsome young man, who appeared to be Michael's "date" for the event. "He looks very young," Nancy was heard to say. "A Billy Budd type. I was surprised that Michael didn't introduce us."

"He is Michael's personal assistant," Winter said.

"Oh, I know of such things," she said. "I should, after all those years in Hollywood. At any rate, the boy is certainly good looking, whoever he is."



Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, John Roberts

Arriving at the Diplomatic Reception Room, Michael was horrified to see about eighty adults assembled there to greet him. He turned and fled to the privacy of the bathroom off the White House Library where a future president, Bill Clinton, would conduct a dalliance or two.

Frank DiLeo, Michael's manager, ran after him, but the door had been locked.

"I won't come out until there are children here-not adults!" Michael threatened. "I was told I'd be greeted by children."

At this point, Nancy had heard about the commotion and was summoned. But Michael refused to open the bathroom door, even to the First Lady in her own house. Learning of his demands, she ordered the Secret Service to round up all the children he could find on short notice. "Even if you have to grab some toddlers waiting outside the gates."

The mysterious young man appeared and called out through the door to Michael. Michael opened the door just enough to let his special friend in before slamming it shut and bolting it again.

Within less than ten minutes, the men of the Secret Service had assembled nearly twenty children and had ushered all adults from the room.

When DiLeo told Michael that the children were waiting, he slowly emerged from the bathroom, followed by his young friend.

Along with Mr. and Mrs. Reagan, Michael greeted the children. Then, Nancy invited Michael into the Roosevelt Room to meet top White House aides and their families.

"Will there be children?" Michael asked Nancy.

"Yes, some."

At the end of the session, Michael was escorted to a waiting limousine. Nancy turned to two of her guards. In front of witnesses, she asked, "Is it true? Did he undergo a sex change? I think he did. And that mysterious young man. What about him?"

No one ventured an answer.

"I hope the kid is legal," she said, before heading to her bedroom to change. "We don't want any scandals coming from this White House."

As she was leaving, she turned to address her staff one more time. "The Duchess of Windsor once said that no one can be too thin. I'm pretty thin. But that Jackson boy, he must weigh only ninety-five pounds. That's not only dangerous, but makes one look cadaverous."

She was almost right. Michael's weight had dropped to 102 pounds, which his doctors defined as anorexic. On some days, it was reported that Michael existed on only one carrot and a dozen snow peas.

The following day, the Kremlin, reacting to Michael's visit to the White House, banned all of his music, especially the album Thriller, from the Soviet Union. Michael was attacked as "a singer who sold his black soul for white profit." In a statement, Soviet authorities claimed that Michael was serving the Reagan administration by diverting the American public's mind away from its real problems.

After the glories of Washington, back in Encino trouble was brewing within America's so-called "most perfect African-American family." Since 1978, Papa Joe had co-managed the Jackson brothers, assisted by the management team of Ron Weisner and Fred DeMann.

But as the months dragged on, the business relationship inevitably soured, Joe accusing the managers of "stealing from my boys." He made the accusation but offered no proof. Of course, those reckless charges were vehemently denied by Weisner and DeMann.

Michael's other brothers had always believed, with a definite resentment, that their managers were devoting most of their time to Michael. So when Michael became upset with DeMann and Weisner and fired them, his other brothers dismissed the management team as well. At this point, Michael more or less had already turned over management of his career to Frank DiLeo and John Branca.

Before agreeing on new managers, Michael had even had a secret meeting with the flamboyant Colonel Tom

Parker, the money collector for Elvis Presley. The meeting ended badly after Parker looked Jackson up and down and appeared skeptical about the star's appearance, voice, and manner. Parker later told some of his cronies, "I don't manage faggot nigger boys."

Michael's heroine, Diana Ross, also pushed to manage his career, hoping to sign him with her own newly formed company, R.T.C. Management. Privately, Michael was horrified at the suggestion, feeling that she hadn't been that brilliant at managing her own career. Too cowardly to turn her down, he went for weeks refusing her phone calls until she finally gave up.

Joe went public with his charges, crying "leeches" to the press and accusing DeMann and Weisner of "trying to break up the brothers." In a startling statement, he claimed, "There was a time when I felt I needed white help in dealing with the brass at CBS."

DeMann claimed that Joe did not enjoy "a good relationship with anyone whose skin is not black."

Joe countered that he was not a racist. "I wouldn't have hired a lot of people that aren't black to work for me if I was a racist."

Michael was horrified that Joe was raising the race card. He issued a statement claiming, "To hear him talk like that turns my stomach. I don't know where he gets that from. I happen to be color blind. I don't hire color. I hire competence. The individual can be of any race or creed as long as I get the best performance. Racism is not my motto."

During their press war with their white management team, the other brothers met in private and decided not to renew their managerial contract with Papa Joe as well.

Given the boot by his sons, Joe forged ahead anyway, hoping to interest all his sons, including Michael, in "starring in the largest grossing tour of all time." Knowing that Michael would be a key to the success of the tour, Joe wisely asked Katherine to be co-promoter with him. "If anybody can persuade Michael to tour with his brothers, it's Katherine," Joe was quoted as saying.

Even though he'd been fired, Joe told the press, "I was there when it started, and I'll be there when it ends." To prove to the world that he was still in charge of his boys, and to make some much-needed money, he recovered quickly from his disappointment about being booted, and concocted the idea of another nationwide tour for his sons, including the hard-to-pin-down Michael.

As Joe could have predicted, Michael was the lone holdout, the other brothers agreeing to go on the road again with their parents as managers. Eventually, however, thanks partly to Katherine's careful persuasion, Michael finally agreed to join his brothers on the road.

The tour would be sponsored by Pepsi Cola. In return, the Jacksons had agreed to film two commercials, which eventually led to the disastrous hairburning incident and the feud that resulted between Michael and the soft-drink company. But in spite of that, Pepsi was contractually obligated to sponsor the "Victory Tour."

Joe startled his entire family, especially Michael, when he announced that he was negotiating with Don King to manage the tour.

The flamboyant, Don King, who often wore a white fur coat, diamond rings, and a gold necklace, looked like the biggest pimp in Harlem. The silver-tongued promoter was ridiculed for his hair sticks that stood straight up, looking as if he'd been electrocuted. But he was even more famous for his spectacular boxing promotions, including Muhammad Ali's "Thrilla in Manila" and the Sugar Ray Leonard-Robert Duran fight that seemingly half the world watched.

Michael was fully aware of King's racy background. The promoter got his start in the illegal numbers business in Cleveland. In December of 1954, he shot and killed one of three men trying to rob one of his gambling houses. He didn't go to jail, as prosecutors determined that the death was a "justifiable homicide."

Trouble, also in Cleveland, came again for King. He beat a man to death twelve years later. He told police the victim owed him money. King was convicted of second-degree murder, but the trial judge reduced the conviction to manslaughter. King served only 3'/z years of the sentence before he received a pardon from James Rhodes, the governor of Ohio at the time.

On November 30, 1983, King called a press conference in New York at Tavern on the Green, the highlight of which was a 15-minute documentary congratulating himself for his achievements. A Washington reporter, Cody Shearer, labeled the event "media history's most abominable press conference."

Michael arrived cuddling Emmanuel Lewis in his arms, to the shock of some members of the press. "What's going on here?" one of them asked in a whisper so loud it could be heard throughout the room. "Something queer this way comes." He was told to shut up.

Even though King referred to Michael as "the golden voice of song," Golden Throat refused to take questions, after introducing his mother and his sisters. After that, he sat glaring at King, not even disguising his hostility.

King did most of the talking, as the brothers followed Michael's example and concealed part of their faces behind sunglasses. The Victory album was announced for release on July 2, 1984. Despite its inaugural hype, many fans were disappointed. The brothers performed songs individually and didn't follow their already proven success of having Michael or even Jermaine sing the lead vocals. Amazingly, the "Victory" tour would not include one single song from the album of the same name. For the tour, the errant brother, Jermaine, rejoined the brood. The tour could have been billed as the "Jackson Six."

Jermaine had sought his release from Motown after his career as a solo artist had gone bust. "Being the son-in-law of Motown's president was not a long-range missile launch for Jermaine," Marvin Gaye said. "Berry Gordy Jr. was glad to see Jermaine go."

Later, in his New York hotel suite, Michael watched the videotape of the press conference, and he was disgusted. Summoning his brothers to his suite, he announced, "I'm the biggest star in the world! There's no way I'm gonna be an opening act for this sleazeball," referring to King of course. "What a creep!"

After the press conference, Michael became increasingly furious at King, issuing instructions to Branca to define, as noted below, the terms of their dealings with King:

A. King may not communicate with anyone on Michael's behalf without prior permission.

B. All monies will be collected by Michael's representatives and not by King.

C. King may not approach any promoters, sponsors, or other people on Michael's behalf.

D. King may not hire any personnel or local promoters, book halls, or, for that matter, do anything at all without Michael's prior approval.

Later King was fired as the tour promoter and replaced by Chuck Sullivan, who caused more problems. Because of the terms within his contract, King stayed with the tour but in a figurehead capacity.

In an interview with Playboy in 1988, King discussed his frustrations promoting the "Victory" tour. "The suits went after me," he claimed. "They did their usual thing. They told Michael, `You know, a black guy can't do this. And King is a racketeer. Michael, your image is at stake here.' His image? What Michael's got to understand is that Michael's a nigger! It don't matter how great he can sing and dance; I don't care that he can prance; he's one of the greatest mega-stars in the world, but he's still going to be a nigger megastar."

King found it "ludicrous" how Papa Joe was pushed aside, not only by Michael but by all his sons. "There is no way Michael Jackson should be as big as he is and treat his family the way that he does. No way! Nothing can justify that. He feels that his father did him wrong. There can't be so much wrong his father did him-Michael, after all, is the biggest star there ever was in the music business. His father may have done some wrong, but he also had to do a whole lot of right. Whatever it was, Michael could reprimand, chastise, teach-'If you did it wrong, Dad, don't do it wrong no more.'"

King concluded his interview by claiming that, "I see that Michael has nobody black around him-nobody. So therefore, he is, in effect, a pseudowhite."

When Chuck Sullivan, owner of the New England Patriots of the National Football League, signed on as a promoter, he had harsh demands for Michael's fans. Each fan would have to order a total of four tickets and would have to send in a mail order for $120. There would be no guarantee of a specific date, a certain seat, or even a ticket itself.

This caused an outcry. Even though these high ticket prices had not been Michael's idea, he was the one accused of "greed."

"We thought you were kind and loving to your fans," wrote Betty Lou Garghrin of Long Island. "But I think you're just a bloodsucker." Michael was stunned, even deeply hurt by such criticism, blaming Sullivan for such bad press and disastrous public relationships.

Sullivan and King were an ill-fated duo at the negotiating table. The bombastic boxing promoter labeled Chuck Sullivan "Charlie the Tuna." Sullivan lost $20 million as promoter of the tour, and "Victory" was not a victory for him. His company, Stadium Management Co., was forced into bankruptcy, and the Sullivans eventually had to sell the New England Patriots.

Even though Michael "fought against it," and in spite of his reservations, he threw himself into rehearsals and the actual stage appearances, "giving each performance everything I could." Before setting out, Michael demanded yet a third rhinoplasty from Dr. Hoefflin. "The first two didn't really do the job-the nose must be even thinner," were his instructions.

The "Victory" tour by the Jackson brothers was one of the pivotal events of 1984, a year that saw Vanessa Williams resign as Miss America, the death of jazz great Count Basic, and the birth of The Cosby Show on NBC.

Between July and December of 1984, The Jacksons bombarded America, with more drama transpiring off stage than on. Fans suspected that it would be the last time Michael would ever tour with his brothers. When the tour ended in Los Angeles, Michael proved them right by proclaiming, "This is our final farewell tour as a family." In fact, he had wanted to call it "The Farewell Tour," but he'd been voted down by his brothers.

The "Victory" tour opened in the heart of America: Kansas City. Despite bouts of depression, Michael found amusements wherever he could. He laughed hysterically when a fully clothed Frank DiLeo lost his balance and fell into a hotel's swimming pool in Kansas. In Washington, DC, Michael grabbed a handful of money from DiLeo's pockets and tossed the hundred-orso bills to screaming fans below, causing a riot. It was well known that DiLeo usually carried a wad of cash to handle "MJ emergencies," as he put it.

Michael chased DiLeo around a hotel suite with his boa constrictor, Muscles. Terrified of snakes, DiLeo pulled a gun and threatened to shoot the monster, even though the reptile was harmless. When boredom set in, Michael reverted to the old tricks of his childhood. He would take a bucket of water and run out to the edge of the atrium, tossing the liquid down onto people dining below, especially at Hyatt hotels.

Tensions between the brothers were rampant. Michael always got the best accommodations and the best transportation. And whereas the brothers flew commercial airlines, Michael traveled by private jet, including in one instance, a luxurious craft belonging to Meshulam Riklis, the zillionaire husband of Pia Zadora.

The darkest point of the tour came in August, 1984, when the Knoxville News-Sentinel published anonymous letters threatening to kill Michael and assassinate many of his fans. Three concerts had been scheduled in that Tennessee city, but because of those letters, they were abruptly canceled. Hours later, the telecast of the Olympics was interrupted to announce that the "tour was back on again." Under tightened security, the concerts were presented without incident. Michael was delivered to Neyland Stadium in an armored Wells Fargo truck.

Rumors that Michael was gay rose to a crescendo during the "Victory" tour. There was even wide speculation that Michael had been castrated to maintain his falsetto voice. In a new CBS comedy album, Eddie Murphy had a line, claiming-and accurately so-that Michael was "not the most masculine guy in the world."

Joan Rivers was at the peak of her fame in 1984, when she often hosted the Johnny Carson show. Her two favorite subjects of ridicule were an overweight Elizabeth Taylor and Michael's sex life. "Is Michael Jackson gay?" she'd ask her audiences. "Please, he's as queer as a three-dollar bill." One night she claimed, "Michael Jackson is gay. He makes Liberace look like a Green Beret." Her audiences burst into hysterical laughter.

Entering the fray was Louis Farrakhan, "National Representative of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad and The Nation of Islam," who did not find anything amusing about Michael. He urged his devoted followers "not to practice Michael Jackson's sissified ways." Many of Farrakhan's disciples felt that Michael was transgendered and was deliberately blurring the dividing line between male and female.

One black writer claimed: "The white man has always feared the black man's superior sexual power. As we know, black men are superior to white men in both the bedroom and in the boardroom. Along comes Michael Jackson portraying the black man as a faggot! He has set back AfricanAmerican advancement twenty years. He is trying to take our power from us. Slave owners in the 19th century used to castrate their unruly black male slaves. By castrating himself and singing in falsetto, Jackson is playing into whitie's game plan for us: To rob us of our manhood and remove the black sexual threat."

Of course, charges that Michael Jackson had been castrated are ridiculous, as photographs taken by Santa Barbara police authorities-today resting in a bank vault-can prove.

The outspoken Joan Rivers continued her attack. One night she asked her audience, "Ever wonder what happened to Michael Jackson's other glove? It's in Boy George's pocket!"

Rivers was reacting to a story that had run in a late summer edition of the National Enquirer. In bold headlines, Michael and Boy George, the selfadmitted "queen" and lead singer of Culture Club, were alleged to be immersed in a hot affair. In less bold headlines, Michael was also rumored to be having simultaneous affairs with Wham's George Michael and Queen's Freddie Mercury. It appears, however, that he was having affairs with none of those homosexual entertainers.

Michael was so upset by the headlines linking him with Boy George that he called his publicist, Norman Winter, and burst into tears. The publicist had seen stacks of mail pouring in from young men and girls from around the world.

A typical letter from an impressionable young girl read: "Michael, Michael, tell me it's not true. You and Boy George! How could you! That's disgusting! My great dream has been to grow up and marry you and have many beautiful children with you. Now the news about you and that horrible creature from Britain has destroyed my dream. I want to die!"

Another letter from a young gay man read: "Michael, I am so happy to learn you are gay. My greatest dream is to fuck you all night. My former lover said that I'm the best top he has ever had. I can go for hours. I know from the faggy way you move around the stage that you are a bottom. My goal in life is to become the dream-man of all bottoms and all size queens. I'm enclosing a nude picture of myself so you can see how impressive I am. It's all yours, baby. I'm ready and willing and able to send you to Paradise!"

In the middle of the "Victory" tour, and in a startling development in September of 1984, Michael, enraged and fed up with the gay rumors, called a press conference. But he didn't show up. However, his manager, macho, cigar-smoking Frank DiLeo did. He shocked reporters when he read from a two-page document.

For some time now, I have been searching my conscience as to whether or not I should publicly react to the many falsehoods that have been spread about me. I have decided to make this statement based on the injustice of these allegations and the far-reaching trauma those who feel close to me are suffering.

I feel very fortunate to have been blessed with recognition for my efforts. This recognition also brings with it a responsibility to ones admirers throughout the world. Performers should always serve as role models who set an example for young people. It saddens me that many may actually believe the present flurry of false accusations:

No! I've never taken hormones to maintain my high voice.

No! I've never had cosmetic surgery on my eyes.

Yes! One day in the future I plan to get married and have a family.

Any statements to the contrary are simply untrue.

I have advised my attorneys ofmy willingness to institute legal action and subsequently prosecute all guilty to the fullest extent of the law.

As noted earlier, I love children. We all know that kids are very impressionable and therefore susceptible to such stories. I'm certain that some have already been hurt by this terrible slander. In addition to their admiration, I would like to keep their respect.

While reacting to all these gay rumors, Michael also received some disturbing news from a couple of a more heterosexual nature.

His youngest sister, Janet, had eloped with James DeBarge. She was only eighteen at the time, her groom twenty-one. Michael was adamantly opposed to the marriage and told family and associates that "Janet betrayed me." He never explained just how her marriage had betrayed him.

When she was just sixteen, Janet had met DeBarge, and they'd become close friends. Tall, dark, and handsome, he seemed like an ideal candidate for marriage, except for the fact that each of the Jacksons knew some dark secrets about him. There had been reports of drug and alcohol abuse. Katharine insisted that "the boy is completely wrong for my Janet."

In a touch of irony, the singing DeBarge brothers had been groomed by Motown during the early 80s as heirs to the departed Jackson 5. Originally formed in 1978 and hailing from Grand Rapids, Michigan, the quintet was comprised of four brothers and one sister, "Bunny." Before he married into pop royalty in 1984, DeBarge had recorded such 1980s classics as "Who's Holding Donna Now?" and "All This Love."

In a terrible case of bad judgment, the newlyweds moved into the Jackson's Encino mansion. DeBarge would later call it "The House of Fear." Living with the Jacksons put a severe strain on the marriage, and DeBarge and Papa Joe often engaged in denunciations of each other that sometimes evolved into physical violence. At one point, or so it was rumored, Papa Joe threatened to kill his son-in-law.

When DeBarge was in residence at the Encino house, he reported that "Michael was a sad, lonely figure, wandering around looking for love, which he seems to find only in Bubbles."

Bubbles was not a stripper, as the name suggests, but Michael's pet chimp. As such, he became the most famous-and the most controversial-chimp in the world.

Michael might not have actually found love, but DeBarge reported that during his stay at Hayvenhurst he saw a number of boys coming in and out of Michael's bedroom. These boys, or so the Encino bodyguards reported, ranged in age from nine to fourteen. Michael's excuse to DeBarge was that he was auditioning the boys for future videos. Many of DeBarge's charges were later dismissed as "nonsense" or "fantasies" by loyal members of Michael's camp.

Nonsense or not, DeBarge, along with bodyguards at Neverland, were called to testify against Michael in 1993 when young Jordie Chandler brought charges of child molestation against his former friend.

Joan Rivers

In anticipation of his trial, when Michael heard that DeBarge was going to testify against him, he was furious. Michael recalled going into the newlyweds' bedroom late one night and slipping under the covers with Janet and DeBarge to discuss deep, personal secrets. He viewed DeBarge going public with those secrets as "a betrayal."

As Michael had predicted, his sister's marriage was doomed from the start. There were rumors that they'd had a child together, but this was never confirmed, and there was also much speculation about an abortion.

On January 7, 1985, after a tumultuous marriage, Janet's link to DeBarge was annulled. Over the years she has said little, at least publicly, about her brief, unsuccessful marriage. "You don't have to hold onto the pain to hold onto the memory."

On those nights alone with Janet and DeBarge, Michael would sometimes discuss how painful it was to have the tabloids publish their accusations of homosexuality.

"Michael Jackson made charges of being gay sound like a case of leprosy," said gay activist Kevin Macmillan. "He alienated the entire gay community the way that Tom Cruise would do in years to come. The signal that both Cruise and Jackson gave out was that to be gay was the most scandalous and horrible thing that could happen to a guy. Thanks a lot, fellows."

In contrast to Michael's petulant response to gay charges, his sister, Janet, would handle future gay rumors about herself with far more style and sophistication. Unlike Michael, Janet was far more savvy, knowing how to retain, and not alienate, large segments of her fans.

In 2001, she was asked by a reporter from Ehony, "There have been questions about your sexuality. Some have asked if you're gay or bisexual."

"I don't mind people thinking that I'm gay or calling me gay," she said candidly. "People are going to believe whatever they want. Yes, I hang out at gay clubs, but other clubs too. I go where the music is good. I love people regardless of sexual preference, regardless of race. No, I am not bisexual. I have been linked to dancers in our group because we grow close. I grew up in a big family. I love being affectionate. I love intimacy and I am not afraid to show it. We fall asleep in each other's arms. We hug, we kiss, but there is nothing beyond that. Because Rene and I broke up, it's like people need some sort of drama, some sort of gossip."

She was referring to her long-time Mexican companion, Rene Elizondo. It has been whispered that Rene was really her husband. Reporter Joal Ryan once claimed that Rebbie, Janet's older sister, said that Janet and Rene had "eloped years ago."

Rene often worked with Janet, co-writing songs for her 1997 release The Velvet Rope.

Rebbie's remarks, broadcast over an Atlanta radio station, exploded into a national issue. But a spokesperson issued a quick denial. Janet claimed, "We're not married, only in spirit."

Janet achieved notoriety when the 1993 cover of Rolling Stone came out. Rene is standing behind her covering her bare breasts with his hands. In 1997 she made another startling quote, this time to Ebony. "It was Rene's idea that I get my nipple pierced. I gave him a choice of two areas, and he chose the nipple."

During their thirteen-year relationship, some reporters referred to the duo as "Yin and Yang."

Boy George

After what could hardly be called a restful interlude at Encino, it was time for Michael to hit the road again with the continuation of the ill-fated "Victory" tour.

In Philadelphia, Michael met Bruce Springsteen, who had come to see "what in hell is this Jacko shit all about?" Michael was awkward and tongue-tied around the American rock and folk singer, who was competing in world markets with rival tours and albums. Springsteen's Born in the U.S.A. was a big hit, selling 15 million copies in America alone. The album became one of the best-selling in music history, with seven singles hitting the top ten.

Springsteen asked Michael about the recent grosses on Thriller.

"I never learned to count that high in school," Michael said. "All I know is that you, me, and Prince have gone to Pop Heaven."

Springsteen and Jackson would meet again in 1985 to record "We Are the World," but the two artists seemed to have little interest in each other.

Sensing an arrogance in Michael that was off-putting, Springsteen gave him some advice which he'd repeat often to other stars. "I believe that the career of an artist can last as long as you look down into your audience and can see yourself, and your audience looks up at you and can see themselves, and as long as those reflections are human, realistic ones." He turned and parted, leaving Michael somewhat bewildered at the words he'd just heard.

Watching Springsteen go on his way, Michael became petulant, even bitchy. "I don't know why they call him The Boss. Personally, I think he's much overrated. He can't dance, and he can't really sing. Off key at best. I'm bigger than The Beatles ever were. Not only that, but I'm much bigger than Elvis Presley. If they called Elvis the King, what about me?"

The stage manager raised an eyebrow and said: "The Queen, perhaps."

The next day he was fired.

The Jacksons' final show at Dodger Stadium in Los Angeles was not a sell-out. DiLeo had to give away hundreds of tickets. In his hotel suite, Michael was screaming in rage. On his final night of the "Victory" tour, right before he went on, he heard that a federal grand jury in New York had indicted Don King on twenty-three counts of income tax evasion. "Couldn't happen to a nicer guy," Michael said.

On stage that historic night of December 9, 1984, Michael stood in front of his brothers and shouted at the audience: "We love you all! It's been a long twenty years since my brothers and I have entertained you together. Love to all." In a gesture of brotherly love, Michael blew pretend kisses at his brothers on stage.

In his autobiography, Moonwalk, Michael unrealistically summed up his experiences on the "Victory" tour. "It was a nice feeling," he wrote, "playing with my brothers again. We were all together again." The actual gossip associated with the tour suggested at the time, however, that Michael wasn't even speaking to his brothers during the last weeks of the tour, and that Michael claimed privately that The Jacksons would have been washed up long ago without him.

Another segment of Moonwalk repeated a rehearsed, much-repeated response from Michael about the gay issue, a question which had repeatedly been raised during the "Victory" tour.

"I believe in relationships," Michael wrote. "One day I know I'll find the right woman and get married myself. I imagine myself with thirteen children."

When the "Victory" tour ended in Los Angeles, it had played to more than two million fans, grossing $50 million, breaking the $30 million record set by the Rolling Stones in 1981.

The success of the tour spilled over into the Victory album, which also sold more than two million copies.

Sean Lennon, son of the slain ex-Beatle, became Michael's new "best bud" in spite of the significant age difference. Sean had been only five years old when John Lennon was assassinated in New York, and the boy was only nine when he began to "hang out" with Michael.

In the wake of her husband's death, Yoko Ono, Sean's mother, ordered 24hour security guard protection for her offspring, fearing kidnapping or something much worse. Despite her concerns for her children, Yoko seemed willing to entrust her beloved son to Michael, allowing the older entertainer to spend hours or even days and nights at a stretch with Sean.

Many mothers who delivered their young sons to Michael over the years might have been overwhelmed with the magnitude of his stardom, might have been swayed by money, or else might simply have been naive. This was not the case with Yoko Ono, one of the most sophisticated women in the entertainment business. For most of her life she'd known and befriended homosexuals and was hip to what was going on. Obviously Michael didn't set off any alarm bells within her, or else she would hardly have sanctioned turning Sean over to his care and feeding.

For his part, Michael got to enjoy the company of a handsome and charming young boy. There must have been the added thrill of knowing that Sean was the son of the one Beatle that Michael most admired, considering John far more talented than his former friend, Paul McCartney. "As a musician, John's talent extended to his toenails," Michael told Yoko, who agreed, of course.

Although extremely protective of Sean's health and welfare, Yoko never tried to be a domineering, smothering mother. She prided herself on rearing her son without the normal restraints imposed on one so young. In other words, if Sean wanted to urinate in the back seat of a limousine, he was free to do so without fear of reprimand. Apparently, Yoko took the point of view that limousine covers could always be re-upholstered. Yoko had received death threats against her son, but she felt that because of Michael's heavy security at Neverland, she had nothing to worry about . . . except perhaps Michael himself.

To a journalist from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Yoko once said, "Every mother worries, but I want Sean to pursue what he wants to as long as it's good for him. I try to avoid a situation where mother and son stick to each other too much. He has many friends, he communicates with many people."

Suddenly, Sean and Michael were seen everywhere, popping up at Broadway shows-only musicals-and other events. The young boy often spent nights in hotel suites with Michael, even weeks at Neverland.

At Neverland, the staff would often hear Sean and Michael playing the song, "Beautiful Boy," which John Lennon had written for his son.

Sean once startled Michael by telling him that for many years he did not know about John's previous life as a Beatle, and he kept no memorabilia or records at The Dakota where they lived in New York. Sean claimed that he learned about his father's musical background when a babysitter showed him a copy of Yellow Submarine (1968).

Dark-haired and almond-eyed, Sean was amazingly bright, often making quotations unusual for one so young. In 1983, he said, "Peace is a good thing. So is smoked salmon."

Michael was obviously taken with the boy's Eurasian attractiveness and charm. He often spoke of Sean's "rosebud mouth." The youth did not resemble either Yoko or John Lennon, but had his own distinctive look and features.

The young boy told Michael of his "undying love" for his father. "I can't tell you how many times I walk into a store or mall and hear him singing," Sean said. "I get this really nice feeling, like he's still around. It's almost magical."

Once he showed Michael a photograph taken at his birthday party when he'd turned seven. On the picture, he'd superimposed a picture of John and then had superimposed two large tears on his father's cheeks. "He's crying because he couldn't be at the party too."

As Sean got to know Michael more intimately and to trust him, he admit ted that he didn't want to be "just a clone of my father," but an artist in his own right, capable of making his own distinct music. "The whole `son of John Lennon' thing was dumped on me, and I didn't ask for that. All my father's friends are waiting for me to fail in my dream, figuring I can spend the rest of my life living off the old man's money."

Sean told Michael that he (Michael) and John (his father) "had it easy when it comes to making music. To both of you, writing music and singing is second nature. To me, it's very hard to make music." He asked Michael if he'd teach him "the tricks of the business," and Michael agreed to, although he was far too self-absorbed in his own issues to really do that.

"One day my music will bring people up in the world," Sean said. "Just like your music does."

When Sean was thirteen, Michael cast him in his film, Moonwalker.

With Michael, Sean shared some of his deepest fears, mainly of being gunned down as John had been in 1980. One night Sean revealed something that he'd told only his closest friends. "I absolutely believe that my father was killed on orders from the CIA who was bossed around by Ronald Reagan. Revolutionaries like my dad are always historically killed by the American government all except Castro, and they sure tried hard to get him. The belief that Mark Chapman was some crazy guy who killed my dad for personal reasons is insane or naive."

Later, during the 1990s, as child molestation charges against Michael were aired, one New York journalist tried to reach Yoko for her reaction, knowing her own son had spent a lot of time in private with Michael. The reporter wanted to know if Michael had ever been a substitute father for Sean and did Yoko consider the singer a good role model. She had no comment.

In 1993, Sean's relationship made blaring tabloid headlines in Britain. James DeBarge, the former husband of Janet Jackson, made some explosive charges in a taped conversation with a police informant. During the time he'd been married to Janet, he'd slept in a bedroom next to Michael's. He claimed that he'd walked in on Michael and Sean, catching them "together in a sexual way."

Bruce Springsteen

"All the boys who visited at the Encino house slept in Michael's bed," DeBarge reportedly said. He admitted to doing some spying on Michael.

Or so it was reported in the press. DeBarge could not be reached to confirm or deny these reports.

As his young special friends matured, Michael most often lost interest, although with certain boys, such as Macaulay Culkin, a lasting friendship emerged.

The last known encounter between Michael and Sean occurred in 2001 during a reception at Tavern on the Green in New York City's Central Park. The invitation-only gala followed Michael's big 30th anniversary celebration at Madison Square Garden.

A reporter for the British tabloid, The Sun, was seated at a table next to Yoko and Sean. He noticed Michael enter the room and head immediately to greet Yoko and her son. Ignoring Yoko for the moment, he turned on Sean with an accusatory tone in his wispy voice. "You never return my calls," Michael charged. "I leave messages for you all the time, and you never call back."

In spite of what appeared to be a rebuff to Michael, Sean has always been respectful of him in the press. "If it wasn't for Michael Jackson, I probably wouldn't make music now," Sean once said. "Thriller changed my life completely."

In 1984 Michael stood at the zenith of his career. He was celebrated throughout the world, even in countries that many people had never heard of before. "He was not just the King of Pop, but King of the World," Quincy Jones said.

On a windy day in Los Angeles, when Michael came home again, there was a distinct chill in the air. He sensed something ominous, and he couldn't put his finger on it.

Wherever he went, whatever he did, the world was watching him and judging him. There seemed to be eyes everywhere, as if hidden cameras had been installed in every corner of Hayvenhurst. He once told Diana Ross that he had no dark secrets to hide, and therefore had no fear of the press.

But now, at the age of twenty-six, he had many secrets, none of which he wanted to share with the world, or even with intimate friends.

He could be himself only around children "because they have no masks," he told his mother Katherine. "Adults are filled with lies and deceit. Kids will tell you the truth. You can share your innermost secrets and desires with them."

What Michael didn't know then, but what he surely knows now, is that not all children are alike. It's true that some children will hide your secrets and never tell them to the world. Other kids will splash your innermost desires on the front pages of tabloids. At this early stage of his life, Michael hadn't learned to tell the difference between the two types of young boys he'd select for "special friendships."

Nor had he fully realized that adults have ways of prying secrets, some times with manipulative pressure, from the minds of children, revelations that could destroy certain people who engage in dark desires.

He knew that he was too famous to escape the voyeuristic attention of the world, so he decided that, unlike a child, he would wear a mask when he was out there-his reference to the world that existed outside the Encino compound. He would conceal his true nature and create a fake persona deliberately intended to deceive. "I want the world to see me not as I am, but as they want me to be," he once told Katharine Hepburn.

"Good luck," Hepburn told him. "I've been doing that for years and getting away with it. I don't really care what anybody writes about me, as long as it's not the truth."

Back at Encino, Michael was leaving the family compound with an unknown blond-haired boy of great beauty, a Tadzio, perhaps no more than twelve. He was going on a shopping expedition to buy the child as many toys as he wanted.

La Toya ran after him. She had an urgent message. "The First Lady of the World is on the phone, and she wants to speak to you," La Toya said.

"You mean, Nancy? I've already been there, accepted that award."

"More famous than Nancy," La Toya said.

"That could be only one person," Michael replied.

Racing back into the house, he nervously picked up the receiver. In a whispery voice, he said, "Hi, this is Michael."

On the other end of the phone, an even more famous whispery voice greeted him. "Michael, you dear. It's been far too long. As they say in the Garment District, have I got a deal for you. This is Jackie Onassis!"

"I think Michael appeals to the child in all of us. He has the quality of innocence that we would all like to obtain or have kept. I think he is one of the finest people to hit this planet, and, in my estimation, he is the true King of Pop, Rock and Soul. I love you Michael. "

--Elizabeth Taylor

"When I met him, it was really love at first sight. I think when you get to know Michael, you understand the nature of his charisma. He looks at the world with the innocent eyes of a child. "

--Sophia Loren

"Jackie twisted my arm to make me write Moon walk."

--Michael Jackson on Jackie Kennedy Onassis

"To many people Michael Jackson seems an elusive personality, but to those who work with him, he is not. This talented artist is a sensitive man, warm, funny, and full of insight. Michael's book, Moonwalk, provides a startling glimpse of the artist at work and the artist in reflection. "

--Jackie Kennedy Onassis

"I expected it to be difficult, and it was. Michael's a perfectionist. "

--Colin Chivers, director of the 'Smooth Criminal' video

"I ripped off a couple of solos, and he liked the first one. It was my choice too. He seemed to go on emotion rather than technique, which is how I've always worked. "

--Steve Stevens, guitarist for 'Dirty Diana'

Chapter Eight

In 1984, after the "Victory" tour, Michael returned to Encino's Hayvenhurst, which by then had become the best-known celebrity mansion west of Elvis's Graceland. From there, he would launch friendships with three of the most celebrated people of the 20th century: Jackie Onassis, Marlon Brando, and Elizabeth Taylor, while still hanging onto friendships with such media events as Katharine Hepburn, Liza Minnelli, and Jane Fonda, and such minor celebs as the much younger Sean Lennon.

When Michael accepted the call from Jacqueline Onassis, she was working for Doubleday in New York and was at the time the most celebrated editor in publishing. Her boss had given her a budget of $300,000 to offer Michael for his memoirs, although in his mid-twenties he was a bit young to be penning an autobiography. One editor at Doubleday told Jackie, "If Michael agrees to this, we should call his memoirs An Unfinished Life."

After exchanging pleasantries about their few previous meetings, Jackie got down to business and pitched the offer of a memoir.

"My life has only begun," he protested.

"There's such a great interest in you-millions of fans around the worldthat we at Doubleday wanted to hear your story as you saw your life. The early years. The struggles. The incredible success. What it's done to you."

"If memoirs are such a great idea, then why haven't you written one?" he asked provocatively.

"Doubleday has a standing offer with me of $5 million for my autobiography, but I possess too many secrets. A memoir from me couldn't be honest, and therefore I won't write one."

"I know you must have many secrets-not only your own but the intimate details of so many other famous lives. But what secrets do I have? I'm still a virgin. Never been kissed. At least not on the mouth."

"That's a unique story in itself," she said with a slight sense of mischief.

"Imagine a man living for a quarter of a century and still a virgin. You and my late husband, Jack, had a lot in common.

"Now you're pulling my leg," he said. "I'm told that when you let your hair down, you have a wicked sense of humor."

"If you only knew," she said. "One time at the White House, I was doing this really horrendous impersonation of Lady Bird Johnson. Guess what? In flies Lady Bird herself."

"I'm also told you like gossip."

"I don't deny that."

"Then I think you'd be very disappointed in any memoir I wrote," he said. "I have no gossip to share."

"Perhaps I would be disappointed," she admitted candidly. "But I don't really expect you to tell everything. But because you're the biggest star in the world, we at Doubleday want your story."

"I don't know..."

She'd later recall that he seemed so hesitant, yet wavering. "Let me fly to the coast and pitch this idea to you in person. As you know from having met me, I'm very persuasive."

"That you are." He hesitated again, leading her to conclude that he was one of the least articulate men she'd ever encountered.

"I'm not going to debase myself in any book," he warned. "The tabloids already do that for me. Do you know a good libel lawyer?"

"I never sue for libel," she said. "Let the jackals write what they wish. Just tell your story from your heart. Just be Peter Pan. That's all you have to do."

"I'd like that!" He agreed to a meeting in Los Angeles.

"I'm packing my bags," she promised.

After putting down the phone, he was eager to tell family and friends of this remarkable offer he'd just had from Jackie. "I remember every word of the dialogue," he claimed.

Privately he confessed that he had little or no interest in writing a memoir. "As for that $300,000 advance, that's peanuts in the music business," he said. "We count in the millions." He confided to his family that if he agreed to do the memoir, he would have a chance to solidify his friendship with Jackie. "Imagine me, Michael Jackson, born in a bungalow in Gary, and growing up one day to be friends with Jackie Kennedy Onassis. She gave me her private phone number in New York. Imagine that!"

Jackie and her assistant, Shaye Areheart, flew to Los Angeles in the autumn of 1983 to convince Michael to write his autobiography. Their initial meeting was to be a luncheon at Chasen's, a posh Los Angeles restaurant. Jackie and Areheart arrived on time and were kept busy as well-wishers came to their table. In a city known for famous movie stars, Jackie outdazzled all of them-all except Michael. Their meeting was scheduled at one o'clock. By two-thirty, he hadn't shown up, and Jackie and Areheart went ahead and ordered lunch.

Jackie Onassis, hailed as the world's most desirable woman, wasn't used to be being stood up. Initially embarrassed, she decided to forgive Michael. "He's very shy," she told her colleagues. Privately she was enraged.

The woman who'd charmed Charles de Gaulle and Nikita Krushchev didn't give up that easily. She called Michael the following morning, using her most seductive voice. At first he seemed intimidated and didn't want to take her call. Finally, he relented. He came to the phone and pleaded for her to forgive him for his rudeness. "The idea of writing an actual book devoted to my personal life paralyzed me," he said. "I changed costumes three times that morning and was ready to go. Then at the last minute I got cold feet."

Before the end of their conversation, he invited her to tea that afternoon at Hayvenhurst. When a chicly dressed Jackie arrived at Encino, she found only two staff members. Michael had ordered the rest of the household to leave, including photographer Steve Howell, who wanted to capture the historic coming together of this famous pair on film. "He kicked us out. We didn't get to see her. All of us were horribly disappointed and mad at Michael for his insensitivity."

Michael was awed by Jackie, considering her the epitome of grace, style, and charm. Once he'd held Diana Ross in such awe, but seemingly had graduated from that, moving on to bigger game. "And what bigger game could there have been than Jackie Onassis?" Howell asked. "My God, she was the most famous person on Earth meeting the second most famous person on Earth."

"It was a lovefest," said a staff member who was allowed to remain behind to serve tea. "Jackie and Michael were practically cooing at each other. I couldn't tell where Jackie's whispery voice ended and Michael's whispery voice began."

Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis

As Jackie would later reveal, "I didn't end up interviewing Michael. He ended up interviewing me."

"How do you live with the dread that every time you walk out your door fans or the paparazzi are waiting to take your picture?" he asked her.

"I consider the alternative," she said. "Life as a recluse. A Georgetown widow peering out through the draperies at throngs gathered on the street in front of my house. That wasn't an option for me, so I moved to New York. Of course, I can't take the rush of people at times. Perhaps that's why I married An. He could almost guarantee my privacy when he wasn't invading it himself." She was referring, of course, to her second husband, Aristotle Onassis.

"How do you handle being a celebrity?" he asked.

"I don't know anything else," she said. "It comes easy for me. I couldn't imagine being unknown. Almost from the beginning of my life, I was on stage or being exhibited somewhere. Of course, not the kind of notoriety that came later. Actually, I've often pondered your question myself. Maybe I would miss the fame. At first anonymity sounds wonderful, at least the freedom it would give you. Imagine going shopping on Fifth Avenue without the gawkers and the paparazzi. I've asked a few movie stars what it was like to have known world adulation, then neglect. Gloria Swanson once told me, `It's like the parade has passed me by.' She said she missed the adoring fans and the hysteria they once generated for her."

At the end of the afternoon, Michael still hadn't agreed to write his memoirs. Instead he proposed The Michael Jackson Scrapbook. "You know, a picture of my boa constrictor, Muscles. My first report card. The first song The Jackson 5 ever recorded. Stuff like that."

"I once compiled a book devoted to memorabilia of an early trip to Europe with Lee," she said, obviously turned off by the idea of a Jackson scrapbook. She was referring to Lee Radziwell, her sister.

The next day Michael invited Jackie on a tour of Disneyland, with him serving as her personal guide. "He knew all the hidden corners, the names of all the animals, the thrill of every attraction," she said. "I found it boring, but he was mesmerized. I think he has the heart of an eight-year-old."

After that day at Disneyland, Jackie seemed fascinated by the subject of Michael's sexual orientation. For such a worldly woman, this was out of character. Among others, she discussed it with J.C. Suares, who would become the book designer for Moonwalk. According to Suares, "She repeatedly asked me if I thought Michael liked girls."

She even discussed it with Peter Lawford, thinking that as a Hollywood insider he might know something. "I have never known Jackie to be so intrigued with someone's sexual orientation," Lawford later said. "She was one of the most sophisticated women in the world. Both she and Lee included many homosexuals, especially those in the arts, among their best friends. Truman Capote. Rudolf Nureyev. Jackie even had a distant kinship with gay author Gore Vidal."

She confided to Lawford, who was to die the following year, that, "When I first met Michael in New York in the late 70s, I just assumed he was gay, but hadn't admitted that to himself yet. After seeing him so many years later on his home turf in Encino, I think he's figured out he's gay. But his gayness, I suspect, has a strange twist to it."

"What do you mean exactly?" Lawford asked her.

"I mean, it's not gay like two handsome men who look like Paul Newman and Rock Hudson getting together. I have great intuition about these matters. Michael is gay, but his gayness is different. There's something fishy going on here. Something he's hiding from the world, something that will never be revealed in Moonwalk. The book will hardly be a candid confession, but a glossy, glitzy thing. Michael's mythology of himself. But in spite of what I've said, I predict it'll be a bestseller."

The staff at Doubleday was eager to hear Jackie's impressions of Michael even before she eventually landed the deal to publish a memoir, not a scrapbook.

"He seems to have no perspective on his life" she claimed. "That's understandable. He's only twenty-five. Of course, I've met men his age who ruled kingdoms. I think he's more interested in projecting an image of himself than he is in telling any truth. Maybe his truth would completely destroy his image."

It took Michael two weeks to make up his mind to go ahead with his book and accept Jackie's offer. "Of course, I'll need a ghostwriter," he told her.

"I can arrange that," she promised. She confessed that she'd been less successful in pursuing other celebrities. "I even went to your rival, Prince, and tried to get him to write a memoir. He turned me down. There have been other rejections. Katharine Hepburn, Bette Davis, Greta Garbo, Ted Turner, Brigitte Bardot, Barbra Streisand, Barbara Walters, Rudolf Nureyev."

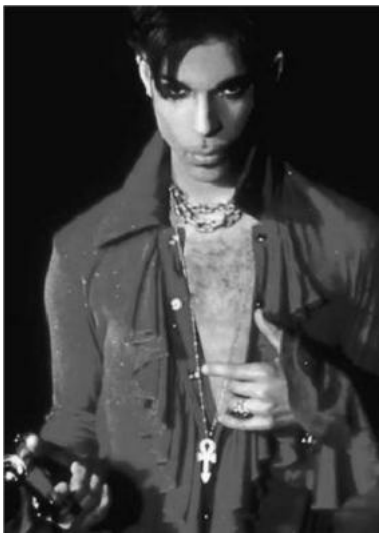
"I've heard of some of these people, but some of those celebs are too obscure," he said. "Their biographies won't sell."

She concealed her astonishment.

Jackie amused friends with her description of Hayvenhurst. "It's La La Land," she claimed, "with a damn chimpanzee running amuck. Jack would have hated it, and Ari would have called in moving vans to cart off every tasteless stick. I haven't seen such kitsch since I saw photographs of Mrs. Khrushchev's home. Animals in cages. Tacky awards and trophies. Jackson family pictures. Furniture that only a demented queen could have purchased. It wasn't even nouveau riche, not even `Jewish Renaissance,' but artifacts from the Land of Oz. Let me put it this way: Michael decorates like he selects his wardrobe."

In the months ahead, Jackie, from her publishing base in New York, listened to Michael's endless demands and insecurities about the project. She also read one disappointing chapter after another. Finally, in despair, she told her staff, "Dealing with the mercurial Mr. Jackson is like being in a train wreck-worse, an airplane crash."

Prince may have turned down Jackie's offer to write his memoirs, but he accepted an invitation to visit Hayvenhurst. Perhaps curiosity propelled him to Encino, not the prospect of any friendship with his rival, Michael. Privately, he'd ridiculed Michael and was flabbergasted at his phenomenal success. Michael was equally jealous of Prince.



Prince

Michael poured out his frustrations over Prince to his attorney, John Branca. "Prince is darkly sexual, a man of mystery," Michael said. "Sinister even. In spite of that `Thriller' video, I'm still known as Goody Two-Shoes. Squeaky clean. Why don't fans regard me as sexually dangerous?"

Branca reportedly did not have an answer for that.

Michael became upset when he learned that Branca's firm was also representing Prince. "There can be only one King of Pop," he warned. "I don't believe in sharing the throne."

The press constantly linked the two bizarre young megastars, and many music fans gravitated into either pro-Michael or pro-Prince cults. But whereas Prince was by reputation known as a sexy womanizer, Michael had to keep on fighting gay rumors.

"I don't understand it," Michael said. "He's very effeminate. He wears lots of makeup. His dress isn't macho. Far more girlie than my own clothing. But he's called a stud. How could he be? He's only a midget."

During the summer of 1984, Purple Rain, recorded by Prince and topping the charts, was even more successful than the Victory album. Reportedly Michael was so jealous of Prince that he'd go into a rage at the mention of his name. Dozens of people heard him making uncharitable remarks about the performer. "He's a copycat," was only one of Michael's charges. "He's ripping me off!"

Purple Rain made Prince a megastar, selling more than ten million copies in the U.S. alone and resting comfortably for 24 weeks as number one on Billboard's charts. Critic Gabe Fowlkes said, "Catapulting off the Purple Rain soundtrack, Prince combined dance beats with powerful guitar riffs to create music that even Nancy Reagan could bust a move to. And unlike Michael Jackson, Prince does not sing as if he's been castrated."

Later, Michael was heard telling people "how weird" Prince was, little realizing that he would one day be known as WACKO JACKO. "I don't like anything about him. He can't sing, and there's an awful aura about him-a bit creepy."

The one thing that Michael especially resented was the film, Purple Rain. Prince had succeeded in the movies where Michael had failed with The Wiz.

Michael was seen slipping into a private screening of Purple Rain at Warner Brothers. Before the lights went on, he'd left the screening room and headed for his waiting limousine. He could only bite his lip in frustration as he watched Purple Rain with Prince become the "sleeper" of the summer. Prince had a hit movie, an achievement denied Michael. His jealousy was aggravated when the film won an Oscar for best score.

Later, when Michael was quizzed about the movie, he said, "I've already told you. Prince can't sing. Now I know he can't act. I acted in the role of the Scarecrow in The Wiz. That was real acting, not something you are likely to see in Purple Rain."

Michael told Quincy Jones that he found Prince's music offensive, "vulgar in the extreme. Imagine writing a song about mutual masturbation." He was referring to "Jack U Off' in Prince's Controversy album, released in 1981.

Down the road, Michael would not concern himself with Prince as much as with two new rivals who had emerged on the scene-notably Janet, his sister, and the outspoken Madonna.

At the door to Hayvenhurst, the five-foot-tall Prince presented himself to the Jacksons-in this case Michael was joined not only by La Toya but young Janet. Prince had not come to admire Michael, which he didn't do at all, but to try to learn "what makes the dude tick." Prince would not learn anything, as Michael remained almost silent for the entire evening, observing Prince with great skepticism. In lieu of confronting such a rude host, Prince turned his attentions almost entirely to La Toya, hoping-but failing-to seduce her.

Prince promised La Toya "a trip to Paradise!" She wasn't interested. Later, she asked her brother, "What did the little creep think? That I was some Saturday night whore hot to trot?"

Michael finally managed to speak when he showed Prince to the door after a disastrous evening. "Good night," he said in his whispery voice.

One of Prince's bodyguards came inside and presented him with a package, which he then gave to Michael. It was some twigs and leaves from a sycamore tree along with some metal charms and the tail feathers of a peacock. There was also a tape. Prince told Michael to play the tape backwards.

As the door closed on Prince, Janet came up to stand beside her brother. In her best Mae West impersonation, she said, "I chew little sausages like that for breakfast."

Upstairs in his bedroom, Michael played the tape. "It sounded satanic," he told Frank DiLeo in a late-night phone call. "I think it's voodoo. Prince has put a hex on me. I'm sure he's a warlock."

"Now, now, Michael, it'll be okay," DiLeo assured him. He also reminded Michael that thousands of people had accused him of being a warlock after Thriller was released.

"That's different," Michael said, dismissing such charges. "I think Prince's gift came directly from the Devil himself. I want you to round up someone to break the spell tonight-perhaps somebody from Haiti. Prince's hex on me has got to be lifted. Otherwise, my career will be destroyed."

DiLeo said he would, then turned off the light and went back to sleep. The next morning Michael had completely forgotten about his instructions to his manager.

A year later, Prince and Michael were set to record a duet for the We Are the World album. But Prince didn't show up. Michael was furious until he was reminded that he once stood up a person far bigger than Prince, Jackie Onassis herself. Michael didn't have an immediate response for that.

When asked why he didn't show up, Prince told his associates, "The guy is silly, a wimp."

Does Michael deserve credit for converting Prince to the Jehovah's Witness far-right cult? Prince himself claimed that it wasn't Michael, but his mother's dying wish that he convert to the controversial religion that rejects everything from blood transfusions to the occult.

Following in the footsteps of the former "King of Pop," Michael himself, Prince now proselytizes door to door trying to convert unsuspecting innocents to the draconian world of Jehovah's Witnesses.

"Michael Jackson got the boot from us," said one of the Jehovah's Witnesses-and Prince may be next." She noted a report about Prince in the London Mirror that the "androgynous performer promotes Jehovah's Witnesses in Minneapolis, wearing his trademark mascara and dressed in a tailor-made suit with stack heels. He arrives at doorsteps in a limousine surrounded by four bodyguards."

The last known comment Michael made about Prince was, "He's a cherry moon with too much mascara." Michael was no doubt referring to Prince's 1986 film, Under the Cherry Moon.

During their visits to Hayvenhurst, neither Jackie nor Prince had been impressed with the chimp, "Bubbles."

"But he had become the love of Michael's life," according to a former staff member at Encino who didn't want to be named. She didn't like the chimp either, especially when she had to round up his dirty diapers. Michael always insisted on changing Bubbles' diapers himself.

"I was fired for no apparent reason," she said. "Maybe I saw too much." She didn't reveal what "too much" meant.

Michael rescued the chimp, "Bubbles," from a cancer laboratory where he was about to be used for medical experiments-or he didn't, depending on which story or which sources you want to believe. Whether he faced certain death or not, Bubbles was brought to Hayvenhurst, where he became the most pampered chimp in history.

The Star introduced Michael and Bubbles to the world under the headline: MICHAEL JACKSON GOES APE. NOW HE'S TALKING WITH HIS PET CHIMP-IN MONKEY LANGUAGE. Other supermarket tabloids filed even more bizarre stories. The National Enquirer claimed that Prince was using ESP and mental telepathy to drive Bubbles insane.

Michael obsessed over the baby chimp, even dining with him at table or throwing occasional "Alice in Wonderland" tea parties for him. "He came to regard the chimp as a human being," said Bob Michaelson, who visited Hayvenhurst on several occasions. The chimp knew benefits no other monkey had ever known: Limousine rides, his own hotel suite during road trips with Michael, even a personal bodyguard. Two dozen sets of Michael/Bubbles matching outfits were designed. Bubbles was perhaps the only chimp in the world associated with a custom-made tuxedo.

As the years went by, and as Bubbles matured, Michael grew bored with the chimp, the same way he did with young boys as they aged. Bubbles had also gotten hard to manage, once jumping up on the bed and landing in Michael's face after he'd had another nose job.

Eventually, Michael would adopt two additional, and younger, baby chimps, Max and Alex. Bubbles had designer clothes named after him, even a line of toys. But eventually, he was sent away in disgrace from Hayvenhurst, and ended up sharing a cage with two dozen other chimps, his days of glory behind him.

On March 3, 2005, columnists for The New York Daily News startled readers with a gossipy item, JACKO AND CHIMP TALE: IT GETS HAIRY. Uncovered was a 1993 interview that James DeBarge, former husband of Janet, gave to a police informant in Britain back in 1993. Revelations were subsequently published in Britain's Daily Star.

"The sex charges against Michael Jackson grow more bestial by the day," a columnist wrote. "Just when you thought the King of Pop's reputation couldn't sink any lower, it turns out Jackson's former brother-in-law, James DeBarge, has claimed the singer was up to some inappropriate monkey business with his chimp, Bubbles."

"He was changing Bubbles' diapers and just got carried away," DeBarge claimed in the 1993 interview. When Bubbles dropped out of sight, rumors were spread at the time that Papa Joe shot the chimp after he caught him in bed with his son, but this gossip was not true.

Miko Brando

The allegations brought an avalanche of letters to the newspaper and postings on the web. One reader facetiously wrote, "Parents of young boys who live near Michael's Neverland Ranch thank Bubbles for the sacrifices he made so that their sons could have a night or two off." Another reader jokingly asked, "Is anyone old enough to remember the old song, "I'm Forever Blowing Bubbles?" Many readers wrote in with outrage: "It's blatantly obvious that he is mentally ill. Padded cell, straitjacket, throw away the key."

The Bubbles and Michael stories weren't the only tales relayed through the tabloids during 1984. At the peak of his career, Michael received tributes as well as condemnations. The News of the World's color supplement hailed him as "The World's Hottest Property." But Britain's Melody Maker magazine put him on its list of "Ten Fruitcakes," because he bathed in Perrier water and talked to inflatable geese. There was a report that he was working on a new project, a video in which he'd wear a purple dress that catches on fire.

The Fashion Foundation of America's 43rd annual survey of custom tailors and designers named President Reagan, The Catholic Archbishop of New York City, and Michael Jackson as America's best dressed men-all that in spite of the archbishop's gowns and Michael's tacky military outfits.

In Sevran, France, in July of 1984, an "obsessed" teenage boy committed suicide when his parents refused to finance plastic surgery to make him look like his idol, Michael Jackson.

Michael was extremely upset by this report of a suicide and turned to Miko Brando for support. (Miko happened to be not only Michael's security guard, but the second-eldest son of actor Marlon Brando and Marlon's second wife, Movita Castenada.) Michael had grown closer to Miko after his security guard had put out the fire in his hair during the filming of the Pepsi commercial.

With Miko Brando employed by Michael, it was inevitable that he would eventually meet The Godfather himself. He'd seen the film fifteen times, as he was as fascinated by crime pictures as he was by Disney cartoons. Michael told friends, "Now that I'm the biggest entertainer in the world, I need to associate with names as big as me. Jackie Onassis, and, yes, Marlon Brando. Perhaps Elizabeth Taylor one day."

The "odd couple" friendship of Michael and Marlon began in the living room of Marlon's home on Mulholland Drive in Los Angeles. Before an astonished Michael, Marlon placed a $10,000 check on his coffee table. He asked Michael for an I.O.U. for the same amount. The request flabbergasted Michael until Marlon explained that it was a contest. "Whoever lets out the biggest fart takes home the prize," Marlon said. "I have to warn you, I've been eating beans all afternoon."

Marlon Brando

Michael giggled and covered his face, later claiming that Marlon "had a potty mouth." But he kept returning to Brando's home time and time again, and Marlon also became a frequent house guest at Neverland.

Sometimes Quincy Jones joined Michael for an evening with Marlon. Jones and Marlon had known each other since the late 1940s when the actor was appearing as Stanley Kowalski in Tennessee Williams's A Streetcar Named Desire on Broadway. With fellow actor Sidney Poitier, Marlon used to hang out with Jones late at night at Small's Paradise in Harlem. Marlon regaled Michael with stories of his early days in New York, when he always wore a red fedora hat. Jones was at Marlon's side when they attended the funeral of the assassinated Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Jones always called Marlon "Leroy," and Michael was envious of the bond between the two longtime friends.

"Tennessee always confused the real me with the fictional character of Stanley Kowalski," Marlon said to Jones. "And Michael still thinks of me as Don Corleone."

When Michael told Marlon that Jackie Onassis was going to be the editor of his autobiography, Moonwalk, Marlon leaned back on his sofa. "I fucked her but just once. She told me that it was the best fuck of her life."

"Now, Marlon, you know she wouldn't talk dirty like that," Michael said.

Ignoring him, Marlon went on, "I fucked Nancy Davis before she married Ronald Reagan. But I never got around to Pat Nixon, Bess Truman, or Mamie Eisenhower."

"Oh, Marlon," Michael said, covering his ears, which he would always do whenever he thought Marlon was "talking vulgar."

Their friendship began gradually but deepened in the 1990s. Toward the end of his life, Marlon was telling his friends, "Michael Jackson is my best comrade-in-arms."

The biggest project between Marlon and Michael never got off the ground. Marlon worked on a screen treatment, which he hoped to present to director Martin Scorsese. In the proposed scenario, Marlon cast himself as God, with Michael playing the Devil. "It's typecasting, of course," Marlon facetiously told Michael.

Alarmed over Marlon's burgeoning weight, Michael arrived one night bringing Marlon fresh vegetables from his organic garden. What made the evening rather bizarre was that Michael arrived dressed in a pink-and-chartreuse Pinocchio outfit, complete with a long nose.

"I'm astonished to see you as Pinocchio," Marlon said.

"I like to dress up," Michael said.

"I know that," Marlon said. "It's the big nose I don't get. I thought you'd spent millions of dollars on plastic surgery trying to get rid of a big nose."

Marlon found that a friendship with Michael had fringe benefits. It was reported that he used Michael as his personal bank, at one point borrowing a million dollars from him.

Regardless of the stress Marlon faced in his life, Michael was there for him. He idolized Marlon and came to regard him as a father figure.

Marlon was no great father, no more than Michael's real father, Papa Joe, had been. Except for Miko, Marlon had two dysfunctional children, Christian and Cheyenne. One night Christian shot Cheyenne's lover and was sentenced to ten years in prison for the assassination. Cheyenne was pregnant at the time of the slaying.

She'd later accuse Marlon of molesting her, and eventually, at the age of 25, she would commit suicide. Throughout this painful ordeal, Michael stood by Marlon. When charges of child molestation were raised against Michael, many of his other famous friends deserted him. Marlon, however, along with Elizabeth Taylor, was there for Michael. "He did the same for me," Marlon told his friends. "I can't turn my back on him now. Molestation charges have been raised against me too. I know what it feels like."

Michael had confided in Marlon that he was suffering emotional distress over Janet's marriage to James DeBarge and that he was delighted when Janet eventually filed a petition to nullify the marriage.

Martin Scorsese

Marlon tried to soothe his nerves, telling him, "I'm emotionally distressed over my own marriages, such as they were. My final conclusion is this: No man should ever marry and obligate himself to a woman. A man should be free. Even when I was married, I still insisted on being a free man. Sometimes I brought my girlfriends home to meet my wife ... or wives."

"I'll never get married," Michael promised him.

"You know, I can believe that." Marlon chuckled at his own humor.

Michael shared with Marlon his experiences in filmmaking and often asked the actor-sometimes hailed as the greatest of the 20th century-for advice. Francis Ford Coppola, who had directed Marlon in The Godfather, was also directing Michael in a 17-minute film for Disney, which would be released in 1986. Steven Spielberg, Michael's friend, was originally going to direct but had to cancel because of a conflict in his schedule. Cast opposite Michael as Captain EO was Anjelica Huston, playing The Supreme Leader.

Amazingly, the film took more than a year to shoot and cost $20 million, which, of course, was more than a million dollars a minute. It ranks as the costliest short ever made.

Michael was cast as an intergalactic song-and-dance man fighting to save a planet from the evil designs of the villain, Anjelica Huston. Disney characters such as Captain EO's flying space monkey, "Fuzzball," pop in and out.

Michael tested Coppola's nerves in this musical sci-fi short by refusing to work on Mondays. He would only rehearse while wearing his sunglasses on a stage that was completely dark. Coppola couldn't even see his moves, much less direct them. He couldn't have heard the director's cues anyway because Michael demanded that the background music be played at full blast.

He had an infuriating habit of disappearing right before he was to be in one of his scenes. Actually, he was often hiding behind a prop. After the crew had searched frantically for him, with production costs mounting, he would suddenly appear on the set. "I don't know why you're complaining," he told Coppola. "I've been right here all along, waiting to go on."

Other than getting overpaid, Michael found a fringe benefit in working on Captain EO. It came in a ten-year-old package named Jonathan Spence. Members of the crew reported to Todd Gold, a reporter for People, that the cuddly twosome would "hug and nuzzle a lot." Reportedly, nothing sexual was going on, but that didn't stop crew members from gossiping behind Michael's back. The blond-haired actor was called "an early version of Macaulay Culkin."

MJ in Captain EO

Little Jonathan seemed a devoted companion to Michael during filming. Not only did he fetch him such delights as a freshly made glass of chilled passion fruit juice, but he could be seen mopping Michael's brow after rehearsal.

When not resting, Jonathan and Michael dueled with water pistols. One day a food fight caused $3,000 worth of damage in Michael's expensive trailer. Michael was also fond of ordering custard pies. He and Jonathan would "ambush" crew members in ways that evoked slapstick comedies from the silent screen. "When I got a pie in the face, I wanted to choke the shithead," one crew member said in disgust. "But he was the Michael Jackson, and I didn't want to cross the faggot. He was a diva. There's never been a greater diva in all of Hollywood than Miss Jackson."

When Coppola's final cut for the ultra-expensive video was approved, Disney planned a release of the film at only two specially constructed theaters-one at the Epcot Center at Disney World in Orlando and the other at Disneyland in Anaheim.

At the September 21, 1986 premiere of Captain EO at Disneyland, a nonstop 60-hour party was staged that drew such names as Jane Fonda, Jack Nicholson (who showed up with co-star Anjelica Huston), Sissy Spacek, and George Lucas. The only no-show was Michael himself. Actually he was spotted at Disneyland that day, wearing a large black hat and hiding behind a heavy gray beard. He was seen boarding the roller-coaster called "Space Mountain."

Captain EO was hardly a triumph for Michael. One of his young fans, Joseph P. Ulibas, said, "I saw it and was disappointed even at my young age. Dude, they promised me a movie, and all I got was some singing, dancing, and overacting. They burned a ton of money on this `movie.' What I would like to know is what did they spend it on? For one thing, it wasn't on acting lessons. I can tell you that for sure."

To generate news before the premiere of Captain EO, and in a moment of indiscretion, Michael launched a secret publicity campaign to show the world that he was "bizarre," not that anyone on the planet needed much convincing at this point.

That was the word he wanted to be characterized as, although later this campaign would spin out of control and backfire on him. He set out to tantalize the press with his eccentricities, and the media, especially the tabloids, not only bought his self-styled "bizarre" act but invented stories of their own, making Michael appear far more idiosyncratic than he already was.

One morning he woke up and ordered one-hundred surgical masks in various colors. From the moment he first appeared in public wearing this mask, he was photographed. Pictures of him in disguise appeared on the front pages of newspapers around the world. "Isn't this fabulous!" he told Frank DiLeo, "The whole world is talking about me and my mask." Although most often appearing in white, he sometimes chose a colored surgical mask to match his outfit of the moment.

"He looked really fetching in magenta," DiLeo was heard to say. His manager went along with Michael's affectations, although the gruff, macho pro fessional secretly must not have approved. He did admit, however, that Michael knew how to attract the attention of photographers and reporters. "If he hadn't made it as a singer, he could have hired out as a publicist."

Michael actually needed the surgical mask to cover up his chin while recovering from another plastic surgery operation performed by Dr. Steven Hoefflin. Somewhere along the way, Michael had seen Kirk Douglas performing in the 1960 film, Spartacus. He'd been intrigued with the cleft in the actor's chin and wanted the facial feature for himself. Dr. Hoefflin agreed to perform the operation.

To come up with the famous Douglas cleft, the surgeon had to drill two tiny holes in Michael's jaw. Once this delicate procedure was carried out, a plastic prosthesis was inserted. After the wound healed, Michael hardly looked like the macho actor but at least he had his photogenic cleft.

Weeks later, Michael returned to Dr. Hoefflin's office to have a permanent eyeliner applied. This less-difficult operation involved the insertion of black dye injected directly into the eyelids. When that operation also succeeded, Michael surveyed the results and seemed pleased. "Now I'll have no more need of eyeliner. I'll mail all my mascara to Prince."

At this point in his life, Michael chose as a role model an unlikely candidate: Howard Hughes, "The Aviator." He had never heard of this former American hero until someone in a newspaper story suggested that Michael's wearing of the surgical mask evoked Hughes's phobia about germs. From that day on, Michael read everything he could about America's first billionaire, not only his accomplishments in aviation, but his private life too.

Michael read that he was not only a womanizer, according to press reports, but also learned that he was a closeted homosexual, carrying on a long-term affair with Cary Grant and other male stars who included Errol Flynn. Michael became intrigued with Hughes on many levels, especially in his success at leading a private life that wasn't exposed to public view until after his death. Michael wanted to learn how this hero managed to cover up his bedtime activities with men while "enjoying" a press that linked him to some of the most famous women of the 20th century, including Ava Gardner, Katharine Hepburn, and Ginger Rogers.

Michael also learned that in addition to breaking aviation records, Hughes had become a successful movie producer. He ordered a copy of Hughes's film, The Outlaw, that had starred Jane Russell and Jack Buetel. Michael learned that the world believed that Hughes had been hotly in pursuit of the busty and buxom Russell but that secretly he had the hots for Buetel, who played Billy the Kid.

Michael, too, wanted to be linked in the press with famous women dangling at his side like "arm candy," while indulging his private passions away from the prying eyes of the world.

Unless it was by the hand of a "special friend," most often a cute little boy, Michael, like Hughes, ordered that he never be touched. Like Hughes, he wanted doors opened for him, as he did not want to touch a knob that might be contaminated by germs.

Howard Hughes

Michael made such frequent appearances at toy stores that staff members wondered where he was stashing this vast array of items. He wasn't. Once Michael and one of his special friends had played with the toys for one day, Michael's staff was ordered to destroy the toys as a means of protecting him from germs and contamination.

Throwing precautions aside, Michael would sometimes expose himself to germs, just like the eccentric billionaire. In spite of his obsession with germs, Hughes preferred oral sex, often servicing women who had several different partners a week. Michael too seemed to forget about hygiene when he "French kissed" Bubbles or seemed to delight in changing soiled diapers and wiping the chimp's ass.

He continued to visit Disneyland but made a new demand on park attendants, whose supervisors were willing to do his bidding because of all the publicity he generated for the amusement park. Michael was one of the world's most agile dancers on the stage, yet he demanded that he be transported around Disneyland in a wheelchair. Fans who recognized him thought that he'd injured himself during a dance rehearsal. He hadn't. When he arrived at an attraction of his choice, he'd jump out of the wheelchair and be as agile as he was when performing the Moonwalk.

Toys weren't the only items Michael was purchasing for his amusement. For display alongside a human brain in a jar of formaldehyde and his own nose cartilage also preserved in a jar, he purchased the mummy of a young Egyptian boy for $3 million. He also acquired the boy's mummified pets-a lion cub, a lizard, and a rat which were buried with this son of a noble family. The pets were entombed with the boy to keep him company in the afterlife. Michael became intrigued with that idea and asked his lawyers to draw up a codicil to his will. Upon his death, his pets at the time were to be killed and mummified to join him in his grave.

At this time in his life, he also commissioned a portrait for placement above the headboard of his bed. His own portrait appeared in the center, and he was surrounded by five figures he viewed as his "equals." Sharing the oil painting with him were Albert Einstein, Abraham Lincoln, George Washington, Mona Lisa, and E.T. Each of the figures, including Michael himself, was painted in Napoleonic poses in full military regalia. Each followed Michael's example of wearing a white sequined glove and aviator sunglasses.

Cary Grant

Wanting to generate even more publicity before the opening of Captain EO, Michael conceived one of the most ingenious publicity stunts yet, the equal of the Elephant Man story. Behind the scenes, he enlisted the support of The National Enquirer, which would break the story. A photographer arrived to take a picture of him sleeping inside a tube-like hyperbaric chamber made of see-through plastic. The Enquirer ran the story-MICHAEL JACKSON'S SECRET PLAN TO LIVE TO 150. The story claimed that by sleeping in this $175,000 contraption, Michael could stave off the aging process and not die at the ripe old age of ninety but live for an additional six decades at least.

After its first exposure in the national tabloid, the picture of Michael in the chamber ran worldwide.

Michael had encountered the machine when he was at the Burn Center being treated for burns after his hair caught fire during the Pepsi commercial. The machine was none too safe, and because of its 100% oxygen content, hospital employees approached the chamber wearing fire-retardant clothes to assist burn victims who were temporarily placed in the chamber to flood their body tissues with life-giving oxygen. Trained personnel knew of the dangers associated with the chamber, including the possibility of an oxygen-fed fire breaking out or else oxygen toxicity to the patient.

The tabloids weren't the only publications writing about Michael. After the worldwide success of Thriller, even Time magazine wanted him for a cover story. Surprisingly for an entertainer who deliberately courted bizarre publicity, Michael rejected Time's request for an interview. A reporter for Time, Denise Worrell, had to settle for interviews with Papa Joe and Katherine instead.

On a tour of the Jackson's Encino compound, Papa Joe, escorting Worrell, knocked on Michael's bedroom door. When there was no answer, he opened the unlocked door to show her Michael's mannequin-studded room.

To the surprise of both Worrell and Joe himself, they discovered Michael sitting in the dark room lit only by the glow of a TV set turned on low. Michael did not introduce his friend, who looked like a boy in his late teens. Michael seemed embarrassed at this invasion of his privacy and extended a weak handshake to Worrell, which she would later claim felt "like a fluffy cloud."

Michael had nothing to say to the correspondent, but averted his eyes and turned back to watching the television screen. Papa Joe seemed embarrassed. Worrell, although she really wanted to interview the reclusive star, turned and left the room quickly, followed by Joe. "I'll have a word with you later," Joe was heard warning Michael. Joe turned apologetically to Worrell. "Michael has only just discovered who Greta Garbo was, and he's trying to imitate her."

MJ in hyperbaric chamber

As Worrell was leaving the Encino mansion, a perplexed Katherine came up to her. "Don't get the wrong idea!" she said. "Michael isn't gay!" As Worrell drove away, she remembered Papa Joe's final words to her. "Get it right in your article on Michael. He's definitely not gay! Joan Rivers is broadcasting lies about my son. He's gonna sue!"

Katherine might have put up a bold front to a journalist from Time magazine, but in private she often expressed her despair to her children. "Michael hangs out so much with all those white boys." She went on to assert that if he wanted to play with children, there were lots of nieces and nephews for him to pick from.

Bob Michaelson, who once worked as a business partner with Michael, said, "There is a popular misconception that Michael was always in the company of young boys. Actually he was often seen with many handsome guys in their late teens. They were always white, always good looking, and always discreet. He was not seen with any girls or young women. Not that!"

Except for those special friends, Michael continued to pursue friendships with his equals, an array of personalities that now firmly included Marlon Brando. He continued to see Liza Minnelli, although admitting privately, "I would have preferred Judy Garland but she's dead."

"Jackie Onassis is definitely my equal," he claimed, although he was beginning to wonder about the status of Diana Ross.

He did not include Brooke Shields on that list as an equal. "I love people like Brooke who are talented but who work so hard," he said. "Brooke is a nice gal but she's not Elizabeth Taylor. That's the kind of woman I want to be seen with."

The Oscar-winning actress, darling of divorce lawyers and diamond dealers, was about to enter Michael's life.

Elizabeth had certainly heard of Michael Jackson, but was not familiar with his music. Her son, Christopher Wilding, was a devotee, however. Like many stars of her era, Elizabeth's taste in music ranged from Judy Garland to Frank Sinatra, although she'd enjoyed Elvis Presley as well. The rock 'n' roll star had once sent her a note, "Would you like to shake, rattle, and roll with me?" But she'd never answered it.

In the 80s, Michael was enjoying-or else detesting-the same kind of scandalous fame she'd experienced during her love affair with her Cleopatra costar, Richard Burton, in Rome. But now, instead of her escapades, it was Michael's adventures-real or imagined-that dominated the headlines.

With the onset of age-Elizabeth was now fifty-two-her beauty was fading, although she still made a stunning presence.

Michael had even more money than she did, a reported $300 million in his coffers, most of it from his hit album, Thriller. He was only twenty-six years old. In spite of Elizabeth's long and successful career, she estimated, "I can scare up only $80 million, if that."

When a maid in her Bel Air home announced that "Mr. Michael Jackson is on the phone," the megastar was skeptical. "Why would Michael Jackson be calling little of me?" she asked the maid, not expecting an answer. "A duet, maybe? Tell him to call Diana Ross." The maid returned to the phone, but came back soon. "No, it's really Mr.

Jackson," she said. "I'd recognize that girlie-man voice anywhere." Still thinking one of her friends was playing a joke on her, Elizabeth got up to answer the phone.

But even after talking to Michael, she still wasn't convinced. Some of her friends delivered great impersonations. But when fourteen tickets to Michael's concert at Dodger Stadium on February 27 arrived, she was convinced that she'd been talking to the star himself. "A perfect gift for Christopher," she told her maid, "and I didn't have to pay a cent for it. He can invite all his young friends."

When the concert began, Elizabeth was extremely disappointed with her seats. Even though given the VIP box, she did not have a good view. After twenty minutes, she rose to her feet and left.

When news of her walkout reached Michael backstage, he was devastated. He called her the next day and, as Elizabeth remembered, "We talked for three hours. About everything. Mostly about having to go into the business without having a chance to grow up first. We truly identified with each other. I found him sweet and sensitive, not at all bizarre like the stories I've read in the tabloids. Not that I read tabloids, of course, but stories-most often outright lies-are written about him. As you know, I've been a tabloid scandal for years, so I know what he feels like. I told Michael that reporters must have slept under my bed to write the crap they do."

In his biography, Moonwalk, Michael summed up his relationship with Elizabeth this way: "I'm inspired by her bravery. She had been through so much and she is a survivor. I identify with her very strongly because of her experiences as a child star. When we first started to talk on the phone, she told me she felt like she had known me for years. I felt the same way."

Michael and Elizabeth were so compatible over the phone that they agreed to meet in person. He invited her to the set of Captain EO. Later, she told her friend, Roddy McDowall, "Being with Michael brings back memories of Monty." She was referring, of course, to her loving relationship with her longtime companion, the homosexual actor, Montgomery Clift, with whom she'd appeared in the 1951 A Place in the Sun.

On the set of Captain EO, Elizabeth seemed to revert to childhood herself. She joined Michael and Little Jonathan in their messy food fights in his trailer.

A few weeks later, she invited Michael to her home, where he showed up with a "date," Bubbles. "I find Michael very dear," Elizabeth later recalled. "He was very childlike. Not childish. Childlike. I could identify with that. He took me back to the days when I was shooting National Velvet with Mickey Rooney. The only difference is that Mickey was sexually aggressive. I didn't know at the time any details of Michael's private life, but he came across as very asexual. In other words, I didn't think he was going to rape me. With Rooney, you could never be sure."

If Michael were indeed gay, as rumors had it, he could find no more supportive friend and champion than Elizabeth herself. She had always been the most gay-friendly actress in Hollywood, and in time she'd become an AIDS activist.

In the months to come, Michael was seen frequently at Elizabeth's Bel Air home, talking with her for hours at a time. He even established a "hot line" to her manse so that they could talk at any hour of the day or night without going through staff members.

Both Michael and Elizabeth liked ice cream and sampled various flavors. He told her that he was considering manufacturing his own brand of ice cream which "will be the tastiest on the market because of a secret ingredient."

"What secret ingredient? Mother's breast milk?" she asked facetiously.

"Something even more startling," he told her. "An ingredient I learned about in Africa. The saliva of a rhinoceros."

When she received an invitation from President Nelson Mandela to join Michael on his tour of South Africa, she gracefully declined, speaking to Mandela personally. After putting down the phone with Mandela, Elizabeth asked friends, "Why do famous people want to meet only famous people?"

When Michael returned from the tour, he resumed his friendship with Elizabeth. Her staff often reported seeing him cuddled in her arms on a sofa watching TV.

"It was hardly a love affair, as some tabloids have suggested," said Bert Overfield, who covered this burgeoning friendship. "No sex. But lots of love. Michael himself spoke publicly about Elizabeth. `She's my Wendy.'" Michael was referring to Wendy Darling, one of the characters in Sir James M. Barrie's Peter Pan.

Michael believed so strongly in the Barrie story that he once confided a secret to Elizabeth. "We can fly, you know. We just don't think the right thoughts to levitate ourselves. I'm studying with these two gurus."

"Don't take me with you," she warned him. "I'm too much of a blimp to get airborne. And don't jump off the Empire State Building, thinking you're Superman. You might come crashing down to Earth."

In talks with Michael, Elizabeth learned of "deeper, darker secrets." He claimed that he had the power to foresee his own death, "just knowing" that it would come in the year 1998 when he turned forty. So confident was he in this myth that he started to sign his name, "M.J., 1998." Recipients of his notes did not know what the "1998" stood for, and rumors spread among Michael's fans that the world was going to end that year.

Elizabeth, who did not turn out to be a prophet, told him, "With my history of ill health, I fear my world will come crashing down on me long before 1998."

During their long hours of conversation, he shared with her his fascination with sideshow freaks of nature, those unfortunate souls who used to be showcased in circuses. He was especially intrigued with the lives of Siamese twins and how they lived together. He was also fascinated with bearded ladies, and he once showed her a picture of a two-headed baby. She found it grotesque. "Sometimes I feel like a freak too," he said.

In spite of all these oddities, Elizabeth would one day announce to the press, "He's the sanest person I know. There is nothing weird about him."

In describing his friendship with Elizabeth to friends, Michael claimed that she was "a combination of Queen Elizabeth II and Princess Diana in the same body." At one point he even compared Elizabeth (the actress, not the queen) to Mother Teresa.

When she heard that remark, Elizabeth said, "Michael had better check with Teresa herself before making a comparison like that. I've been called Jezebel, the Whore of Babylon, and a home-wrecker, but never Mother Teresa. How can he compare me with that prune-faced Mother Teresa?"

When a rail-thin and much-altered Michael flew to London in March of 1985, he attended Madame Tussaud's to unveil his wax model. Elizabeth turned down the invitation to accompany him. It was his first public visit to England since the Jacksons toured there in 1979.

One member of the ever-cynical London press, noting a photograph of Michael displayed beside his wax figure, wrote, "I can't tell which one is the dummy."

That wasn't all. Michael began to look whiter in all his photographs. The press speculated that he was using Porcelana, a skin-bleaching cream. Several writers for magazines commented on his "new, feminine look." One reporter claimed, "Michael Jackson was never the most masculine of men. Now with all the tweezing of the eyebrows, all that makeup, that heavy lipstick, I could swear he's transgendered. I'm going to follow him to the toilet, assuming he still uses the men's loo. I bet he'll go in a booth and squat to pee. Stay tuned, dear readers."

Back in Los Angeles, Frank DiLeo referred to claims that Michael had had his skin lightened by chemical, even surgical, means as "preposterous."

Quincy Jones commented publicly about Michael's "strangeness." He said, "When you start in this business as young as he did, at age five, it's hard to get a realistic point of view on life. Considering the background, and what happened to him in recent years, he's surprisingly sane. I've seen dudes with one record go absolutely nuts. You've got to have a strong center to handle it, and I think Michael has that. I'd rather have a kid who's talking about the Elephant Man's bones than one with a pound of cocaine. Any day!"

Michael called Barbara Walters to attack a 20/20 report that he was a "plastic surgery addict." A hip, savvy news hen like Walters wasn't fooled for a minute, but she listened patiently as Michael explained that the change in his looks was because of a change in his diet.

MJ with his wax effigy

Later, Walters, or so it was rumored, laughed off Michael's explanation, telling her staff, "It's all those fruits and vegetables he eats-the raisins, unsalted nuts. Or maybe it's the popcorn. Yes, definitely. It's the popcorn making him turn white."

In April of 1985, Michael also made the news with another Elizabeth, this one the Queen of England. Buckingham Palace announced that the image of the Queen could not appear with Michael Jackson on a stamp issued in the British Virgin Islands. The statement claimed, "The Queen will not appear on any stamp which portrays a living person." It was suggested, however, that if any image had to appear with the Queen, William Shakespeare would be an acceptable candidate.

This rebuff was a great humiliation to Michael and a setback to him in one of his desires. For years, he'd had a dream, as expressed to his aides, to have Her Majesty confer British knighthood onto him. "No one deserves it more than I do," Michael was alleged to have said.

The Queen had bestowed knighthood on such figures as Sir Winston Churchill. And in the future, she'd elevate Michael's friend, Elizabeth Taylor, to the status of Dame of the British Empire. Sources close to the Queen said privately that Her Majesty appreciated the Jackson brothers performing before her, but that she had no intention of granting him a British knighthood. If reports are to be believed, the Queen found the whole idea "horrid."

Teaming with Lionel Richie, Michael composed a song for African famine relief. With the help of Quincy

Jones, Michael came up with the basic music for "We Are the World." Demo cassettes of "We Are the World" were sent to various artists who had agreed to participate in the recording. The initiative for the relief program was started by Bob Geldof with his "Band Aid" in Britain. He spoke of seeing "120 people die slowly in front of you" after a visit to Ethiopia.

To impress Richie with his A-list friends, Michael invited the star to join him for dinner with Elizabeth Taylor. "We talked about isolation and what you do when you're lonely," Richie later recalled. "Michael seemed amazed to learn that Elizabeth often went out alone without security guards."

They told Richie that they sometimes disguised themselves and went to see movies in Westwood. "We always sit in the back holding hands," Michael said. "She's my new best girl." Richie wondered, but then rejected the possibility that Michael and Elizabeth were having a May-December affair.

From the very beginning of their relationship, Elizabeth had to be aware of Michael's special friendships with young boys. She often saw Michael with these children. Years later, in 1999, when she was asked about this, she didn't really answer, but excused Michael by claiming, "He is magic. I've long known that magical people, especially artists, have genuine eccentricity. That is, perhaps, what drives them to create magic in media."

A friend of Elizabeth's, who did not want to be named, claimed, "Even if Michael is nabbed as the King of Child Porn, Elizabeth will stick up for him and make excuses. She's a gutsy broad, but also a very sweet woman and fiercely loyal to her friends-take Rock Hudson, Montgomery Clift, and James Dean, for example."

When Michael told Elizabeth he wanted to direct his next music video himself, she called her friend Eddie Dmytryk "to show Michael the ropes." A Ukrainian, the liberal director had made Crossfire in 1947. It had been one of the first Hollywood pictures to decry anti-Semitism, for which he earned an Oscar nomination as best director. He later became a victim of the House UnAmerican Activities Committee and an infamous member of the blacklisted "Hollywood Ten."

At the time of his meeting with Michael, the director was teaching film at UCLA. Dmytryk would later recall several meetings with Michael at his Neverland ranch. "He had dolls everywhere-perhaps he never had a chance to be a kid himself. Little dolls, big dolls, life-size dolls, and lots of cuddly teddy bears. I met Jordie Chandler there, the same kid who would later bring a lawsuit against Michael. A nice kid and rather bright. Perhaps fourteen at the time. I didn't see anything sexual going on between them, but it might be possible."

Knowing that Dmytryk was a sophisticated man of the world, and a discreet one, Michael confided a secret in him. "I once wanted to look like Diana Ross and a lot of people say I do. But now I want a different look. I'm going to have my appearance altered to look like Elizabeth as she was when she appeared with Mickey Rooney in National Velvet in 1945. I've seen the picture fifteen times."

Although it was later denied, Michael did create a "shrine" to Elizabeth at Neverland. Michael's publicist, Bob Jones, confirmed the existence of the shrine to Elizabeth. Several visitors saw it before it was locked permanently, its exhibits ultimately removed and put into storage when the white-heat friendship between the two legends dimmed somewhat. Within the shrine, on giant video screens, Elizabeth's films such as A Place in the Sun, Cleopatra, and National Velvet played twenty-four hours a day. Michael refused to show Butterfield 8, the 1960 film in which Elizabeth won an Oscar for her portrayal of a prostitute. "It's okay with me," Elizabeth was quoted as saying. "I thought the picture was lousy too and didn't want to make it."

Michael designed the wallpaper himself. It portrayed a series of little heads of Elizabeth. For the walls not covered with paper, Michael demanded that the painters come up with the exact violet of Elizabeth's eyes, but they never were able to match the exact shade.

Elizabeth interested Michael in the cause of fighting AIDS, and he not only donated money for her charity but was her escort to functions in Los Angeles staged to raise money in the battle against a disease that was killing off many of her friends. It claimed Rock Hudson, her costar in Giant, on October 2, 1985.

Michael boycotted the 12th Annual American Music Awards ceremony. He sensed what was to come. Unlike his great success in 1985 with Thriller, he failed to win any of the awards for which he was nominated.

Many of the artists who attended the awards ceremony later showed up at midnight to meet Michael and to record "We Are the World."

Quincy Jones posted a sign outside the studio that read: LEAVE YOUR EGO AT THE DOOR. The artists came from the worlds of pop, R&B, country, whatever. Among those who appeared were Harry Belafonte, Ray Charles, Bob Dylan, Cyndi Lauper, Tina Turner, Bette Midler, Willie Nelson, The Pointer Sisters, Paul Simon, Stevie Wonder, Smokey Robinson, Dionne Warwick, Bruce Springsteen, and Diana Ross, who went around asking for autographs. "How could she embarrass me like this?" Michael asked. "She's too big a star to ask for autographs."

Leaving the studio after a long night, Michael confided that he hadn't had dinner. He was going home to demand that his chef prepare him a plate of steamed okra.

One critic of the video claimed that all the stars except Michael had, indeed, left their egos at the door that night. He demanded that his solo recording be taped privately and away from the rest of the stars. "He wanted to be different and set aside from the other celebrities," said one of the recording staff. "Like he was special, better than the rest of the singers. In the video, a shot begins at his sequined socks and his Bass Weejun shoes. He's so big he doesn't need to show his face right away."

Michael was overheard bragging, "Fans will know me the moment they see my socks. Try to photograph Bruce Springsteen's socks. No one will know who he is. No one!"

"We Are the World-The Video Event" became the ninth best-selling video cassette of 1985, and "We Are the World" as a single record became the first ever to go multi-platinum, staying number one on Billboard's charts for a month. The song's sales raised more than $40 million. At the Grammy Awards at the Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles in February of 1986, "We Are the World" won four awards.

Quincy Jones, Lionel Richie, and Michael Jackson, 1985

In June of that year Michael celebrated his success with "We Are the World" by undergoing yet a fourth operation on his nose, demanding to have it made even slimmer, although it was quite thin as it was. He claimed that he would soon turn twenty-eight, and he wanted to celebrate with a thinner nose, even though Jehovah's Witnesses aren't supposed to observe birthdays.

After he'd recovered from the operation, Michael told friends, "I can hardly rehearse my music any more. I spend all day looking at my reflection in the mirror. Dr. Steven Hoefflin is a wonderful plastic surgeon. Because of me, he's called `The Plastic Surgeon to the Stars.' Not just movie stars go to him. Even Ivana Trump uses him."

Michael also reminded anyone interested, even Paul Anka, who clearly wasn't, that "lots of famous stars in the past had nose jobs, even Elvis Presley. Marilyn Monroe not only had her nose done, but her breasts. You don't think for a moment that those breasts were actually hers, do you?"

At one point, Frank DiLeo wondered why his client bothered with such expensive nose jobs and then went out in public with a surgical mask. "The last time he was spotted, or so I heard, he was wearing a gorilla head mask with fur. King Kong all the way."

On May 12, 1986, it was announced at a press conference in New York that Michael's new look would be showcased in Pepsi commercials. Michael, according to a contract negotiated with the soft drink king, Roger Enrico, would be paid a record-breaking $15 million. This time he wouldn't have to split the millions with his brothers, and, according to his demands, would not have to be seen "drinking one drop of the vile soda." Pepsi also agreed to sponsor Michael's first nationwide solo tour, although no dates were announced for that momentous event. Under most endorsement deals, an artist is usually paid in installments. Michael demanded the entire $15 million up front.

MJ and Bob Jones

When the mega-check cleared, Michael was not in a mood for celebration. No longer was he thinking of the competition from Prince, but a challenge coming from "down the hall," a reference to the Encino manse where he still lived on the same floor as his younger sister Janet. Family members had overheard the second-most talented member of the Jackson clan claiming that her new album, Control, was going to sell more copies than the record-busting Thriller.

Even Papa Joe had told her, "You'll be as big as Michael-not bigger, but as big." Janet was in the throes of her own management crisis, as she, like Michael and her other brothers, wanted to break from her father, turning to others, such as John McClain, a young executive at A&M, for career guidance, much to her father's rage and fury.

After studying the latest photographs of Janet, Michael was enraged. He stormed out of his bedroom and rushed downstairs to confront Katherine. "Janet's even stolen my nose and had a plastic surgeon build an exact copy for herself. Not only that, she sounds like me. She looks like me. She's stealing my dance steps."

Katherine was hardly reassuring. "You started a trend. Everybody in the family, even your father, is trying to look like you, with a little help from plastic surgeons. That is, all except Jackie. He's pleased with the face God gave him."

With Control, Janet showed the world that she was no longer Daddy's Little Girl. She finally sacked Papa Joe as her manager and teamed with Terry Lewis and Jimmy ("Jam") Harris, two multi-talented music men, to create the album. Joe predicted failure, but Control went on to sell eight million copies and won Grammys for Lewis and Harris. Reportedly, Michael was furious at the album's success, especially when it spawned such hit singles as "What Have You Done for Me Lately?"

Michael complained bitterly to his publicist, Norman Winter, that both La Toya and Janet were altering their faces to look more like him. "You've got to do something about it," Michael demanded of Winter.

"But I'm not a plastic surgeon," he protested. "Otherwise, I would make La Toya look like a female Little Richard and Janet Mike Tyson in drag."

Michael was not amused at Winter's sarcasm. "The way it is now, La Toya is often mistaken for me when she goes through airports or lounges of deluxe hotels. Why would anyone mistake La Toya for me? Do you think I look like a girl?"

Winter had no comment.

Michael's fury spilled over onto Diana Ross when he learned that she was marrying a white man, Arne Naess, the Norwegian shipping millionaire who lived in Oslo. At first there had been rumors that he'd attend their wedding the following February, even functioning as best man for Naess. But later, he sent word to Ross that he was turning down her invitation to the wedding-"and future invitations as well."

Ross suffered public humiliation. "He has Elizabeth Taylor now," she told friends. "What does he need with the woman who was responsible for launching his career. Fuck him! Instead of ordering his chauffeur to call him Miss Ross, he's probably demanding to be called Miss Taylor now."

When Elizabeth heard what Ross had said, she replied, "Meow!"

Janet

Ross got her revenge two years later when Michael broke his stonewall silence and requested her appearance on a Showtime special for television. It was to be a tribute from "loving friends" to Michael's career and life. Ross cabled that she could not make the commitment because of her busy schedule.

"What do I need her for?" Michael ranted. "I've got Elizabeth Taylor. Sophia Loren. Gene Kelly. And Quincy Jones and Sean Lennon, and anybody else I could get if I really wanted them. She turns me down and I'm a bigger star than Greta Garbo in her heyday!" He had been reading books about the reclusive Garbo.

At one point, Michael told Winter that he would "henceforth and forever more" associate only with celebrities who were his equal. He didn't want minor celebrities being photographed with him "and trying to get a big break by feeding off my fame."

He made some exceptions to that. Bodyguards at Hayvenhurst would later report a parade of young boys, ranging in age from nine to fourteen, being slipped into Michael's bedroom at night. In spite of this clandestine activity, Michael was still living with his parents at Encino. One guard estimated that over a three-year period "at least three dozen young kids were slipped in." He could not offer an explanation about why parents would allow their offspring to spend the night with an entertainer "approaching the big 3-0" in age.

One guard would later testify that all the boys were white and often blond and blue-eyed. None of them was black, as was the case with Emmanuel Lewis. Sometimes these boys would stay in Michael's bedroom for almost a month. Other boys were sent packing after only a one-night "sleepover."

All meals were prepared for Michael and the toy boy of the moment and delivered on a tray which rested outside his door. Michael would issue orders that he not be disturbed for days at a time.

According to La Toya, Michael would often keep seeing the same boy on and off for more than a year at a time. After they got "too old," the boys were dropped. Some were not willing to get the boot, and often had to be bought off or coerced out of the house with expensive gifts.

In a disturbing revelation, La Toya reported that Katherine, in a search of Michael's room when he was out of town, discovered a stash of checks. To La Toya, Katherine called her son "a fucking faggot." As a devout Jehovah's Witness, she was homophobic, as were many other members of her cult.

Sophia Loren

Checks in varying amounts- $100,000, $200,000, $300,000, even $1 million-had been written to parents of boys Michael had entertained for prolonged sleepovers. Even checks for the purchases of Rolls-Royces were found. Apparently, Michael gave away these expensive vehicles the way Elvis gave away Cadillacs.

La Toya warned Michael that he was courting a potential public scandal and might also be setting himself up for future blackmail. "Some of these parents might come back in the future and demand more money when whatever you gave them is spent."

He turned a deaf ear to her. "I love kids," he said. "We're just playing games-that's all there is to it. Case closed."

When not entertaining young boys, Michael entertained lucrative proposals for various endorsement deals. He was offered nearly $30 million by entrepreneurs to sponsor a line of Michael Jackson clothing. Copies of the clothes he wore in such videos as "Thriller" or "Beat It" were approved by Michael, but there were so many delays and indecisions on his part that the clothing did not make an impact on the market. Rip-offs of Michael Jackson clothing, especially garments made in China and Japan, saturated the market, such a vast exploitation that it virtually destroyed the authentic MJ label.

Likewise, an attempt to launch a line of toys called "Michael's Pets" also failed. There would have been a talking Muscles and a talking Bubbles. At one point it was reported that Michael became so jealous of all the media attention focusing on his chimp-and not on himself-that he nixed the deal.

He sent word to the toy manufacturers, "Let us not forget that it is Michael Jackson-not Bubbles-who is the star of this show." The line of toys never took off either, although Michael was said to have kept nearly $25 million in various marketing advances, including a line of Michael Jackson sunglasses.

"Michael Jackson ended up screwing everybody," said entrepreneur Bob Michaelson, who called his would-be partner "a sleaze."

Rip-off Michael Jackson clothing-some of the garments bearing a label MADE IN TAIWAN-flooded America. Kids attending schools from Oregon to Florida were wearing Michael Jackson sneakers, Michael Jackson T-shirts, and even carrying Michael Jackson lunchboxes. All of this merchandise was unauthorized, and the legitimate promoters who had originally contracted with Michael to use his image "went belly-up," in the words of one failed clothing manufacturer.

Among entrepreneurs in the business world, Michael became known as a "ruthless son-of-a-bitch." One irate manufacturer said, "Behind that whispery little Marilyn Monroe voice, that face of supposed naivete, there beats a heart of gold. Hold onto your shirts should you ever have the misfortune to cross his path. He'll take it off your back. Not only that, he'll take your pants, your shoes, your socks, and, as a final fuck-you, your jockey shorts."

The business community wasn't the only sector furious at Michael Jackson. Jehovah's Witnesses were still upset about Thriller. They were as yet unaware of the future accusations that would link Michael with molestation of young boys. By February of 1987, Michael and the Jehovah's Witnesses had had it with each other. Michael was deliberately promoting a self-styled "bizarre" lifestyle, which the ultra-conservative church leaders found "repulsive," in the words of one of their elders. "In our church, men do not wear lipstick and enough makeup to look like a Saturday night whore," a spokesman said. "Unlike his mother, Mr. Jackson is not a true Jehovah's Witness. His lifestyle is not compatible with the teachings of our church."

William Van De Wall, speaking for the Watchtower Bible Society, said it was Michael's wish to separate himself from the church. "For one violation alone, he could have been disfellowshipped," Van De Wall claimed. "He attended a birthday party for Elizabeth Taylor. Jehovah's Witnesses do not celebrate birthdays. This has been made perfectly clear to Mr. Jackson from the beginning. He deliberately mocked our beliefs by attending the party for this much-married and scandalous movie star."

According to the terms of the church, Katherine would go against church policy if she ever spoke to her son once he was "disfellowshipped." Even so devout a Jehovah's Witness as Katherine had no intention of obeying this rule. She was riding around Los Angeles in a maroon-colored Rolls-Royce, a birthday gift from Michael, with whom she'd maintain a loving relationship long after he withdrew from the church.

Freed from the heavy rules of his cult religion, one of the world's most intolerant and severe, Michael would increasingly pursue that self-proclaimed "bizarre" lifestyle that he wanted. But he didn't spend all his time with cute little boys locked away in darkened bedrooms. He actively added to his list of friends a growing number of the most famous names in Hollywood, deciding that Liza Minnelli, Elizabeth Taylor, and Katharine Hepburn, although good for openers, weren't enough.

Even Robert De Niro showed up at Michael's for dinner. "Except for Frank Sinatra, whom Michael detested, he loved all Italians, because of his continuing fascination with the Mafia," Brando said. "Even though I'm not Italian, I had made that movie-so I qualified. But Michael seemed to think every Italian had a link to the mob, and this utterly thrilled him. He once told me he loved his manager, Frank DiLeo, because of his Italian name. He even entertained Martin Scorsese. Believe you me, Scorsese has no links to the mob. The one entertainer who did have a link to the mob, that piece of wop shit, Sinatra himself, turned Michael off and was never invited to one of his Italian nights like I was. Of course, I'm sure Sinatra wouldn't have gone to Michael's had he been invited. Oh, didn't I tell you? Ava Gardner once said I was a much better lay than Sinatra. Apparently, at times he was impotent. My noble tool has never failed me and never disappointed any woman. Or man, for that matter."

As the 80s deepened, and work continued on his latest album, Bad, which was delayed for months, Michael befriended the rich and famous. All of these elite members of the "Old Guard" in Hollywood wanted to meet the most famous entertainer in the world. In fact, Ronald Reagan one time called Michael-not to give him another award-but to chat with him for about fifteen minutes.

When Brando heard that, he laughed. "Perhaps Reagan needed Michael's advice on how to run the planet," Brando said facetiously. Brando could not tolerate Reagan. "God knows someone sane should give Reagan some advice. Bad actor. Bad president."

To Michael's doorstep came a host of stars, all odd couplings for Michael. Gregory Peck. Charlton Heston. Sophia Loren. Cary Grant. "I think most of them were driven by curiosity," Brando said. "Let's face it: all of us are in show business. It's only natural for stars to want to meet fellow stars. Peck and Heston didn't show up for the stimulating conversation. I love Michael dearly, although I never got around to fucking him. But, let's face it, at the table he doesn't have much to say. But it's fun to watch him get through a dinner giggling into his white-starched napkin. His maids must have a hard time getting rid of the lipstick smears."

When macho Charlton Heston came to dinner, Michael wanted to impress "Moses" with his straight credentials. He told the preposterous story that at least once a week he retreated to Hugh Hefner's Playboy mansion "where I enjoy my own private harem."

Whether Heston fell for this is not known.

Heston may have been the most conservative A-list actor that Michael would ever meet. His name had never been linked to any woman other than his wife, Lydia Clarke, a former drama student.

Heston's advocacy of "two guns in every home" and his right-wing political conservatism did not open many doors to him in Hollywood. Michael may not have been aware of Heston's political positions, although he was familiar with some of Heston's films.

Michael had seen his 1968 Planet of the Apes five times. Heston once said, "Nudity is never erotic, except in the bedroom." Yet he became the first major American male film star to show his ass in a movie.

Heston himself admitted that he was "too dull, too square, and too Protestant." As such, he fitted in with the public image that Michael promoted of himself. He still used the excuse that he was a virgin because his church dictated no sex before marriage. Heston seemed to live by that rule too. "I'm not a drunk," Heston told Michael, "and I've had only one wife. I don't cheat on her, and my kids aren't runaways."

He seemed to like Michael, or at least the image that Michael was projecting of himself. Later, when Heston learned that Michael might be a molester of young boys, he retreated in horror from his former friend. "I have never been an advocate of the homosexual lifestyle," Heston said.

"No one ever accused me of being a champion of gay rights. Child molestation is perhaps the most evil form of sex known on the planet. If Jackson has been guilty of such crimes, he should be sentenced to prison for life. Once in prison, he may learn the evils of molestation first hand."

Heston even lectured Michael on the "necessity" of keeping firearms in the house. "It seems to me ethically questionable to expect a policeman earning $35,000 annually to risk his life to protect a citizen. We've got to protect ourselves, turn our homes into armed camps if necessary. Even women should be trained to use weapons." He offered to teach Michael how to shoot, and he also invited Michael to his own home to see his gun collection. Michael never accepted either offer.

Witty, urbane, and sophisticated, Gregory Peck was the very opposite of Charlton Heston. Michael had little to say to Peck, but was seemingly fascinated by his long career and stories of the personalities he'd encountered. With his deep, modulated voice, Peck could hold a listener Spellbound, the name, of course, of one of his first movies, released in 1945. During the making of that film, he'd enjoyed a torrid affair with Ingrid Bergman.

He told Michael stories about his life that he'd never told an interviewer. "People talk about you wearing lipstick," Peck said. "I did you one better. Once I was a tour guide at Radio City in New York. As a gag, the manager had me dress up in drag one night and come out as one of the Rockettes."

Charlton Heston

Michael told him that he'd cried while watching his 1962 performance in To Kill a Mockingbird.

Peck thanked him for the compliment but preferred to speak of movies that were never made. "Two years before Mockingbird, I was cast opposite Marilyn Monroe in Lets Make Love," he said. "Believe it or not, I was cast in a singing and dancing role. Now don't get fired up. My singing and dancing-have no fear-would not have offered you any competition at all. I dropped out when Marilyn's hubby at the time, Arthur Miller, downgraded my part and built up Marilyn's. Even so, Marilyn and I really bonded. I saw she was self-destructing. I tried to save her. But making love to a woman every day isn't necessarily the way to save her. She told me that if I married her, we'd be the happiest couple on the planet. Dreams, my friend, are sometimes better left as such and never translated into reality."

"Marilyn Monroe would have frightened me to death," Michael said. "Too much woman."

Peck and Michael also talked about the increasing infringement of the media into a star's private life, and Peck sympathized with the ongoing invasions of Michael's privacy. "It's second rate to expose one's insides to the public," Peck said. "I don't like the tendency of all these actors to go on TV and tell all. It's in poor taste. The only self-revelation I go for is in my screen performance. The public doesn't need to know that I fucked Ava Gardner."

Michael wanted to know how Peck got his start, and the actor laughed. "On the stage. I once worked with the great Katherine Cornell, a famous stage actress long before your day. She told me that I'd never make it as a film star. `One of your ears is larger than the other,' she said, as if I didn't already know that."

One night Peck arrived unexpectedly at Michael's door, asking for the copy of the 1987 film Amazing Grace and Chuck that Peck had made with Jamie Lee Curtis. As a good neighbor, he'd lent the film to Michael but had to pick it up because a film exhibitor had received a defective copy. Peck wanted to get a good print in time for an eight o'clock showing of the film in a neighboring town. Peck returned later for a visit with Michael.

He surprised Michael by telling him that political groups were being formed to run him for President in the 1988 elections. "These foolish people think the world will be improved considerably if I replace Reagan in the White House. Then there are those who think Paul Newman should run as president with me running as vice president."

Gregory Peck

"The day has come," Michael proclaimed. "Movie stars taking over the role of politicians."

Peck amused Michael by reading to him an article that suggested Charlton Heston should run as the Republican candidate for President, with Peck taking up the Democratic banner. "Peck has nothing to compare with Heston's Moses," the actor read from the newspaper column, "although Peck's portrayal of Douglas MacArthur cannot be taken lightly."

Peck facetiously said he feared that if he ran for President, his previous roles, where he played "certifiable lunatics," would be used against him. He included Captain Ahab in Moby Dick and Dr. Josef Mengele in The Boys from Brazil.

"I also suffered traumatic anxiety in Spellbound, and in Twelve O'Clock High I went to pieces under the strain of sending bombers on missions where they might die."

"I don't know," Michael said. "I've watched with my friend, Bubbles, Bedtime for Bonzo many times. It didn't keep Reagan out of the White House. Incidentally, if Bedtime for Bonzo is remade, I want Bubbles to play the lead. Perhaps you'll take the Reagan role in the remake."

Peck told Michael that "about as close as I will ever get to the White House is a visit I paid there when Richard Nixon was president. He kept praising my performances in films, and told me that in all of them I stood for the American way of life. I asked Nixon, `Which films were your favorites?' I fully expected him to say To Kill a Mockingbird. Everybody goes for that one. Nixon said he thought I was most memorable in Red River, Fort Apache, She Wore a Yellow Ribbon, and Sands oflwo Jima. I didn't want to embarrass the President but he had confused me with John Wayne."

One night Peck informed Michael that he'd signed with Michael's dear friend, Jane Fonda, to make a movie called Old Gringo.

Michael and Peck remained friends for a quarter of a century. Peck often went riding with Michael on his ranch, Neverland, and the actor was amazed that Michael had seen To Kill a Mockingbird so many times that he had actually memorized all the dialogue.

Unlike most of Michael's fabled friends, Peck defended him when charges of child molestation arose. He even called Michael "a model parent," and posted a letter on Michael's website, defending him.

During many happy visits to Neverland, Peck saw up close how Michael was with his children, Prince Michael I and Paris, from his marriage to Debbie Rowe, his dermatology nurse. Peck even lived to see Michael as a parent to Prince Michael II by a surrogate mother.

At Michael's 30th Anniversary Celebration at New York's Madison Square Garden in 2001, an aging and ailing Peck taped a glowing video tribute. He'd kept his good looks as he matured, but he died in June of 2003. When Michael heard the news broadcast on TV, he cried for hours at the loss of such a steadfast and loyal friend. "The others deserted me," Michael claimed. "They won't take my calls. But Gregory was always there for me."

On Monday, June 16, 2003 Cardinal Roger Michael Mahoney, archbishop of Los Angeles, held up funeral services for 20 minutes because of Michael's late arrival at Peck's funeral. The moment he walked into the church, Michael realized he was inappropriately dressed. For the occasion, he'd worn a red jacket. To his dismay, he discovered that all the ushers were wearing a similar red jacket. Michael demanded that the services be further delayed until he could send for a black jacket, but the archbishop refused to accommodate him any more.

After the services, Michael shook hands with Harry Belafonte and Anjelica Huston, with whom he'd costarred in Captain EO. He stepped up in front of Greta Konen Peck, the hairdresser Peck had married, and offered his condolences.

She was 92 years old, and she took Michael's hand and gently squeezed it. "My husband admired you very much." Holding back tears, she said, "The story is over. No more Kilimanjaros to climb." She was referring to the 1952 movie, The Snows of Kilimanjaro, that her husband had made with Susan Hayward and Ava Gardner.

The friendship that existed between Charlton Heston and Michael, or even Gregory Peck and Michael, surprised Hollywood. His forming a relationship with Sophia Loren shocked insiders. "What are those two doing at night together?" asked reporter Donald Wolper. "I can guarantee they're not getting together for sex."

For all the world to hear, the forever chic and still glamorous Neapolitan proclaimed, "When I met him, it was love at first sight," she said.

In 1988, when Michael performed in Paris, Loren, in stunning couture, showed up to greet him. To the show, she'd invited an entourage of two dozen guests. When Michael appeared in Switzerland that same year, the continenthopping Loren was also there to greet him.

Loren also appeared at Neverland for dinner with Michael, but claimed she wouldn't show up if he invited his "best friend," Marlon Brando.

"When we made that 1967 disaster, A Countess from Hong Kong, your Mr. Brando told me that `my tits and ass are too big,"' Loren confided to Michael. "What about his tits and ass being too big? Fatso!" The picture had been directed by a 77-year-old Charlie Chaplin, who still remained Michael's all-time screen favorite.

Anjelica Huston

Marlon later said, "Michael Jackson is the only person in the world who appreciated that movie."

When Michael expressed his admiration of Loren's performance in the film, she said, "How very kind. But one reviewer found that Brando and moi had `about as much passion as that of a pair of love-wracked halibuts.' How right he was."

"Is it true that Marlon told Chaplin at the end of the shoot..." He hesitated, not wanting to say the words.

"Brando informed Chaplin, `You can take this fucking film and stick it up your ass-frame by frame!' Your Mr. Brando has such a way with words."

Michael was fascinated by Loren's background and eagerly listened to stories of her private life. Her upbringing had been even more difficult than his own, as she'd been born in a ward for unmarried mothers in Naples. She went on to become a star and international sex symbol, cooking spaghetti for Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia and dining with the Queen of England.

Michael was particularly interested in Loren's impression of working with his movie star pals-not just Brando, but Gregory Peck in Arabesque in 1966, and even Charlton Heston in the 1961 El Cid. "I was going through my epic period," Loren said, making it sound like an apology.

Michael was eager to learn what he could about Cary Grant, with whom Loren had appeared in the 1957 The Pride and the Passion and the 1958 Houseboat. One of Michael's all-time favorite films was Bringing Up Baby. Grant made the film in 1938 for RKO opposite Michael's friend, Katharine Hepburn. "I like leopards-that's why I liked the movie," Michael said.

He asked Loren if she could arrange for him to meet Grant. "Ask your friend Katharine Hepburn to set it up," Loren said, somewhat dismissively.

Weeks later Michael learned that Grant had fallen for Loren, filling her dressing room with fresh roses every day during the making of Houseboat. "I knew he loved me," Loren later said, "but he never came right out and said so-that's not his style." In spite of her wooing by the handsome actor, Loren chose to stay with Carlo Ponti, her husband. Michael later learned that Loren had even spurned the advances of President John F. Kennedy.

In March of 1987, when Motown Productions launched a special for Showtime's cable network, Motown on Showtime. Michael Jackson, Loren went on the air as an expert on Michael Jackson. So did Elizabeth Taylor, joining Yoko Ono and Gene Kelly. Two people refused to cooperate: Diana Ross, still angered by Michael's boycott of her wedding to Arne Naess, and Michael himself. Michael's refusal to participate in his own tribute could only be viewed as arrogance by Motown's Berry Gordy Jr.

When he heard that Ross had turned down Motown's request to host his tribute, Michael attempted a lame explanation to the press. "I was jealousthat's why I didn't go to the wedding," he falsely claimed. "I wanted to marry Diana myself. The fourteen-year difference between us doesn't matter to me."

At this point in Michael's career, not one member of the press, even the most gullible, believed him. To an increasing degree, his straight talk was met with greater and greater skepticism.

Michael got even with Ross. Even though he was not participating in the Showtime "lovefest," he had total control over the project. The American public heard that Ross had taken credit for discovering The Jackson 5, but Michael now began dismissing that claim as publicity hype. "Not a word of truth to it," Michael said in direct contrast to statements he'd made since the 70s.

Michael was once overheard backstage at a concert talking to people he perceived as stagehands, not knowing that Jonathan Reeves was a freelance reporter who lived and fed on the fringe world of celebrities. "I can't be seen with run-of-the-mill celebrities, people like Richard Gere or Cindy Crawford. With my status in the world, I need to hang out with Jackie, Elizabeth, or Marlon. Sophia Loren is definitely A-list. I mean, she even won an Oscar. I'm proud to be photographed with her. She's so elegant, so beautiful, and, also, the world's best chef."

An artist's portrayal of MJ and Sophia Loren

Before the child molestation charges went public, Loren was always there for Michael, at least at public events. In January of 1990 she attended a star-studded event at the Beverly Hilton in Beverly Hills. Honorees included Michael's friends, Elizabeth Taylor and Gregory Peck. But it was clearly Michael's night when he won The American Cinema Award as "Entertainer of the Year." Michael showed up in a midnight black military uniform. Parading to the podium with an army of six bodyguards, he was presented the great honor by Loren herself. She had been photographed accompanying Michael to the awards ceremony which was hosted by Michael Douglas.

"The 90s had arrived," said Peck years later, "and Michael was king. But his incredible world was about to end."

When Cary Grant learned that Michael wanted to meet him, he came to call. At first the coming together of Michael with Grant appeared to be another one of the singer's many "odd couple" relationships. Yet the two superstars had more in common than might be obvious at first.

Grant was witty, sophisticated and urbane, whereas Michael was inarticulate and lacking a social presence except when he was on stage. Grant was seductive and could even be menacing on the screen. Michael was not. But both could be mysterious, as each star led a closeted life. Both were born into poverty.

Seated before Michael and fifteen minutes into the conversation (with Grant doing most of the talking), he informed Michael that he used to perform in musicals. "Never could carry a tune, though. I used to stand on stage and mouth the words. A singer behind the curtain warbled for me. I was also an acrobat and a juggler if you want me to teach you some lessons."

"I want to have a screen presence like you have," Michael said. "How did you do it?"

"It was an accident," Grant confessed. "In my early pictures reviewers found I had an amazing asexuality. Of course, I was cast with all the wrong women. In Blonde Venus, there was no heat between Marlene Dietrich and me. At that time I didn't know that I was supposed to actually act a love scene. She had eyes only for her director, Josef von Sternberg, and certain ladies. She was later asked what she felt about me. `I had no feelings,' Dietrich said. `He was a homosexual.' Wasn't that a charming reply?"

"Other people have said the same thing about me," Michael confessed.

"I know that! They've spread fag rumors about me for years. If someone wants to say I'm gay, what can I do?"

Grant was not being candid with Michael. He cared a lot about "fag rumors," sometimes suing. Even at the end of his life, he sued comedian Chevy Chase for saying, "I understand he was a homo," on Tom Snyder's Tomorrow talk show. At one point, Chase, billed as "the next Cary Grant," referred to the actor as brilliant but added, "What a gal!" Grant sued Chase for slander for $10 million, settling out of court for perhaps a million.

Michael complimented Grant on his movie appearances, including his favorite film, Bringing Up Baby. But he told him he also liked him in North by Northwest, a film Grant had made for Alfred Hitchcock.

"I turned down Lolita to make that one," Grant said.

"What's Lolita about?" Michael asked.

Grant looked stunned that he hadn't heard of it. "It was a degenerate film about child molestation. Do you think I could have played a child molester? It was based on a novel by Vladimir Nabokov. About a man lusting after a young nymphet. Sir Laurence Olivier also turned it down. James Mason took the role and made it a classic. Even so, I'm glad I turned it down. Originally, Nabokov's publisher wanted him to rewrite the book, having the older man lust for a young boy. A sort of Tadzio. You know, Death in Venice and all that. The first script I was shown had Lolita cast as a boy, a kind of Lolito. Like bloody hell would I ever appear as a homosexual in film, much less as a childmolesting homo. A chicken hawk we'd call it. I did enough of that when I got intimate with Katharine Hepburn in Sylvia Scarlet. Presumably in the film, I thought Hepburn, with short hair and trousers, a boy. Yet George Cukor in one scene had me undress for the bed I was supposed to share with her. I look her over, thinking it's a boy, and say `It's nippy tonight. You'll make a proper hot water bottle!' Personally, I think child molestation is repulsive."

It is not known if Grant at the time knew of Michael's interest in young boys and was indirectly criticizing him.

As the evening progressed, Grant pointedly looked at Michael. La Toya that night was in and out of the room; otherwise, we'd know nothing of this encounter between Grant and Michael.

"I read the other day that you said you planned to get married and have a family," Grant said.

"Yes, that is my dream," Michael said. "Many children to love."

"I don't advise it," Grant said. "I forget how many times I've been married. Every one of my wives left me. I don't know why. Maybe they got bored, real tired of me. My first wife accused me of being a homosexual. All the women, except Betsy, have accused me of being a homosexual. Virginia was just the first."

He was referring, of course, to Virginia Cherill and Betsy Drake.

Although Michael's meeting with Gregory Peck developed into a longtime friendship, his association with Grant was relatively short. Neither performer seemed to have any desire to pursue the other after one evening.

The following morning, Michael called Katharine Hepburn to ask her about her long-ago costar.

Tight-lipped and uncooperative with the press, Hepburn could be surprisingly outspoken in private. "Oh, yes, Cary Grant," she said. "If I recall, he was a supporting player to me in a film or two. Cold as the Arctic night. Ego as large as Mount Rushmore. A tightwad, but so am I. A self-hating homosexual. Never told the truth in his life, a compulsive liar. Took LSD for psychiatric reasons, or so he said. Married unhappily so many times you'd think he would finally learn that he hates women. Such a charming presence on the screen. Such a lonely heart off screen."

Michael, when not "hanging with the stars," was under great pressure to come out with a follow-up album to Thriller.

With more than sixty songs written, he had ample material from which to make the final selections. Driving himself to the verge of a nervous breakdown, he had an almost pathological desire to top Thriller. "I want to be the only Jackson on the charts." He was referring, of course, to the runaway success of sister Janet's Control album. His resentment of Janet's success became so strong that he began to ridicule her physicality. "You have the fattest thighs in the family," he told her.

The Bad album would be long in the gestation period. Many of Michael's hopes and dreams for the album never materialized. Originally, he'd wanted to record a duet with Prince to determine which one was "really bad." Michael told his producer, "that Prince could do all those James Brown imitations I used to do, and I could do my famous Moonwalk." Quincy shipped Prince a tape of the song. "It's shit!" Prince told his aides. "Send word to that gal I want nothing to do with her album."

Michael was also rebuffed when he wanted to record a duet with Barbra Streisand called "I Just Can't Stop Loving You." The diva sent back word: "You've got to be kidding. Me in a love duet with Michael Jackson? Ronald Reagan and I would be more convincing."

Michael was also rejected by Whitney Houston. "I don't understand," she said. "Does Michael want me to sing the girl's part-or is he saving that for himself?"

Quincy suggested that Diana Ross be asked. "Why should I revive her career?" Michael said.

In lieu of Streisand or Houston, Michael chose the unknown Siedah Garrett, a protegee of Quincy's, for the duet.

Eight of the ten songs on the LP were written by Michael, who also sang both lead and background vocals. He also wrote "Leave Me Alone" on the CD bonus track. In addition, he duetted with Stevie Wonder in "Just Good Friends." An adaptation of a gospel song, "Man in the Mirror," was sung with Andrae Crouch.

During their work together, there were false rumors circulating about a romance between Michael and Siedah Garrett, perhaps spread by Michael himself. She looked a lot like him. One headline claimed JACKSON AND LOOKALIKE MULLING MARRIAGE.

A member of the Bad crew later sarcastically said, "About the only phallic image Siedah ever saw was an eighteen-foot python that Jackson had three guys carry to the studio to frighten the shit out of her."

A California singer two years younger than Michael, Garrett was a talented artist who had previously performed in a duet with Dennis Edwards of The Temptations. Released in 1984, "Don't Look Any Further" was a Top 5 R&B hit.

Michael liked this African-American singer and songwriter as a friend, never a lover, and even hired Garrett to tour with him from 1992 to 1993 in his Dangerous trek around the globe.

But he never really forgave her when she supported Madonna as a backup singer and dancer on the "Re-Invention" Tour in 2004. Garrett's signing with Michael's "nemesis," Madonna, should hardly have come as a surprise to Michael, as Garrett had also sung backup vocals for Madonna in "True Blue" in 1986 and "Who's That Girl?" in 1987.

The Jackson/Garrett duet, "I Just Can't Stop Loving You," was the first single release from the Bad album. Its release was a good omen for the success of the album itself. The song shot to Number One on Billboard's charts, but, regrettably, fell fast. Within fourteen weeks, it was off the charts completely, a short run for such a big hit in the music industry.

Garrett is still known today for co-writing Michael's worldwide hit, "Man in the Mirror," which was included in the Bad album. A lot of fans thought Michael was the co-author of "Man in the Mirror," but it was really another songwriter, Glen Ballard.

The second solo from the album, the namesake song, "Bad," sold nearly 11 million copies around the world, climbing to Number One on the charts in twenty-three countries. It was released in October of 1987.

The Bad album would produce five Number One songs, including the wonderfully melodramatic "Smooth Criminal." "Another Part of Me" was also a hit, as was "The Way You Make Me Feel." Michael denied that his solo, "Dirty Diana," was a dig at Diana Ross, with whom he was on the outs. Steve Stevens, a former guitarist for Billy Idol, performed with Michael on "Dirty Diana." But, in the words of one critic, "These two talents couldn't rescue this song."

Evoking silent screen vamp Gloria Swanson, the original album cover depicted Michael's face covered with a patterned lace net. Walter Yetnikoff at CBS Records exploded when he saw this cover, "What in hell's going on here? The cover says `Bad,' not 'faggot!'" A picture of Michael in street punk black leather was submitted instead.

After endless delays, the Bad album was completed by June of 1987 and released that September where it made its debut as Number One on the charts.

"What a way to celebrate your twenty-ninth birthday," Michael said. Now that he'd cut himself off from the Jehovah's Witnesses, he could celebrate birthdays, which he'd always adored anyway.

As one reviewer, in an attack on the album, put it: "Even when Michael's `Bad,' he's good, at least in sales." The solo single, "Bad," shot to Number One but collapsed within a five-week period. As Frank DiLeo knew from the beginning, Bad was not going to be another Thriller.

Glowing reviews flooded the media, including Rolling Stone, its critic claiming that Michael "can out funk anybody anytime."

But was Michael the funkiest? His "Bad" solo was attacked by many critics from black magazines. "If this is the blackest Jackson can get, better bring out the tarbrush." That line for Ebony magazine was killed before printing. Allegedly, it was written by "one seriously pissed-off black dude."

Even if Thriller could not be topped in sales, Bad would sell twenty-five million copies worldwide, making it the second biggest selling album of all time, an impressive achievement for any performer, but one viewed as a failure by Michael, who had so desperately wanted to beat his own record.

In spite of its success and all those hit singles, Bad, as an album, when heard today, is rather disappointing. For example, one critic wrote that the song, "Dirty Diana," a moody techno-metal excursion, "could have used a little less fake crowd noise and a little more Eddie Van Halen." Another critic complained of the "programmed synthesizers and cheesy backing chants that are everywhere." Basically, Bad has emerged as a fine dance pop album with some "catchy (albeit lightweight) tracks," in the words of one reviewer. The sad news is that Michael by the year 2006 never did anything to top this minor effort. Not a good track record for the so-called "King of Pop."

Siedah Garrett

In 1987 Michael hired a Texas-born publicist, Bob Jones, to take over as his head honcho of communications for MJJ Productions. Leaving Motown, Jones signed on with the King of Pop, a label he bestowed on Michael.

Bob Jones had worked with the Motown greats, including Diana Ross herself, along with Stevie Wonder, Lionel Richie, The Temptations, Smokey Robinson, and The Supremes. But he'd never encountered a performer like Michael Jackson before. In the weeks and months ahead, he would be forced to handle one bizarre episode after another, some of the best of which he recorded in a memoir, Michael Jackson: The Man Behind the Mask, published in 2005. The book claimed that "It was Jones who was forced to put out public relation fires and give a positive spin to each successive bizarre story relating to the superstar."

Jones occupied an eyewitness seat as he watched entertainment's biggest star destroy himself "with self-hatred and self-indulgence." His was the unenviable role of explaining and interpreting to the public Michael's "fraudulent marriages and poisonous family relations," as well as his drug abuse and voodoo ceremonies. But before things began to unravel, Jones got to jump aboard the bandwagon promoting Michael during the last great success of his career, the Bad album, the Bad videos, and the Bad world tour.

Millions tuned in on August 31, 1987 to watch Michael Jackson: The Magic Returns, a 30-minute TV special that traced his rise as a star. It was the sixth highest rated show of the week. Forbes Magazine named Michael as the ninth highest paid entertainer, with a two-year estimated earnings of $43 million.

Along with the success came minor annoyances. A woman calling herself "Billie Jean Jackson," a resident of Illinois, filed a $100 million lawsuit, claiming that Michael was the father of her three children. It turned out that her actual name was Lavon Powlis.

"My God," Yetnikoff proclaimed, "if this so-called `Billie-Jean' proves her case, Michael's reputation as a straight-shooter is made." But, like all paternity suits brought against Michael, this one failed. There wasn't the slightest proof that Michael even knew who the strange woman was, much less had fathered her children.

For six weeks, Michael worked on the "Bad" video at Brooklyn's Hoyt Schermerhorn subway station. Rather unconvincingly Michael cast himself as Daryl, a kid from the ghetto who'd gone away to a private school. Upon his return, he finds he no longer fits in with his street gang. His old gang members taunt him singing, "You don't down with us no more, you ain't down, you ain't bad."

When the video switches from black and white to color, Michael appears wearing fingerless gloves. Along with his backup dancers, he sings and dances, eventually uniting these West Side Story rival gangs. The famous director, Martin Scorsese himself, was the helmer on the video, Steven Spielberg having turned down the job.

Michael looked bizarre and outlandishly overdressed in his black leather motorcycle outfit, a modern interpretation of Marlon Brando's more macho outfit in the 1953 film, The Wild One.

Dancers who worked in the video with Michael, including Greg Burge and Jeffrey Daniel, claimed that Michael was trying to rip off West Side Story, insisting that they watch the film time and time again.

One of the dancers, who didn't want to be named, ridiculed Michael's costume: "He came out like a dominatrix, dressed in black boots with silver heels and buckles, lots of buckles. The leather jacket made him look like a motorcycle mama, his metal-studded wristband a bondage queen, and there were enough zippers for every drag costume between San Francisco and New York City. And chains-yes, girl, chains-enough for any S&M parlor."

In spite of the ridicule the costume generated, Michael took credit for designing it. It was later revealed that James O'Connor, owner of a punk rock store on Hollywood Boulevard, not only designed the costume but sold it to Michael for $291.34. "Even with the black surgical mask he wore into my store, I knew who was buying the costume from me," O'Connor claimed. The costume would later be auctioned off for $30,000.

That Kirk Douglas cleft Michael had placed in his chin through surgery came as a shock to his loyal fans.

At least the Douglas comparison was a macho image. But with the release of the "Bad" video, Michael suffered through unwanted comparisons to Joan Crawford, especially in his heavy use of pancake makeup. This was the beginning of the comparisons with Crawford. They would reach their peak, especially around the world, when he was photographed just before his infamous trial for child molestation. One headline at the time ridiculed him as THE DAUGHTER OF JOAN CRAWFORD.

Bob Jones

The "Bad" video cost two million dollars, maybe a lot more, and Michael was largely blamed for the production going over the budget. One assistant on the film said, "Jackson spent most of his time telling the director of Taxi Driver and New York, New York how to direct." He was referring, of course, to Martin Scorsese.

The "Bad" video marked the first time Michael was filmed tugging at his crotch. "Was his underwear too tight?" Quincy Jones asked facetiously.

"Maybe he wanted to see if it were still there, or had atrophied from lack of use," one of the dancers cattily remarked.

The "Bad" video shoot moved to the 125th street subway stop in Harlem. A few blocks away, Madonna was shooting her video of "Who's That Girl?" When a break came for her, she invited herself to Michael's set. It was while watching him that she first saw him grab his crotch. Madonna was no stranger to crotch grabbing herself. But she seemed shocked at Michael's doing that. She was overheard to remark sarcastically, "Maybe he's trying to find some non-existent balls!"

The release of the "Bad" video sparked a fire sale in Michael Jackson merchandise. From posters to coat hangers, MJ memorabilia was the rage of the hour. Michael Jackson was a subject of amusement, often ridicule, on all the late night talk shows, even making imaginary appearances (never in person) on such TV sitcoms as The Golden Girls.

In night clubs from San Francisco to Miami, Jackson impersonators ruled the night. One performer, Valentino Johnson, spent $50,000 to have his face surgically altered to look more like Michael. But, as Yetnikoff pointed out, "How is he going to keep up with Michael's ever-changing face?"

With a white sash tied around his waist like Astaire, Michael also shot the video for "The Way You Make Me Feel." In it he appeared with Tatiana Thumbtzen, a Florida-born dancer.

She auditioned and won the role for "The Way You Make Me Feel" video, beating out some two-hundred other girls. For her four days of dancing, she was paid $4,000, playing a mini-skirted seductress.

Tatiana took her very limited and very unromantic experiences with Michael and fashioned them into a book, The Way He Made Me Feel, which she dedicated to "My Savior, The Lord Jesus Christ," not Michael.

As a ballet student, she had dreamed of working and dancing with Michael. In 1987 that dream came true for her, but there would also be a downside.

In her confessional, she admitted that she had a "big crush" on Michael the day she met him. During the shoot, when she accidentally fell on her ass, Michael rubbed her butt. "I could not believe it!" she later said. "Michael was flirting with me. I thought if anyone had ever questioned his manhood, here was his or her answer."

In the video's final scene, Michael and Tatiana hug. Many fans were disappointed, as they'd wanted the romantic duo to kiss, but Michael was against that.

He complimented her walk, finding it "very sexy." In Tatiana's view at the time, that was a "compliment from a heterosexual male." Michael liked working with Tatiana so much he invited her to join him on the Bad tour. At the time, she was still hoping for some romantic involvement, although up to now he'd never asked her out. Their most intimate encounter came when he asked to borrow some of her face powder to touch up his makeup. Magazines began running articles calling Tatiana MICHAEL'S GIRL.

During the Bad tour, at New York's Madison Square Garden, Tatiana made a daring move. "I landed a kiss right on his smacker!"

In explaining why she kissed Michael, she said, "I looked into his eyes, and he did this really sexy thing-he bit his lip-and just looked at me with this look that was so incredibly sexy. I pulled him close and as I was about to kiss him I felt the hand on my hip and before I knew it we were locked into this kiss."

No one had ever seen Michael kissing a girl in public-or in private for that matter. Backstage, Michael's manager, Frank DiLeo, gave her the evil eye, but later, mother Katherine seemed to applaud her action, "giving me a big bear hug."

A different reaction came from Michael's security guard, Miko Brando. Enraged and shouting at her at the top of his lungs, he yelled, "How dare you fucking take advantage of him like that! You fucking bitch! Who the fuck do you think you are? I cannot believe you fucking took advantage of him like that in front of all those people!" Later, Tatiana was fired from the Bad tour. She was replaced by Sheryl Crow.

Months later, Tatiana dated Michael's rival, Prince, but claimed, "We curled up in bed like kittens, and simply fell asleep."

"Michael was the Peter Pan squeaky-clean one, and Prince was the sexually overt one," Tatiana claimed. But if he was such a sexual creature, why didn't Prince seduce her? Seduction was also something she'd never get from Peter Pan.

Tatiana Thumbtzen

Tonia Ryan, the co-author of Tatiana's autobiography, said, "Every other red-blooded male in America was going after Tatiana-Eddie Murphy, Prince, Robert De Niro, Matt LeBlanc, but Michael didn't even go out on a date with her. You do the math!"

In the wake of the first child molestation charges against Michael in 1993, Tatiana was interviewed by everybodyfrom Howard Stern to Maury Povich. The question was always the same, "Did you sleep with him?" Tatiana later claimed that she felt that if she'd admit to having had sex with Michael, it was "going to validate his manhood" and perhaps make it appear more likely that he was innocent of those child molestation charges. Although not admitting to sex, she lied and told TV audiences that she'd dated Michael for a year. "In my fairytale mind, I thought that he would come looking for me to thank me. Boy, was I wrong!"

Bubbles and MJ: Friends forever

Ultimately, although Tatiana had initially tried to defend Michael, she ended up feeling used by him. She became part of an image to make Michael appear straight to the public. Her "dream," of working with Michael turned into a "nightmare."

"I now realize that when you are blessed, you may be cursed as well," she said.

On the Bad tour, Michael preferred the company, not of Tatiana, but of some very "special friends."

Michael had a saying that became his guide to living: "No wenches, bitches, heifers, and hoes."

Instead of female company, Bob Jones claimed that the King of Pop favored blond-haired young boys. "In my experience with Michael, once a boy turned fourteen or fifteen years old, ties were severed."

Even though it was still the 1980s, Michael, as he went on the "Bad" tour, was already living the lyrics of his 1993 single, "Keep It in the Closet":

Whatever we do whatever we say now
We'll make a vow to keep it in the closet.

"He is very curious and wants to draw from people who have survived. People who have lasted the course. He is not really of this planet. If he is eccentric it is because he is larger than life. What is a genius? What is a living legend? What is a megastar? Michael Jackson-that's all. And just when you think you know him, he gives you more... There is no one that can come near him. No one can dance like that, write the lyrics or cause the kind of excitement that he does. "

--Elizabeth Taylor

"There is a considerable 'ick' factor when it comes to Michael Jackson. Though acquitted of child molestation, most people have been repulsed by his admission to sleeping in the same bed with children, even if it was non-sexual. He also carries plenty of baggage given his eccentric behavior over the years and plastic surgery that has reduced him to a disturbing visual image. "

--Nekesa Mumbi Moody

"Michael never really had a childhood and I think he is trying to experience it in later life. I would tell him to keep the knowledge that he is innocent and hold his head up. "

--Frank DiLeo, Michael Jackson's former manager

"Michael can go out and perform before 90,000 people, but if I ask him to sing a song for me, I have to sit on the couch with my hands over my eyes and he goes behind the couch. He is amazingly shy. "

--Quincy Jones

"In my heart, I was saying, 'I love you, Diana. Shine! And shine on forever because you are the true princess of the people. "

--Michael Jackson on Princess Diana

Chapter Nine

Michael never forgave the magazine, Rolling Stone, for the way it embarrassed him in February of 1987. Its readers voted him worst artist in a staggering number of categories. Worst male singer. Worst album (Bad). Worst video ("Bad"). Worst dressed. Worst single ("Bad"). Worst hype. Most unwelcome comeback.

Other organizations, including the American Music Awards, were more indulgent with his output. "Bad" was chosen as Best Soul/R&B Single, though Michael lost to Paul Simon as Best Pop/Rock Male Vocalist. Janet won for Best Pop/Rock Video for "When I Think of You."

The gamblers in Las Vegas were betting heavily on Michael to make another clean sweep of the Grammys in 1988, for which he'd earned four nominations. Bad had been nominated for Album of the Year. Both Michael and Quincy Jones were nominated for Producer of the Year, and Michael was also nominated for Best Male Pop Vocal and Best Male R&B Vocal.

The night seemed to belong to Michael as he performed live at the 30th annual awards ceremony, his first TV performance in five years. He sang and danced to "The Way You Make Me Feel" and "Man in the Mirror." For his performance, Michael got a standing ovation, and Quincy Jones told him, "The night is yours."

In a startling development, Michael lost all four Grammys. As Diana Ross was presenting the award for Album of the Year to U2 for The Joshua Tree, Michael collapsed backstage and had to be revived.

A sore loser, Michael told his handlers, "I refuse to attend another one of these stupid award presentations. The backers are white racists. They want to use me just for ratings-not to get the honors I deserve."

Bob Jones, his publicist, claimed that Michael tended to play the race card any time he felt "victimized." Otherwise, as Bob suggested, "Michael seemed to want to join the white race."

Regaining his composure, Michael stormed out of the auditorium where the Grammys had been presented, vowing never to return.

As the star of the Pepsi commercials that were aired during the Grammy telecast, Michael was clearly the winner, at least financially. Along with the millions of dollars he earned, Michael met a new young friend with whom he'd launch another one of his "special relationships." His name was Jimmy Safechuck, and Michael would be so enchanted with the good-looking boy he'd invite him to go with him on the Bad tour.

When Michael met the blond, blue-eyed California-born boy, it was early in 1988. Jimmy was only nine years old, Michael a ripe 3-0.

The boy appeared with Michael in one of the Pepsi ads. In the commercial, Jimmy, cast in the role of a young fan, enters Michael's dressing room, finding it empty. He tries on Michael's sunglasses and even dons one of his fedoras and one of his sequined jackets. Suddenly, he looks up and is startled, seeing Michael in the doorway. "Looking for me?" Michael asks.

Jimmy had been told that Michael's appearance at the doorway would be shot at some later date and that he should look startled at an empty space. That look on Jimmy's face was for real when Michael, without Jimmy's knowledge, suddenly appeared in the frame.

From the moment of their first meeting, Michael became enchanted with Jimmy. The man and boy were seen together virtually all the time, often accompanied by Jimmy's parents. Once, when the parents invited Michael for dinner, he arrived in a Rolls-Royce with his own food.

A relationship of extreme intimacy between the boy and Michael was maintained on and off for parts of 1988 and 1989, although there were other "special relationships" going on at the time with other boys. Jimmy and Michael were often seen in public wearing the same costumes, man and boy identical designs.

Michael not only obtained the permission of Jimmy's parents to allow their son to go on the Bad tour, but he eventually hired both the mother and father as well.

Jimmy Safechuck and MJ

On the Bad tour, Jimmy often appeared on stage with Michael, both wearing identical bondage outfits, apparel evocative of the S&M shops on Christopher Street in New York City. Michael at the time seemed oblivious to the speculation the two costumes generated.

A crewmember, who toured with the Bad troupe and didn't want to be identified by name, claimed that "Michael in those days thought he was King of the World and did pretty much what he Goddamn pleased. He must have known about the rumors circulating about him and the kid, but he made no attempt to conceal his affection for the boy. Although the Bad tour crew felt they were underpaid, considering the grueling schedule and long hours, and those crowds, this Safechuck boy was getting a king's ransom spent on him. Michael would take him shopping in Europe-you name it, toys, games, clothing, anything the kid desired. Michael once rented an entire amusement park just for the kid and himself. There were reports it cost him as much as $50,000."

The sales department at Hamley's in London, the largest toy store in the world, still remembers the visit of Michael where he held Jimmy's hand. "Michael even bought puppets of himself for the boy," said one clerk. "And also some puppets of Stevie Wonder. They made off with at least three dozen dolls and teddy bears. Every computer game that fascinated the kid was purchased without objection by Michael."

He generously gave Jimmy's parents a stunning new 1989 Rolls-Royce. With all the gadgets and extras, the bill came to $200,000. That wasn't all. Jimmy's parents were also given, or so it was reported, "His and Hers" Mercedes. "Transportation won't be their problem in the future," said an aide to Michael.

When Jimmy, who turned ten years old during the Bad tour, caught the flu, so did Michael. Two performances of the Bad road show had to be cancelled while Michael and his young friend recovered in a hotel suite.

Michael had learned to dance the Moonwalk sideways, and he taught its intricate steps to the very talented Jimmy, who appeared on stage dancing the same routines as the star himself. The Motown 25 TV special showed pictures of Michael and Jimmy trading dance steps with each other.

On his shopping spree with Jimmy in Los Angeles, Michael ran into trouble when he visited the Zales Jewelry Store in the Simi Valley Shopping Center. Appearing in a wig, with false teeth and a mustache, Michael aroused the suspicions of the manager, who telephoned the police.

Michael was on the verge of being arrested until he took off the disguise and showed the officers who'd been summoned to the scene his identification. He explained that he had to wear disguises or else he'd be mobbed and the store overrun. The police let him go, and the manager was filled with apologies. But by this time Michael, who had come in to make large purchases, refused to patronize Zales.

It was said that Frank DiLeo urged Michael to break off his relationship with Jimmy because of the ugly rumors. In London, one member of the press actually suggested, in print, that the relationship was "perverted." By now, his fame was so great that Michael couldn't appear in public, even in disguise, and not attract unwanted public scrutiny.

Michael forced himself to separate from Jimmy after putting up a strong fight to stay with the boy. He later claimed, "I'm so terribly lonely without him. It's a sad day when my public determines who I can have for a friend. The difference in our age is not a problem for me."

It was later reported, and widely distributed on the web, that when Jimmy and Michael went their separate ways, the boy received a "large cash gift."

At the time of Michael's trial on a charge of child molestation in 2005, prosecutors sought Jimmy out to question the young man as a potential witness. Reportedly, he claimed that "nothing happened" during his short friendship with the star.

The Bad world tour was launched on September 12, 1987, coming to an end on January 27, 1989. In his first-ever solo tour, Michael appeared on stage 123 times, playing to an audience of nearly 4.5 million fans in 15 countries (including the U.S.) on four continents.

When the grosses were tallied, the tour had taken in $40 million but would end up costing Michael money. Throughout the tour, millions of dollars had been spent on an ultra-deluxe lifestyle, including the simultaneous availability of a jet, a helicopter, and a bus. Millions had been expended on every desire, and the show itself was one of the costliest ever mounted for a singer.

As Michael launched his Bad tour, rumors were rampant. It was falsely announced that Michael was going to star in the lead role of Phantom of the Opera, to be directed by Steven Spielberg. Around the same time, rumors circulated that Michael was planning to buy Motown Records. Adding fuel to the speculative fire was Michael's appearance, at the American Cinema Awards, with Sylvester Stallone and Sophia Loren.

Michael's so-called romance with a blonde, 25-year-old woman, Karen Faye, was just another attempt to give Michael a straight image. Faye, who was in love with another man at the time, had worked as Michael's makeup artist on the Captain EO video-nothing more. It turned out that Michael himself had ordered an aide to feed the story of the fake romance with Faye to the National Enquirer.

Karen Faye

Faye herself was very defensive and supportive of Michael. "There is one special person who has given me more in my life than anyone. His name is Michael Jackson. It was the luckiest day in my life when this magical man sat in the makeup chair before me."

"If you believe that Karen Faye and Michael were lovers, then you'd surely believe that Rocky and Michael were lovers," said a Hollywood publicist. "Friends, yes. Lovers, no way, Jose."

Again, in another attempt to deceive his fans, a faux romance was promoted between Michael and Sheryl Crow, who had joined the Bad tour. Born in Kennett, Missouri, Sheryl was four years younger than Michael. In time she would emerge as more than a mere backup singer for Michael, and would enjoy a successful career on her own. Between 1994 and 2002, she would win nine Grammy Awards, including Best New Artist and Best Female Rock Vocalist, earning a place at Number 44 on VH1's 100 Greatest Women of Rock 'n' Roll.

Michael got on harmoniously with the singer, even enjoying Krispy Kreme doughnuts with her after the show. But as one stage manager said, "That was all the sugar that romance ever fueled."

One of the most glamorous women ever to play the guitar, Sheryl went from backup singer to international star, and Michael was said to resent her success. With her blonde hair and flowing locks, she exuded sex appeal. Michael was said to envy Sheryl's glammed out red-carpet outfits, and her todie-for body, as the entertainer arrived to receive Grammy after Grammy.

During her two-year Bad tour, Sheryl remained silent as rumors spun out of control about a torrid romance between her and "The Gloved One." Later, when she became a staple in the music industry herself, she squashed all that gossip. "He never took off that glove for me," she reportedly said. In time to come, with artists such as Celine Dion and Wynonna Judd singing songs she'd written, Sheryl no longer needed to publicize her link to Michael. If anything, she seemed to want to distance herself from him.

More convincing were reports that Brad Pitt and Sheryl had shared a romantic involvement when they were students at the University of Missouri, but this gossip was never confirmed.

The pretend romance was carried out in public when Michael duetted with Sheryl in the song, "I Just Can't Stop Loving You." He actually caressed her thigh in what was called "the most heterosexual performance of his career."

Sheryl Crow

Instead of promoting a romance with him, Sheryl was instructed by Michael's manager "not to make eye contact with him unless performing with him." There would be no more kissing scandals, as in the case with the Florida dancer, Tatiana Thumbtzen. Since Sheryl had no romantic interest in gazing into Michael's eyes, she could easily comply with this draconian ruling.

One member of the Bad troupe claimed that, "I just couldn't believe how far Jackson's contempt for women had gone. Not only was he horrified at the idea of fucking a woman, he didn't want what he called `one of those heifers' even looking into his eyes unless it was officially mandated. What a guy!"

Sheryl would also work with Texas-born Don Henley, the American rock musician who is the drummer and one of the lead singers and songwriters of the band The Eagles. She once spoke about the difference between working with Don Henley and Michael. "The difference between Michael Jackson and Don Henley is quite obvious, in that Michael is very reclusive and Don is the type of person that makes you part of his family. He takes care of you and spends time with you. You are an equal with him, whereas with Michael, he didn't even know our names."

The Bad tour opened in Kansas City and was a smash hit. Michael was entertaining crowds within the same arena where he and his brothers had played during their famous "Victory" tour four years earlier, but now Michael was performing solo.

Bob Jones recalled visiting one of Michael's hotel suites during the tour. "I had never seen a suite that had been so destroyed. Lamps, tables, and chairs were thrown about. Food wrappers and all sorts of other garbage covered the floors, tables, and bed. The housekeeper had been paid off not to tell."

For three nights in March of 1988 Michael performed at Madison Square Garden, an event attended by Elizabeth Taylor. A benefit concert was performed for the United Negro College Fund, and Michael was presented with an honorary degree in front of, among many others, Yoko Ono and Liza Minnelli.

Even though the benefit was to aid young African-Americans, Michael was criticized in some black magazines for devoting all his attention to "certifiably white" stars such as Taylor and Minnelli and virtually snubbing such black entertainers as Whitney Houston.

Still miffed at Michael, Diana Ross did not respond to his invitation to the benefit. President Ronald Reagan found time to send a videotaped message. With the usual Reagan brand of humor, the President said, "Let me be the first to call you the new Dr. J." This was the benefit concert in which Tatiana Thumbtzen kissed Michael on the lips, feeling his entire body stiffen except in his groin.

Michael often didn't accept invitations, especially personal ones, such as the christening of Diana Ross's second son, Evan, with the Norwegian millionaire, Arne Naess. But along with Little Richard, he showed up at the 1988 wedding of his attorney, John Branca, to Julie McArthur. Bubbles came dressed in a hand-tailored tuxedo, and immediately "fell in love" with the handsome hot stud, Don Johnson, of Miami Vice.

Caught up in the hysteria surrounding his Bad tour, Michael still had time for two of the most significant events in his life: his move out of the family compound in Encino and the publication of his long-awaited and ultimately disappointing autobiography, Moonwalk.

Michael's move from Hayvenhurst in Encino to Neverland was long overdue. His family was seeing "too much" of his private life and interfering with his intimate time, especially when he wanted to be alone with his young friends. The 2,700-acre ranch in California's Santa Ynez Valley is located at 5225 Figueroa Mountain Rd., 5 miles north of the town of Los Olivos, about a two-hour drive north of Los Angeles.

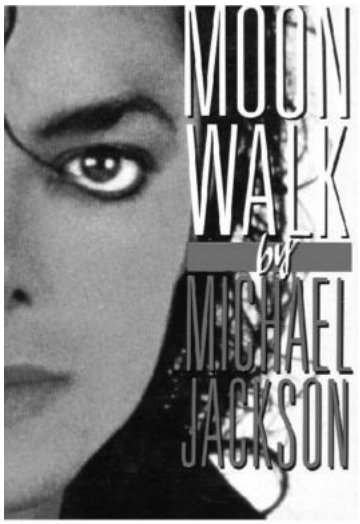
Michael had fallen in love with the property when he'd visited Paul McCartney and his wife, Linda, here. They too were considering buying the property, but it wasn't for sale at the time.

When the ranch came on the market in the spring of 1988, Michael went for it, but he was a tough negotiator, acquiring the property for $17 million, even though the asking price was $35 million. Along with the budget purchase price came an array of European antiques. TV and radio media, not knowing the actual purchase price, reported that Michael paid $28 million for the ranch. He immediately changed the name from Sycamore Ranch to Neverland, in honor of the fictional island in the story Peter Pan.

One of Michael's former publicists (not Bob Jones), who had been dismissed from the star's staff, privately told reporters, "I'm sure Jackson selected the location because it's across from a nursery school. If the tots there were too young for his blood, there's also a prep school nearby filled with goodlooking young boys, who have never had an older man `Beat It' for them."

Michael immediately set about securing the property from fans who might learn of his new address. Soon

Neverland had a police force and was entered by an iron and steel gate which was topped by a mammoth gilded crown, symbol of the King of Pop.



His autobiography, from Doubleday

After Neverland was renovated to his specifications, Michael threw a "warming bash," inviting friends and associates, but deliberately ignoring Papa Joe and Katherine. "I found out about Michael's new home by watching the TV news," Papa Joe said. However, Michael did invite his brothers and sisters, including Janet and Randy, to the housewarming.

Michael assured such friends as Elizabeth Taylor and Jane Fonda that, "You can come to visit me at any time. I'm less than a thirty-minute helicopter ride from Los Angeles."

Attending the housewarming were some of Michael's new celebrity neighbors, including Steven Seagal. Handsome actor John Derek, known for marrying some of the most beautiful women in show business, showed up with his voluptuous wife, Bo Derek, who'd enjoyed such success in the 1979 comedy, 10. "He is my Svengali-like mentor," she told Michael. She later was surprised when she was asked to sign a release, swearing that she'd never divulge to the press anything she'd learned during her visit to Neverland.

Michael also had another seductive neighbor, Cheryl Ladd, a staple of 1970s pop culture and the actress who replaced Farrah Fawcett on the hit TV series, Charlies Angels.

Even during the Bad tour, when Michael was performing around the world, he flew back to California for visits to Neverland as often as he could.

When Moonwalk was released on April 20, 1988, following four years of ghost-writing, Michael was in Liverpool, appearing in the hometown of The Beatles on his Bad tour.

He called home to apologize to Joe for his revelations in the book. His father had already gone on television in April of 1988 denying Michael's allegations. Joe called his discipline of his boys "little spankings." Also interviewed, Marlon Jackson claimed that Michael was accurate in his revelations of the beatings. "We were hit-and hit often," Marlon charged.

The prediction of Michael's editor at Doubleday came true, as the former First Lady, Jackie Kennedy Onassis, watched Moonwalk sell nearly half-amillion copies in 14 countries, topping the bestseller list of The New York Times.

Michael dedicated the book to Fred Astaire, and it carried an appreciation signed by Jackie. "To many people, Michael Jackson seems an elusive personality," she wrote. "But to those who work with him, he is not. This talented artist is a sensitive man, warm, funny, and full of insight. Michael's book, Moonwalk, provides a startling glimpse of the artist at work and the artist in reflection."

Bo Derek

That was the public face she put on the book. In private she expressed her disappointment, revealing that Doubleday had turned down the first version-"not juicy enough. The second version wasn't a whole lot better. As juicy as a dried-up turnip."

Jackie oversaw much of the promotion for the book, including full-size cutouts of Michael in stores. A hand written note by Michael claimed, "one of the reasons I haven't given interviews over the years is because I've been saving what I have to say for my book. Love, Michael." In spite of that claim, he had almost nothing to say in the book that his fans hadn't already heard or read elsewhere.

The reaction of his fans was as diverse as those fans themselves. One reader got carried away claiming Moonwalk was "the single greatest autobiography I have ever read in my life." This statement could be true, if we knew how many autobiographies, if any, this rabid fan had read. Other more realistic reviewers, such as Terry Callen, of Gloucester City, New Jersey, found the book, "A total whitewash.... The world as Michael Jackson thinks it should be." Another savvy reader, also from New Jersey, found Moonwalk "the most blatantly bogus and self-serving autobiography since Joan Crawford wrote her self-tome in the 60s."

The Jackson family was uniformly negative about Moonwalk, especially Michael's brother Marlon, who found three-fourths of the book "a lie." La Toya also expressed her disappointment. "Cold and impersonal. What did he leave out? The beginning. The middle. And the end."

At the same time Katherine was also shopping her version of life with the Jacksons. She called it The Jackson: My Family, and sent a draft of her autobiography to Jackie at Doubleday. "All vanilla with no chocolate sauce," Jackie wrote to her publisher. The book was filled with such fairytale revelations as Michael telling his second-grade teacher, "Someday I'm going to live in a castle."

In spite of her troubled, often violent marriage to Joe, she wrote, "Occasionally when Joe and I are lying in bed at night, one of us will become nostalgic: `Remember when...?' Before we know it, we're reliving one of the countless special moments in our family's past: Our kids' living room sock hops, The Jackson Five's public debut at a department store in Glen Park, Illinois. Joe will never admit publicly that he can be just as sentimental as I, so I just did it for him." She ends on an upbeat note, visualizing herself "watching the grandkids perform as professionals someday." Her book was eventually published by St. Martin's Paperbacks and released in 1990.

Flying into Narita Airport in Japan on September 9, 1987, Michael was besieged by fans, as police struggled valiantly to keep him from being mobbed. He was angered when 300 photographers arrived to take pictures of Bubbles, who had flown into Tokyo on a separate flight. "Just who in the hell does this chimp think he is?" Michael asked. "Once again forgetting who the real star is. Me!" He also seemed resentful that Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone presented a ceremonial sword to Bubbles-and not to Michael.

When he was installed in grandeur on the 10th floor of Tokyo's Capitol Hotel, Michael was informed that the rooms would henceforth be known as The Michael Jackson Suites.

After Michael launched a total of fourteen sold-out performances at Korakuen Stadium in Yokohama, he was told that the Japanese had dubbed him "Typhoon Michael." In less than a month, he played to nearly half a million fans at fourteen concerts in three Japanese cities. The world press, covering the Japan tour, seemed to go wacko over Jacko, Today proclaiming-"No pets, no plastic just raw sex." News of the World, using a politically incorrect term, proclaimed "Japs Go Whacko (sic) over Raunchy Jacko."

On the Bad tour, journalist Paul Voth accurately summed up media reaction to Michael. "Even as he triumphed on his world tour, the papers at home and abroad began an assault on Michael that would last for years. Speculation about his nose, his skin, his sexuality-slowly but surely a trend developed. The media concentrated less and less on Michael's musical contributions in favor of the much more profitable stature of portraying him as a weirdo with strange habits and ideas."

On September 14, Michael's manager, Frank DiLeo, informed the world press, including ten journalists flown in from London, that stories that Michael purposely lightens his skin "are preposterous."

In Australia, the press was not so kind. Michael was routinely labeled "Wacko Jacko." One Aussie journalist proclaimed, "In a word, Michael Jackson is a nut case."

Michael responded by writing a letter to People magazine that would have gotten an eighth grader an F in English: "Do not judge a man until you've walked 2 moons in his mocassins (sic). Most people don't know me, that is why they write such things in wich (sic) most is not true. I cry very often because it hurts and I wory (sic) about the children." The letter didn't turn the tide against the lingering wisecracks about him. It did, however, prove to the world that Michael couldn't spell.

Even late-night TV comedians began to suggest that there was "something queer" going on between Michael and Bubbles. "The question is," one raunchy comedian said in a Las Vegas night club, "Is Bubbles the top or the bottom?"

Privately Michael didn't turn such a kind face to the world as suggested by his child-like letter. Hearing of lagging ticket sales among the Aussies, he threatened to fire his entire managerial staff, including DiLeo, if the Bad album didn't top the sales of Thriller. Sales were so poor in Perth and Adelaide that concerts were cancelled.

Comments in the local bars, particular ly among cricket players, were nasty, some claiming they weren't going to pay eighty dollars "to see some dancing nigger faggot. If we want to see dancing, we've got our own aborigines."

Some of the press in Australia was more favorable, reporters labeling Michael "Crocodile Jackson." But for what reason, as that was hardly his image? British journalists wrote about "The Peter Pan of Pop." But some London reporters were fascinated by the stories that kept popping up that Michael was interested in young boys and that he preferred their company to that of a beautiful young woman. Many of his female fans continued to make themselves available to Michael, but he showed no interest. One journalist wrote, "Instead of the Peter Pan of Pop, I'd call him The Pied Piper, luring young boys to God knows what fate." Michael was furious when he heard that and threatened to sue.

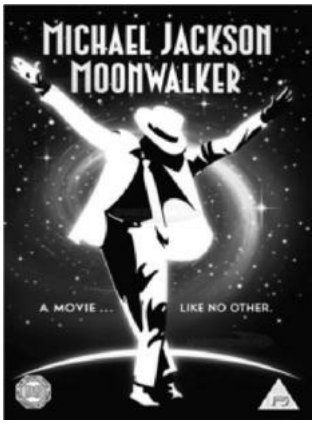
One Australian journalist noted, "Jacko is grabbing his crotch more frequently. He really should masturbate in his dressing room before `coming' on stage. His disgusting performance isn't suitable for children. Actually he doesn't seem to show any crotch at all-rather a concave. Maybe those rumors are true-that he had his pecker cut off."

"Now they're attacking my manhood," Michael lamented. "Who do these jackals think they are, Madonna?"

In January of 1988, Michael turned up in Las Vegas, watching a performance of "Siegfried & Roy" at the Frontier. Meeting the performers backstage, Michael was invited to spend the following day with them at their plush home in the desert. "A gay time was had by all," wrote a cynical Las Vegas reporter.

Siegfried and Roy worked with Michael on creating illusions for his show. To show his gratitude, he wrote their theme song, "The Might in the Magic." A tape of Michael performing the song opened the duo's future shows.

Flying to Pensacola, Florida, for rehearsals for an all-new show, Michael also brought his chef with him. It was reported that Michael existed for several days on a diet of fresh flowers.



He wanted to open the new show in Atlanta but Pepsi, his sponsor, objected. "Not in the home of Coca Cola," Michael was told by Pepsi executives.

Instead, Michael and his troupe opened his U.S. tour in Kansas City. It was reported that backstage before he went on, Michael assembled his troupe together to pray to God to "make us funky!" To judge from the show itself, God granted their request.

Right before leaving Kansas City, Michael was told that his Standing Room Only performances there had brought in $750,000, topping the previous record set by Elvis Presley.

Michael danced a jig of joy. "Who's The King now?" he asked.

It was on to New York and Madison Square Garden. Michael was delighted when a Newsweek reviewer compared his Moonwalk as equivalent in fame to Charlie Chaplin's wobble. The Little Tramp still remained his favorite performer.

Back in the Midwest, Michael landed in St. Louis. To the extreme disappointment of his fans, Michael almost immediately came down with the flu and laryngitis. The culprit who exposed Michael to the infection was reportedly a thirteen-year-old boy introduced as "Peter." Somehow Michael had met this handsome child in New York and had invited him, along with his parents, to tour with them, even on future dates in Europe.

Michael had been seen with Peter so frequently that he touched off tabloid speculation. One journalist even claimed that Michael "bought the kid by giving the parents a Rolls Royce." It was later revealed by Steve Chabre, former head of MJJ Enterprises, that Michael did indeed purchase a Rolls for Peter's parents, as well as a luxurious house in California's San Fernando Valley.

A former garbage collector, Peter's father was hired to go on the road with the Bad troupe. As publicist Bob Jones noted, "On every stop of the tour, Michael and Peter stayed locked in Michael's suite."

While Michael was occupied with Peter, Bob and Michael's chief of security, Bill Bray, had to keep the boy's parents distracted with shopping jaunts. Michael placed no limit on the amount of purchases the parents could charge.

Recovering from "Peter's flu," Michael flew to his home state of Indiana to appear at the Market Square Arena in Indianapolis on March 18, 1988. Although publicly he remained smiling, Michael was overheard saying, "Indiana is a great state . . ." He paused. "To leave."

With Peter by his side, Michael speeded up his tour, playing in Denver, Hartford, and Houston, where he invited Vice President George Bush to attend. The offer was spurned. Next on the tour was Atlanta, where Pepsi, in a reversal of a previous decision, decided to take on the CocaCola giant on its home turf, slathering the town with Pepsi advertising.

Siegfried and Roy

Arriving in Chicago, Michael received the Key to the City from its mayor, Eugene Sawyer.

The leader of the Nation of Islam, minister Louis Farrakhan had denounced Michael's "Victory" tour and had urged a boycott because of Michael's "Jheri-curl, female acting-he's a bad role model for our young boys." But in a grand gesture, Bob Jones invited Farrakhan to a performance. At Michael's request, Eddie Murphy had already given him tapes of Farrakhan's orations.

That night the controversial minister was won over, proclaiming Michael "A Special Messenger of Entertainment." In subsequent speeches, Farrakhan would praise Michael, who would later contribute $25,000 to Farrakhan's "Million Man March" on Washington, DC, on October 16, 1995.

Bob Jones delivered the money in his own name, as Michael didn't want his name used. "This is how Michael operated: Always willing to hang someone else out to dry and cover his own ass," Bob charged. "You see, if the media and public found out that Michael Jackson donated anything to an event sponsored by the Nation of Islam, he'd lose his Jewish friends and a lot of his fan base would turn against him."

After playing in Dallas and Minneapolis, the troupe flew to Europe, landing at Rome's international airport on May 23, 1988. It was time for a reunion with his new friend, Sophia Loren. He escorted her to a party thrown by Franco Zeffirelli, the movie director, at his elegant Rome villa, but Michael spent all the time playing with a gaggle of pajama-clad children and refusing to mingle with tout Roma.

The U.S. Ambassador to Rome, Maxwell Rabb, personally escorted Michael on a private visit to the Sistine Chapel. "Diana Ross taught me to love art," he told the ambassador.

Frank DiLeo had tried to arrange for a private meeting between Pope John Paul II and Michael, but the pontiff canceled at the last minute. Privately he let it be known that, "I don't want to become part of the Michael Jackson publicity machine."

Louis Farrakhan

In October of 1996, Michael decided that if he could not get an audience with the Pope, he wanted to own a piece of him. Reading that the Pope in Rome had successfully undergone surgery for an inflamed appendix, Michael sent an offer to the Vatican to purchase that appendix for a million dollars, noting that such a bequest could be most useful to aid Catholic charities. The private secretary to the Pope did not respond to the offer.

Suffering from laryngitis, Michael played to audiences of 75,000 at concerts at Flaminio Stadio in Rome. Attending were two celebrity guests, Sophia Loren and her rival, Gina Lollobrigida. Lollobrigida confided to Michael, "I haven't spoken to the bee-tch in twenty years until you brought us together for the paparazzi."

Michael had been booked in Rome's deluxe Lord Byron Hotel. With time on his hands, he drew pictures in ink on the white, stiffly starched bed linens, including a self-portrait. After Michael had checked out, a maid at the hotel auctioned the doodles, getting $5,000 for Michael's profile.

Later, Michael was furious to learn that his concerts in Rome and also in the city of Turin in Italy's Piedmont had been illegally taped. These unauthorized tapes eventually made their way into the United States and Britain, although they had to be hawked underground.

Among the 55,000 fans who attended Michael's concert in Basel, Switzerland, was Elizabeth Taylor. It was during their time together in Switzerland that Michael astonished Elizabeth by proposing marriage to her. Both the glamorous mega-star and Michael would later deny the proposal of marriage, but intimates of both parties have insisted over the years that it happened.

To Michael, a May-December marriage to the aging star made a lot of sense. Before flying to Switzerland, he'd even discussed his proposal with Katharine Hepburn, who'd appeared opposite Elizabeth in Tennessee Williams's Suddenly, Last Summer, released in 1959.

"Would she expect sex?" Katharine reportedly asked, obviously being facetious.

"No, not at all!" Michael said, taking the question seriously. "It wouldn't be that kind of relationship."

A gossipy friend of Hepburn's was seated with her when Michael visited the star at her Turtle Bay townhouse in New York City.

"Then go for it if Elizabeth's willing," Hepburn advised. "I was married once. I made it clear from the beginning that there would be no sex after I said `I do.' Since my groom wasn't particularly keen on the opposite sex, that proved no hardship for him at all. I invited his boyfriend along on our honeymoon to Bermuda."

Pope John Paul II

Hepburn told Michael that reporters would stop calling attention to the fact he was not dating if he were married. "You don't ask married men what young girls they're taking out," Hepburn said. "It's not done."

Elizabeth turned Michael down ever so politely, her confidante, Roddy McDowall later said. "Marriage was proposed to Elizabeth by some of the most important men in the world, including a former president of the United States who offered to divorce his wife for her."

Michael, according to McDowall, made a counter-offer, promising to donate $5 million a year in AIDS research if she'd give him her hand in marriage. Still, she said no.

"As my personal history has shown, I'd make a terrible wife but a great friend," she said. "Let's be friends for always. If you need me, wherever you need me, I'll be there."

"That sounds very much like Diana Ross," he said.

"Did you ever propose marriage to her?" she asked. "I think I read that someplace."

"You are the only person in the world I'll ever ask to marry me," he said. "You could lead a life of luxury. Everything you want, all the jewelry you could ever wear."

"But Michael, I already lead a life of luxury. I have more gems than is good for me, with more on the way."

"Rock Hudson, Montgomery Clift, and even James Dean proposed marriage to me, but I told each of them it wouldn't work," she claimed. "It wouldn't have, you know? The same with us. It wouldn't work."

"But you'd be free to have lovers on the side," he said.

"That's a right all my husbands have retained in marriage," she claimed, "and a privilege I've always reserved for myself as well."

"Is your decision final?" he asked.

"Final and forever more," she said. "Now, let's not speak of this again. However, as compensation, I have a few stray children I'll let you adopt."

Before he flew out of Switzerland, Elizabeth promised him that even though she wouldn't marry him, she'd let him host her next wedding.

Before leaving Elizabeth and Switzerland behind him, Michael had one more "house call" to make. He'd solicited and received an invitation to visit Oona Chaplin, the widow of his all-time film hero, Charlie Chaplin, whom Michael always referred to as "The Little Tramp." Chaplin had died in 1977, and Michael wanted to bring flowers to his gravesite near her home in Vevey, Switzerland.

The Oona Chaplin Michael encountered was not what he expected from the famous widow. Her appearance shocked him. She came into her living room wearing tight-fitting clothes more suited to Tatum O'Neal or Brooke Shields. Her appearance was rather unkempt, and she wore too much makeup, as if trying to erase twenty years from her face.

She spoke of the "lonely years after Charlie died" and told Michael that The Little Tramp ended his life in a wheelchair. "I was his watchdog and nurse day and night, waiting on him hand and foot. He fired all the nurses I hired for him."

Oona joined Michael for the pilgrimage to Chaplin's gravesite. She spoke with a certain pain about her previous life and how she'd been dominated by two powerful men, both her famous playwright father, Eugene O'Neill, and Chaplin, whom she'd married in 1943 when she was just seventeen and he was fifty-four. "My father cut off communication with me when I married Charlie," she said.

She was surprised that Michael did not know who Eugene O'Neill was, but she patiently explained to him the significant role he'd played in the American theater.

Back at the Chaplin house, she led Michael into the bathroom. At first he protested, "I like to do my business in private."

"No, no, you silly boy." In the bathroom she removed a bottle labeled "shampoo." Drinking half of it, she offered him the bottle. "Want some?" she asked. He declined. "It's not shampoo, ducky. But liquor. My family hides my bottles from me, but I outsmart them."

Oona was living up to her reputation. Before meeting her, Michael had heard stories about her wandering the streets of Vevey at night in her bare feet, dressed in a nightgown. She'd shout obscenities to passersby. The tolerant policemen never arrested her, but drove her back to the safety of her home, where they would put her to bed.

Bizarrely, Michael wanted to know about the body-snatching caper that occurred one rainy night on March 1, 1978, at the Vevey cemetery where Chaplin was buried. A Bulgarian and a Pole had stolen her husband's coffin and had held it for ransom, demanding 600,000 Swiss francs. Eventually they were arrested, and Chaplin's body returned to Oona, who arranged for its second burial.

Oona Chaplin

"Imagine what grave-robbers would ask for my body if they ever snatched it when I die?" Michael asked, inserting himself into the drama.

"They're not going to get my body," she told Michael. "In my will I've demanded that my coffin be encased in a solid block of concrete two feet thick."

"But what if you're buried alive," he asked. "You'll never escape if you wake up in a coffin like that."

"That's something you need not worry your pretty head about," she said.

Before leaving, Oona startled Michael by making a request. "More than anything in the world I want to meet the divine Mel Gibson. Do you know him? If so, please introduce us. I'll fly to Los Angeles. If you don't know Mel, maybe some other handsome hunk in Hollywood. You won't believe the checks I've written to handsome men after Charlie died. I bought a luxury apartment in New York for one of my favorites. Like Charlie, he was very well endowed."

Whether Oona knew it or not, she was preaching to the choir. Michael himself had written many a check, but to males who were slightly younger than those Oona so desperately desired. And much larger checks awaited Michael's penmanship in his future.

Because she was trembling, he took her hand. "Aging courtesans in Europe used to give sound advice to young girls. Spend your youth with a rich old man so that you can enjoy old age in the company of a handsome hunk."

On June 27, Michael launched his concerts at the Pare des Princes in Paris. In attendance were Grace Jones and the designer Patrick Kelly. The mayor of Paris, Jacques Chirac, presented Michael with La Grande Medaille de la Ville de Paris, an honor usually given only to visiting heads of state. Michael accepted the honor but turned down the invitation to a formal state dinner. He had other plans.

Bob Jones later claimed that those other plans concerned "Peter," who had suddenly reappeared. Michael was staying at the grand luxe Hotel Crillon in the heart of Paris. Later, Jolie Levine, an aide to Michael, discovered a mysterious sheet in the star's bedroom where he'd been sleeping with Peter. Evocative of the incident at the Lord Byron in Rome, Michael had drawn a picture in ink of himself and Peter on the sheet.

"Also written on the sheet was what amounted to a love note to the boy," Jones claimed. "The sheet was my first tangible clue that Michael Jackson, the King of Pop, was up to no good with this young kid." Jones and Levine smuggled the sheet out of the hotel to prevent it from falling into the hands of the tabloids.

Bob told Frank DiLeo of his discovery. Michael's manager, according to Bob, topped him with a story of his own about an incident that occurred during Michael's trip with Peter to the Cote d'Azur. In Nice, DiLeo "found a sheet painted with human feces." Bob claimed that one of Michael's favorite words was "doo-doo." Now he knew why.

Michael had succeeded in making friends with two of the most famous women on the planet, Elizabeth Taylor and Jackie Kennedy Onassis. He had only one more conquest to make it a triumvirate. He wanted to befriend Princess Diana, the third woman he most admired in the world.

Michael's dream was realized on July 16, 1988, at the third concert of the Bad tour at Wembley Stadium. He'd flown into Heathrow Airport on July 11 with his personal doctor, dentist, throat specialist, and chiropodist. In addition, he brought with him a masseur, a manicurist, a hair dresser, a personal chef, two secretaries, and eight "minders."

Backstage he met the lady of his dreams, Diana, the Princess of Wales, for the first time. She seemed somewhat awed by Michael, later telling friends, "He is the most famous man I've ever met."

Another famous man, Prince Charles, stood at her side. Although formally polite, he was hardly in awe of Michael, who did not make his kind of music. As a student at Cambridge, the Prince of Wales had played Barbra Streisand recordings night after night. With that great diva, the Prince would have an on-again, off-again affair.

Michael seemed greatly disappointed that the Prince and Princess of Wales did not bring Prince William and Prince Harry to this special presentation. He'd had Bad tour jackets specially made for the boys. Recovering from his disappointment, Michael presented the royal pair with two checks-one for 100,000 pounds for the Great Ormond Street Children's Hospital, another for 150,000 pounds for the Prince's Trust for disadvantaged children.

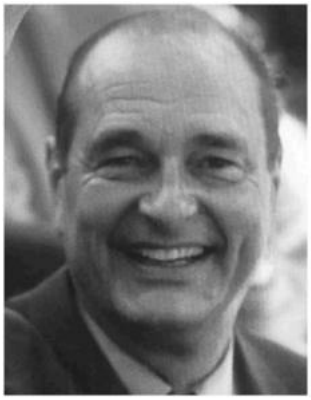
Not only that, Michael presented them with a framed set of cassettes and compact discs of Off the Wall, his mega-selling Thriller, and Bad. He'd heard that he was the favorite pop star of the Princess.

Embarrassing the Prince, Michael asked him why he didn't bring his sons to the concert. "William is only six years old, Harry just three," Charles said. "There's a thing called bedtime."

Michael made a special request to the Prince, telling him that his pet chimp, Bubbles, had been denied entry into England. He asked the Prince to intervene so that he could be reunited with his pet. Charles smiled politely, saying nothing.

In parting, Charles astonished Michael by saying, "I hear you dance very well. The next time you're in London, you must come by and teach me how to dance. I'm a bit awkward on the ballroom floor."

Even before flying into London, Michael had debated removing the song, "Dirty Diana," from the evening's performance. He felt that it might offend the Princess, although it was not about her. At the last minute, Michael changed his mind and decided to perform "Dirty Diana" after all. The reaction of the Princess was carefully recorded. She seemed to like the song. Standing up from her seat, she danced with the music. Seated beside her, Charles sat in obvious discomfort. At the song's end, Diana applauded wildly, as



French President Jacques Chirac

Charles remained motionless, looking like he'd rather be somewhere else.

MJ, Princess Di, and Prince Charles

Michael later told the press, "I was so excited at meeting the royal couple. I'm very, very happy that they came to watch me perform. I thought the Princess was just wonderful." He made no mention of Charles.

After the concert, Michael was told that the royal couple had left the stadium in a limousine to avoid the crowds. Two other famous guests, he was told, were waiting backstage to greet him: Joan Collins and Ava Gardner.

He received the glamorously dressed Collins first for a very brief meeting. He'd met her once before. In front of people, she said, perhaps facetiously, "If you ever want to switch, darling, and try a woman for a change, you're welcome to lose your virginity to me. Countless other men have made such a sacrifice for me." Michael seemed embarrassed.

A more modestly gowned Ava Gardner followed, her great beauty of the late 1940s and early 50s a memory long faded but forever immortalized on film.

"Sugartit!, I loved your performance. I hear 01' Blue Eyes himself is jealous of you-not for your singing, but for how much money you make."

"Weren't you the actress that married Frank Sinatra?"

"One and the same, honeychild."

"What was it like being married to a man like that?" he asked.

Prince William in uniform

"I could write a book," she said. "He was great in the sack. Our troubles began while I was on my way to the bidet."

"I don't understand what that means," he said, looking puzzled.

"I'll explain it to you, but in the next lifetime, love," she said, air-kissing him on both cheeks. "You put on quite a show, child. If I ever do another musical like Showboat, I'll ask the studio to use your voice to dub for me." She turned and walked away.

When she'd gone, Michael told an aide, "I can see why Sinatra divorced her. She's not gentle like Elizabeth. Or as kind as Sophia. She seems like a very brittle woman. Maybe she's mad because she's lost her beauty. With the breakthroughs in plastic surgery these days, stars don't have any more excuses to look old."

Ava Gardner

After Michael flew back to the United States, he began to call the Princess at least once a week. Since he was such an international star, she accepted the calls, at least at first. Most often they talked about children. "I live for my children," she confided to him. "They are my joy, the reason I get up in the morning."

Both of them talked openly about the increasingly invasive and aggressive paparazzi and how difficult it was to live while stalked constantly the moment one left one's door.

Michael told the Princess that he admired her sense of style and grace so much that he'd dressed up one of his mannequins to resemble her, complete with a blonde wig and a diamond-studded tiara. He had seen Diana photographed in what she called "my Elvis dress." White and sequin-studded, the dress had a matching jacket with a turned-up collar. Diana told friends that she "felt both funky and feminine" when wearing the dress, "which I probably do too often, but I can't stand the idea of giving it up-it's my favorite."

Michael informed the Princess that he talked with her plastic version for hours.

"What do you talk about?" she asked.

"Mostly children," he said. "Our mutual love for them. How difficult it is to be shy and yet a public person. How to deal with the media. Our fears that it might one day destroy both of us."

Whether Michael deliberately promoted these stories or not, his so-called romantic link to Princess Di began to appear in the tabloids. The Star reported that Michael "at long last" had fallen for a woman, the object of his affection being Princess Diana herself. Not only that, but Diana, according to reports, wanted to star in Michael's next musical video in which she would dance with him. These reports were ridiculous, of course.

A student of media, Donald Tracy, said, "More lies have been printed in the tabloids about Michael Jackson than any celebrity in history. Why? I ask myself. Because the truth-at least until the child molestation charges became public domain-would be devastating. From the very beginning, I think reporters were too savvy to believe all that hype about Michael and women.

But they printed the stories anyway because Michael was hot copy, and they had to write something about him."

Michael sent lavish gifts to Prince William in London, but not to Prince Harry, who was a bit young, even for Michael's taste in special friends. These presents were always carefully rewrapped and returned to Neverland, with the same suggestion, written endlessly. "The Princess thanks you for such marvelous gifts, but William is already blessed with so many things given to him by his parents. He does receive gifts from well-wishers around the world. It is our policy to return these gifts with the suggestion that they be given to other children in need. Think of the joy that would bring."

Michael was said to be offended by this rejection, but that didn't stop him from sending even more expensive presents. He also kept beseeching the Princess to allow William to fly to Neverland. The more rejections he received, the more passionate he became in his campaign to entertain William for a sleepover.

While she was still speaking to him, Diana told Michael that she'd nicknamed William "Billy the Basher," because he liked to play rowdy sports. She said, "Like us, he has the paparazzi following him everywhere. Even if he rides his bike across the palace yard, it's a front page tabloid event."

One night the Princess told Michael that William had at long last chosen his desired profession. "I want to be a policeman," the boy said.

She claimed, "I informed him that his future role had already been determined at birth. `You're going to be King!' I told him."

Michael hastily added, "I'm a king too. The King of Pop."

"I think I heard that somewhere," Diana said jokingly.

Prince William became an obsession of Michael's. He'd framed a blowup of the young Prince taken on his first day at Wetherby School in 1987, wearing his regulation red shorts, which were mandatory even in the middle of winter. Under a hat and smiling, the Prince was seen dressed in a red tie with red-trimmed stockings and waving at the crowds. He carried a Postman Pat lunchbox. Michael ordered his staff to send William a Michael Jackson lunchbox.

Princess Di, 1985

During his brief marriage to Lisa Marie Presley, Michael taunted her, claiming he had this ongoing affair with Princess Di. It was reported that Lisa Marie was jealous, although for what reason is not known. Certainly she had no sexual interest in her husband. It must have been for some other reason, perhaps resenting that Michael had such a world-famous friend.

When Bob Jones heard that Michael was creating some imaginary affair with Princess Di, he said, "Give me a break! The King (i.e., Michael) didn't have a relationship with Princess Diana. He admired her, and a number of calls were put into Diana's people on behalf of Michael. He badly wanted to be friends with her, but apparently she wasn't the least bit interested."

Bob claimed that he personally made calls to Kensington Palace. Instead of getting Diana on the phone, "a polite gentleman" answered. "I told him that Michael had matters he wished to discuss with the Princess," Bob said. "I was told to write down the subject matter in detail, send it along, and they'd get back to me. To my knowledge, none of those calls was ever returned."

Finally, through this "polite gentleman," Michael was told in rather harsh terms that no more presents for William would be accepted but would be returned unwrapped to Neverland. Michael was also told that because of prior commitments, William would not be available to be Michael's guest at Neverland-"not at the present time, not in the near or even distant future." At the bottom of the carefully written note, the Princess had scrawled in her own handwriting:

"Michael,

Please stop sending gifts! They aren't wanted. And please stop calling. Your calls will not be returned. Best wishes in your future career."

It was reported that Michael, after receiving this note, stayed in his bedroom at Neverland, crying for three days and refusing to eat except for a cup of vegetable broth a day.

Princess Di wasn't the only dilemma facing Bob Jones as Michael's publicist. Within a few months after signing on, Bob came to believe that his new employer was a racist.

In his book, The Man Behind the Mask, Bob writes: "Michael Jacksonbeneath the bleached skin that has made him a grotesque caricature of a female alien-was black too. He was also the weirdest and most inexplicable of racists. His favorite word to describe blacks, his original race, was Splaboo. Yep, Splaboo. It was a word he used a lot, a word he used around people such as Macaulay Culkin."

Bob also noted in his memoirs that Papa Joe always "favored lightskinned black folks" and that "Tito, Jackie, Janet, and many of the younger generations have selected white or non-blacks as their mates."

Michael was never known as a public champion of black people, as was his close friend, Marlon Brando, or many other stars such as Harry Belafonte. As Bob and the rest of the world were observing in the late 1980s, Michael's skin color became a source of endless tabloid speculation. He was in denial of his own pigmentation, which was changing before the eyes of his fans.

In his role as a spokesman for Michael, Bob was constantly asked what Michael was doing to change his original skin color. Through it all, Michael continued to deny skin bleaching and plastic surgery on his nose. "I guess he didn't want to look like a Splaboo," a security guard at Neverland said sarcastically.

To make himself even whiter, Michael smeared his already-bleached skin with white makeup, creating a freakish aura. Bob noted that Michael, between 1972 and 1998, had so much plastic surgery that "he went from being a really handsome African-American kid to an awful facsimile of a Caucasian woman.

Skin pigmentation wasn't all that was on Michael's mind during the late 80s as he installed himself at Neverland.

The tabloids followed his every move, reporting on one scandal after another whether true or not. One astonishing report may have had some authenticity to it. Michael was terrified of being recognized by his fans when he ventured out of his house. To prevent that, he adopted many disguises. One day he heard that some Swiss scientists were close to developing a potion that would make people invisible-movies, of course, have been made with that theme. Michael seemed willing to invest $1 million in that potion if it could make him invisible. He told some of his staff at Neverland that, if invisible, he could give some of the potion to Bubbles too. That way, both of them could go shopping at various malls, including toy stores, and not be molested by the public. How an invisible man could go into a toy store and buy merchandise without attracting attention was never explained.

After several futile attempts, Michael realized that the invisible potion, if such an elixir existed, was only in the early planning stages, far too soon in its development to make him disappear any time soon.

Far more obtainable-or so he reportedly felt at the time-was a desire to acquire another skeleton. He'd failed to secure the bones of the Elephant Man. But out there in a Los Angeles cemetery, with the traffic whizzing by, rested the bones of the world's most enduring sex symbol, Marilyn Monroe.

He'd heard that the heirs to her estate were "one greedy bunch," as his friend Marlon Brando had charged. Brando later reported that Michael had talked seriously of making an offer of $5 million to secure MM's skeleton. "I just went along with Michael for the ride," Brando claimed. "I thought, of course, it was just a .joke. My mistake was in not realizing that Michael's doesn't joke. I like to play practical jokes on people all the time, especially if they are close friends."

As a great actor, Brando maintained a serious face when he told Michael what he might do with Marilyn's bones. "Marilyn and I were lovers," Brando said. "Our affair began right after the war when I picked her up at a sleazy bar in New York. It continued on and off right up until her murder. In fact, hours before she was killed, we had a date to get together for dinner."

Marilyn's fate?

Brando's suggestion, if Michael could have her corpse removed from the Mausoleum of Memories at Westwood Memorial Park, was not to keep Marilyn's bones hidden away at Neverland. "First, I'd have a designer put Marilyn's bones in a bikini," Brando said. "She loved diamonds-even sang about them. Definitely a diamond tiara and a diamond necklace are in order. The costlier the better. I'd install her as an attraction on Hollywood Boulevard, charging fifteen dollars a ticket. People would gladly pay that. But it can't be just a stack of bones. I'd lay her out in the center like a funeral parlor. An open casket. But all around I'd have wide screens showing some of her famous moments. That walk in Niagara. That satiny pink gown she wore when she sang `Diamonds are a Girl's Best Friend' in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. Her walk at the rail station in Chicago in Some Like It Hot. Her singing `Heat Wave' in There's No Business Like Show Business. Newsreels of Marilyn and Joe DiMaggio. Her standing on that subway grate in The Seven Year Itch as a blast of hot air blows her skirt up to her panties. Definitely pictures of her in New York, in that skin-tight gown singing `Happy Birthday' to President Kennedy."

Michael told Brando that he thought "all your ideas are just great."

After Michael had left his house, Brando called one of his friends. "The kid actually thought I was serious. I was just talking shit like I like to do for fun. He really believed me. I must be a better actor than I thought I was."

Goddess

Like Prince William, the bones of Marilyn Monroe eluded Michael. But he still wanted to live in a fantasy world, one he could create at Neverland. After recovering from several setbacks, he pulled himself up out of his bed to oversee construction, on the grounds of Neverland, of "another Disneyland," one far greater than he'd created at Hayvenhurst. "I don't have to dream, but can live in my dream," he told staff members.

At Neverland, Michael experienced the first real freedom he'd ever known in his life. At long last he was free of his smothering mother, Katherine, and dictatorial Papa Joe. He also did n't have his siblings, especially their mates, interfering or, worse, judging his lifestyle.

Michael's freedom didn't extend to his employees, each of whom was forced to sign a confidentiality agreement. "He ran Neverland like Himmler might direct a concentration camp," said one disgruntled employee who had been fired because he'd violated a cardinal rule. "I talked to one of the other employees. We were not supposed to talk to each other. We were also told to look down at our navels when Michael walked by." As an afterthought, he added, "It was Jackson who should have bowed his head in shame."

In the years ahead, employees-most of whom were no longer working at Neverland-reported that dozens of young boys were dropped off at the guarded front gate and handed over to Michael's "security force." One of Michael's special policemen would then assist the boy into a fanciful carriage pulled by a Clydesdale.

After he had been escorted to the main hall of Neverland, the boy du jour was taken to Michael's bedroom. After securing clearance, the boy was allowed to enter the room. At such times, Michael himself would be lurking behind the door but would not appear within its frame. The aide would not see him in the flesh. Presumably the boy wouldn't get to feast his eyes on Michael until after he entered the darkened room.

When staff members did see Michael in his room, as when making a delivery, he was often in tight white briefs, but always in full makeup. Sometimes he'd be discovered in bed with a young boy, each nude from the waist up, a sheet covering their lower bodies.

Later, one employee told the police, "I don't know how Michael contacted the parents of these young boys and gained their consent to deliver a ten-year-old, or even a twelve-year-old, to Michael's den. How did he make contact with them and get their permission? I know he did that because it was the parents, sometimes just a mother, who would deliver her son to Neverland. Sometimes a boy would stay only a night, with his mother waiting to pick him up the next morning. In one case an especially beautiful wide-eyed boy, probably the best-looking kid I've ever seen in my life, was delivered to Michael's room where he stayed nearly a month. Michael must have really dug that kid."

There are just some things MJ can't have

Two courses of introductions have been suggested. Michael often invited young boys, including some young girls, to Neverland to enjoy its Disney-like attractions. Once the children were at play, he would select those boys whom he'd like to get to know better. Often he made his selection when they were playing shirtless or else wearing a swim suit to jump into his pool.

Another method of contact was through dozens of model agencies in Los Angeles, many of whom specialized in child models for both TV and print advertising. Michael would order publicity photographs of these boys sent to Neverland. Staff members reported that he would spend the good part of many a day studying each photograph carefully and evaluating it. His excuse to the agencies was that he was planning to make musical videos involving child actors, as he'd done in the past. It was reported that Michael seemed especially interested in the lips on a young boy.

Johnny Ciao was employed as a chef at Neverland during the greater part of 1988. During that time, he witnessed a parade of boys being entertained by Michael. One boy, who "looked like an angel," was estimated to be only eight years old. Staff members felt that the oldest boys Michael entertained were thirteen years of age-rarely sixteen or seventeen.

In a move he'd later regret, Michael hired Mark and Faye Quindoy, a Filipino couple, to manage his Neverland estate. They would later spill many of Michael's secrets to the world, appearing on such shows as Geraldo Rivera's Now It Can Be Told. When child molestation charges first appeared, and the Quindoys were questioned by California police, the couple agreed to testify against Michael. They would later sue Michael for $300,000 back pay and also sue his envoy, Anthony Pellicano, who denounced them as "cockroaches and failed extortionists."

Having replaced Johnny Ciao, Faye Quindoy became Michael's personal cook, preparing such treats as a Mickey Mouse Cake and the Seven Dwarfs Pizza. Her husband presided over Michael's small army of 15 armed guards, 32 groundskeepers, and two animal keepers, even a fire "brigade" of one firefighter.

When Michael and his special friend of the moment tired of his own Disneyland at the ranch, he'd asked Mark Quindoy to drive them to Solvang, which, like Neverland, lay in the Santa Ynez Valley. Because of its association with early Danish settlers, the town offers a taste of Scandinavia in California, with much of its architecture in the traditional Danish style. There is even a copy of the most famous statue in Copenhagen, the Little Mermaid, as inspired by the tale of Hans Christian Andersen.

One day Mark drove Michael to Solvang, accompanied by a seven-yearold boy who was spending his nights in Michael's bed.

After pulling a four-wheel-drive Chevrolet Blazer into Solvang, Mark accompanied Michael and the boy as they explored the town, stopping at a mammoth dollhouse Michael was considering duplicating at Neverland.

On the way back to the ranch, Mark later reported that he was astonished to witness Michael in an embrace with the boy-"like a lover, kissing him passionately. It was just like a boy kissing a girl in the backseat," he later testified. He claimed that the boy put up no protest but just sat there quietly tolerating it even when Michael wet-kissed him on the lips. "Michael began kissing him everywhere-his neck, head, arms, shoulders, and body. I was utterly stunned-appalled that he could do that to a seven-year-old boy. The kid stayed for another three weeks at Neverland before departing with his mother, who had been staying in Michael's guest house. The next day a nine-yearold boy showed up and began his sleepovers in Michael's bedroom."

Years later, when contacted by investigative reporters while living in Manila, the Quindoys admitted that "Jackson chose one boy at a time. The kids were assaulted with sounds and lights. Lewd things went on right under the noses of the parents." The couple claimed that they did not go to the police because "we were just witnesses, not victims."

One big question has been raised-but never quite answered: Why did mothers allow their kids to be alone all night with an adult male in his bedroom? Rabbi Shmuley Boteach said, "No one has suggested that women have sunk so low that they would prostitute their own children in order to benefit from proximity to a superstar." He cited the case of Michael Jackson as "a frightening new sickness in the American soul. The pursuit of money and celebrity has driven some Americans to use their own children as the means by which to obtain rewards. Just when you thought that respect for women in our popular culture had reached its nadir, along comes a new stereotype: the mother as pimp."

Michael's bedroom was on the second floor of Neverland's main residence, a manor-style building with nearly a dozen additional bedrooms. There were an extra four bedrooms within an elegant and rather tastefully decorated guest house in back.

The Quindoy witnesses

He had ordered that a secret playroom be constructed next to the manor. Like Michael's perpetually darkened bedroom, this playroom was strictly off-limits to other employees. Sometimes Michael would spend all day in this playroom with his special friend of the moment.

Michael not only maintained a shrine to Elizabeth Taylor, but he created the Shirley Temple Room. He'd seen all of her films, including Wee Willie Winkie and The Little Colonel, many of them countless times, and had decorated the room with film posters of his favorite Shirley Temple flicks. He'd also collected lots of Temple memorabilia, including a pair of patent-leather Mary Jane shoes that she'd worn in one of her movies. He'd also purchased curly haired wigs sold in the 30s to young girls whose mothers wanted them to look like the chubby-cheeked toddler.

Michael was especially intrigued with a series of shorts Temple had made in the early 1930s. Called Baby

Burlesks, these films starring young kids spoofed movies and stars of the early Talkies. Viewed today, these seemingly innocent films have been called "baby porn," attracting every pedophile in America-that is, those who desired young girls instead of young boys.

To more mature and cynical audiences in the decades to come, Temple became a joke and was endlessly spoofed. One critic wrote, "She was precocious to the point of nausea, overemphasizing every goody-goody line, pouring on each inflection of cheer and wringing forth every tear in a manner that had nothing whatsoever to do with real acting." But Michael didn't agree with that. He was a self-admitted "sucker" for a Temple movie any time she wanted to take a ride on the Good Ship Lollipop. He even ordered a Shirley Temple mannequin, dressing it in baby pink with a pink bow holding up her curly coiffure.

One day he invited Mrs. Shirley Temple Black to visit Neverland, and she accepted his invitation. In her 60s and rather matronly, Temple had hesitated before accepting the invitation. Her nervousness was evident when Michael greeted her in the foyer of Neverland. "Are you disappointed in me?" she asked.

"Of course not," he said. "I'm honored."

"I'm always embarrassed to meet fans of my pictures from the 30s," she said. "I feel I've betrayed them by growing up. Even worse, growing old."

"You are not old," he assured her. "You'll be forever young in your films which will also live forever. The world will always remember you as young."

Michael appeared before Temple in full makeup, including mascara, eyeliner, and Honey Glow.

Not missing a beat, nor even appearing startled that she was greeting a man in heavy makeup, Temple studied Michael's face momentarily and said, "I like Honey Glow myself."

As he ushered her into the Shirley Temple Room, she took his hand and searched for his eyes behind his sunglasses. "Like you, I sacrificed my youth to entertain others," she confessed. "But by 1949 the studios told me I can't be a cute little girl forever. Now let's look around this Shirley Temple Room. I'm sure it'll bring back so many memories."

Mrs. Temple Black became the U.S. Ambassador to Ghana and later Czechoslovakia. At the time of her meeting with Michael, the two stars exchanged autobiographies, he giving her a copy of Moonwalk and she presenting him with her tome, Child Star.

Mrs. Temple Black grew up. Michael never did.

For his master bedroom at Neverland, Michael purchased an oversized red velvet and gold throne, "fit for a queen," as a member of the Neverland staff jokingly suggested. He also had a four-poster bed. But for extreme privacy, he ordered the construction of a Secret Room. It was entered through a ten-foot walk-in closet packed with childish novelties and other bizarre artifacts. A door was hidden at the rear of the closet behind an array of Michael's favorite military costumes.

A narrow, carpeted stairwell, lined with rag dolls, led to the windowless, eight-by-seven-foot secret chamber.

In the 90s when the police searched Neverland, trying to find evidence to prove a case of child molestation against Michael, they accidentally stumbled upon this private hideaway. The room, police discovered, was sparsely furnished, containing an oversized sofa, upholstered in a satiny pink, a Trinitron TV, and a bed covered with pillows depicting Peter Pan and Tinkerbell. A bugeyed, red-headed Troll Doll was placed in the center of the bed. There was also a Mickey Mouse phone. For art, pictures of smiling babies in diapers lined the walls.

When the existence of the secret room became known to the public, reporters labeled it Michael's "creepy lair." When Michael was not entertaining a boy in his bedroom, he would take the child out to enjoy the grounds at Neverland, which included Michael's Disney-esque attractions and his animal menagerie.

His private zoo was complete with tigers, lions, and giraffes. There were also two elephants, the baby elephant a gift from Elizabeth Taylor. Michael ordered that the animal be painted in his favorite shade of pink.

A "Lawrence of Arabia" camel was part of the menagerie, as was a baby llama called "Puddin' Pie." There were enough pink flamingos to rival their nesting ground on Inagua Island, in The Bahamas. Michael also had a cage of chimps, supplying them with papayas, mangoes, and boxed fruit juices.

Throughout the park were waterproof pictures of Michael holding hands with children. Both parents and children, even such famous guests as Elizabeth Taylor and Gregory Peck, were invited to enjoy Michael's fantasy park.

Security guards from the Nation of Islam required each guest to sign a waiver agreeing not to carry cameras. Later cell phones were added to the forbidden list. If a visitor violated the mandate, he or she might be escorted from the grounds of Neverland by a guard.

One of those guards reported that Michael threw rocks at his lion to make him roar. He could often be seen riding his Ferris wheel with a series of boys.

One guard claimed, "I can't count the number of young boys who rode with Michael on that Ferris wheel, his arm locked possessively around them. All the young kids were instructed to call Michael `Daddy.'"

Shirley all grown up

Sometimes he would simultaneously hold the hands of two boys as he escorted them around his amusement park, whose white-painted Victorian gazebos and ornate street lamps evoked fin de sie- cle Paris. He even had treehouses built on the property. He'd climb up to one of these getaways in the sky with his favorite of the moment.

After Michael adopted child star Macaulay Culkin as his favorite, he installed a water pistol range, "Mac and Mike's Waterforts," for some epic water pistol battles. Ice cream flavors came in an astonishing array, including one Michael himself created-kiwi fruit and peanut butter. One arcade played rap music all day, although Michael had ordered a sound engineer to edit out "the curse words."

He told his adult visitors that his flowerbeds cost him $300,000 a year to maintain. "I can't stand to see a flower die," he said. "When a flower withers, I order one of my gardeners to dig up the bulb and replace it immediately with one that will bloom again."

Lunch was always provided for the kids invited to Neverland. "The kids skipped the vegetables and main courses and went immediately for the desserts," said a former cook. "After a big lunch, they'd spend the rest of the day eating pink cotton candy or devouring bags of popcorn. All of them went home with a belly ache."

When the builders of Neverland thought they were finished with the project, Michael demanded more-his own steam railway, a fun fair, a cinema, and a make-believe Indian village. When everything was finished, Michael hired a Charlie Chaplin impersonator to wander the grounds, amusing the children, who usually didn't know anything about the silent screen star.

After Michael's guests had departed, he often retreated to "The Giving Tree" overlooking a lake. Here he would write lyrics, including the song, "Childhood":

People say I'm not OK
'cause I love such elementary things.

It's been my fate to compensate for the childhood I've never known.

Trolls and Peter Pans found in secret room

For truly private getaways, Michael rented a so-called bachelor pad in the summer of 1989, calling it "The Hideout." Actually it was a condo on the 14th floor of The Westford, a luxury housing unit at 10750 Wilshire Boulevard. When the police, in years to come, raided the condo, it was discovered that it didn't have a bed, only a sleeping bag and a large-screen TV

Many of Michael's special friends were taken surreptitiously to The Hideout. Often parents, usually a mother, delivered her son to Neverland. Michael sometimes, later in the dark of the night, took the boy to the condo.

When it was later revealed that Michael had a "secret address," one story was headlined: AT LONG LAST MICHAEL JACKSON DISCOVERS GIRLS.

Perhaps not believing what he wrote, one journalist claimed that Michael-"rather belatedly"-was discovering girls and now had a rendezvous condo for his private assignations.

"This was all a big joke, and the reporters writing such shit probably didn't believe it themselves," said Robert Estelle. "The story about the fuck pad turned out to be true. Only the reporters at the time got the genders confused."

Life was not all fun and games with young boys at Neverland. Michael worked on a 93-minute music video cassette Moonwalker, which included a montage of live footage of himself in concert. With Michael, of course, cast as the main character, Moonwalker also contained a series of fantasy pieces. Even fat boy Frank DiLeo, Michael's manager, appeared in the video, along with familiar faces such as Mick Jagger or Sean Lennon playing themselves. One of the dancers was Michael's nephew, Jermaine Jackson Jr.

Elizabeth Taylor as "Herself' appeared uncredited in archive footage. Michael originally wanted to release Moonwalker in theaters but budget restraints forced him to take it straight to video release.

Peter Pan pillows for the kids

The most disturbing part of Moonwalker wasn't associated with its view of the shrine to Ms. Taylor, but Michael dancing with what supposedly was the Elephant Man's skeleton.

Darkest corners of secret room

Upon its release, Moonwalker was a hit, even outselling the former number one best-selling music video of all time, "The Making of Michael Jackson's `Thriller.'" For twenty-two weeks Moonwalker held its position as Billboard's Number One video cassette. After that, it was knocked down to number two by the release of Michael Jackson: The Legend Continues.

The video racked up sales of $30 million. But Michael had invested $27 million, making his cut less than $3 million, even less when final expenses were deducted.

"He blamed everybody," an aide said confidentially. "He even threatened to fire DiLeo. Jackson shouted, screamed, and raged, placing responsibility on everybody but the one person responsible for the low return-Michael Jackson himself. When he wasn't screaming about Moonwalker, he was screaming about the final tallies coming in on the Bad album, even though it was the second best-selling album of all time. Jackson wanted one hundred million copies sold, not the fifth of that he actually got. We felt he was so unrealistic in the big sales he demanded that he'd become delusional."

After five years of being "inseparable," Michael, for reasons of his own, fired his Uncle Tookie, Frank DiLeo. From all reports, DiLeo had been a successful manager for Michael, the most temperamental star in Hollywood. His manager had stood by Michael through many a disaster.

He had his attorney, John Branca, do the dirty deed. Getting DiLeo on the phone, Branca told him, "Michael called this morning. He's decided he doesn't want to work with you any more."

Putting up a brave front, DiLeo said, "If the kid has mandated that, it's okay with me." That very day he set about trying to find another job. Ironically, he succeeded where Michael hadn't-in the movies. He was cast in Martin Scorsese's Goodfellas, appearing with Robert De Niro, and in both the Waynes World movies with Mike Myers and Dana Carvey.

The Westford

There was much speculation about why Michael fired DiLeo, but only the impulsive star himself knows for sure. At times Michael blamed DiLeo for the tabloid "Wacko Jacko" image. He also blamed him that the album, Bad, didn't top Thriller in sales. He also felt that DiLeo was taking far too much credit for Michael's own achievements. Because Michael would not face the press, and DiLeo had to go on for him in front of TV cameras and microphones, he was becoming increasingly well known. Michael also claimed that DiLeo was getting "too bossy and possessive."

One member of the Bad troupe claimed that "Michael Jackson was seriously pissed about everything. DiLeo, a real sweet, good guy, who lived, breathed, and slept the advancement of the career of Michael Jackson, became the fall guy."

To friends, DiLeo expressed his hurt feelings, "It was cowardly not to call me personally and tell me I was out the door. I treated him like my own son."

Michael didn't want to meet DiLeo's demand for $5 million in severance pay. But when the man Michael once called "my shield of armor, my other half"threatened to go public with "secrets to make the tabloids blush," DiLeo got his $5 million check.

On Diane Sawyer's Good Morning America TV show in 2004, DiLeo gave a somewhat enigmatic answer to a question about why Michael fired him. "I think it was, he fired me because it was politically asked of him. There was an outside record executive with a big-time lawyer and one executive at Sony that would like to see Michael's power cut in half. And getting rid of me was half the power."

DiLeo's final word on Michael: "He's part Howard Hughes, part E.T. Michael Jackson begs description." Like Howard Hughes, who employed a so-called press agent, Johnny Meyer (actually his pimp) to handle many of his least pleasant tasks, the reclusive Michael hid behind DiLeo for a good part of the 80s.

Kenny Rogers, the country music star, was in the unique position of knowing both the King of Pop and the King of Rock and Roll. "Michael is the Elvis of his generation," Kenny said. "Like Elvis, Michael too is locking himself away from the real world. That's an extremely unhealthy way to live. I know what it's like to be mobbed by fans every time you go out. It can be terrifying. But, he's seen out so rarely that when he's spotted, it's a major event-and he gets mobbed. Even so, he's got to learn to get out more."

At Neverland, Michael ventured out very rarely and always in disguise. In spite of invitations from Katherine, he avoided a return visit to Hayvenhurst.

"There were weird things going on at Neverland, but unlike life at Encino, no violence," said a former maid who'd worked at both estates. "The difference between Neverland and Hayvenhurst is that family fights often occurred at Hayvenhurst. Except for Michael, the acorns didn't fall far from the tree."

She was referring to the sons of Papa Joe. In many ways, at least in their domestic lives, they emulated their father's own behavior and unhappy mar riage.

A good example of this involved Michael's brother Jackie: Even though Enid Spann's marriage to Michael's brother, Jackie, had ended in August of 1987, Jackie was later arrested on a charge of harassing his former wife. Arriving at her home, where she was entertaining, Jackie kicked in her French doors, sending shards of glass flying.

She called the police, who later charged Jackie with violating a restraining order issued by a judge.

Jermaine's marital problems seemed even more dramatic than those of Jackie. After a tumultuous marriage to Hazel Gordy, during which Jermaine frequently cheated on his wife, the marriage had wound down by 1988, and would eventually end in divorce. But before it did, Jermaine would start another family with Margaret Maldonado, eventually fathering two children with her-Jeremy and Jourdynn. At one point both Margaret and Hazel were pregnant with Jermaine's babies. As Enid Spann once claimed, Jermaine showed up with his three-month-old son at Marlon Jackson's birthday party in December of 1986, with a pregnant Hazel at his side. In August of 1988, Jermaine, while visiting his ex-wife, Hazel, attempted to rape her. She screamed as he forcefully held her down, but managed to escape by biting his arm.

Randy's romantic life would grow even more complicated than those of his brothers. After reportedly having as many affairs on the side as his older brother, Jermaine, Randy married Eliza Shaffe in May of 1989, an ill-fated union that would produce one child and end in divorce in 1991. The divorce was acrimonious, and Eliza later filed a criminal complaint against Randy, charging that he beat her during her pregnancy. He pleaded no contest to the wife-beating charge and in November of 1991, he was sentenced to a twoyear period of probation. When he violated that probation, a judge sentenced him to one month in jail. Katherine appeared in court to plead her son's case. She was successful in getting the judge to change his decision. He agreed to commit Randy for 30 days to the Pine Grove Mental Hospital where he underwent domestic violence counseling.

Margaret Maldonado

Eliza was photographed by the press in front of Randy's Wilshire Boulevard condo carrying a sign that accused him of being a "Dead Beat Dad." She needed money to support their daughter, Steveanna, and Randy wasn't making the payments a judge had ordered. In the midst of all this turmoil, according to Margaret Maldonado, Randy launched an affair with the beautiful model, Paula Barbieri.

This Florida-born woman, who like La Toya herself, would pose for Playboy magazine, later became famous because of a romance she conducted with another black man. Paula broke up with O.J. Simpson on June 12, 1994, the day that Nicole Brown, the athlete's ex-wife was murdered. Nonetheless, Paula stood by Simpson through his fifteen months in jail, and she later wrote a confessional, The Other Woman: My Years with Of. Simpson -A Story of Love, Trust, and Betrayal.

It is not known whether Michael was even aware of Randy's involvement with Paula, but he avidly watched Simpson's televised court case. Later, when news of his own trial was broadcast on TV, he remarked, "O.J. drew better ratings than I did."

Randy's affair with Paula would not last long. But his affair with Alejandra Loaiza, a Colombian, would have far-reaching implications for the Jackson family. The attractive young woman had already had a traumatic life before arriving at the Jackson compound. Her mother had served time in a California penitentiary as a convicted cocaine dealer.

One day Alejandra confessed to Margaret Maldonado that she'd already had "several abortions" at Randy's request. Apparently, he preferred unprotected sex but didn't want to have a "bunch of babies" running all over Hayvenhurst. "My brothers have already brought enough kids into the world," he said. After an on-again, off-again affair, Randy finally married Alejandra in 1992 and would eventually sire three children with her.

To complicate matters even more for America's most dysfunctional black family, Jermaine would later marry Alejandra following her divorce from Randy on March 18, 1995. Jermaine and Alejandra were married in a secret ceremony at the Hotel Bel-Air. Della Reese administered the vows.

Reese, who toured as a teenager with gospel great, Mahalia Jackson, is an ordained minister of the Church of Understanding Principals for a Better Living in Los Angeles. Katherine could only have been horrified at the choice of Reese as the presiding minister at her son's wedding. Reese's church has come under fire from the Christian Right, since it refers to itself as "Christian," but does not accept the divinity of Jesus Christ.

Diane Sawyer

Margaret later said, "I tried to figure out how I was going to explain to my children that their Aunt Alejandra was now their stepmother, and their cousins, Randy Jr. and Genevieve, were now their stepbrother and stepsister. And that their Uncle Randy's girlfriend was now sleeping with their father. Talk about family values run amuck." Reporter Diane Dimond, on Court TV, raised a provocative question, "Do the children call Jermaine Uncle or Daddy or what?"

Alejandra Loaiza and her children

Even Tito wasn't immune from marital discord. His 1972 marriage to Delores V. Martes ("DeeDee") would also end in divorce in 1990. DeeDee discovered that Tito, following the Jackson pattern, had been unfaithful to her. He had three sons with DeeDee. As they grew older, they formed a group called "3T," releasing two albums, Brotherhood in 1995 and Identity in 2004. The first album included the hit, "Anything and Why" which they performed with their uncle, Michael himself.

Many of the Jackson family's domestic dramas unfolded without making headlines in the tabloids. Instead, the media continued to focus on Michael, who could always provide some kind of hot, sensational story. He rarely spoke to his associates about his family problems. Weeks before he fired Frank DiLeo, Michael told his manager, "I hate confrontations, and I abhor violence."

Obviously the private lives of the Jackson family members weren't going well. And for the most part, their professional careers weren't going anywhere either.

From Neverland, Michael told his siblings they had to "go it alone" with their album, 2300 Jackson Street, named after their small bungalow in Gary, Indiana. Janet and Rebbie joined their brothers-all except Marlon-in the album. Like Michael, La Toya also refused to join the group. Released in 1989, the album fared poorly, reaching only 59 on Billboards charts. "I always told my brothers that without me, they're headed for oblivion," Michael once told Frank DiLeo.

Della Reese

Some of Michael's brothers, notably Jermaine, blamed him for "sabotaging" sales of the album, although how Michael did that was never made clear.

With the release of 2300 Jackson St., the Jackson brothers' contract with Epic Records was fulfilled. It would not be renewed. No record company seemed interested in committing themselves to an expensive contract with the Jackson brothers unless Michael was part of the deal.

In distinct contrast to the failure of his brothers, Forbes Magazine in September of 1989 listed Michael as the number one highest-paid entertainer for the second consecutive year, with a two-year estimated earnings of $125 million. By December of that year, Entertainment Tonight had named Michael "The Most Important Entertainer of the Year." Rolling Stone proclaimed Thriller the number one album of the 80s, and the best-selling record album in the history of the music industry.

Michael Jackson would go down in music history as the undisputed star of the 1980s. His triumphs, both artistically and financially, stunned the industry. He had become the 1980s' most enigmatic entertainer, a man of mystery.

The Pulitzer Prize-winning author, Margo Jefferson, stated it this way: "Was he man, boy, man-boy, or boy-woman? Mannequin or postmodern zombie? Here was a black person who had once looked unmistakably black, and now looked white or at least un-black. He was, at the very least, a new kind of mulatto, one created by science and medicine and cosmetology. Biology defines a mulatto as the sterile offspring of an animal or plant species. Michael Jackson's sperm count, I'm relieved to say, is one of the few things we know nothing about. We are reasonably certain he chose not to produce offspring by traditional means: here again, science joined nature to do his bidding."

The 80s were drawing to a close. Michael would never again experience such heady days of glory. The 90s were coming, a decade so dreadful for Michael that he would on several occasions contemplate suicide.

Diana Ross's early prophecy was about to come true for him in a very personal way: "The world likes to build a star up to tear him down," she said.

"Michael Jackson loves children-but mainly if they're dropdead gorgeous, and in some cases even ready to drop dead. If Michael Jackson would just agree to be a pedophile, we could have our kook and eat him too. "

--Michael Musto

"Forget about the superstar, forget about the icon. If he was any other thirty-five-year old man who was sleeping with little boys, you wouldn't like this guy.""

--La Toya Jackson

"It was a child's dream, with every kind of soda in the world there, every kind of candy. A two-floor arcade, a carnival and a movie theater.""

--Macaulay Culkin, on Neverland

"He never had a childhood. He is having one now. His buddies are twelve-year-old kids. They have pillow fights and food fights. "

--Bert Fields, a former attorney of Michael Jackson

"We had very similar experiences in childhood. We're both going to be eight years old forever in some place because we never had a chance to be eight when we actually were. "

--Macaulay Culkin

"Michael Jackson is just a successful pop singer, after all. Maybe this particular American life is just too strange to stand as anything other than its once-glorious, now-pathetic self. But in the end we walk away, shaking our heads in befuddlement. Maybe it's better to just put on 'I Want You Back/smile sadly and leave it at that."

Chapter Ten

In his mind at least, Michael's "affair" with Princess Di lasted until her tragic death in the summer of 1997.

"I had a concert on the day the news broke," Michael said. "My doctor woke me up to tell me Diana was dead. I collapsed. I fainted. He had to give me smelling salts to revive me, and I cancelled my show because I simply could not perform. I just broke down. I wept and wept for weeks afterward."

He spent all the day watching news reports of the death of the princess with her lover, Dodi Fayed, his other friend, in a car crash in a Paris tunnel while they were being chased by paparazzi on motorcycles.

"She used to confide in me," Michael told his friends. "She'd just call me on the phone, and we would talk about everything that was happening in her life. The press was hard on her in the same way they were hard on me, and she needed to talk to someone who knew exactly what she was going through. She felt hunted the way I feel hunted. Trapped!"

When he was interviewed by Barbara Walters on TV, Michael admitted, "I fell back in grief and started to cry, upon learning of Diana's death. I said there's another one real soon. I feel it coming. There's another one, and I pray it's not me. Please don't let it be me. And Mother Teresa came."

Dr. Steven Hoefflin

When Walters asked Michael if he were psychic, he said, "I don't want to say that but I've done it before." Michael's claims about his link to Princess Di contradicted reports made by staff members, such as Bob Jones. "Diana had desperately wanted me to meet her children," Michael said, "and we talked about it many times, but I never got the chance. Dodi talked very highly of the boys. He says they are wonderful, and he had some good times on holiday with the boys and Diana."

In seances during the months that followed, Michael reportedly spoke to the spirit of the since-departed Princess Di. According to Michael, she assured him that she was "in good spirits," and asked him to intervene in the parenting of Prince William. According to Michael, the Princess told him, "William should be brought up by you-not Charles."

It is believed that Michael met Dodi in 1987 in the office of their mutual plastic surgeon, Dr. Steven Hoefflin. Michael was trying to erase the final traces of his "Negroid nose," whereas Dodi didn't like "my Arabic beak."

Born in Alexandria, Egypt, three years before Michael, Dodi was the son of billionaire Mohamed Al-Fayed.

Even before they met, Michael was impressed with Dodi's achievements in the movie industry, especially as they related to the 1981 Oscar-winning hit, Chariots of Fire. Michael was also impressed that Dodi's father owned Harrods in London, the world's most famous department store, and the Ritz in Paris, the world's most famous hotel.

Dodi's father had made a fortune by working for Saudi arms dealer Adnan Khashoggi. It is said that Khashoggi had been involved in almost every single conspiracy theory in the latter part of the 20th century, ranging from Watergate to the Iran-Contra affair.

Michael met Dodi as his eight-month marriage to the American model, Suzanne Gregard, was coming to an end. Dodi grew up in a world of privilege, dividing his time between family homes in Egypt and France. He also had homes in New York, Paris, London, Los Angeles, and Switzerland. An avid night-dubber, he was addicted to fast cars and even faster women.

Long before Diana, there were so many other women. Critics of Dodi called them his "trophy women" and suggested he was a Middle Eastern social climber.

Like Michael, Dodi had also dated Brooke Shields, but his dating with her was for real. Dodi, to make Michael jealous, would speak of his conquests of famous or infamous women, including Winona Ryder, Cathy Lee Crosby, Mimi Rogers, and the notorious Koo Stark who in 1982 had launched a scandalous affair with Britain's Prince Andrew. "I was far superior in bed," Dodi bragged.

Dodi Al-Fayed

Dodi's romance with Barbra Streisand had ended long before he met Michael. Again, Dodi liked to bring up the name of the diva to "send Michael into a jealous rage."

A gossip columnist reported, whether accurately or not, that Streisand once said, "Tina Sinatra and Michael Jackson may find the fire in Dodi. I never did."

In addition to bonding with Dodi, Michael had another reason for wanting to know him. At the time of their introduction, Dodi was contemplating his role as an executive producer of the Peter Pan story, and, of course, Michael still dreamed of playing "the boy who wouldn't grow up." The picture, after it was abandoned by Spielberg, later resurfaced as Hook. Michael lost the role.

He also claimed that he and Dodi discussed "night after night" the launching of other films starring Michael, with Dodi being the executive producer. "We laughed and joked about the mischief and mayhem we'd create in Hollywood," Michael said. "Dodi has taken a lot of flak in this country, which is so unfair. He is one of the sweetest, kindest men you could ever know. The problem is that people judge people before they even know them. To me, he is like a big Santa Claus. He loves giving, he's very wise, creative, talented, and kind-hearted."

Apparantly, Dodi loved fast cars. Long before his death in Paris, Dodi, once or twice with Michael positioned beside him in the back seat, sometimes ordered his chauffeur to "hit the floor" with the gas pedal. Michael was often shaken by the danger but apparently never objected. Months after the death of Dodi and Princess Di, Michael said,

"There but for the grace of God go I."

One night when Michael was engaged in a private rendezvous at Dodi's house, two men arrived to evict Dodi. His house was one of the most expensive rentals in Hollywood, but Dodi had written a bad check to his landlord who wanted him evicted. In the film industry, Dodi had a reputation for writing bad checks. A producer who refused to be named claimed that "Dodi was a deadbeat, a bad guy."

Was Dodi's relationship with Michael sexual? That was the question at Hollywood parties for several months late in the 1980s. The answer might never be known. Dodi is dead, and Michael doesn't speak of such things. Michael's detractors claim that there was definitely "something there, more than a friendship, but we couldn't call it love." Even so, the two men seemed very devoted to each other.

Although Michael and Dodi had enjoyed a close bond, Michael didn't seem jealous when his friend launched an affair with Diana. "They were a match made in heaven," Michael claimed. "I thought they were beautiful together. It was lovely to see them like that. Diana was a wonderful person with a good heart. She went around the world as a philanthropist just like Mother Teresa. Diana proved that she really, really cared about people, children especially. The way I do."

Michael later confided to friends that he understood why Jackie Kennedy "married that beast, Onassis. There was this extraordinary circus going on around Jackie. Onassis offered her a chance to escape from that. For that same reason, I think Diana will marry Dodi. But there's a big difference. Jackie did not love Onassis. Diana loves Dodi. Of course, I love both of them."

The gay rumors linking Michael with Dodi remained confined mainly to insider Hollywood. But after a brief lull, the gay rumors about Michael resurfaced once again in the media during the late 80s and early 1990s. This time they would never go away.

Katherine Jackson's memoirs were released in 1990 and in her book this member of the homophobic Jehovah's Witness cult denied the rumors about her son. Either naively or with calculation, she claimed, "Michael is not gay." One of her reasons she cited for her son not being gay is that the "Bible speaks against homosexuality and he's very religious." By now, however, this absurd defense had become a tired cliche. In her memoirs, she claimed that Michael "wants to settle down and get married one day. We've talked about it. And he will." In this case, mama knew best. Her son would eventually "marry" not only once, but twice.

For her book, Katherine engaged Rebbie, her oldest daughter, in the cultural war raging around her younger brother. Even though Rebbie was far removed from what was actually going on at Neverland, she provided a quotation for her mother's book: "If Michael were married, the gay rumors would stop immediately."

Within Katharine's memoirs, Rebbie concluded with a statement that was particularly unconvincing to an America growing more hip, more cynical, and more skeptical than ever about her brother. "Just being around him and hearing the little things that he says about women tell me he's definitely heterosexual." That remark brought guffaws to some reviewers of Katherine's tome.

Michael's purported homosexuality was not the only angle pursued by the media. Because of the extraordinary changes in his physical appearance, they began to speculate even more daringly. One tabloid raised the question, IS MICHAEL JACKSON DEAD?

The journalist speculated that Michael might have died and that the "money men" behind him had substituted another singer and dancer to fill his shoes. As wild as this seemed, precedents for such scenarios aren't unknown. Some writers, for example, have died, but their estates have kept churning out novels in their name.

Tabloids not only focused on Michael but began to tear away at the public relations hype associated with the so-called loving Jacksons themselves. Papa Joe helped fuel that speculation by telling People magazine: "We wonder why things have changed like they have, why Michael doesn't seem to care about his family. The few times we've spoken to him, he seems glad to hear from us. But when you talk to other people, they say Michael doesn't want to be involved with his family."

Caught up in personal matters and spending days, even weeks, in his private quarters at Neverland with his boy of the moment, Michael often neglected business. But on September 13, 1989, he showed up for a press conference in Los Angeles. Officials of LA Gear announced that they had just signed Michael to a multi-million dollar two-year endorsement deal.

A lot of the journalists at the conference suggested that LA Gear had hired the wrong Michael-"perhaps they meant to hire Michael Jordan, not Michael Jackson," one reporter facetiously suggested.

For the $20 million he was being paid, Michael made a major concession to the sportswear company. He discarded his black loafers and white socks and showed up wearing a pair of LA Gear tennis shoes in black with silver streaks. LA Gear was retiring its spokesperson, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, the basketball star. With its elaborate Hollywood-style palm trees and fog machine, the press conference cost LA Gear $50,000.

Michael's comments before reporters were very brief: "I am very happy to be part of the LA Gear magic, and I hope we have a very rewarding, successful career. Thank you."

Reporters noted that Michael appeared nervous and anxious, and he seemed like he wanted to flee from the press conference. One writer described Michael "in a panic to escape, like one of his pet rats if cornered menacingly." That reporter was right in his assessment. Regrettably for Michael and LA Gear, a concealed microphone picked up Michael's desperate plea to one of the company executives. "You've got to help me!" Michael said in a whimpering voice that verged on tears. "Get me out of here or I'll faint. Don't let them ask me questions!"

After Michael had fled into the fake fog being generated as part of the special effects, reporters openly jeered. "It was a total disaster," said Ronald Bank from a newspaper in Sacramento. "To think I drove all the way to Los Angeles to see Jackson run out of the room while blowing an insincere kiss. That lady's not to be believed! I'm convinced that Jackson not only thinks he's Marie Antoinette, he's become the Queen reincarnate!"

When reporters heard this, especially Michael's whimpering, they popped questions at Robert Greenberg, the company CEO. "Why have you hired a spokesman who can't-or won't-speak?"

The chairman was obviously embarrassed but tried to put a good spin on Michael's disastrous performance. "Pepsi couldn't get Michael to drink that soft drink," he said. "But at least we got Michael to show up at the press conference in our shoes-not bad."

Even though his days as Michael's attorney were numbered, John Branca had pulled off this amazing deal between Michael and LA Gear. Word got out that Branca, in the interests of his client, had "walked off with the company store."

The Michael Jackson sneakers released by LA Gear

When terms of Michael's deal leaked out, many of his fans were horrified. "With that kind of money at stake, he had to become a cry baby at that press conference," said Terri Carroll. "What a baby! What a wimp! That kind of money equaled the net income of some struggling Third World countries, and he's whimpering. I resign from the Michael Jackson Fan Club. I can only conclude that in a starving world, he's collecting millions for doing practically nothing-and behaving like a jerk!"

The deal with LA Gear was the sweetest ever made with a celebrity. It entitled Michael to a royalty on every pair of shoes sold, plus stock options. At the time of their ill-fated deal with Michael, the company was hauling in $800 million a year. If, after Michael's involvement, sales of the product increased, Michael would be entitled to a percentage of all annual sales in excess of $1 billion.

As part of the LA Gear package, Michael had promised to release an album-its working title was Decade, which would include some new songs, as well as cuts from three of his earlier albums, Off the Wall, Thriller, and Bad. For this album, Michael was offered upfront money of nearly $20 million. To everyone's embarrassment, Michael defaulted and Decade was delayed, postponed, and eventually abandoned altogether.

There were the inevitable lawsuits, LA Gear filing a $10 million lawsuit against Michael, charging him with fraud and breach of contract. Michael's lawyers shot back with a $44 million countersuit against LA Gear, making similar charges against them. The case was eventually resolved out of court, and the LA Gear campaign with Michael fizzled to an embarrassing death. Based on Michael's previous litigation with Pepsi and LA Gear, word spread through the business world that Michael, with his lawsuits, was a dangerous entertainer to sign contracts with.

"Michael simply didn't get his act together," Papa Joe later said. "If he had, he could have made millions and millions, not only from LA Gear, but from the album itself."

That wasn't the only business deal falling flat for Michael. Inspired by his ownership of copyrights to The Beatles' songs, he also tried to acquire Motown's catalogue from Berry Gordy Jr. The catalogue, known as "Jobete," was for sale for $200 million, but Michael was willing to pay only $135 million.

Michael had dreamed of acquiring the Motown hits of The Supremes which had starred his sometime friend, Diana Ross. If he could acquire the catalogue, he'd also control the music of, among others, Stevie Wonder, Marvin Gaye, The Temptations, and Smokey Robinson.

A smart musical entrepreneur like Gordy knew the exact value of his treasure trove, and he said no to Michael unless he was willing to come up with the full $200 million. When Gordy wouldn't budge, Branca called Michael and asked if he could increase his offer. Michael slammed down the phone, and the potential deal collapsed.

Business deals weren't working out, but by 1990 it seemed that everybody in the world was honoring Michael Jackson and his gravity-defying dance moves on music videos.

Even President George Bush wanted to get in on the act, following in the footsteps of the Reagans. In April of 1990, Bush invited Michael for a return visit to the White House where he was formally proclaimed "Entertainer of the Decade."

In the Rose Garden, the ceremony was sponsored by Washington's Capital Children's Museum, and Michael was being honored for his work with children's welfare.

Lacking Reagan's smoothness and charm, Bush had little to say to Michael, who showed up in military garb with wide red sashes. Barbara was more relaxed with the singer, introducing him to her dog Millie and telling him she wore red shoes for the occasion when her spies told her he'd arrived at the White House "all trimmed in red." She may have been aiming her sardonic wit at Michael, but he took everything she said at face value. Later, after Michael's departure from the White House with his entourage and three limousines, Barbara said, "I am underwhelmed."

In their wake, reporters crowded around the President in his pin-striped suit. One journalist asked Bush if he'd ever heard a Michael Jackson song. The President did not answer, but asked the reporter a question instead. "Why does he wear that red arm band and those red stripes on his pants? Was he in some school marching band?"

Between business endorsements and award ceremonies, Michael took plenty of time out for pleasure with his "special friends." Peter, the boy who had figured so prominently into the Bad tour, was replaced by another young white boy that Michael's publicist, Bob Jones, identified as Damon Patrick.

Instead of thinking that Michael was asexual-perhaps an early opinion-the publicist concluded in his book that "Michael did indeed have some sort of sexual drive, and it wasn't the least bit natural."

During her son's sojourn at Neverland, Damon's mother complained that the security guard often prevented her from seeing him. And although Michael hired a tutor for the young boy, Damon reportedly learned very few lessons. Throughout much of his stay, he was locked away in Michael's bedroom.

According to Bob Jones, the relationship with Damon was short-lived. But it was rumored that Michael paid out four million dollars when his involvement with Damon came to an end.

Michael still dreamed of a career in the movies. In this ambition, he was goaded on by David Geffen, who had a dream of producing a big-budget musical for the pop superstar.

In many ways, this movie power agent and record industry mogul pursued power, money, and fame even more than Michael himself. Since Geffen had launched his own record company in 1980, selling Geffen Records for a huge profit ten years later, Michael had eagerly followed its progress. Geffen began spectacularly, signing John Lennon in 1980 in what would become the ex- Beatle's last recording contract.

Geffen's other achievements included producing Risky Business, the vehicle that made Tom Cruise a star. He was also the man who bankrolled Andrew Lloyd Webber's Cats.

Over the years Michael had known him casually and was thrilled when Geffen, along with Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, founded DreamWorks SKG, the first all-new Hollywood studio to be established in more than half a century.

Michael envied Geffen's success and wanted to hook up with him, each man vying to become the biggest mogul in the entertainment industry. "If my role model, Howard Hughes, can do it, so can I," Michael told Geffen among others.

Geffen flattered Michael, telling him that, "Quincy Jones has taken too much credit for your own genius. It's time to move on from him."

Michael predicted to Geffen that the 1990s "belong to me. If people thought I was the most successful artist of all time in the 80s, they ain't seen nothin' yet. I'll double my success in the 90s, and I'm starting the decade as the highest-paid artist in the history of the music industry. Not bad."

At the time Michael met Geffen, the entrepreneur was still in the closet, leading a somewhat heterosexual life. He almost married Cher. Unlike Michael, however, Geffen would consensually "come out," which he did in 1992, albeit under some degree of pressure.

"I like men, I like women," Geffen declared. "I'm an equal opportunity seducer." After that announcement, it is estimated that a goodly percentage of the handsomest actors in Los Angeles sent Geffen their resumes, hoping to become his next toy boy. Along with another friend of Michael's, Elizabeth Taylor, Geffen became a champion warrior in the battle against AIDS.

Much of Hollywood thought Geffen already had a toy boy in Michael himself.

The world in the early 90s wasn't that familiar with Michael's sexual pattern, so rumors swirled through Hollywood parties that the ruthless producer "who would stop at nothing to get what he wanted" was having an affair with the ruthless singer/dancer "who would stop at nothing to get what he wanted."

"They should be lovers even if they're not," one producer said. "Even man and wife, David being the man, of course. Together, this dynamic duo, wearing Batman and Robin tights, could take over not only Hollywood, but lay America itself at their feet."

"If David Geffen is not actually plugging Jackson in the ass, he's doing it spiritually," said an executive at CBS Records who didn't want to be named. "Before Jackson takes a crap, he calls Geffen to get his OK. Geffen has total power over Jackson's career. In that little girl voice of his, Jackson calls Geffen two or three times a day. Jackson wants Geffen's advice on everything. I hear all the time that Geffen and Jackson are having sex. But Geffen is not the type of man Jackson would be attracted to. Perhaps if Geffen had been born in 1980, we could get some action here. Of course, there is the Jewish question, but I don't want to go into that."

Finding the right script for Michael proved a daunting challenge, even for Geffen. As head of Geffen Pictures, he offered Michael the script of Streetdandy, which had been written by Tom Hedley, co-writer of Flashdance. Michael read the script "but is giving me all this reluctant debutante shit," Geffen claimed.

He ultimately despaired of finding a proper script for Michael, telling his partners, "It's got to be Busby Berkeley meets E. T, with Stars Wars as a backdrop."

As Christmas of 1990 rolled around, Michael could only note that Geffen, at the age of 47, had risen from a job in the mailroom of the William Morris Agency to become "the richest man in Hollywood," according to Forbes magazine.

Geffen's good will temporarily soured when Michael failed to show up in Florida for the opening of the spanking new Universal Studios Theme Park in Orlando, as Michael had agreed. It was said at the time that Michael Eisner, the CEO and chairman at Disney, had asked Michael not to appear at the opening of a competing theme park, claiming that if he did, it would "damage the wonderful friendship you have with Disneythreaten it even."

Michael, as he admitted himself, was "caught between a rock and a hard place." There was a way out. On June 3, 1990, Michael suffered what was originally announced in the press as a mild heart attack. An ambulance rushed him to Saint John's Hospital in Santa Monica, where he was booked into a room across the hall from Elizabeth Taylor. Ironically, she'd been rushed to that same hospital, suffering respiratory problems. Although her illness was real, Michael's might have been faked.

David Geffen

The next morning Elizabeth wheeled herself into Michael's room carrying a white lily which Michael added to a vase of black roses ordered by La Toya from her hotel in London. When Elizabeth left, he spent the day receiving phone calls from well-wishers. He expected Liza Minnelli to call, but President Bush?

While in the hospital, and for reasons known only to Michael, he asked the staff to perform an HIV test on him. These tests are always highly confidential, but someone on staff leaked the results to the press. The test came out negative. One doctor asked, "If he's the virgin he publicly claims to be-you know, saving it for marriage-why does he want to be tested for AIDS?"

Except for a young man who was evicted after sneaking into the hospital with a plan to assassinate Michael, he rested well in his room and miraculously recovered after a week of rest.

Geffen wanted Michael to sever his ties with Branca, his faithful and sometimes spectacularly successful long-time attorney. Somehow Geffen managed to convince Michael that the attorney was getting "too much pork, leaving you with the bone." That wasn't true, of course. To pry Michael away, Geffen fanned the fires of Michael's jealousy. Geffen reminded him that Branca's law firm represented not only Mick Jagger and the Rolling Stones but the dreaded Prince, who was still Michael's nemesis.

"Not just Jagger," Michael said. "What about George Michael? The New Kids on the Block? Branca even represents the Jim Morrison estate. One thing is for sure: He won't be representing my estate when I die."

"Correction," Geffen said. "If you die. You're going to live forever."

Michael became furious when he learned that the "Steel Wheels" tour of Jagger and his Stones broke the record set by Bad to become the most successful rock tour in the history of music.

Within days of his release from the hospital, Michael sent Branca word, "Your services are no longer required." Michael didn't want to face the attorney directly, so he had Richard Sherman, his accountant, deliver the bad news.

Michael fired Branca at the wrong moment, just as the attorney was ready to consummate a deal with Warner-Chappell for the acquisition of the James Brown catalogue. "It would be a great triumph for Michael to own the songs of James Brown," Frank DiLeo once told associates. "Imagine it. Michael had stood in the wings watching James Brown, his idol, perform at the Apollo Theater in Harlem. Then, presto, one day he ends up owning the fucker's catalogue. As for those people spreading rumors that Michael is gay, that's bullshit! They don't know what they're talking about. Michael Jackson is definitely not gay!"

In the beginning Geffen not only wanted to make Michael "the biggest of movie stars," but he wanted to sign him for Geffen Records. Regrettably for the promoter, Michael was locked into a firm contract with CBS Records. Geffen learned that the price of freeing Michael from CBS would have been costlier "than the gross national product of Uganda."

As head of CBS Records, Walter Yetnikoff stood in Geffen's way.

Geffen was producing the new Tom Cruise movie, which would be released in 1990. It was called Days of Thunder, and Geffen wanted Michael to supply a song for the soundtrack. Michael agreed but called Yetnikoff and told him that he wasn't going to allow Geffen to have the song.

Yetnikoff nixed the deal on Days of Thunder "at Michael Jackson's whining insistence," Yetnikoff claimed. In his memoirs the intensely competitive and sometimes abrasive Yetnikoff admitted that he taunted Geffen over his "sexual bent-I'd chase after him into gay clubs and demand his hand in marriage."

When Yetnikoff sent word that he'd like Geffen to give his new girlfriend lessons in how to give a blow-job, Geffen exploded. A new feud between Yetnikoff and Geffen was born.

Geffen wanted revenge, and he began to undermine Yetnikoff to Michael, hoping to get him out of his contract so that he could sign with Geffen Records. Michael owed CBS four more albums.

But unknown to either Michael or Geffen, Yetnikoff's reign at CBS was already drawing to a close. Within months he'd be out the door. By September 4, 1990, Yetnikoff was ousted as CEO of CBS Records. One of the reasons for his demise was his deteriorating relationship with the label's mega-seller, Michael himself.

"What the hell!" Yetnikoff said on the way out the door. "Sex, booze, power, prestige, money, glory. I tasted it all!"

When Michael was informed of Yetnikoff's departure, he said, "You're talking history. Yetnikoff is yesterday. I'm here today. What about me? What does this mean for my career?"

When Geffen heard of Yetnikoff's demise, he said, "Ding dong, the witch is dead!"

With Frank DiLeo, John Branca, and Walter Yetnikoff out of Michael's life, he needed a new manager. Geffen had a best friend, Sandy Gallin: Enter Gallin into Michael's life.

During the period he remained friends with Michael, Geffen helped him set up both a new legal staff and a managerial team to replace Yetnikoff, Branca, and DiLeo, who had guided Michael through his great triumphs, including Thriller. Under a new team, Michael would never achieve the worldwide sales he'd done in the past, although his notoriety would grow. Instead of millions flowing in, millions would flow out.

Previously, Gallin had worked with, among others, Dolly Parton and Neil Diamond. As a producer, Gallin had been a personal manager or agent to stars, including Cher and Whoopi Goldberg. He also went on to produce feature films such as Father of the Bride and the Oscar-winning documentary, Quilt.

When trouble loomed in Michael's future over child molestation charges, Gallin rose to his defense. He said, "Michael's innocent, open, child-like relationships with children may appear bizarre and strange to adults in our society who cannot conceive of any relationship without sexual connotations. This is not a reflection of Michael's character; rather it is a symptom of the sexual phobias of our society."

For his trouble, the movie editor of the Los Angeles Times, Claudia Eller, "outed" Gallin as a homosexual in a major cover story.

Michael also hired Bert Fields and Lee Phillips, who were attorneys for Geffen, and later, Allen Gruman. As his management team fell into place, Michael paraded through Neverland in "Windsor red robes, imitating a king. He even wore a gold crown," his housekeeper, Blanca Francia, would later claim. That was not all Francia would claim in the years ahead, based on her having introduced Michael to her son, Jason. But before that happened, she witnessed the arrival of young Wade Robson at Neverland where he became one of Michael's all-time special friends. This eight-year-old Australian from Brisbane, with his platinum blond crew-cut, was exceedingly handsome with a certain macho air about him. Wade had been born in 1982, Michael in 1958, but they quickly became "great pals" in spite of the age difference.

Sandy Gallin

Wade later claimed that, like Michael, he'd shown an affinity for dancing "even before I was out of diapers." Michael had met him in 1987 when he was only five years old. Wade had recently won a dance contest. At one of his Australian concerts, Michael had invited him up on the stage. Later, Michael said that "Wade showed off moves dancers ten years his senior couldn't have pulled off." The young boy had learned to dance by watching Michael's music videos, especially "Thriller."

Michael invited the Robsons and their son to California. After a short stay, Wade's father seemed none too happy with the arrangement and returned to Australia. But Wade's mother, Joy, found Neverland "the happiest place on earth." She was soon on Michael's payroll and given a shiny new RollsRoyce.

Joy roomed in the guest cottage, and Wade was invited for nightly sleepovers in Michael's bedroom. Soon Michael had nicknamed him "The Little One," and was very affectionate with the boy.

Michael and Wade often danced together, and Michael became so impressed with Wade that he cast him in such videos as "Black or White," "Jam," and "Heal the World." Some of Michael's casting demands stirred up a lot of unfavorable press. Michael strong-armed Pepsi into hiring Wade for a commercial, even though the role should have gone to an African Americannot a blond-haired white boy.

In the commercial, Michael sat at a piano, singing "I'll Be There." Tenyear-old Wade played a young Michael, his blond crew-cut concealed by an Afro wig and his porcelain white skin darkened by computerized colorization. Having a white child play young Michael was soundly condemned by African-American publications.

As Wade grew older and Michael moved on to other special friends, Wade became successful on his own, directing stage shows and videos for such stars as Usher and Britney Spears. He would later spearhead the Wade Robson Project on MTV, a dance version of American Idol.

In 2005 when Michael went on trial on charges of child molestation, both Wade and his mother, Joy, came back into Michael's life. Prosecutors wanted to know exactly what happened between Wade and Michael during his sleepovers at Neverland in the early 90s.

Bert Fields

On the witness stand, Wade admitted to sleeping in the same bed with Michael but claimed that nothing sexual ever took place. "We slept in the same bed, but we both were fully dressed in pajamas. It's a huge bed. He sleeps on one side, and I sleep on the other."

Under severe cross-examination by prosecutor Ron Zonen, Wade admitted to other sleepovers, not only at Neverland, but at his mother's apartment in Hollywood, at Michael's secret condo hideaway at Century City, and even in a hotel suite in Las Vegas.

Wade Robson

Wade refuted another eyewitness, Blanca Francia, Michael's maid. In front of the world, she claimed that she once found Michael and Wade in bed together-"and they were naked from the waist up." Whether true or not, she also claimed that she walked into Michael's bathroom, finding Wade and Michael laughing and showering together. On the tiled floor she spotted Michael's white BVDs and the boy's "neon green Spiderman briefs," which she often laundered. On the stand, she claimed she slipped out of the bathroom without either Michael or Wade noticing her.

When asked to confirm or deny the maid's testimony, Wade said, "It simply never happened."

The prosecutor zeroed in on Wade. "If you knew that the person, the thirty-five-year-old man who was sleeping with an eight-year-old boy, possessed a great quantity of sexually explicit material, would that cause you concern about that person's motivations while he was in bed with a boy?"

Wade looked uncomfortable and paused a long time before answering. "Yes," he said in what amounted to a whisper.

Zonen forced Wade to look at a book seized at Neverland. Called Boys Will Be Boys, it featured naked pictures of young boys aged 10 to 13. His face growing stern, his shoulders drooping, Wade was also forced to look at another book, A Sexual Study of Man, in which masturbation, oral sex, and sodomy were depicted.

"Would you be concerned about a person who possesses that book crawling into bed with a ten-year-old boy?" Zonen asked.

"Yes, I guess so," Wade said in a soft voice.

It is believed that Wade's testimony about his long-ago sleepovers at Neverland went a long way in helping Michael retain his freedom.

As charismatic as Wade was, an even more charismatic blond-haired boy entered Michael's life after Michael saw the box office hit, Home Alone: Macaulay Culkin.

At Neverland, Michael watched the film repeatedly. One day he saw it three times. His staff felt that he had become obsessed with Macaulay, at least with what he saw on the screen. He hastily invited the beautiful young boy to Neverland, and Macaulay called with his acceptance. The first time he spoke with the Home Alone child, Michael must have stayed on the phone for at least three hours.

He seemed mesmerized by the sound of Macaulay's voice and eagerly awaited his arrival at Neverland. "I never knew him to show so much excitement in his life," a security guard claimed.

Michael immediately ordered posters from the movie, depicting Macaulay with his hands on his face screaming. The concept was based on the famous painting, The Scream, by Edvard Munch.

Wade all grown up

Macaulay Culkin, the most famous and the richest child star of his time, was born in New York on August 26, 1980. By 2005 he would play himself in archival footage appropriately titled "Michael Jackson's Boys" for TV.

"Mack," as he's known to his intimates, broke into show business at the age of four, appearing in a bevy of off-Broadway shows.

After writer John Hughes recommended that director Chris Columbus cast Macaulay in his script, Home Alone, released in 1990, the rest is movie history. The movie went on to earn $285 million in the U.S. alone, making it one of the highest grossing movies in the history of the cinema. Internationally, Home Alone would gross $550 million.

His next film, My Girl (1991), was another hit for Macaulay and featured his very first screen kiss. In 1992 he filmed Home Alone 2: Lost in New York, and it was another hit. In 1993 Macaulay earned $5 million for appearing in The Good Son playing a murderous little demon. In contrast, his salary for the first version of Home Alone was $100,000.

The child star's luck changed in 1994 when he turned 14 and appeared in a series of duds, including The Pagemaster, Getting Even with Dad, and Richie Rich. For the last two films, he was paid $8 million, the highest fee ever for a child star. When the most famous child star of all time, Shirley Temple Black, heard this, she said, "I worked for peanuts-perhaps a banana or twoin the 1930s."

After his early success, it was a long road downhill, although Macaulay was considered for the male lead in Titanic in 1997. He lost the role, of course, to Leonardo DiCaprio.

Macaulay and Michael, after they first met, bonded on the issue of show business fathers. "Michael and I had an understanding about my difficulties with my father. He knew what that was all about. He'd lived some of my shit with his own father. It's not like I can just bump into people on the street and say, `Oh, you too!' It doesn't happen that often. Michael's still a kid. I'm still a kid. We're both going to be about eight years old forever in some place because we never had a chance to be eight when we actually were. That's the beautiful and the cursed part of our lives."

A former stage and child actor, Christopher (Kit) Culkin was his son's manager for a while. There were many disagreements. At one point Macaulay claimed that his father "was overbearing-very controlling."

Macaulay Culkin and MJ

When the cheeky ingenue with the impish grin arrived at Neverland, Michael was captivated.

Macaulay found Neverland "a child's dream-every kind of soda in the world there, every kind of candy. A two-floor arcade, a carnival, and a movie theater. Neverland is still the only place on earth where I feel absolutely, onehundred percent comfortable."

When not playing video games at Neverland, Macaulay and Michael were often spotted at various California malls, shopping for toys. Their shopping carts would overflow with talking robots, water blasters, and battery-powered laser guns. On one occasion, Michael bought Macaulay a twelve-inch doll bearing the likes of Kevin McCallister, the suburban imp the child star portrayed in Home Alone.

One salesclerk told the press that "the two giggled their way up the aisleokay for Culkin since he was only a kid, but a bit suspicious for a thirty-fouryear-old man."

At one of the shopping malls, both Michael and Macaulay were recognized. "I think Jackson became really jealous of the Culkin kid," said the owner of a local store. "These girls were so young that Jackson seemed old enough to be their father. They were screaming for Culkin like he was all four Beatles in one little boy. Jackson stood by and watched the adulation of these pre-teen fans. It must have brought back memories of when he was a child star."

Michael's younger brother, Kieran Culkin, born in 1982, was also invited for sleepovers at Neverland. Like Macaulay, Kieran was an actor, appearing in the remake of Father of the Bride in 1991 and Nowhere to Run in 1993. Kieran had made his debut playing Macaulay's cousin in the 1990 Home Alone. He would later go on to bigger movies such as the The Cider House Rules, released in 1999.

"Kit" Culkin, Macaulay's father, maintained that no abuse of his children ever took place during their visits to Neverland. He did, however, discover Rory, Macaulay's two-year-old brother, sitting on the floor with Michael, both drinking from baby bottles.

In June of 1991 Michael invited Macaulay and his parents for a vacation in Bermuda, and they accepted. The most cynical members of the press hinted that the King of Pop and the beautiful blond-haired child actor were actually "on a honeymoon."

Macaulay and Michael stayed at the Hamilton Princess in the penthouse suite, with the Culkin parents located in less spectacular digs on the sixth floor. On the island, Michael and Macaulay played games, shopped, and went swimming or diving. When devilish, they dropped water-filled balloons on passing tourists seven floors below.

In Bermuda, Michael did not endear himself to the local populace. When a taxi driver told him there were fewer than 60,000 people who lived on the island, Michael shot back: "I draw more fans than that at one of my concerts."

At one point in their Bermuda vacation, Michael and Macaulay were seen riding the waves in a speedboat. Their captain was H. Ross Perot, who maintained a lavish summer home on island. He'd failed in his bid for the presidency, losing to Bill Clinton.

In Bermuda, Macaulay told a journalist, "Michael is fantastic, he's not weird."

Bored with the entertainment possibilities on Bermuda, Michael, on June 21, 1991, paid for the private performance of a musical to be presented at his hotel for Macaulay and his parents.

After Bermuda, Macaulay and Michael flew to Disney World in Florida, enjoying the amusements there for a few days before winging their way back to Los Angeles in a private jet. The rest of Michael's staff returned to California aboard conventional commercial flights..

Kieran Culkin

The intense bonding between the child star and Michael continued. On August 26, Macaulay arrived at Neverland to celebrate his 11th birthday.

So enchanted was Michael with Macaulay that he couldn't wait for him to finish his location shoot on the set of Home Alone 2. Michael flew to Winnetka, Illinois, to visit with his special friend.

Reportedly, Michael was disappointed when Macaulay told him he was marrying Rachel Miner in June of 1998. Both the bride and groom were only seventeen, Michael predicted the marriage wouldn't last. And it didn't. Rachel and Macaulay were divorced in August of 2000.

When Michael, by whatever means, became the father of "Prince Michael I," he asked Macaulay to be the godfather of his infant son, and the former child star eagerly accepted.

Once a picture materialized of Michael's first child, a baby with blond hair and a cherubic face, bloggers went to work, claiming that Macaulay was not only the godfather of Prince Michael I but had supplied the semen for the artificial insemination. This report cannot be confirmed.

Michael reportedly urged Macaulay not to sign on for the role of a gay club kid who kills a drug dealer in the edgy drama, Party Monster, released in 2003. The co-director of Party Monster, Fenton Bailey, said, "It doesn't matter how good Macaulay is in the film. The question is, Will people allow him to re-invent himself after a time in the wilderness?" He was referring to Macaulay's "retirement" from the screen. Apparently, the answer was no. Millions of Home Alone fans stayed away from Party Monster.

Most of Michael's special friends ended their relationship with the superstar when one of them turned fourteen. Not so with Macaulay. The friendship endured the turn of the millennium. "I love him," Macaulay once said. "He's a good friend of mine. He's affectionate but he never touched me or interfered with me."

Michael stood by Macaulay's side as the child actor suffered through intense agoraphobia and panic attacks, which sometimes made it impossible for him to leave his bedroom. From the first, Michael was sympathetic to Macaulay's plights, as he too had suffered these same panic attacks. He noticed that Macaulay fidgeted constantly. He'd run his hands through his beautiful blond hair, and he was also in the habit of playing with the rubber bands he frequently wore like bracelets on his wrists.

Like Michael, Macaulay had a horror of being recognized by fans who still remembered him from his Home Alone days. To disguise his blond looks, he sometimes dyed his hair a rainbow of shades. He admitted to Michael that he frequently spent eight hours a day in his bathroom, regarding it as a "sanctuary." He even installed a TV and DVD system there to keep him amused. "It's a rather tortured existence," he admitted.

Macaulay, all grown up.

To calm his nerves, Macaulay was taking the anti-anxiety drug, Xanax, along with Clonazepam, an addictive sedative used to treat chronic nervousness and seizures. These drugs, along with marijuana, were discovered in his car during his arrest in Oklahoma on September 17, 2005, on a charge of speeding. When police discovered the pot and the medication without prescriptions, he was arrested, later pleading guilty to misdemeanor drug charges.

At the time of Michael's child sex trial in 2005, Macaulay had turned twenty-four. Consistently, he admitted having shared Michael's bed at Neverland, but staunchly denied that "anything untoward happened."

Staff members at Neverland contradicted Macaulay's defense of Michael. Philippe LeMarque who served as majordomo at Neverland for about ten months after the departure of Mark Quindoy, testified in court about Macaulay and Michael.

On the stand, LeMarque claimed that Michael called him at two o'clock one morning, demanding French fries for Macaulay and himself. When he called security and asked the whereabouts of "Silver Fox" (Michael's code name), a guard claimed he was in the video arcade. Entering from the more obscure second door, LeMarque claimed that as he came in, "I saw Michael groping the kid," meaning Macaulay. "He did not see me, so I stopped and quietly tiptoed back and re-entered through the other door."

Adrian Marie McManus, a former maid at Neverland, also took the stand, claiming that Michael groped Macaulay in a "smooch session" in the library at Neverland. She told jurors that she spied Michael planting "his razor-thin lips all over the young Home Alone star's face-and rubbing his hands on his body. I was coming out of the bathroom by his bedroom where I was cleaning up the area. I could see Mr. Jackson in the library. He was kissing him on his cheek. His hand was by his leg at his rear end." She also testified that the child star lived up to his reputation as a trouble maker.

McManus had replaced Blanca Francia as Jackson's personal chambermaid. A middle-aged Latina, McManus worked at Neverland from August 1990 to July of 1994 which was the "peak" of the bizarre friendship between Michael and Macaulay.

On May 11, 2005, Macaulay took the stand in Michael's trial, calling accusations that he was molested "absolutely ridiculous." Macaulay bridled at prosecutor Ron Zonen's suggestion that Michael might have molested him without his knowledge while he was sound asleep. "I find that unlikely," Macaulay told the court.

He was even questioned about the pornography police seized from Michael's bedroom. "Overall, he's still a human being," Macaulay said. "I don't find it inappropriate." He added that at the age of twelve he kept a copy of Playboy under his bed.

Macaulay's 45-minute appearance on the witness stand was viewed by legal analysts as a brilliant performance. Former prosecutor Ann Bremner, said, "He's a great witness. Unflappable. Jurors are well aware that Culkin is a trained actor."

Macaulay is so rich today he doesn't have to work unless he wants to. Just how rich is he? He once said, "I could sit around with my thumb up my butt watching TV and my kids would still go to college."

In the post millennium, the sweet-faced young boy, who became filmdom's most unexpected superstar, said, "I've had all the fame anyone could want, and I ran away from it. Maybe Michael will do the same thing one day."

At the time Michael was involved with Macaulay, he launched a faux affair with Madonna, each hoping for-and getting-maximum tabloid exposure.

Representatives of both Madonna and Michael each alerted the press and the paparazzi that they'd be dining together at the chic Ivy Restaurant in Los Angeles. Madonna arrived dressed in vampiric black, and Michael was attired in angelic white satin. Although the meeting had been touted as a romantic rendezvous, each of the two rivals left in separate limousines. It was almost impossible for two such widely diverse personalities to overcome their jealousies and actually like each other, but once it was launched, the show had to be played out.

"You might have been the hottest pop artist of the 80s," Madonna said to Michael. "But Prince, George Michael, and Whitney Houston-and moi-certainly gave you a run for your money in the second half of that decade."

Material Girl

"All of you are very good," Michael said in a voice so low it was almost a whisper.

Not getting the response she obviously wanted, Madonna ribbed Michael. "So you made one big album and a Pepsi commercial where you caught your coiffure on fire."

Michael became defensive. "The world has recognized me as its greatest entertainer. I'm the biggest."

Madonna reminded him that newspapers and magazines polled in 1989 had named her "Artist of the Decade." Michael had nothing to say to that. Nor did he need to be reminded. When that news had been announced, an enraged Michael had called his manager at the time, Frank DiLeo. "Was it Madonna who recorded Thriller?" Michael screamed into the telephone. "Madonna who produced the best-selling album of all time? I think not!"

Madonna didn't stop there. "Honeychild, at the end of the 90s, I'll also be voted Number One Artist of the Decade. Not Prince. Not Whitney Houston. Not Bruce Springsteen. Not George Michael, and you can forget Phil Collins." She deliberately left Michael off the list. "Madonna will be the Mamma Mia of that decade too."

"How do I fit into this picture?" Michael asked, obviously peeved at her provocation.

Madonna answered, but it wasn't what he expected. "When I'm tired of one of my toy boys, I'll pass him on to you."

Michael requested carrot juice blended with spinach when the waiter approached, Madonna preferring a stronger libation. After the waiter left, she looked at Michael skeptically, as if annoyed. "The restaurant is candlelit," she said. "You don't need sunglasses." She reached for his glasses, jerked them off, and threw them to the floor, stomping them with her stiletto heel.

"Don't try to hide from the world behind sunglasses," Madonna warned him. "Be comfortable with yourself whether it's with a boy-even a woman, God forbid-or perhaps a menage a trois." Her outrageous talk shocked him. "I lost my virginity to a woman," she claimed. "Moira McPharlin. She fingerfucked me."

At one point during dinner, she turned to him. "I don't like blow jobs. But I do like getting head-but only nonstop for a day and a half. What about you?"

"Oh, Madonna," Michael said, giggling into his napkin.

To blow Michael's mind, at least according to one of Madonna's gay dancers, she told Michael, "Of all the people I've bedded, do you know who's the best hung in Hollywood? Sandra Bernhard."

The staff at the Ivy did what it could to keep the paparazzi away from Madonna and Michael, not knowing that the two mega-stars wanted to be photographed and have their pictures in the tabloids.

Later that night, Michael was heard saying, "Madonna sure knows how to market herself. If only she could sing and dance." This was just one of many digs at his rival-all in a similar vein-that he would make over the course of her career.

When Cher heard about the outrageous publicity Madonna was getting by exploiting Michael, she said, "Madonna could afford to be a little more mag nanimous and a little less of a cunt!"

Madonna agreed to be Michael's "date" for the 63rd annual Academy Awards ceremony. As the paparazzi went wild, Madonna arrived in a white sequined Bob Mackie gown wearing $20 million dollars worth of diamonds on loan. Her dress was cut so low she almost had a wardrobe malfunction.

People Weekly wrote that "Michael Jackson looked positively legendary in gold-tipped cowboy boots, a blinding diamond brooch and-in a dramatic sartorial departure-two gloves."

Barbara Walters, speaking on TV, said, "They looked like caricatures, they seemed untouched, larger than life." Privately, Walters (and this rumor cannot be confirmed) claimed that she felt Madonna was exhibiting Michael "the way a Bearded Lady might be put in a circus of long ago."

Before millions of fans around the world, Madonna sang Stephen Sondheim's "Sooner or Later," which had been nominated for Best Song from the film, Dick Tracy, in which she'd co-starred with her lover of the moment, Warren Beatty. Much to Michael's obvious discomfort, the song won the Oscar.

After the ceremony ended, Michael escorted Madonna to the uber-trendy Spago's for an Oscar bash. Michael greeted many stars he knew casually, including Anjelica Huston, with whom he'd appeared in Captain EO. After their entrance, once Madonna and Michael had their pictures taken, they split up. Michael was seen chatting with Diana Ross, with whom he still maintained an uneasy relationship.

He reacted in horror as Madonna spotted Beatty. "Hey, Warren," she shouted. "Some guys in the press are asking me how big your dick is. I told them I never measured it. I hope that was the right answer."

Actually, Madonna, or so it was reported, wanted to seduce Michael as one of her rapidly growing corps of high-profile conquests. "I've had Prince," she told her bevy of gay dancers. "Why not Michael? Of course, there's a downside. After the mighty sword of Sean Penn, I'm not used to pinpricks." At Michael's expense, the dancers laughed.

A former friend claimed that Madonna was speaking the truth. "It's no joke, size matters to her. She's not interested in somebody who's not above average. That's why she sought out Mick Jagger, John F. Kennedy Jr., Jack Nicholson, Bob Riley, and toy boy Tony Ward."

Author Andrew Morton, in his biography, Madonna, wrote that Madonna "later told one of her lovers that she indeed tried to seduce Jackson shortly after the Oscars-but confessed that her bedside manner failed to arouse his interest. The same lover recalled her description of the scene: `They were on the couch at his place and she would put the moves on him and he would stick out his tongue for a second. When they touched he would start giggling like a little boy. Nothing happened because he was giggling too much. That was one man she was not able to conquer.'"

In spite of their lack of chemistry, some time later Michael and Madonna were seen once again together at Spago's. As rumor had it, they were going to perform a duet on Michael's upcoming album, Dangerous. But nothing came of it. The two artists were simply incompatible.

At dinner, Michael preferred unseasoned boiled carrots, while Madonna ordering more sophisticated fare. The meal lasted three hours, and the couple was seen leaving the restaurant arm-in arm, then went their separate ways in separate limousines.

The press continued with its media buzz about the two superstars. It must be assumed that journalists who wrote these romantic fantasies didn't actually believe them, even for a moment. On April 15, 1991, Madonna and Michael shared the cover of People magazine, but staff members hardly predicted the sound of wedding bells in their future.

The press queried Madonna about those rumors of a romance. She didn't really answer the question but proposed something else. "I have this whole vision about Michael. We're considering working on a song together. I would like to completely re-do his whole image. Give him a Caesar. You know, that really short haircut, and I want to get him out of those buckly boots and all that stuff. What I want him to do is to go to New York and hang out for a week with the House of Extravaganza, a group of vogue-ers. They could give him a new style. I said, `Could you give this guy a make-over for me?' because I think that's really what he needs."

Madonna stealing MJ's "crotch" move

Daringly, she made it clear to the press that she felt Michael "was in the closet." As depicted in her film, Truth or Dare, she was one of the most gay-friendly artists in the business, surrounding herself with gay dancers. Jokingly, but with a dash of conviction, she suggested that her dancing entourage of boys could help Michael "come out."

She even described what an evening with Michael was like. "First I beg him not to wear his sunglasses and of course he complies, because I'm stronger than he is. Then we exchange powder puffs-we both powder our noses-and we compare bank accounts."

Reportedly, Michael raged for days when Forbes magazine in September of 1991 published its list of the highest-paid entertainers. Madonna ranked number four with a two-year earning streak of $63 million. Michael had fallen to number five with a combined two-year gross of $60 million. Madonna sent him an autographed picture of herself. On it she scrawled: "Eat your heart out, Michael! I've got bigger tits too."

Again, Michael went into a rage at Neverland, firing three employees that day who got on his nerves. "That heifer! Damn her!"

When Madonna learned that Michael was referring to her as a heifer, she shot back, "I'd rather be a cow than a drag queen from outer space."

Madonna wasn't the only one casting an envious eye toward Michael. Sibling rivalry was rampant within his own family, as Janet competed furiously with Michael on the charts. June of 1991 found older brother Jermaine not exactly concealing his jealousy of Michael from the tabloids. "I could have been Michael," Jermaine claimed. "It's all a matter of timing, a matter of luck."

That same month, Jermaine released "Word to the Badd" to the world at large. The song was highly critical of Michael, attacking his bleaching creams and his endless plastic surgery.

Reconstructed. Been abducted. Don't know who you are. Once you were made. You changed your shade. Was your color wrong? Could not turn back. It's a known fact. You were too far gone.

When he heard the recording, a furious Michael called his mother, Katherine, ordering Jermaine to be evicted from Hayvenhurst, the Encino compound. Michael owned most of the property.

Since he also paid the bills on the compound, he had that right. Only the intervention of the matriarch of the family pleading with Michael kept Jermaine from getting the boot. "Your brother's got no place to go," Katherine pleaded. Eventually she won a reprieve for Jermaine. Michael visited Hayvenhurst only rarely. When he did, Jermaine was ordered to keep out of his sight.

"Word to the Badd" was released during the same week as "Black or White," Michael's hit single. The two brothers battled on the public air waves, with Michael emerging the victor, of course.

Appearing in London on the BBC, Jermaine attempted to explain why he wrote a song so highly critical of his brother, an almost unprecedented event in the music industry.

"I tried to put some phone calls to him and I didn't get a reply. It's a number of things but it's nothing that we couldn't have worked out had we spoken. But I wasn't granted an opportunity. The overall message is an older brother telling a younger brother to get back to reality."

Michael was irked at the snide comments made by both Jermaine and Madonna. But he flew into a rage when he heard reports claiming he had an "unnatural relationship" with Macaulay Culkin. He decided that a counterattack was needed to fight against press reports, some of which left the clear suggestion that he was a pedophile, long before such accusations were officially charged.

Michael wanted his publicists to spread stories that he was having a series of involvements with beautiful young women. Shoshana Hawley, a Las Vegas showgirl, was singled out as a suitable "date" for Michael.

They were spotted four times attending a pageant at the Excalibur Hotel in Las Vegas. One newspaper wrote a completely misleading story about Hawley and Michael, headlining it, SPARKS FLY BETWEEN DANGEROUS DUDE AND CASINO CUTIE. There were even reports that Michael and Hawley were spending days at a time in his hotel suite in Vegas.

The press got it all wrong. Michael was spending his nights in a sleepover with Brett Barnes, a ten-year-old, good-looking boy from Australia, where Wade Robson had originated. Brett, like Macaulay, was destined to become one of Michael's all-time "special friends."

Only two years behind schedule, "Black or White" was the first single released from Michael's upcoming album, Dangerous. On its first day of release, Michael triumphed over Madonna playing on 96% of 237 of the nation's Top Forty radio stations. With her "Like a Prayer," Madonna had set a previous record of 94%.

Before Christmas of 1991, "Black or White" was the number one single in the country on Billboards top Pop Singles Chart, making it the fastest rising single since The Beatles released "Let It Be." Through Christmas and into the first of the year, 1992, "Black or White" held strong. In music history, Michael became the first performer to have number one pop hits in the 1970s, 80s, and 90s. Before sales died down, Michael eventually sold one million copies of "Black or White."

Production costs associated with the "Black or White" video rose to an astonishing $7 million. Michael brought back John Landis who had done such a brilliant job in directing the "Thriller" video. This time around, Michael and Landis often bitterly disagreed on how to film the video. At one point, Michael shut down production and retreated to his trailer, where he refused to come out for the rest of the afternoon. Thanks partly to this extravagant diva behavior, costs soared.

The eleven-minute video, or so the PR hype would have us believe, was designed to promote racial harmony throughout the world. Michael appeared in the video with Balinese dancers, American Indians, a tribesman from the Sudan, and Macaulay Culkin. Still enchanted with Macaulay, Michael had cast the young boy in the video. The Home Alone star was one of a group of children surrounding Michael.

Many of the fast-escalating costs of the video were associated with having Macaulay on the set. With Michael, he fired squirt guns and tossed waterfilled balloons at the crew. Tiring of that, the child star and Michael set off stink bombs, testing the patience of Landis. As a further insult to the director, he had to endure a custard pie in the face, a gift from Michael that was hurled in imitation of a gag from the silent screen.

"We had to put up with unbelievable shit," said one of the crew members. "It was disgusting. We could forgive this Home Alone kid. He was just a devilish imp. But Michael Jackson! What the hell! This silly little turd is pushing forty and acting like an eight-year-old on drugs."

Another crew member claimed that Michael "was completely infatuated with the boy and would let him do anything. When I got a lemon meringue pie in my face, I wanted to plow my fist into both of them. But, then, I would never work another day in Hollywood, and I have a wife and kids to support. I find both Jackson and Culkin arrogant little pricks. They seemed to think they own the world, and, I guess, at that point in their lives they did. We had to take their shit and smile. Incidentally, I hate lemon meringue pie. If it'd been chocolate fudge, I might have forgiven them."

When the video for "Black or White" was released, it is estimated that some 550 million fans around the world saw it, watching in fascination as a panther on screen was transformed, through a skilful use of computer graphics, into Michael.

In no previous video had Michael been so sexually explicit. He not only caressed and grabbed at his crotch, but was seen zipping up his fly. Thousands upon thousands of protests came in to the Fox network, which had exclusive rights to air the video. Fans objected to both the blatant sex and also to the depictions of crime and violence. Michael is seen smashing the windows of a parked car and tossing the steering wheel through a shop window.

After meeting with Fox executives, Michael agreed to cut the last four minutes of the "Black or White" video.

He issued a statement to the press:

"It upsets me to think that Black or White' could influence any child or adult to destructive behavior either sexual or violent. I've always tried to be a good role model and therefore have made these changes to avoid any possibility of adversely affecting any individual's behavior. I deeply regret any pain or hurt that the final segment of Black of White' has caused children, their parents or other viewers. "

Controversy over the video launched a media blitz. One newspaper suggested that "Jackson has really gone insane with this one." The furor only goaded the public's interest, which was a good omen for the eventual release of the album, Dangerous.

Michael wasn't the only Jackson sibling generating comment in the press. Stories were rampant that La Toya was writing a tell-all memoir and shopping it to New York publishers.

La Toya, born in 1956, never obtained the fame as a singer that Michael and Janet did. What resentment she has about that is best left to her private thoughts. She'd had such minor achievements as hitting #17 on the Billboard Singles Charts in 1980 with her recording of "If You Feel the Funk." The first Jackson woman to have a solo career, she released her first album in 1980 and went on to record six albums, four in the 90s. Her biggest hits were "You're Gonna Get Rocked," "Heart Don't Lie," and "Bet'cha Gonna Need My Lovin'."

La Toya didn't have the voice, the charisma, or the dancing skills of either Michael or Janet, and her career eventually fizzled. Even abandoning Polydor Records for RCA produced only lukewarm results among the record-buying public.

As he worked on his own Dangerous album, and pursued his own diversions, Michael grew increasingly disturbed about what La Toya might write about him in her memoirs. He'd already been embarrassed by the publication of Katherine's book, even though his mother, predictably, was kind to him. But he feared La Toya's recollections, especially if she printed stories about his being molested as a child. For some reason, he seemed to dread this type of revelation more than anything else she might tell a world audience. He ordered John Branca, who was his attorney at the time, to write La Toya a letter, threatening a lawsuit if such revelations were made.

Dominated by her parents for years, La Toya was demonstrating independence for the first time in her life. Papa Joe himself had picked a shadowy figure, Jack Gordon, to help manage La Toya's career. For four years, he'd run a Nevada whorehouse. He'd also spent some time in prison.

Gordon had once tried to bribe Harry Reid during his tenure, in 1978, as chairman of Nevada's Gaming Control Board. For $12,000, Gordon wanted Reid to approve two new, carnival-like gaming devices for casino use. Reid allowed the FBI to videotape the attempted bribe. At one point, as registered on the videotape, Reid put his hands around Gordon's neck and said, "You son of a bitch, you tried to bribe me." Gordon was subsequently arrested, convicted in federal court in 1979, and sentenced to six months in prison.

Reid eventually went on to greater glory, becoming the senior United States Senator from Nevada and the Senate Majority Leader during the admin istration of "the second Bush."

In 1988, La Toya, to the surprise and horror of her family, fled from Hayvenhurst with Gordon. In September of 1989, La Toya, age thirty-three, married Gordon, provoking yet another violent reaction from her family. After her marriage, La Toya telephone Katherine. "I've disowned you," La Toya shouted into the phone. "All of you."

Hoping to make a fast buck, it was Gordon who was urging La Toya to write the tell-all. Gordon claimed, accurately or not, that Michael called one night to offer his sister $12 million if she'd drop plans to publish her memoirs. La Toya has never confirmed that.

Gordon himself had once confronted Papa Joe and Katherine with a proposal. For $5 million, he claimed that he could get La Toya to stop writing. Although Gordon may have exaggerated the millions, it is believed that there were behind-the-scenes offers to get La Toya to dispense with her book.

In 1991 the respected writer, J. Randy Taraborrelli, was set to publish his unauthorized biography, Michael Jackson: The Magic and the Madness. The author's literary agent, Bart Andrew, revealed to the media that agents on Michael's behalf had offered $2 million not to publish the book. Taraborrelli allegedly refused, claiming that he could not be bought off.

La Toya and Gordon found interest in her memoirs at Putnam. When he heard this, Michael threatened to purchase the publishing firm for $85 million and suppress the memoirs. It was the editors at Putnam themselves who turned down La Toya's memoirs after reading the first draft-"not enough juice." She eventually found a willing publisher at Dutton, which issued her memoirs in 1991.

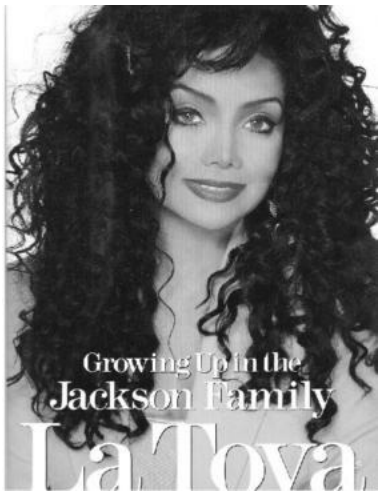
For her book, a gleeful La Toya was paid $500,000, and she could only note that that was $200,000 more than Jackie Onassis at Doubleday had paid for Moonwalk.

La Toya's memoirs hit The New York Times bestseller list and remained there for several weeks, eventually selling more than one million copies.

Michael escaped condemnation in her memoirs, but La Toya didn't spare either Papa Joe or Katherine. She wrote of her father's brutality not only to her but to her brothers and sisters. She claimed that Joe once beat her and left her bleeding on the bathroom floor of their Gary, Indiana, bungalow. She said that her brothers just stepped over her when they wanted to use the bathroom, as they feared getting involved.

At the last minute, La Toya pulled the plug on an allegation of sexual abuse at the hands of her father, although in media interviews, she suggested that she had been a victim of incest.

La Toya and Katherine had once been "best friends," but in her book, La Toya turned on her mother, revealing her not as a kindly matriarch, but as a Dr. Jekyll and Ms. Hyde. She went on to assert that at one point her mother offered her medication that she knew could kill her if she took it.



La Toya's autobiography

One startling statement in La Toya's memoirs, perhaps engineered to cause maximum embarrassment to Katherine, claimed that her mother said that "Hitler's one mistake-he didn't kill all those Jews. He left too many damn Jews on this earth, and they multiplied."

The talk-show/tabloid circuit went for La Toya big-time, as interviewers goaded her to reveal even more shocking allegations about her family than she already had in print. She did detail the physical and psychological abuse she and her eight brothers and sisters had endured at the hands of Papa Joe. She even claimed that Joe and Katherine once tried to kidnap her and bring her back to Hayvenhurst to break her emotional involvement with her manager, Jack Gordon.

Like Michael, La Toya had been raised as a Jehovah's Witness. She asserted that the elders of the church had ordered Michael never to speak to her again because she had "missed too many meetings." She found him sobbing on Janet's bed. He couldn't go through with the harsh dictates of his cruel church, and they maintained their friendship until Michael freed himself from the dictates of this cult.

Although a darling of the media, because she made "hot copy," La Toya came in for her share of attacks. One reporter wrote, "Michael may have earned the moniker `Wacko Jacko,' but La Toya is as crazy as any of her siblings. With a modicum of talent and a lot of nerve, she has parlayed her name into a career. She has received more publicity for her antics than for any of her recordings."

Harry Reid

In 1987 La Toya had electrified her fans by posing nude for Playboy. Some eight million copies of the magazine sold within one month. It was the most sensational issue since nude pictures of Marilyn Monroe were published. When Playboy came out, La Toya's brothers responded in horror, Jermaine calling to denounce her as "a piece of shit."

Michael was more sympathetic, telling her that he knew why she'd posed: To strike back at her parents and at the Jehovah's Witnesses who had brainwashed her for years. He claimed that he grabbed his crotch on the stage for the same reason. "I want them to know I'll do what I want to do. They no longer control who I am."

Sexy Janet

As two-faced as ever, Michael called Katherine and expressed his "moral disgust and total outrage" at La Toya's photographs in Playboy. He informed Katherine that he'd changed his private phone number and vowed never to speak to La Toya again.

Michael had visited Hugh Hefner's Playboy mansion and had seen the photographs that La Toya had posed for-"that ruins the family image. That's it! There's nothing left."

The magazine came out with eleven pictures of La Toya. In one she posed naked with a sixty-two pound boa constrictor-not "Muscles"-slithering between her shapely legs, suggesting a massive phallus. La Toya received $1 million from Playboy for the photo session.

Madonna, who was also fond of her own big breasts, seemed jealous of La Toya when Madonna appeared on The Arsenio Hall Show. She claimed that La Toya had undergone breast implants. "I know because people have told me," Madonna charged. "It's obvious that La Toya's bosom has grown in just a week."

La Toya countered, "Madonna is the one who's undergone breast surgery. It was her only chance to look anything like a woman. I saw a photograph of her where she showed one of her new breasts. I've gotta tell you, they're still not as good as mine."

Gordon called Arsenio Hall and offered "my wife for a night," so that the talk show host could determine for himself if La Toya's breasts were real.

Jack Gordon, throughout most of the 1990s, managed not only La Toya but John Wayne Bobbitt, Paula Jones, and even the so-called illegitimate son of Elvis Presley.

On the night of June 23, 1993, Lorena Bobbitt, a manicurist from Ecuador, cut off the penis of her husband, John Wayne Bobbin, as he lay sleeping in their Manassas, Virginia, home. Realizing that her husband's penis might be surgically re-attached, she grabbed the severed appendage and raced off in the family car, flinging it out the window. After a diligent search, the local police located the part and Bobbitt had his manhood restored, after grueling surgery in a nearby hospital.

Gordon sensed there was money to be made in theatrically exploiting Bobbitt. In the main, feminist political activists were against John Wayne Bobbitt and pro Lorena Bobbitt, but millions of American men stood behind him, especially when Lorena later testified that she severed the penis "because he was selfish and wouldn't give me an orgasm."

When Gordon informed Michael of his new client, he was fascinated. Michael was never known for reading newspapers, and he misunderstood the situation. He seemed to think that the penis was discovered but never reattached to its rightful owner.

According to Gordon, Michael made an offer to purchase the penis and to add it to his collection of carefully preserved medical oddities, one of which included a human brain. Gordon never revealed the amount of money Michael was willing to pay for the severed penis, but jokingly said: "It was such a generous offer that I had a good mind to get Bobbitt to agree to have his prick cut off again for Michael."

Bookings were forthcoming for John Wayne Bobbitt, as Gordon managed his career, getting him an appearance on The Howard Stern Show. On the air, the controversial TV host offered Bobbitt $10,000 if he'd whip out his penis and show it to TV land. Bobbitt refused, but he eventually agreed not only to reveal his penis but to show it fully erect, seducing women in a number of XXX-rated films, which were eagerly bought by male collectors.

Bobbitt also played himself in a shameless hardcore docudrama, John Wayne Bobbitt Uncut. Directed by veteran adult film star, Ron Jeremy, the film was delivered to Michael for his viewing pleasure. He reportedly viewed it several times, although critics noted that Bobbitt, after his slicing, "seems to have lost an inch or two." One reviewer wrote, "John Wayne Bobbitt exploits himself to the nth degree, by selling everything he has-all 4'/z inches of it."

When American men were no longer interested in Bobbin's saga, he broke with Gordon and moved to Nevada where he found work in a brothel. At the same time, and with a certain irony, this staunch Republican also became the minister of a Las Vegas church.

In 1999 he was convicted of grand larceny. He was sentenced to five years pro bation for his role in the theft of more than $150,000 in clothing from a Fallon, Nevada, store. Archie Blake, the district judge, ordered him to pay $5,000 restitution and serve 100 hours of community service. On February 28, 2003, his probation was revoked, and this underground celebrity was sent to prison.

Sexy La Toya, centerfold

Gordon took on another controversial client, and informed Michael that he did not only "plan to make big bucks off of her, but I may topple the U. S. government as well." At first Michael seemed to treat this as an idle boast, until he discovered a news program or two when flipping channels on TV for the next cartoon.

Paula Corbin Jones was born in Lonoke, Arkansas, on September 17, 1966. A former state employee, she would sue President Bill Clinton for sexual harassment, claiming that on May 8, 1991, she was escorted to his hotel room, where Governor Clinton crudely propositioned her. She claimed she'd kept quiet about the incident until 1994.

Fascinated by the case, Michael followed the developing story on TV. He advised Gordon that Jones should undergo rhinoplasty as he himself had done. He also suggested that he was willing to fly Jones to Los Angeles for a possible meeting with Elizabeth Taylor. Michael promised that Elizabeth would get rid of Jones's "big hair" and make up her face in "more subtle shades." The meeting never came off, and Elizabeth may have been completely unaware that her services were being offered to Jones.

Gordon's plans for Paula Jones, including a multi-million dollar book deal, never came off. Clinton eventually paid $850,000 to Jones but issued no apology, in exchange for her agreement to drop her appeal.

Gordon did get Jones in print, securing a deal with Penthouse for her to pose nude. She appeared in the December issue: "PAULA JONES UNCOVERED! She Shows All and Tells All: How the Far Right Used and Abused Her to Destroy Clinton." Michael compared Jones's nude spread with that of La Toya. "La Toya wins," he told some of his brothers. "Clinton chose the wrong girl."

As if Jones and Bobbitt weren't bizarre enough clients, Gordon took on another job to promote the career of "Elvis Presley Jr." His original name was Phillip Stanic, and he was born in the same town as Michael-Gary, Indiana. Phillip entered the world the day before Christmas in 1961.

He later had his name legally changed to Elvis Presley Jr., claiming that his birth mother was Angelique Delores Pettyjohn, a walk-on for Elvis in his movie Blue Hawaii.

Elvis Jr. was short and stocky. He is not handsome and bears little resemblance to the King, but he learned the Elvis moves and transformed himself. In the words of one critic, "He got the look down pat."

Gordon promoted Elvis Jr. as a singer in night clubs, proposing a multimillion dollar deal for Michael to sign a contract for an extravaganza in Vegas, with Elvis Jr. as his opening act. Elvis Jr. said he believed that "my father gave me up for adoption because having a child out of wedlock in that era could have had an adverse affect on his career."

Although Michael refused Gordon's offer, he was intrigued by Elvis Presley Jr. and wanted Gordon to provide him with all the details about the young man's life. Michael was especially intrigued to learn that Elvis Jr. started his career as a clown in the circus at the age of five. By the time he was twelve years old, he was training lions, tigers, and other animals. When only sixteen, he began singing in the lesser-known lounges in Vegas.

Gordon claimed that Michael, in disguise and at his invitation, slipped in to a lounge one night to hear Elvis Jr. sing. "He is not the son of Elvis Presley!" Michael later told Gordon.

Gordon wanted to keep Elvis Jr. impersonating Elvis Sr. as he was in his "Hound Dog" years, complete with jumpsuits and sideburns. But eventually Elvis Jr. pulled the plug. "It wasn't me," he said. "I can't live my life as him."

Unlike Lorena Bobbitt, La Toya didn't cut off Gordon's penis, but their marriage was frequently violent.

On one occasion, in their luxurious New York apartment, Gordon plowed his fist into La Toya's face. Blood splattered on the white marble floor of the couple's bathroom. Before she could escape from his attack, he picked up a heavy oak dining room chair and crashed it into her back. An ambulance carried her to Lenox Hill Hospital where Michael called her the next day, urging her to "dump him." Although she told her brother that she would, she was back with Gordon a few days later.

John Wayne Bobbitt

La Toya wrote of physical and emotional abuse from Gordon for ten years. "He grabbed me and said `I own you,'" she claimed in an interview in 2005 on 20/20.

Earlier she had revealed that her husband had booked her into strip clubs and had falsely advertised that she would appear in the nude. Not only that, but he tried to coerce her into making hard-core porn films.

To Michael's relief, La Toya finally divorced Gordon in 1997. "1 had to get rid of all the cancer in my life, beginning with my husband." She placed the entire blame on her former husband for causing an alienation between Michael and herself and other family members, especially Katherine. The family seemed to accept that explanation, Papa Joe claiming that his daughter had been "brainwashed."

In the spring of 1992, La Toya signed a $5 million year-long deal with the landmark Moulin Rouge in Paris. She was the single greatest attraction ever booked in this world famous theater. "Just think about it," Gordon told her. "You'll appear on the same stage that made Josephine Baker a legend in the 20s."

On that same stage, other acts included an assortment of French comedians, acrobats, jugglers, and one performer who wrestled three live crocodiles plus a topless snake charmer who danced with a six-foot boa constrictor evocative of Michael's "Muscles."

During this time La Toya was also honored as one of the ten best-dressed women in the world by the designers of Milan and Paris.

Fortunately, in ways that perhaps reflected a growing maturity and wisdom, she eventually toured with Bob Hope and the USO in support of the servicemen and women fighting the first Gulf War, and she also worked with Nancy Reagan in her "Just Say No" anti-drug campaign.

The following year, in 1993, when charges of child molestation against Michael were first aired, La Toya, standing alone among the Jacksons, led the attack against him. She accused Michael of paying hush money to the parents of his accusers. "He would stay in his room at Hayvenhurst for days on end with young boys."

At the Wailing Wall in Tel Aviv, Israel, and while accompanied by Gordon, La Toya delivered a statement heard around the world: "I love him a great deal. But I cannot and I will not be a silent collaborator to his crimes against small, innocent children." This was viewed by the media as the harshest and most damning statement one sibling had ever uttered against another in the history of the entertainment industry.

She also renewed charges that her own mother, Katherine, had once again denounced Michael"That damn faggot, I can't stand him."

Paula Jones

Gordon jumped into the fray, charging that "Michael used to have the LAPD in his back pocket-but no more." He also leveled more charges against Michael, claiming that he'd learned that her brother "had paid hit men to assassinate La Toya if she ever returned to America."

Londoners woke up to read The Sun and its screaming headlines: LA TOYA TO BROTHER: CUT OUT THE BOYS! In the story, La Toya claimed that she'd warned Michael five months previously to "stop spending so much time with young boys."

After their divorce, Gordon continued to call La Toya, making threats against her, even death threats. And, post-millennium, he announced plans to "write the tell-all book of tell-alls about La Toya, Michael, and the Jackson family."

He called it Never Neverland: The True Story of the Most Powerful Family in the Music Industry. The slippery Svengali began to release revelations to the press, hoping to interest a publisher in his startling expose.

During his time with La Toya, Gordon claimed that he witnessed Michael "injecting himself with some kind of fluid to whiten his skin. He would look in the mirror and say, `I'm getting lighter, I'm getting lighter.' I don't know what the fluid was, but Jackson was getting lighter. I saw him do it in 1985. Boxes containing this mysterious fluid were delivered to Jackson's house every day."

One night at the Jackson compound in Encino the following year, Gordon claimed that "I saw a monkey set ablaze as part of a voodoo ritual in the Jackson backyard at Hayvenhurst. They asked me to leave and never talk about it again." Other writers, with credentials more impressive than Gordon's, would also link Michael with voodoo rituals.

In another monkey story-in this case, a tale about a pet chimpanzeeGordon charged that he'd witnessed Michael "abusing his pet chimpanzee, Bubbles. He beat him a lot. I saw him punch him, kick him in the stomach. The chimp was on the ground crying. Jackson used to say `he doesn't feel it. He's just a chimpanzee. I have to discipline him.'" The first of the beatings that Gordon claimed he witnessed occurred in Encino in 1985.

Branca, Michael's attorney at the time, denounced the accusations of Michael's former brother-in-law. "These are all absurd, made-up, outrageous allegations. Consider the source. It's a joke. I don't believe that anyone will believe anything that comes out of Jack Gordon's mouth."

"Elvis Jr."

Nearing the end of his life, Gordon told a reporter, "I've had cancer four times. I feel like the book should have been written a long time ago. It's about time the world learns what the Jackson family, especially Michael, is all about. All that family does is tell one lie after another. Of course, they'll denounce anything I say about them. But I was around them for a long time, and I saw plenty. I've lived long enough to see much of the truth about Michael made public. There's a lot more here that's going on. They want to conceal the truth and claim everybody's a liar. You want the truth? Michael Jackson and all his family have engaged in a deliberate campaign to conceal the truth from their public. With good reason, I might add."

In a November 25, 2003 interview with Rita Cosby, Gordon gave other damaging testimony against Michael.

GORDON: I saw him take children into his bedroom and the children would stay there three or four days and they would come out and there would be a noticeable change in their behavior from a happy child to a very despondent-you know, unhappy child.

COSBY: What do you believe?

GORDON: What do I believe? Well, I believe he's a pedophile.

COSBY: You do?

GORDON: In every sense of the word.

On April 19, 2005, at the age of 66, after a drawn-out battle with cancer, Gordon died in a Las Vegas hospital.

Reportedly, La Toya sent a security expert to eyewitness his burial, wanting to make sure his death was for real. "I was fearful of his lies and death threats," she said.

Upon hearing the news, Michael reportedly said, "The world is now a better place."

After her divorce, La Toya "disappeared" for a number of years. "I didn't know what to do with my life." At one point she started going out again, disguising herself in a suit, mustache, and goatee. "Everyone thought I was a guy," she said. "Actually everybody thought I was Michael. They didn't know if I was a girl or guy."

Her appearance led to media speculation, and rumors spread among the Los Angeles underground that La Toya was a lesbian. The same charges had been leveled against her younger sister, Janet. These charges appeared in a June, 2005, interview that La Toya granted to journalist Paul E. Pratt.

> PRATT: In the song's lyrics, `Just Wanna Dance,' you mention kissing a woman on the neck and dancing chest to chest. Have you had sexual interaction with a woman?
> LA TOYA: It's a question I prefer not to answer.
> PRATT: What would you like your fans, in particular, your gay fans, to know about La Toya Jackson?
>
> LA TOYA: I want to say that it's because of my fans, in particular my gay fans, because they tend to be a little more outspoken about their feelings, > that I have gotten the inspiration to do this. It's because of them I'm `Startin' Over.'
>

Her album with the same name was released in 2005.

After years of being sheltered by her parents and under the domination of her husband, La Toya, along with Janet, has emerged as the most sophisticated of the Jackson family. Michael's comments on homosexuality were offensive to the gay community and cost him thousands upon thousands of fans. La Toya proved the more tolerant one. On gay marriage, she said, "It is so difficult in the world for people to find love, true love. When people are in love, I don't see anything wrong with it in the world. If they choose to live their lives and get married, why should we interfere? A lot of people don't agree with me, but that's how I feel."

Imagine Michael making such a socially advanced statement.

Post-millennium, La Toya's views about her brother changed markedly during his renewed charges of child molestation. "We're all behind him 1,000 percent," she said. "The public hears so much that's not true."

She said, "Michael knows my heart. I have always been with him in my heart. He knows the influence of somebody else who made me do something against my will." She was clearly referring to Gordon. "My family knew I didn't want to do what I did, but I couldn't say no."

On 20/20 in 2005, she also said, "I love my brother. Michael is one of the sweetest persons on this earth. You have no idea. He is so misunderstood."

Another woman who loved Michael was Elizabeth Taylor, but not enough to marry him. On his "red hotline," with a direct link to Elizabeth Taylor's Bel Air mansion on 700 Nimes Rd., a call came in for him at midnight. Michael was engaged in a sleepover with Macaulay Culkin.

"Guess what?" said Elizabeth (or so Michael later claimed). "I've gone and done it. I got down on beaded nylon and popped the question to Larry." It was a hot night in June of 1991 when Elizabeth placed the call to Michael, her confidant.

On that very same night, he agreed to host their wedding at Neverland. By July of 1991, Elizabeth was about to enter into her eighth and final marriage, this time to a husky, thirty-six-year-old truck driver, Larry Fortensky, who boasted a six-inch penis, according to a former wife. Elizabeth had met him when both of them were in rehab at the Betty Ford Clinic in 1988.

She told Michael, "I have the hots for him." She also claimed that he planned to continue working even after they were married "because he doesn't want to be a kept man. It's his way of maintaining his balls."

When she met Larry at the rehab center, he'd been driving an off-road Caterpillar dirt compactor. But he'd become a self-described "walking night mare," with his consumption of hard liquor, pills, and pot, and had voluntarily checked himself in.

He soon bonded with Elizabeth. Fellow inmates watched the romance blossom as he hauled her around the grounds in a wheelchair. Outside the clinic, he took her out on their first date together, dropping into McDonald's for their supper. Elizabeth, who had dined in some of the world's greatest palaces, liked the taste of the Big Mac and became addicted to the burgers, which only increased her waistline.

"There's only a twenty-one year age difference between us," Elizabeth told Michael, "but Larry just loves my not-altogether-fallen breasts. We have passionate sex."

When he'd first introduced himself to Elizabeth, Larry had said, "I'm from Stanton, California. Bornthere 100,000 Heinekens ago." He'd been born in 1952 in the wake of Elizabeth's big success with A Place in the Sun opposite Montgomery Clift.

He also told her that he'd gone to Pacifica High School but had dropped out, so he warned her that he wasn't very well educated and dreaded "meeting all your fancy friends."

One of those friends Elizabeth wanted Larry to meet was Michael. Before his association with Elizabeth, Larry had the typical hard-cut prejudice against gay people. From what he'd read, Larry just assumed that Michael was gay.

But they did meet and, in spite of their widely different backgrounds, became friends of a sort. "I don't give a shit if people in the tabloids are making fun of me for marrying a woman so much older," Larry said. "You like to hang out with younger companions. I like to hang out with and make love to an older woman."

Michael said that he didn't see anything wrong with that. "I'm happy if Elizabeth is happy, and she seems to be. But does she really have to pose for that magazine cover holding a condom? Naughty, naughty."

In time, Larry would meet many of Elizabeth's other gay friends, including Roddy McDowall and millionaire Malcolm Forbes.

The "wedding of the year" took place in October of 1991 at Neverland, Michael picking up the tab of $1.5 million. Two American presidents attended, Ronald Reagan with his wife, Nancy, and Gerald Ford. There were 160 other guests.

Larry invited members of his family, except his father with whom he was on the outs, and Elizabeth invited both children and grandchildren. Michael invited his Hollywood Golden Age friends such as Gregory Peck. Merv Griffin arrived with "arm candy," Eva Gabor, and even Diane von Furstenberg put in an appearance and was seen talking to-of all people-Phyllis Diller.

In return for his generous hosting of their wedding, the Fortenskys pre seated Michael with a rare albino bird from the Amazon. It was rumored to have cost Elizabeth $25,000.

After the wedding, Jack Gordon called with another one of the many getrich-schemes he had come up with for Michael. So far, Michael had rejected all of Gordon's "deals," but Gordon never stopped trying until the two men discontinued their association.

Gordon later recalled Michael as saying, "I wanted to marry Elizabeth myself. But I understand why she chose Larry over me. But her marriage has given me an idea. I'm going to get married myself My new bride is not as famous as Elizabeth but her father was."

"Just who might that be?" Gordon asked. "I'm all ears, and I want the rights to the photographic coverage."

"I'm not telling," Michael said. "I haven't even dated her yet."

"What makes you so cocky?" Gordon asked. "Maybe the bitch won't even be attracted to you."

"Sexual attraction is not part of the deal," Michael said adamantly. "There are other things."

"Yeah, money," Gordon snapped.

"That too, to the tune of $15 million dollars."

"For $15 million, I'll marry you myself-and I'm a straight arrow."

"There will be more than money on the table," Michael said. "I'll agree to spend millions more on launching her singing career."

"Oh, my God," Gordon said. "You're going to propose marriage to a singer. I want her management contract."

"You're always wanting something." Michael said, slamming down the phone.

"It's being offstage that's difficult for me. "

Chapter Eleven

At the dawn of the 1990s, Michael seemed to be making a career out of receiving awards. Most often, he didn't show up to accept these honors. When he did, he became notorious for giving a brief and predictable speech, always of the "thank you very much, I love all of you" variety.

On ABC's Good Morning America, host Charlie Gibson referred to Michael Jackson as "a guy who made one big album and a Pepsi commercial where his hair caught on fire." Appearing with him, Tina Brown, then editorin-chief of Vanity Fair, defended her choice of Michael on the cover of one of that magazine's recent editions. He was pictured with his long hair blowing back in an unseen wind. "We chose Michael Jackson because he is the premier entertainer of our time," Brown said. "He's the biggest!"

Michael did put in an appearance at the Beverly Hilton Hotel for the unveiling of a portrait that he had commissioned of himself. Called "The Book," it depicted Michael in a chair holding a book on his lap. In the background was a statue of Peter Pan. A Japanese businessman paid $2.1 million for the painting. This was the highest amount ever paid for a portrait of a living person. When Whoopi Goldberg heard of this, she remarked sarcastically: "You've got to be kidding!"

With the collaboration of his new manager, Sandy Gallin, Michael took more of a hands-on approach to his own career, leaving Gallin free to pursue his other clients, who included not only Whoopi, but also Dolly Parton and Neil Diamond. When Dolly heard that she and Michael were being managed by the same agent, she was reported to have said, "Don't forget! I have bigger tits than Michael Jackson unless he goes back for plastic surgery again."

Michael refused to attend the 1990 Grammy Awards. It was just as well. If he'd gone, he would have seen Janet Jackson's "Rhythm Nation 1814" edge out "Moonwalker" for Best Long Form Video of the year.

One award Michael received was later to cause ridicule and embarrass meat. The homophobic Los Angeles Council of the Boy Scouts of America created an award and named it in honor of Michael, its first recipient. On September 14, 1990, he accepted the Michael Jackson Good Scout Humanitarian Award for his "humanitarian efforts" and fund-raising.

Michael Eisner, CEO of the Walt Disney Company, presented the award to Michael, who appeared in a black and gold military costume with sunglasses. In a brief acceptance speech, Michael said, "On behalf of the millions of past, present, and future Boy Scouts, I will try to abide by your motto of being prepared and always extending a hand to others."

Joan Rivers ridiculed his short speech. "I bet he'd like to extend a hand to a cute little boy scout. Why? To `Beat It,' of course!"

Michael slowly moved ahead with his long-delayed new album, Dangerous. He set unrealistic goals for himself, demanding of his back-up musicians that they produce an album that would top the sale of Thriller. Privately, Sandy Gallin had his doubts that Michael would ever top the sale of Thriller. Dangerous would eventually sell thirty million copies worldwide. Michael had an even loftier goal. He said, "I want to create something like Beethoven did so that people would still listen to it in a thousand years from now."

When Forbes magazine published its list of highest paid entertainers for 1990, two black men ranked as number one and two. Michael was furious that he came in after Bill Cosby. "Cosby does a little dance to open the show," Michael said. "But he can't dance. I mean, not a step! And for not being able to dance, he earns $100 million in two years as opposed to me."

With Walter Yetnikoff and John Branca out of the picture, Michael proved a hard-assed negotiator when it came time in 1991 to talk turkey with Sony, the new owner of CBS Records. Tommy Mottola, who would later be denounced by Michael, took over for Yetnikoff.

Up front, Michael demanded an $18 million advance for each album. Not only that, he wanted to split expenses and profits fifty-fifty with Sony, an unheard-of request in the industry. He also wanted to start his own record label. "What next?" Mottola asked. "Pay for his flight to the moon?"

The staff at Neverland reported that Michael shouted and ranted for three days and nights, even firing five of his team, when he learned that sister Janet had signed with Virgin Records for a contract estimated to be as high as $50 million, the largest recording deal in the history of the industry.

Michael struck back, signing a deal with Sony that might bring him up to $1 billion, at least in potential earnings. Not only was the amount unprecedented, but so was the deal, which included film, record, and TV options. The fifteen-year contract, after much bickering, finally granted Michael the right to start his own record label, Nation Records. For being CEO of the company, Michael would be paid $1 million a year.

He also got Sony, again after much bickering, to grant him a seventy percent profit on all video rights. Since Sony owned Columbia Pictures, it was announced that Michael would also be making his first film for that company.

In rebuttal, Janet's people, as they are called in Hollywood, announced that her deal with Virgin Records did in fact exceed "the record segment of the contract" signed by her brother with Sony. But the Wall Street Journal soon shot down Janet's claims, estimating that the record portion of Michael's Sony deal would be "worth at least $60 million," a good $10 million more than the terms defined by his younger sister's contract. Michael's rivalry with his older brother, Jennaine, receded into the background as he seemed to an increasing degree to be pitted against Janet. A fan in Chicago, Laraine Maven, said, "I don't have much allowance to spend in a record store. If it was a question of buying Janet or buying Michael, I'd go for her, since she sings better."

In 1992 the Guinness Book of World Records asserted that Michael's Sony deal was indeed the largest contract ever signed in the music industry.

For his first movie role at Columbia, Michael wanted to depict Little Richard, but so did Eddie Murphy. "Eddie wouldn't be believable as a Tutti Frutti," Michael shouted at Gallin. "I practically own Little Richard. Get the role for me. Tell Eddie to star in ... dare I say the title, Mother Fucker! "

Back at Encino during this time in 1992, Margaret Maldonado Jackson, now living with Jermaine, was in the process of producing a mini-series called The Jacksons: An American Dream. Her problems were detailed in her memoir, Jackson Family Values: Memories of Madness, ghost-written by Richard Hack and published in 1995.

Among Margaret's travails, La Toya threatened legal action if her likeness was used in the mini-series. In January of 1992, a nationwide search that rivaled the hunt for an actress to play Scarlett O'Hara in Gone With the Wind was launched. More than three dozen young actors were needed to portray the Jackson family at three different stages in their lives. Margaret not only had La Toya to deal with, but Michael himself. Reports surfaced, but were later denied, that Michael demanded actors playing him to be white.

December, 1989 edition of Vanity Fair

Margaret finally got Michael to agree on the cast, and made some intriguing choices of her own. In the end, a talented actor, Jason Weaver, played young Michael, with Alex Burrall and Wylie Draper starring at later stages of his life.

Margaret cast Holly Robinson, familiar to audiences for her appearances on 21 Jump Street, as Diana Ross. For her lover, Berry Gordy Jr., Margaret cast Billy Dee Williams. The first black Miss America (later dethroned), Vanessa Williams, was cast as Suzanne de Passe, who, as a Motown executive, played an instrumental role in launching The Jackson 5.

Margaret recalled, "Seeing the actors re-enact segments of their lives brought back all the love, the pain, the anticipation, the heartache, and, in several cases, the anguish as memories came flooding back."

As the head of his own record company, Michael signed up some other family members to his label. But his motives may have been suspect. Some executives at Sony privately claimed that there was a feeling that the King of Pop wanted only one Jackson in the recording studio, Michael himself. Of course, there was nothing he could do about Janet. At this point, she was beyond his financial control.

"I think Michael secretly wanted to sign the other Jacksons as a means of suppressing them instead of promoting them," said a Sony official, speaking confidentially. Michael did release a recording by his older sister, Rebbie, and one by Tito Jackson Jr., both of which showed a great deal of promise, but reportedly he then went on to sabotage the promotion of both of these recordings.

Michael had begun what was for him a long, arduous, and costly project, his long-awaited Dangerous album. In a surprise move, he did not use Quincy Jones as the producer, even though the very talented Jones had brought Michael his greatest success.

He decided to go with Harlem-born Teddy Riley as producer. Riley was famous for a new musical genre, called "New Jack Swing"-or "Swingbeat" in Britain-and had pioneered the sound with such R&B performers as Keith Sweat.

New Jack Swing eventually translated into hiphop soul. Riley had also worked with Boy George. By 2006, Riley was at work with a New Jack Swing revival.

Teddy Riley

The album, Dangerous, premiered on Billboard's top album chart at Number One in 1991, as Michael himself had predicted. It had been produced at an estimated cost of more than $12 million, an industry record. CBS Records shipped out four million copies.

In addition to the title song, "Dangerous," the album featured such songs as "In the Closet" and "Remember the Time," the latter dedicated to Diana Ross. Michael was feeling better about her again. As a political message, he recorded "Heal the World."

Internationally, Dangerous would eclipse the sales of Bad, as 32 million albums disappeared around the world, even in East Germany. Not all of these were legitimate sales. On November 20, 1991, a group of armed men stole 30,000 copies of Dangerous from an air freight terminal at the Los Angeles airport.

In spite of strong sales, critical response to the album was for the most part unfavorable. The Los Angeles Times asked: "How dangerous can a man be who literally wants to please everyone?" The reviewer called the album "a messy grab-bag of ideas and high-tech non sequiturs, with something for everyone from the man who has everything-relatively tame, wildly unfocused." Another critic asserted, "Michael Jackson desperately wants to be a classic star like his good friends Elizabeth Taylor and Katharine Hepburn."

Teddy Riley, the producer of the Dangerous album, said that Michael talked a lot about what he'd done to his face and skin during their production work. "I'm quite sure if Michael could have done it all over again, he would not have done what he did," Riley said. "But there's no turning back. Once you change your description, you're stuck with it. You can't get your own face and your own skin back. But he is still Michael Jackson, still the talented man that everybody grew up on."

Although at least three music videos were generated by the Dangerous album, the video associated with the single "Remember the Time" generated more than its share of strife.

John Singleton, director of Boyz N the Hood, was hired to direct it, opting for, in full cooperation with Michael, a setting in ancient Egypt.

In a surprise move, Michael decided to cast Eddie Murphy in the video, despite the fact that it was widely assumed that the two men detested each other. Throughout the 80s Murphy had made a career in stand-up comedy routines which sometimes viciously ridiculed gays and their vulnerability to AIDS. Even Richard Pryor found Murphy "a little too mean," and Michael was frequently the butt of Murphy's jokes.

John Singleton

Michael, of course, was aware that Murphy had mocked him on nationwide television and made fun of him in club acts, but despite all that, the two men worked harmoniously together, concealing whatever private feelings they might have had about each other. Murphy was cast as the Pharaoh Ramses, playing opposite the glamorous actress and supermodel, Iman, who played his wife, Queen Nefertiti. Before signing on, Murphy, joking or not, said, "There ain't gonna be no scene with me kissin' no faggot!"

Born in Somalia, the exotic Iman became the wife of David Bowie on April 24, 1992. Channel 5 ranked her #29 in their roster of "The World's Greatest Supermodels." Iman later proclaimed, "I had breast enlargement to quiet that noise in my head and fill the gaping hole in my self-esteem."

Iman confided that she would not be able to show the video to her father, a strict Muslim. Her father was the Somalian ambassador to Saudi Arabia. "Nudity and erotic video are against his religion, and has been a major conflict in our family. Even my being a model goes against my father's religion. At the end of the day, I'm my father's daughter. If there are any naked pictures up when he comes around, I hide them."

She'd posed topless for the 1985 edition of the popular Pirelli Calendar. She had also performed in a music video for Jermaine Jackson, "Do What You Do."

In Michael's video, Eddie Murphy, as the Egyptian pharaoh, sends his guards chasing after Michael, who manages to elude them and ends up with an embrace and a kiss from Iman.

Michael seemed to freeze during his kiss with the delectable Iman. "I wouldn't freeze, man," Murphy said. "That would sure get a rise out of me."

Later, reviewers attacked the kiss as "the most unconvincing in the history of the movies." One critic wrote, "if Michael Jackson was trying to assert his heterosexual credentials in this video, he failed miserably. If Sir Winston Churchill had ever been forced to kiss Adolf Hitler, I think the British prime minister would have pulled it off with more fervor." Singleton begged Michael to film the scene over again, but Michael retreated to his dressing room for the rest of the day. Sobbing, he was found watching The Little Mermaid.

Magic Johnson was also cast in the video. Privately, Michael told his producer that he wanted to limit his contact with the athlete. He'd heard that he had HIV, and Michael, perhaps unaware of how the disease is transmitted, was overly sensitive.

The director wanted his actors in Egyptian dress, which meant showing some leg. But Michael refused, allegedly because his legs were still "as brown as an acorn," whereas his upper torso had turned white. To the horror of the wardrobe department, Michael insisted on wearing black pants underneath his Egyptian dress.

Later, Michael agreed to a minor participation in Murphy's 1992 album, Love's Alright. In the video of the song, "WhatZupWitu," Michael and Murphy appear in a Technicolor-like dream together. The Boys Choir of Harlem also makes an appearance. The video was so horrid that it was at first released only in Japan. Later when it reached the United States in 1999, MTV voted it as "one of the 25 worst music videos" in history.

For yet another video from the Dangerous album, Michael filmed "In the Closet," as if dangerously courting more ridicule from Joan Rivers. "In the Closet?" she shrieked. "Michael, tell us something we don't know."

If his kiss with Iman was a bomb, he hoped to right that wrong by hiring another supermodel, the ravishingly attractive Naomi Campbell.who had been chosen by People magazine as one of the 50 Most Beautiful People in the World.

A Californian, Herb Ritts, who had directed videos for both Janet Jackson and for Madonna, signed on as the director of "In the Closet."

As a director of music videos, Ritts was an odd choice. He was mainly known for celebrity photography, taking pictures of everyone from Jack Nicholson to Mick Jagger. His photos had graced album covers, including Madonna's True Blue in 1986. He'd photographed Cindy Crawford for both the July 1988 and the October 1998 issues of Playboy. As a respected photographer, Ritts gained unprecedented access to many of his subjects, including a paralyzed Christopher Reeve and a post-brain surgery Elizabeth Taylor.

During the publicity associated with "In the Closet," Ritts proposed a daring concept: Michael would pose nude for a centerfold for publication in either Vogue, Elle, Harpers Bazaar, Vanity Fair, or Rolling Stone.

When he saw the horror of Michael's face, Ritts assured him that in his photo shop he could make a penis look bigger. Ritts later claimed that Michael burst into tears at the suggestion and ran away from him. Ironically, despite his horrified reaction to Ritts' proposal, within just a few short months, Michael would be posing nude for a Santa Barbara police photographer-definitely against his wishes.

For six weeks prior to the filming of a third video, Michael hired a personal trainer "who looked like Arnold Schwarzenegger." Since he didn't plan to show his legs, they worked mostly to build up his upper torso.

In spite of all his efforts, Michael still emerged, in the words of one critic, "as the 97-pound weakling in all those old Charles Atlas ads where bullies on the beach kick sand in his face, embarrassing him in front of his girl."

On location in Palm Springs, Michael and the artfully underclad Naomi executed their videotaped maneuvers together. Naomi comes on strong, provocatively wrapping her bare legs around Michael's waist.

In the video, she reveals that she should have been a film star-not just a "supermodel." In contrast, in the words of one critic, "He absolutely froze as Naomi comes at him like a tigress. Michael was out of his element with a hottie like Naomi."

On a trivial note, Princess Stephanie of Monaco was credited with supplying the female vocal. The final track also included a brief appearance by rapper Heavy D, and an appearance by superstar Michael Jordan. In the video, he dances and plays basketball with Jordan. Michael, even at this late date, was still confusing Magic Johnson with Michael Jordan. To resolve the confusion, he developed a somewhat insensitive way of differentiating the two athletes: "Oh, Jordan is the one who's not HIV positive."

Some TV stations, perhaps because of Naomi's sexy dance, refused to air the video. But despite their lack of cooperation, and despite Michael's frigidity, "In the Closet" emerged as the third consecutive number one hit from the Dangerous album.

Back at Neverland the staff was being supervised by Bill Bray, Michael's grizzled chief of security. Michael once referred to him as, "The father I never had." But Bray needed help, and Michael hired Norma Staikos, a stocky, middle-aged immigrant from Greece. According to a staff member at Neverland, "She wore a frown set in stone."

"Michael had his father in Bray," said a disgruntled staff member. "Now he found another mother in Staikos. She soon became the virtual chatelaine of Neverland." The same staff member claimed that Staikos operated Neverland "like the Gestapo-we were terrified of her. Firings were frequent. You never knew from day to day whether you had a job or not."

After a few weeks, Staikos issued orders that the security guards at the gate were not to record the arrivals of "the little boyfriends," some of whom began appearing at three o'clock in the morning. As increasing numbers of young boys arrived at Neverland, Staikos became vigilant in her efforts to blot out evidence of that, as if sensing some future trouble for her employer.

Hired as an assistant to Staikos was Orietta Murdock of Costa Rica. Apparently, Murdock was hired because Staikos thought she was a Latina. But when Staikos met Murdock's sister, whose skin was much darker, both Staikos and Michael learned that Murdock was black. Michael said, "I prefer to think of her as Latina instead of black."

Herb Ritts

Murdock was assigned to organize letters and photographs from Michael's young fans. "I felt bad seeing Michael separate the photos and reading the letters he saw with children's handwriting," Murdock later said. `Black kids and kids older than thirteen didn't interest him. And when he was reading a letter and realized that it was from a little girl, he threw it in the trash. He kept and took to his room only the photos and letters from white, Latin, and Asian children. As for the rest, he told us it was useless to answer them, so we had to fake his signature. It was a shame that those children didn't fit into his racial tastes."

MJ and Naomi Campbell in "In the Closet"

After Murdock was fired, she filed a complaint on January 29, 1991 with the Equal Employment Department of California. "I was fired and intimidated for being black. Michael doesn't like black people. He would say that he wasn't black, but a chameleon. He used creams and white make-up like they use in the theater since he didn't like to look black. He called his black guards Big Gorillas." In addition to accusing the singer of being racist, Murdock also charged that he was a child molester.

At least one of Michael's "special friends" would disagree with Murdock. He was Brett Barnes, a 23-year-old, out-of-work roulette dealer when he took the witness stand to testify in Michael's behalf during his trial in 2005 on charges of child molestation. Like another one of Michael's special friends, Wade Robson, Brett too was from Down Under.

He claimed that Michael "did not have wandering hands," refuting the testimony of an ex-Neverland maid. "And I can tell you that if he did, I wouldn't be here right now ... I wouldn't stand for it," Brett said. He also expressed his anger that he'd been referenced at the trial as one of Michael's alleged victims. "It's untrue, and they're putting my name through the dirt," he testified.

Marie Lisbeth Barnes, Brett's mother, testified that her son had slept with Michael "just on occasion." Brett's older sister, Karlee Barnes, recalled that her brother and Michael spent about 365 nights alone in his bedroom.

When the police made a search of Neverland in 1993, they discovered Brett living at the ranch. At the time, he was eleven years old. While Michael was on the Dangerous tour in Europe, Brett stayed behind at Neverland with his mother and sister. The police raid reportedly left the boy trembling and insecure.

He was questioned by the police, and vehemently denied that any improper behavior ever took place between the star and himself. He did admit that Michael was affectionate-"more like a big brother. He's a best friend, except he's big." Under more intense questioning, he also admitted that he'd slept in Michael's bedroom at night. "He slept on one side, and I slept on the other," the boy said. He added, "It was a big bed." He later defended Michael on KNBC, a television station based in Los Angeles.

After the raid, Michael called Brett at Neverland to reassure him that "this is all a big mistake-it'll blow over."

A rabid Jackson fan, Brett was actually five years old and in Australia when he first tried to approach Michael, who was on tour there at the time. In the late 80s, Brett, with his older sister, had come to the airport to greet his idol. With him, Brett carried a handwritten letter with his telephone number.

He didn't actually meet Michael that day, but his letter obviously reached the star. In a few days, Michael called Brett. It was the beginning of several long phone dialogues.

In 1991 an invitation arrived with airplane tickets for Brett, his mother, and sister. Off they went to California to visit Michael at Neverland. Many such visits would follow in the future.

In the wake of the raid on Neverland, the press began a search, reporters hoping to find pictures of Michael photographed with young boys. Literally hundreds of such pictures turned up in newspaper and magazine files. After the raid, these pictures took on a more ominous aura.

Photos were found of Michael with a young Australian boy-not Brett Barnes but a child identified as "Brett Jackson." Michael had introduced Brett as "my cousin," erroneously passing him off as one of the Jackson family members.

The most unusual photo depicted Michael taking time out from his Dangerous tour in 1992 to escort two young boys to Euro Disney, south of Paris. In the picture Brett stands between Michael on his right and a mysterious young boy on his left.

The world had never seen such a plastic face on Michael Jackson before, the result of endless surgeries. His nose had shrunk to the size of that of the mysterious nine-year-old in the picture. Michael flashes Chiclet-white teeth and has an unreal aura about him.

Brett's face is partially hidden, because he is sucking his thumb. But, finally, the mystery boy was identified by some eagle-eyed editor. It was the face of the Bavarian prince, Albert von Thurn and Taxis.

Born on June 24, 1983, Prince Albert was the world's youngest billionaire, with an estimated net worth of $2.1 billion, according to the Forbes Rich List. His 30,000 hectares (74,132 acres) of woodland in Germany is one of the largest forestry holdings in Europe. He grew up in one of the family castles, Schloss Emmeram in Regensburg, but also had other residences in Germany and throughout Europe, including Russia. How Michael linked himself with such aristocracy and was allowed to travel with this rich and unusual child is not known.

Michael certainly could not wow Prince Albert with money and toys, as the young Bavarian was obviously very wealthy in his own right.

Brett Barnes

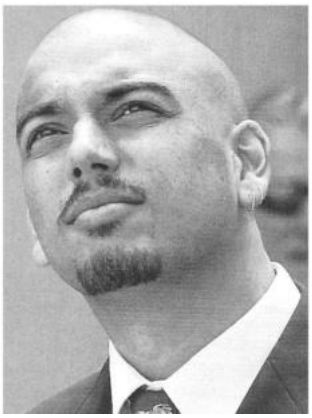
In the wake of the Euro Disney photograph, pictures of Michael and Brett traveling together began popping up in dozens of archives. Wearing a baseball cap and a jacket far too large for him, Brett was photographed arriving in London with Michael in March of 1992.

In London, Michael and Brett paid a call on the dying comic, Benny Hill, who was in a hospital suffering from having had a heart attack. Other than Charlie Chaplin, the English comedian was the artist Michael most admired. Michael loved Hill's cheeky humor, songs, and impressions. As a fan of Benny Hill, Michael was in good company. Greta Garbo and Walter Cronkite were also devoted to Hill's humor. After Hill's death, Michael, through his agents, tried to acquire the artist's memorabilia, hoping to make a shrine to him at Neverland.

It's estimated-there is no way of knowing the exact amount-that Michael spent a quarter of a million dollars entertaining young Brett on their five-day swing through London. They stayed at the swanky Dorchester Hotel where hysterical fans gathered outside to wait for Michael.

Both the man and the boy were housed in the hotel's most luxurious suite on the ninth floor. Michael had arrived in London with two dozen staff members, who occupied the entire eighth floor of the Dorchester. The entourage consisted of, among others, a manicurist and a full-time doctor.

While at the Dorchester, Michael and Brett purchased some $10,000 worth of toys, which they played with at the hotel, abandoning the items when they checked out for a flight aboard the Concorde.



Brett all grown up

Young Brett traveled and slept with Michael during a twelve-day tour that carried them to four continents, including five African nations.

On one lap of the journey through Europe, Michael and Brett reserved the entire Orient Express just for themselves. "Talk about luxury," said one of the staff members aboard the train. "No potentate in history ever traveled in such style."

It was during this tour that Brett came to realize that he was about to be replaced as Michael's special friend. As he and Michael raced through more than a dozen countries, Michael was on the phone at night-sometimes talking for as much as three hours-with a young boy in California called Jordie Chandler.

Albert von Thurn and Taxis

Brett and Michael were next seen in Las Vegas where they were photographed as they viewed the magical act of Michael's friends, Siegfried and Roy. Later Brett shared Michael's suite at the Mirage Hotel & Casino.

Invitations had gone out to Brett and Michael to attend Elizabeth Taylor's much-hyped birthday party, for the celebration of her "Big 6-0." It was staged at, of all places, Anaheim's Disneyland. The star was said to be "bitterly disappointed" when Michael didn't show up.

Publicist Bob Jones believed that the Disneyland bash would be a "sure bet" for Michael to attend. But it was later revealed that Michael and Brett were locked away in the most luxurious suite at the deluxe Helmsley Palace in New York. "The Queen of Mean," Leona Helmsley herself, had personally greeted Michael and Brett, welcoming them to her hotel.

Michael seemingly would do everything for Brett, even calling the manager of the Sportsworld in Paramus, New Jersey. For an undisclosed price, Michael got him to empty the park at 9:30pm, giving patrons their money back so that he and Brett could enjoy Sportsworld and its 175 video games by themselves. The couple stayed until two o'clock in the morning, and Brett later said he had "one of the best times of my life."

In 1993, Jordie Chandler, about to become Brett's replacement, met his rival, Brett. In Los Angeles, Michael had come to pick up Jordie in a limousine. In the back seat, Jordie noted Brett with his big eyes, sitting on Michael's lap. There was a slight resemblance between the two boys. Jordie may have been jealous at the open affection displayed between Brett and Michael. He later told his father that the experience had made him "a bit uncomfortable."

Dr. Richard A. Gardner, the leading authority in California on false claims of child abuse, conducted a series of psychological tests on Jordie on October 6, 1993. In this interrogation, the name of Brett cropped up. Jordie refuted Brett's claim that Michael had never violated him sexually.

According to Jordie, "if he [meaning Michael] wanted me to do something with him, he would say that Brett did that with him, so that I would do it. And, like, if I didn't do it, then I didn't love him as much as Brett did."

That Michael could juggle far more than one "special friend" in his life became evident in testimony provided by El Salvador-born Blanca Francia, who was the star's personal maid from 1986 to 1991. Her testimony became vitally important because she had been granted access to the inner sanctum of Michael's bedroom, where she'd discovered-long before the police-pornographic materials. Blanca had seen the pictures and books first. She later claimed that she'd also seen "inappropriate touching" between Michael and young boys.

Blanca was not adverse to making money off what she'd witnessed. Television's Hard Copy paid her $20,000 for an interview. But she won lotto when Michael paid her $2.4 million when she threatened legal action against him for fondling her handsome young son, Jason Francia.

At Michael's jury trial in 2005, Jason was the only witness who came forward and claimed that Michael had molested him, beginning when he was only seven years old. After five years of therapy, he had become an evangelical Christian, devoting part of his life to working with troubled young people when he wasn't selling auto parts.

Before the world, Jason testified that Michael had taken him twice to his hideout condo. In his testimony, he claimed that Michael and he had played "tickling games" in which the star would move his hands over Jason's genitalia on the outside of his shorts. "Pretty much at every tickle thing there was money," he said. Allegedly, two of these molestations took place at the hideout and the third molestation occurred at Neverland when Jason had turned ten.

This time, according to Jason, Michael's hands went inside his pants. But when tears welled in the boy's eyes, Michael stopped.

During the investigation of Michael in 1993, Jason was questioned by the police in the Jordie Chandler case. At the time, Jason was thirteen. He denied that he'd been molested. Later, however, he changed his testimony and asserted that he had been molested after all.

Lawyers for Michael intensely grilled Jason over why he'd changed his story when first interviewed by police investigators. "In the beginning, I thought I could hold them off and make them go away. I didn't want to tell anybody I had been molested." The implication was that he was ashamed and embarrassed by the incidents.

When defense lawyer Tom Mesereau confronted Jason with his conflicting statements made during a series of interviews with police and prosecutors over the years, Jason uttered a tearful response.

"In the fifth grade, I told my friends I knew Michael Jackson and it was cool. They didn't believe me but it was cool. In junior high, it was no longer cool to know somebody who had issues with kids."

Before the trial, Blanca had given interviews, shedding light on what was going on behind the closed doors of Neverland. One of those interviews was with Diane Dimond, an investigative reporter for TV's Hard Copy. In that ses sion, Blanca made it clear that she had not wanted her son to become another one of Michael's "special friends."

The former maid also made the claim that she once entered a room and caught her son on Michael's lap. She also claimed that she once found her son "so close" to Michael in a sleeping bag at his hideout. Later, when she was taking him home, Jason confessed that Michael had given him three hundred dollars. "Three hundred dollars for a seven-year-old?" Dimond asked in astonishment.

Jason wasn't the only young boy Michael had tempted with money. A maid at Neverland claimed that one twelve-year-old boy risked killing himself when trying to retrieve an Easter egg hidden in a crystal chandelier by jumping off a balustrade. The eggs were filled with one-thousand dollar bills. "Why would you do that?" the maid asked the boy. "I'd do anything for money," he replied.

Blanca claimed that she was not fired, but that she quit her job. "I got tired of what was going on-Michael sleeping with boys and taking showers together. I think I saw too much."

In an interview with reporter Dimond, Blanca claimed that the string of boys who visited Neverland were always prepubescent, ranging in age from seven to twelve years old. Other witnesses' accounts differed with Blanca's testimony, claiming that some of the boys were thirteen or fourteen. No one stepped forward to claim that any boy was six years old or younger.

She also claimed that Michael preferred to pick boys who came from split families . . . "a divorced mother or single mother." Apparently, such parents were easier to manipulate than a mother and a father within a more traditional marriage.

Several witnesses, including Blanca, have suggested that Michael was intrigued by the mouths of young boys, especially the lips of Macaulay Culkin. Blanca once found Polaroid snapshots Michael had taken just of close-ups of the lips of his "special friends."

All the boys were nicknamed "Rubba" by Michael. Rubba may have meant that boys sat on his lap and rubbed up against his privates-hence, the name.

Jason Francia

Blanca said she was never tempted to go to the police, and that she was manipulated by Michael with money and gifts. "I didn't want to lose my job," she said.

Blanca was grilled as to why parentseven those who stayed in Michael's guest house while their sons slept in his bedroom in the main house-allowed such activity. "I think they just looked the other way as long as they were getting money or expensive gifts like jewelry."

A mystery still surrounds Blanca after she gave a sworn deposition in the case of Jordie Chandler. Even though she had enough money to retire after her settlement with Michael, she, for reasons of her own, continued to work at menial jobs. She obtained a job working for a senior citizen.

Still living in Santa Barbara County, she bicycled to work every morning. On the way to work, she was struck by a car. This caused rampant speculation and a flurry of rumors that a hit man had been hired to kill her but had not succeeded. The police investigated but no charges were ever filed.

Throughout all of Michael's involvements with these young boys, and his subsequent legal troubles, Elizabeth Taylor remained a steadfast friend.

Over the years, this friendship has caused much speculation in the press. Elizabeth always had an answer to reporters who questioned her about her involvement with Michael. "We love each other," said Elizabeth. "Michael and I. If nobody understands that-or doesn't dig it-then tough shit!"

Gloria Berlin, the real estate agent who sold Michael Neverland, asked him why he wanted a place so big for just one person. She quoted him as saying, "I plan to adopt twenty-nine children and marry Elizabeth Taylor."

"But she's old enough to be your grandmother," Berlin said.

"But I love her. I just love her. I love her. I love her."

Of course, these remarks reportedly were said before Elizabeth's marriage to Larry Fortensky.

Michael's relationship with Elizabeth was viewed very differently by others, opinions often in total conflict. One of Michael's former publicists at Epic completely dismissed the friendship. "The relationship is this," she said. "He brought her just as much publicity as she brought to him. He also bought her a lot of jewelry in appreciation for her `friendship.' They used each other."

The press often put yet another spin on the relationship. "They're just two former child stars being kids again," wrote Cynthia Lambert. "Food fights. Cotton candy. Taylor's a grandmother but she can still revert to being a kid again."

One of the most far-fetched tabloid rumors was that Elizabeth visited Neverland for "treatments in Michael Jackson's hyperbaric chamber." One headline claimed: TAYLOR PLANS TO STAY FOREVER YOUNG.

It is true that this unlikely pair of Elizabeth and Michael has stood by each other through "Thick and Thin," a song Michael attempted to write about their friendship but which was never finished.

"Elizabeth was always there for Michael and Michael for Elizabeth," Frank DiLeo once said, forgetting that Michael had skipped out on her 60th birthday bash at Disneyland.

It is not known how many presents Michael gave Elizabeth over the years, but it was rumored to have been more than $5 million worth of jewelry alone. Michael generated millions more in publicity for her.

"Let's face it," said publicist Howard Brackett. "Taylor hadn't made a movie since dinosaurs walked the Earth. By hanging onto the arm of Michael, she generated untold press. All that notoriety helps her sell that Goddamn perfume and the jewelry she designs. Anyone would want to be a friend of Michael if he gets all that publicity for her. What I don't understand is this: exactly what does Michael Jackson get in hanging out with Elizabeth Taylor?"

Another publicist, who refused to be named, said "Michael basks in the glow of having a fabulous friend like Elizabeth. I've heard that he even tells tricks, `I'll introduce you to Elizabeth Taylor.' Even that story doesn't make sense to me. Why would a nine-year-old boy want to meet Elizabeth Taylor? Superman, maybe. Even Tom Cruise, though I doubt that. But Elizabeth Taylor, who became a star back in the days of a kid's grandparents?"

To Michael's credit, he did respond to Elizabeth's call for help in the plight of AIDS. He contributed freely of his time and money, as when he showed up for a benefit she wanted him to attend in September of 1985. Elizabeth had called major stars such as her former lover, Frank Sinatra. He told her, "This is just another of your lame duck causes-back away from it! It's going to hurt you."

Fortunately, along with Michael, Elizabeth got Betty Ford and Barry Manilow to show up and lend their names to the cause.

Michael also generated a lot of good publicity for himself, portraying both Elizabeth and himself as two crazy kids who didn't grow up. Reportedly, they engaged in food fights and tried to "tickle each other to death" until one of them cried uncle. At Neverland one staff member reported seeing Elizabeth sneak up on Michael and burst a red water balloon over his unsuspecting head.

Blanca Francia, Michael's maid, painted a different portrait, suggesting that this "odd couple" had more of a business relationship than a friendship. At one point she referred to Elizabeth as "Poor Lady," because Michael neglected her for the most part when she came to visit Neverland.

"Michael was just playing with her," Francia charged. "Everyone knows they're not close." She claimed that during one two-week visit, Michael saw Elizabeth only once for dinner. Reportedly, when Elizabeth went looking for Michael to talk to him, he made himself unavailable, instructing Francia to tell the star that he was sleeping.

"I feel so bad for her," Blanca said. "She goes to Neverland and wants to talk to someone. The staff is not allowed to talk to guests, so she's by herself. Michael just wanted to stay away from her."

Mark Quindoy, the majordomo, more or less agreed with the maid's assessment. "Michael's relationship with Ms. Taylor is pure farce. They just use each other to promote their own images." He too agreed that during a twoweek visit to Neverland, Michael had dinner only once with Elizabeth. "In contrast, he not only had breakfast, lunch, and dinner with Macaulay Culkin, he slept in the same bed with him."

It was February 4, 1992, and Michael had just put down the phone, after receiving a "good luck" call from Elizabeth. Dressed in black leather with a red armband, he went from his dressing room down the Art Deco staircase of Radio City Music Hall in New York to appear at a press conference. In the background, reporters heard the sound of "Black or White."

For some $20 million from Pepsi-maybe a lot more Michael announced a worldwide Dangerous tour. It was to be publicized as "The Greatest Show on Earth." He claimed that with the success of the tour, he might raise as much as $100 million for children's charities. Since he didn't need the money, Michael-falsely or otherwise-said that his aim was to "spread global love" among the children of the world.

He had formed The Heal the World Foundation in 1992, hoping to bring aid to underprivileged children. Even though he was doing it for charity, his critics were unrelenting. On the Dangerous album, Michael had inserted his version of the foundation's theme song. One music critic called it "a Hallmark card knockoff of `We Are the World.'"

With interruptions, cancellations, and much dreaded headlines, the Dangerous world music tour would be launched by Michael on June 27, 1992, grinding to a crashing end on November 11, 1993. Some 3.5 million fans would hear him in 69 different concerts, the biggest tour any performer had ever done until Michael broke his own record with his HIStory follow-up in the years ahead.

Germany, Britain, France, even Romania, lay before him. However, because of medical problems with his vocal cords, he had to cut short the tour, resuming it in December of 1992 in Japan.

In another record-breaking deal, Michael sold the film rights to his Dangerous tour for $21 million, the highest deal ever scored for a live concert. The footage was shot in Bucharest. When HBO aired the film in October of 1992, it played to fans in 61 countries, receiving the highest TV ratings in history.

Some of the countries Michael-accompanied by Brett Barnes visited were on the continent of Africa, which he hadn't seen in nearly two decades. Wherever his plane touched down, he drew bigger crowds than either Nelson Mandela or the Pope.

Before arriving in Africa, Michael made certain that his own frozen blood was flown in. Associates reported that he was terrified of contracting AIDS. He feared that if he became ill during the tour and needed blood transfusions, he might be injected with tainted blood. "The only blood I trust is my own," he told his aides. "See that it's shipped wherever I go."

Like his role model, billionaire Howard Hughes, Michael was almost paranoicly germ-conscious, once suggesting that he wanted a Plexiglas shield erected between him and his fans. But he was warned that there would be an outcry against this. Bob Jones himself felt that such a move would be a public relations disaster. Nonetheless, word of the Plexiglas shield made it into the press. Eventually Michael abandoned the plan.

Even before his plane touched down in the Republic of Gabon, the local press was raising provocative questions. One headline read: IS MICHAEL JACKSON REALLY BLACK? Articles about his changing skin color were appearing not only in Africa, but in newspapers around the world. Prior to the example set by Michael, most of the world didn't believe that it was possible for a black man to change his skin color to white.

Doctors, presumably experts, were interviewed on the subject. From Europe, Dr. Hans Geiler (country of origin unknown) issued a statement that a black skin could be turned much lighter by the use of "certain bleaching agents." A group of compounds known as "Hydroquinones," or so it was claimed, could make dark skin much lighter-"but not quite white."

Obviously bleaching agents worked better on a light-skinned black or a mulatto than on persons whose skin was extremely dark or "blue black," claimed one doctor, a plastic surgeon, who didn't want to give his name, fearing a "backlash from people of color." As if the world didn't already know this, the doctor warned, "Race is a delicate issue to discuss."

Thousands of people use Porcelana's Skin Lightening Serum with Hydroquinone, the only FDA-approved ingredient to effectively lighten skin discolorations.

Michael was said to travel with tubes of Hydroquinone. In the past it had been noted that he used Porcelana, a bleaching cream. La Toya was also rumored to have used Porcelana on her beautiful face.

It was alleged that Michael had studied the makeup techniques of George Masters, which he perfected with Marilyn Monroe in years immediately prior to her death. It was called the "white-on-white look." Makeup expert Mitchell Geller claimed that Masters "transformed Marilyn from Technicolor to 'frosted' way before that became the fashion."

As his skin grew whiter and whiter, Michael developed an aversion to the sun. The hot sun of Africa held a particular terror for him. "The direct sun must never touch my face," he warned aides. One way to conceal his face was to wear large hats. In time, he began to travel with an aide who held a large umbrella, most often black, over his whitening head.

MJ crowned King of Sani

It was believed that much of Michael's look came from heavy applications of pancake makeup. He really coated it on. When any aide delicately suggested that he might be using too much, Michael quoted a statement by Masters, who was acclaimed as the leading makeup artist of Hollywood. Masters once claimed that upon Elvis Presley's return from a tour of duty with the Army in Germany, "he was wearing more pancake makeup and more mascara than Marlene Dietrich and Joan Crawford would ever dare."

Attracting thousands of hysterical fans, many of whom were later injured, Michael touched down in Libreville, the capital of Gabon, a port on the Gabon River near the Gulf of Guinea. He was there as the guest of Omar Bongo, the country's president. Although advertised as a good will tour, Michael's trip was financed by the government ministry, it was later revealed.

Omar Bongo was one of the most controversial of all African leaders, having assumed the presidency of Gabon in 1967 at the age of 32, the world's youngest president at the time. At the time of his death in 2009, he'd served as the world's seventh longest serving ruler. If he picked up the tab for Michael, he could well afford it, as Bongo was one of the globe's wealthiest heads of state, an empire attributed mainly to oil revenue and alleged corruption.

Bongo emerged in headlines again in 2005, when a Senate investigation revealed that lobbyist Jack Abramoff had offered Bongo a chance to meet with President George W. Bush in exchange for $9 million. Ten months later, on May 26, 2004, Bongo was photographed talking head to head with Bush himself.

In Gabon, grade school children turned out to greet Michael, carrying a banner that proclaimed: WELCOME HOME MICHAEL. The sounds of drums filled the air. One nine-year-old boy cried out, "Michael is love, love, love! I want to be like him."

A British journalist, Peter Hodges, was at the Gabon airport to witness the arrival of Michael and his entourage. He later wrote provocative copy. "Michael Jackson often flaunts his arrival at airports with handsome young boys. Not so in Africa. The word was out that he wanted his companion, Brett Barnes, to be kept away from the lens of carnivorous paparazzi. Even so, I got to see the kid get off the plane after the paparazzi went chasing after Michael. In London, Jackson had passed the boy off as 'Brett Jackson,' his cousin. I later learned that Brett hails from Sydney, Australia. He was one charismatic and gorgeous boy, fit competition for Tadzio." The journalist was referring, of course, to the young boy beauty in the Thomas Mann novel, Death in Venice.

In Gabon, President Bongo presented Michael with the Medal of Honor, an award often reserved for visiting Heads of State such as Nelson Mandela.

Before the good will tour of Africa was over, Michael would visit not only Gabon, but the Ivory Coast, Tanzania, and Egypt, discovering "Michaelmania" wherever he landed. He logged 30,000 miles in 11 days. His 26-person entourage was flown on a Boeing 707 executive plane. It came complete with a stateroom, a private bathroom, an open bar, lounges and dining areas, and lots and lots of video and audio equipment.

One picture of Michael, with his arms outstretched, his hat removed, was published around the world. Said to be "deeply moved," he was photographed in front of the world's largest church, the Basilica of Our Lady of Peace, in Yamoussoakra, capital of the Ivory Coast.

The highlight of the African safari for Michael came in the Cote d'Ivoire, a little country that had declared itself independent of French colonial rule back in 1960. Even so, by as late as 1969, the Sanwis of Krinjabo wanted to break away and form an independent kingdom. Michael was taken to the Ivory Coast village of Krinj abo, not far from the border with Ghana. The Sanwis had invited Michael for a coronation ceremony to crown him King.

A little boy born into near poverty in Indiana was welcomed to Africa like a ruling dignitary and long-lost son. But it wasn't long before sentiment began to shift against him.

Attired in black trousers and a "flaming" orange shirt, Michael was fanned by four teenage, bare-breasted girls during his coronation. "Kings" and chiefs from nearby villages came to town to watch Michael's crowning. Medicine men chanted incantations as they poured precious gin on the dry parched earth in honor of the memory of their Krinjabo ancestors.

The traditional tribal chief of Krinjabo, Amon N'Djafolk, placed a crown of gold on Michael's head and pronounced him "King of Sani." In a whispery voice, Michael said, "Merci beaucoup. Thank you very much."

He was draped in a traditional gold and orange robe. When he was crowned, he accepted a long golden chain, a symbol of authority. Placed on a golden throne and decked out in tribal drag, Michael, in the words of one reporter, "looked more like a Queen than a King."

Regrettably, Michael insulted the villagers by removing his royal robe immediately after the ceremony. In the local newspaper, a reporter wrote that "Michael Jackson's communication talents are lacking." It was later noted that this was "only one of a series of gaffes and other troubles that caused Michael to abandon his African trip after a week. Originally he had wanted to visit the continent to film scenes for a "Return to Africa" video.

Not all was a disaster. During his visit, Michael went to schools, churches, and institutions for mentally retarded children. In his childlike way he bonded successfully with these children born into a world that was radically different from the glitzy life that Michael knew in America.

Omar Bongo

Without his surgical mask, he hugged and kissed children, some of whom had AIDS. The tour organizer, Charles Bobbit, said, "I was impressed with the interaction between Michael and the children. He sat on the bed with children who were deformed and children who were ill. He sat there and talked to them, hugged them, cuddled them."

His feelings were expressed in the song, "Why You Wanna Trip on Me," part of the Dangerous album.

They say I'm different
They don't understand
But there's a bigger problem
That's much more in demand
You got world hunger
Not enough to eat
So there's really no time
To be trippin' on me . . .

Throughout the tour, Michael kept touching his nose. Noting this, Africans were offended. It appeared that Michael was holding his nose to avoid the raw smells of Africa. He was said to object in particular to hunks of meat rotting in the sun and attracting flies.

The editor of Gabon's leading newspaper was direct in his attack. He called Michael "the sacred beast of America. Holding his nose, he reminds us that we are undeveloped and that our sewer system doesn't equal that of California. When he comes into contact with us, he reminds us that we don't have the luxurious marble bathrooms of rich movie stars in Hollywood. As he passes our markets, he seems horrified at our rotting foodstuff, noting that we lack refrigeration. What are we to make of this strange creature among us? He's not a black man. But not quite white either. He's neither man nor woman but some androgynous thing caught between the sexes. That might be all right in a frail little boy. In a grown man, such an effeminate character, who speaks with the voice of a little girl, is frightening. Maybe it is up to the people of Gabon to turn up their noses at Michael Jackson-not the other way around!" The scalding editorial didn't diminish the crowds who turned out not to greet Michael, but to worship him.

The ever-sharp publicist, Bob Jones, rushed to Michael's defense. "We would not be here if we thought your country smelled," Jones announced in Gabon. "You are our roots. The air here is fresher than anywhere else." The publicist dismissed the nose touching as "just a nervous tick Michael has." But there may have been more to the nose touching than Jones had suggested.

Reports began appearing in America and London that Michael's nose was in danger of collapsing. Before the debut of his Africa tour, he may have endured a total of six rhinoplasties. The suggestion was that during his sixth operation, a hole had appeared in his right nostril that had to be "packed" and stitched. These stitches may have caused the itching and nose scratching he experienced in Africa. In London a plastic surgeon speculated that Michael might one day have to wear a plastic nose.

Back in Africa, Michael told Bob Jones that the African tour was evolving into a disaster. He cancelled a safari-"I wanted to see the wild ani- mals"-and also sent his regrets to Kenya. Instead, he and Brett flew back to London.

Even though Michael fled Africa, Amon N'Djafolk, who'd crowned him King of the Sanwis, paid a surprise visit to Michael to Los Angeles three years later at the time of his marriage to Lisa Marie Presley. The exalted ruler had called Michael the "prodigal child of the Bible" before placing a crown of gold upon his head.

"King N'Djafolk is more than a symbol," Michael said in Los Angeles. "He is the spirit of his people and the father of his subjects. His person is sacred and inviolate."

For some reason, Michael arranged a meeting between the King and attorney Johnnie Cochran, who had not only represented Michael during charges of child molestation, but achieved world fame as the chief defense attorney for O.J. Simpson. The purpose of the Cochran/N'Djafolk meeting was never revealed, but it may have been an attempt to get the attorney to convince Michael to invest his millions into the economy of the emerging nation.

En route to London after the 1992 African trip, Michael received a disturbing report. For every legitimate sale-say, 30,000 copies-of his album Dangerous, piracy sales amounted to 800,000 copies. In Thailand alone, piracy sales comprised 98 percent of his record market.

Once in London, speculation about Michael's nose reached a crescendo. In addition to those six rhinoplasties, plus the chin cleft, a virtual laundry list of Michael's other surgeries was being published in the press. He was rumored to have had his upper lip "thinned." Before-and-after pictures of Michael were run, more or less confirming that this was true.

He also was said to have had several face-lifts, although "God only knows why" Joan Rivers said on TV. "It's yours truly who needed the massive facelift-not Michael Jackson."

He was thought to be trying to replicate the image of Marlene Dietrich in the reconstruction of the contours of his face, which included everything from a "lifting" of the skin covering his forehead to bone grafts on his cheeks and jaw.

He was even rumored to have had several surgeries to remove crow's feet and bags from around his eyes. Why at this relatively young age he needed such massive surgery-more suited to a seventy-year-old-was not reported.

Even though it was believed that he'd gone under the knife any number of times, the press might have grossly exaggerated the extent of the work done on his face.

Michael became particularly outraged when he played to nearly 375,000 fans at London's Wembley Stadium. The Daily Mirror was delivered to him at his suite at the Dorchester. The more he read about himself, the more enraged he became. In an article by Rich Syke, Michael was called "Scarface" and a "cruelly disfigured phantom." The article also made the claim of a hole in Michael's nose-"like an extra nostril"-and asserted that one of Michael's cheeks was higher than the other. "Michael now looks like a grotesque burn victim," the article said. "His nose is so deformed it looks like misshapen plastic." Michael ordered his new attorney, the hotshot legal ace Bert Fields, to sue for libel.

In addition to the conventional press, several highly visible websites distributed trenchant comments about the rapidly evolving saga of Michael's fast-changing face. Anomalies-unlimited.com posted the most authentic history of Michael's face. Their "blithering, yet witty commentary" (their description) suggested that in 1987 Michael's face had "gone from a beautiful cocoa bronze to fish belly white-on his nose he now sports little teeny triangles for nostrils and a sharp razor ridge you could grate cheese on." The website suggested that by 1993 Michael's current color-subject to change, of coursewas "toilet paper pink" and that his massive plastic surgery could be interpreted as "self-mutilation."

Fans took notice that by 1997 Michael's Kirk Douglas cleft chin had disappeared to be replaced with a fake chin implant. "The sides of his face are stretched taut, his nose isn't pointing north any more, and it's anyone's guess what the hell he did to his skin this time. He's getting his face done at the local morgue. He's a ghoul and seems to be a sick puppy with all this stuff he's done to himself."

By 1999, as Michael turned 41, his fans once again noted a dramatic change in his appearance. Anomalites-unlimited.com now compared Michael to "The Joker," Batman's arch-enemy. "New chin again. Nose again. New cheeks. Smaller jaw. The gaunt look is replaced by rounder fluff. Rumor has it he transplanted some pubic hair to make a goatee in an attempt to butch up, but the thought is too repulsive to dwell on."

Sporting the Kirk Douglas cleft

At the turn of the millennium, Michael had yet another face, again duly noted on the web. "Oh, this isn't looking good . . . a goatee! Ack! Is that pubic hair? Suddenly, his jaw is an inch longer. He got his eyes pulled so tight he looks Oriental, and they've ceased to line up properly. His lips have a hint of that lizard-lock smile you see on people who have overdone the facelifts. Good thing Japanese Anime cartoons are taking America by storm, so this is kind of fashionable."

By the time Michael turned 42, former admirers were posting on the web news of his "wrecked face." Anomalies-unlimited.com described a "fakenose-tip prosthesis hanging off as well as scars. The pink little beak nose of 1997 seems to have expanded once again."

The shocking photographs the world saw of Michael, appearing without makeup (could that have been true?) gave him eyes as wide as Joan Crawford. But it wasn't Crawford that Michael was compared to, but her nemesis, Bette Davis, as she looked in Whatever Happened to Baby Jane?

Finally, in 2004, a year before his trial on a charge of child molestation, Anomalies-unlimited.com concluded that Michael had gotten a new nose, thanks to the brilliant carving technique of a German plastic surgeon, Dr. Werner Mang. Michael was alleged to have gotten a new nose constructed from cartilage from his ear.

A former publicist, refusing to be named, said, "For a while, Michael didn't really have a nose. It was in 1999 that Dr. Steve Hoefflin, who had done Michael's earlier plastic surgeries, refused to touch up his nose again. In true Jackson style, Michael refused to take no for an answer and went to Europe to get his nose jobs there. Eventually with all of the cauterizing of the blood vessels, there was no circulation to the tip. The tip of the nose eventually turned sort of a black color and began to fall off. He later had a waxy kind of prosthesis made that attached on the end. However, he eventually found a doctor who was able to take some cartilage from his ear and re-sculpt his nose. Some people still believe he has a prosthetic tip, but it's all sculpted now."

As late as Michael's trial in 2005, plastic surgeons around the world were still giving their opinions to the press about the ethics of too much plastic surgery.

While testifying in his defense during a court trial in Santa Monica, Michael removed the surgical mask he routinely wore. He revealed that the tip of nose was scarred and discolored, the skin tissue dangling from it.

"It appears to me that he's had numerous surgeries on his nose, and it appears he's had something to widen his chin, perhaps a chin implant," a leading New York plastic surgeon, Thomas Loeb, told UPI. Dr. Loeb had performed reconstructive surgery on many celebrities, even notorious ones, such as Paula Jones.

On the question of "When is there too much plastic surgery?" both the American Society of Plastic Surgeons and the American Society of Aesthetic Plastic Surgery have refused to discuss the ethics of cosmetic procedures. "The position of the medical profession has been that everything the customer agrees to is fair game so long as the risks are fairly presented," said Steve Miles, a professor of medicine at the University of Minnesota's Center for Bioethics.

Dr. Robert Kotler, who at 61 had performed more than 5,000 procedures during 27 years of practice, wrote a book called "Secrets of a Beverly Hills Cosmetic Surgeon." He was the most outspoken critic of Michael's nasal cosmetic surgery. He boldly stated that, "You can't take a black person and make him white." He went on, "there was a point with Michael where the work looked great. After the second operation it looked good, a marvelous result. If he, in his mind, was unhappy and wanted to continue, no doctor had to go along with a misguided adventure. Jackson was in the wrong in wanting to go beyond what was reasonable, and the doctors who went along with his request, I think didn't exercise their best judgment."

The original Kirk Douglas cleft

Dr. Kotler not only claimed that Michael Jackson "has gone way too far, but Marie Osmond looks perpetually surprised, her eyebrows are a bit high. I think Joan Rivers has reached the limit as to what is reasonable or has gone just a step beyond."

In spite of overwhelming evidence to the contrary and the posting of pictures of Michael's changing face over the years, he was still maintaining, post-millennium, that "I've had two procedures done on my nose-nothing more, noth ing less."

Joan Crawford and Bette Davis in Whatever Happened to Baby Jane?

Many members of the press were calling Michael's new appearance the "wet shaggy dog look." Strings of wet-looking black hair hung down over his eyes. "In those WWII movies, Veronica Lake adopted the peek-a-boo look with a bang covering her eyes," wrote Betty Fielding. "Michael wouldn't settle for that. He must spend an hour before the mirror each morning getting all that gel just right to make those strings of hair hang just so. His new hair design must have been the creation in Los Angeles of the Queen of All Hairdressers. Or could the stylist have been Michael himself? Bizarre. What's next for Michael? He bleaches his face. Why not go all the way and bleach his hair as well?"

His new look was the most obvious when he showed up at the 1993 Soul Train Awards in Los Angeles to accept three awards. Eddie Murphy greeted him backstage and was astonished to see him in a wheelchair. He told Murphy that he had sprained his ankle while dancing but was going on anyway. On stage he performed his "Remember the Time" song as dancers pranced around him.

Michael walked away with three awards, which he accepted to thunderous applause. "At least he didn't show up in a surgical mask," Murphy told reporters backstage. One journalist claimed that after the ceremony he saw Michael, in the back of the theater, get up out of his wheelchair and walk without a limp to a waiting limousine. That sighting could not be confirmed by other reporters.

Since his face wasn't being worked over and in the process of healing, Michael began to make more appearances, showing up at the Grammy Awards in 1993 to accept a Lifetime Achievement Award. The honor was presented to him by Janet Jackson. Plastic surgery had made her look more and more like her brother. Aware of this, Michael moved in close to her and announced to the audience, "See, me and Janet are really two different people."

The statement was confusing to those who hadn't read the press speculation that Michael had two identities-one when he appeared as a Jackson sis ter and the other as himself. But it wasn't Janet the speculation whirled around but La Toya. One reporter provocatively asked, "Have you ever seen a picture of Michael and La Toya together?"

Of course, they were two different people, but it was alleged that La Toya had had plastic surgery done to make herself look more like her brother. The resemblance between Michael and La Toya was even greater than the lookalike appearances of Janet and Michael.

Fans were wondering why Michael was popping up everywhere after leading a life as a recluse when not performing. Inquiring minds wanted to know, and an answer emerged.

In the decade since the release of Thriller, his popularity had slumped. In a California-based survey of music industry honchos, Michael was placed #14 on a list of stars, far behind such rivals as Madonna or even Janet Jackson herself.

"Michael, by his own hand, had transformed himself into a freak," said one music executive who refused to be named. "Skin bleaching, hyperbaric chambers, the Elephant Man, the fantasy world of Neverland, and the persistent gay issue that was about to explode in his face-it had all become too much. And, to make matters worse, it wasn't just the gay thing. Parts of the world have grown more accepting of gays, and certainly all media attracts thousands of gays. But there were rumors of child molestation that were making the rounds even before the Jordie Chandler press explosion. That was too much. Some of the world-not all-might forgive gay. On the other hand, the suggestion that an artist is a pedophile will make some people go ballistic. But Michael had become such a famous artist, with so many fans around the world, that he'd retain a certain fan base through it all."

Michael also popped up at the NAACP Image Awards. Reporters from black newspapers cornered him, asking him if he had tried to cast a white boy to play himself as a young child in a Pepsi commercial. He'd denied this persistent rumor before, and he would deny it again on that night of the NAACP ceremony. "I'm a black American, and I'm proud of my race. I'm proud of who I am." He would more or less repeat this same statement when cornered by Oprah Winfrey on television.

He also accepted an invitation from the Clintons to attend one of their inaugural balls on January 19, 1993 in Washington. The first daughter, Chelsea, or so it was said, was "ecstatic" upon meeting the King of Pop. Pictures taken of the two of them together have her looking on adoringly.

As part of the event, Michael led an all-star chorus of "We Are the World." Later, he shook hands with the new president, Bill Clinton. Unknown to each of them, both Michael and Clinton would face charges of sexual harassment before the 90s came to an end.

In Washington, Michael checked into the Madison Hotel. Along with him was a young boy (unidentified), one of his "special friends." All that the staff remembered about the visit were requests for the pressing of military costumes and several orders for strawberry ice cream to be delivered to Michael's darkened suite.

The press reported that prior to the inaugural festivities, Michael had agreed to perform before the newly elected President, but had demanded that the other dozen scheduled balls be cancelled so that "I can be the sole performer." This rumor gained such vogue that Bert Fields, Michael's attorney, had to hold a press conference to deny them. Even so, rumors didn't go away. Oprah Winfrey pointedly asked Michael on TV: "Did you tell President Clinton that you had to be the only person there singing?"

"That's the stupidest, craziest story that I have ever heard," Michael said, barely concealing his anger. "That's not even in my heart. I would never say anything like that."

In spite of all these denials, aides to President Clinton, speaking off the record, said that such a request did arrive "from Michael's people." At this point, the truth can't be confirmed.

Michael's appearances at The Soul Train and Grammy Awards were dwarfed by the audiences who tuned in to watch a televised appearance, at Neverland, with Oprah Winfrey on February 10, 1993. His appearance on this show has become legendary. But in reviewing a transcript years later, it is much tamer than the reports written about it at the time.

Oprah did move in on some delicate topics, but surely this skilled interviewer didn't expect Michael to answer any of her questions truthfully. Among other untruths, he made up love affairs with women, including Brooke Shields, which did not exist, and denied bleaching his skin.

President Bill Clinton and MJ

As the world tuned in, Oprah was allowed to ask Michael whatever questions she chose, although she showed remarkable restraint.

Before air time, Oprah was introduced to Jordie Chandler, Michael's new "special friend" who would soon file charges of sexual molestation against the King of Pop.

It was estimated that 90 million people around the world watched Oprah fire questions at Michael, making it the fourth most watched show in television history, top place going to the final episode of M*A*S*H.

On her show, Michael blamed the press for the stories about the hyperbaric chamber ("it is a lie") and of his attempt to buy the bones of the Elephant Man ("and why would I want some bones?). What he didn't tell was that he was behind the planting of those stories.

Michael had only good things to say about his family, with one exception. Papa Joe was singled out for condemnation.

"I love my father," he said. "but I don't know him. To me, my mother's just wonderful. She's perfection. I just wish I could understand my father. There were times when he would come to see me and I would get sick both as a child and as an adult."

In a blatant attempt to deceive the public, Michael claimed that his use of plastic surgery "was only two things," admitting to a nose job. He later said, "I've never had my cheekbones done, never had my eyes done, never had my lips done and all this stuff."

When asked if he bleached his skin, Michael pretended that "as far as I know of there is no such thing as skin bleaching. I have never seen it. I don't know what it is. I have a skin disorder that destroys the pigmentation of my skin; it's something that I cannot help. It's in my family. My father said it's on his side."

He may have been suggesting that he had vitiligo, a genetic skin disease. The disease is closely related to albinism. Those who have vitiligo experience the loss of pigmentation in small oval-shaped patches of their skin. That is because skin cells, known as melanocytes, fail to produce and store melanin, which is largely responsible for the uniform pigmentation of the skin.

In the aftermath of the Oprah broadcast, La Toya among others, asserted that Michael had been using bleaching creams for years. Michael's claim that vitiligo runs in his family has never been confirmed.

Oprah even asked him why he grabbed his crotch while performing.

In his reply, Michael wandered. "I think it happens subliminally. If I'm doing a movement and I go `bam,' and I grab myself ... it's the music that compels me to do it. You don't think about it ... it just happens. Sometimes I'll look back at the footage and I go, `Did I do that?', so I'm a slave to the rhythm."

When asked if he dated, Michael introduced the name of Brooke Shields. He even claimed, as he had before, that he was in love with her. Watching TV with her mother, Brooke reportedly burst into laughter at this revelation. Michael also admitted that he'd been in love with "another girl," but refused to name her.

MJ on The Oprah Winfrey Show

Oprah even asked him, "Are you a virgin?" Michael answered, "I'm a gentleman," and therefore was not willing to discuss "something that is private." When pressed for more details, Michael admitted that he was too "embarrassed" to answer the question.

At one point Elizabeth Taylor appeared from out of the wings, making a surprise visit to the set. In front of the camera, she denied that Michael ever proposed to her. "And I never proposed to him." It was in front of Oprah that Elizabeth delivered her famous and often repeated line: "He is the least weird man I have ever known." She had such bubbling praise about Michael that after the telecast, rumors circulated that she had been paid two million dollars by MJJ Productions for her worldwide endorsement. Again, like so many aspects in the life of Michael Jackson, this rumor cannot be confirmed.

The broadcast ended with Michael taking Oprah on a royal tour of his own Magic Kingdom.

His appearance did not exactly convince the world he was not weird in spite of Elizabeth's glowing enthusiasm. On late-night TV, Jay Leno quipped that "the Elephant Man called and wanted to buy Michael's bones." In a cover story, Entertainment Weekly asked a provocative question: CAN YOU BELIEVE THIS GUY?

One scalding critic, on reviewing Michael's performance with Oprah, wrote: "He was obviously lying on camera, but the evidence was right before millions of viewers. No longer a so-called `Negro,' he was all aglow in an albino whiteness, the ghost-like effect only heightened by the unfortunate choice of a coral-colored lipstick best reserved for an aging Joan Crawford in Technicolor as when she appeared in Torch Song."

Special friends such as Jordie Chandler, who had watched Michael's interview with Oprah Winfrey, had to go to school during the day. That often left Michael alone. Sometimes he was photographed with adults, especially his friend of many years, Michael Milken, the notorious "junk bond king" of the 1980s. Milken was another "odd couple" relationship for Michael.

At the peak of his career, Milken earned between $200 and $550 million annually. A United States attorney aspiring to higher office, Rudy Giuliani, went after Milken, charging him with 98 counts of racketeering and fraud. Milken was indicted by a federal grand jury. Entering into a plea bargain, Milken pled guilty to six lesser securities and reporting violations. He was forced to pay $900 million in fines and served only 22 months in prison between 1991 and 1993. Even after his release, he still had one billion dollars of his personal fortune intact.

This impressed Michael. The two men began to hang out together, ostensibly talking about launching an entertainment cable TV network aimed at children.

When criticized for hanging out with Milken, Michael defended him. "Michael Milken is my friend because he has been through the fire, as I have, and emerged better for the process. He has been misunderstood, as I have been, and harshly judged by those who had no right to assume they knew this man without ever spending an hour in his company."

Michael often flew with one of his special friends to Las Vegas where he was seen with not only Milken but with Steve Wynn, the Mirage Casino owner. Michael later said that he liked Las Vegas because "people here don't judge you as they do elsewhere." He could also spend hours at a time playing video games with young boys he flew in, later retreating with these special friends to the privacy of a hotel suite where, in Michael's words, "you can order anything you want, even a pink elephant delivered to the parking lot if that is your desire."

Michael was photographed with Milken and Wynn on a pirate ship during the grand opening of the Treasure Island Hotel. Steve Miller, a former Las Vegas City Councilman, once wrote that his hometown was a perfect place for both Milken and Michael Jackson to use as a haven from the world.

Winfrey "embarrassing" MJ

Even after Michael's trial on a charge of child molestation in 2005, Miller said, "I realize Jackson was found not guilty, but I still like to use the Milken example to show the forgiveness of Nevadans when it comes to prominent people who have had run-ins with the law. After the six-week trial revealed so much about his personal life, it's no doubt Jackson will need a lot of forgiving if he wants to continue his career. But, if he chooses to seek social acceptance in Sin City, he'll be making the right choice!"

That piece of civic boosterism, however, seemed rather fragile after the first charges of child molestation were aired against Michael by Jordie Chandler. As Michael made his way through the casino of the MGM Grand on New Year's Eve in 1993, a drunken crowd greeted him, many with angry shouts. CHILD MOLESTER! PERVERT! SUCK ON THIS, FAGGOT! Yet earlier in the day, he'd signed autographs for several kids.

In a black chador, looking like a repressed Arab woman, a disguise he'd don in the future, Michael toured the MGM Grand Theme Park with Milken. In the evening he was in his braided Sgt. Pepper drag when he showed up at the MGM Grand again to hear Barbra Streisand in concert. Introduced by the great diva, Michael received a thunderous applause, so maybe Steve Miller was right in his assessment of Vegas as "a second chance town."

Although Michael occasionally toured amusement parks with adults who in the past had included not only Milken but also Jackie Onassis, he much preferred to enjoy these attractions with children, whose ranks now included Frank and Eddie Cascio.

Michael, even back in the 80s, had a sharp eye for beautiful boys. Once, when visiting New York, he was introduced to the concierge of New York's Helmsley Palace Hotel, Dominic Cascio. Cascio greeted Michael warmly. During a discussion of the star's needs at the hotel, Michael spotted a picture of Cascio's two sons, Frank and Eddie. They were just babies at the time, but Michael stayed in touch with Dominic and his interest in the boys continued over the years. A meeting was arranged. Michael sent occasional presents to the boys as they grew older. By the time Eddie turned nine and Frank a robust thirteen, they were entertained at Neverland where, it was reported, "they played day and night."

Michael continued his kindnesses to the Cascio brothers while still entertaining Brett Barnes and his new young friend, Jordie Chandler.

Michael Milken

The year was 1993, the very same year that Michael would take the young Cascio brothers on a world tour-with their parents' permission, of course. This was a blatant act on Michael's part, as charges of child molestation against him were being aired at that time around the world. But instead of at least trying to be discreet, he openly traveled with these two underage boys and allowed himself to be photographed with them, which only caused more speculation about what he was up to.

As headlines about Michael and child molestation blazed, he traveled with the two young boys in August, September, and October of 1993. Diane Dimond, the investigative reporter, stated the obvious. "It seemed odd that a man accused of molesting a prepubescent boy would continue to travel with two of them."

She even traced the parents to their home in Franklin Lakes, New Jersey, where they ran Aldo's Restaurant. Both parents, according to the reporter, asserted that "we trust Michael Jackson with our sons."

Michael's main interest was in Frank Cascio, who would later change his name to Frank Tyson. He slept with Michael in his suite whenever they traveled together. In the words of publicist Bob Jones, Michael "adored the young fellow. Michael even had clothes made for Cascio so that the youngster would look just like him. Michael Jackson would even cancel business meetings if Frank instead wanted to go to Disneyland or just play with water guns or just sleep."

Dominic Cascio and his wife, Connie, often traveled on the road with Michael, serving as "advisors" to him. Once, when Bob Jones confronted Michael about the "impropriety" of having the Cascio brothers in his suite, Michael exploded in anger, sending his publicist back to the States from Romania.

The Cascio brothers were a pleasant diversion for Michael, although a life-long friendship would develop with Frank, who would become Michael's trusted aide. But in 1992 and 1993, the one boy who occupied Michael's thoughts both day and night was Jordie Chandler. How could things have gone so wrong between them?

When they had first come together one bright May day in 1992, Michael's world was so very different. Elvis was no longer "The King" since Michael had replaced him on the throne. He presided over his fans as the king of music and was, indeed, a crowned king of a tribe in West Africa. Those were heady times.

When he first gazed into the beautiful face of Jordie, with his dark skin, beautiful hair, delicate eyes, and fine bone structure, the boy looked so innocent and trusting.

Michael, of course, would have no way of knowing that Jordie would have the power to bring Michael's carefully structured kingdom to an end, a drama that would be played out before the world.

"With Michael you can establish in a few days the kind of good friend relationship it takes years to develop with most people. Or at least that's what you believe. He's the opposite of intimidating. He's accessible and vulnerable. You get the feeling that not only would he never hurt you, but also that he's incapable of hurting you.

It's like finding a bird with a broken wing. In some ways Michael's a little broken. You become protective of him. You want to nurse him back to health. You want to make him happy. But deep down a strange phenomenon is taking place.

In believing that you're safe and in control, you let your guard down and become vulnerable to manipulation without realizing it. His ability to sense who you are and how you can be manipulated is highly refined. By the time you figure out that the helpless sparrow is actually a vulture that can rip the meat off your bones, it's too late.

He goes to great lengths to make you believe he's giving and generous. But he's smart and cunning, like a fox on the hunt. You must remain emotionally remote with Michael to be safe. He means business. He's all business.

Nobody controls Michael Jackson. Nobody! He either controls you by manipulating you emotionally or by paying you obscene amounts of money. Either way, you are going to be controlled. "

--Evan Chandler

"Unfortunately for Michael, when you reach his level of stardom, there is not much you can do...You are up there alone setting a precedent, making history-a living legend. Many people hate to look up and so they must try to bring him down. It's been the same throughout history, from Mozart to Lennon. "

--Adrian Grant from Michael Jackson: Live and Dangerous

"He hums things. He can convey it with his voice like nobody. Not just the lyrics, but he can convey the feeling in a drum part or a synthesizer part. "

--Bill Bottrell, co-producer of Dangerous

Chapter Twelve

Driving incognito down Wilshire Boulevard in Los Angeles, Michael's Rolls-Royce broke down. The nearest auto repair shop and car-rental firm was called Rent-a-Wreck. Its owner, David Schwartz, came to offer assistance and was startled to encounter the pop star. Schwartz picked Michael up in his own van and drove him back to his shop, after calling a tow truck to haul the vehicle in for repairs.

In his office, Schwartz called his wife, June. Within minutes she'd arrived at Rent-a-Wreck with her daughter, Lily, age 5, and her 12-year-old son, Jordie Chandler. The startlingly handsome young boy caught Michael's eye. He was instantly smitten.

It was not the first time the man and boy had made contact with each other. After Michael's hair was set aflame in the Pepsi commercial, Jordie had written him a fan letter and Michael had called, thanking Jordie personally for his concern. Jordie also had a younger half-brother, Nikki, the product of his father's marriage to his new wife, Nathalie Chandler.

For most of his young life, Jordie had worshipped Michael Jackson. The boy knew how to moonwalk to the sound of "The Way You Make Me Feel," and the child's grandmother had even knitted him a sequined glove.

Jordie Chandler

At the shop, Michael presented Jordie with a copy of Dancing the Dream, a coffee table book published by Doubleday under the supervision of Jackie Onassis in 1992. It was a sappy tome for aficionados only. Elizabeth Taylor wrote the purple introduction, claiming that when she heard the name of Michael Jackson, she thought of "brilliance, of dazzling stars, lasers, and deep emotions." The words didn't sound like the gutsy and irreverent broad we all know and love, the woman who on a winter's night in Gstaad would call Peter Lawford a "cocksucker" for bringing Richard Burton back drunk to her chalet.

After giving Michael his telephone number, Jordie took the book home with him that night and read every word, studying the pictures carefully.

Astonishingly, full-page color photographs appeared of Michael as Julius Caesar (Marc Anthony would have laughed); Henry VIII (Charles Laughton would turn over in his grave); Napoleon (Josephine would have said, "Not tonight!"), and as Romeo (without his Juliet).

In this vanity book, Michael revealed to all the world that, in spite of his pretensions, he was not a poet:

Who am I?
Who are you?
Where did we come from?
Where are we going?
What's it all about?
Do you have the answers?

Jordie Chandler (also known as Jordy or Jordan) was born in January of 1980, making him twenty-two years younger than Michael. His father, Evan Chandler, was a Jewish dentist and aspirant screenwriter in Los Angeles, and his mother, June, came from the Caribbean island nation of St. Vincent and the Grenadines, from black and Chinese ancestors. Their multi-racial son had an extraordinary beauty, as has been frequently reported in the press.

The next day Michael telephoned Jordie and "we talked for hours," the boy would later testify. It was the beginning of a phone romance that would last for weeks, preceding Jordie's actual visit to Neverland.

Beginning with Michael appearing at Rent-a-Wreck, he placed daily phone calls, some lasting three hours, to Jordie. As was later revealed in the police investigation of Michael, these calls began in May of 1992 and lasted until February of 1993, the latter marking the end of the first leg of the Dangerous tour.

When not phoning, Michael sent notes: "I have such golden dreams for you. You are my new inspiration."

In late February, Jordie, along with his half sister, Lily, and his mother, June, was invited to Neverland. They would return to Neverland nearly every weekend (Jordie had school during the week). During those early visits, all the Chandlers stayed in the guest house. Invited earlier for a sleepover, and occupying Michael's bedroom in the main house, was Brett Barnes.

Michael began to woo Jordie, Lily, and June with expensive presents. One night at the local branch of Toys "R" Us , which had opened after hours just for them, Michael spent $12,000 on gifts for Jordie and Lily.

During Michael's initial courting of Jordie, it's estimated that he spent $250,000 on gifts for the family, showering June with such elegant presents as $25,000 in jewelry and Jordie with $20,000 worth of computer equipment.

Michael was obviously buying their friendship and, in the case of Jordie, perhaps his love. One night in FAO Schwarz, the famous toy store of New York, Michael spent more than $75,000 on toys for his friend, although earlier, he'd refused to buy a million-dollar solid gold Monopoly set.

In the civil lawsuit Jordie later filed against Michael, he claimed that it was because of these expensive and lavish gifts that the pop star was "able to seduce the plaintiff and thereby defendant Michael Jackson was able to satisfy his lust, passions, and sexual desires."

June's first concern about Michael was raised in February of 1993 when Jordie and she took a two-hour limo drive to Santa Barbara. A young boy sat in the front seat with Michael. June later reported that Michael hugged and caressed the boy, kissing him often on the ear and cheek-soft, lingering kisses.

She reported that this blatant display ensued during the following day on a three-and-a-half hour drive to Disneyland.

On a spectacular outing on April 9, 1993, Michael flew the Chandlers to Las Vegas, checking them into a lavish $3,500-a-night suite at the swanky Mirage Hotel. After Lily and June had retired for the night, Michael invited Jordie to join him in bed to watch The Exorcist. Jordie was horribly frightened by the movie, particularly when the demon-possessed nine-year-old Linda Blair violated herself with a crucifix. Michael cuddled the boy to comfort him and asked him to sleep over with him that night.

Sharing the same three-bedroom suite occupied by Michael and Jordie, June discovered the sleepover arrangement the following morning when she found that Jordie's bed had not been slept in. She went searching and found Michael in red silk pajamas and Jordie in sweatpants sleeping in each other's arms in the pop star's bedroom. Immediately she protested such an arrangement.

Nikki and Jordan Chandler

According to Jordie's testimony, Michael, in tears, seemed shocked and extremely hurt by her suspicions. He claimed, "We are a loving family. There's nothing wrong with my sleeping with Jordie. You should allow it because it's simple and fun-and you shouldn't set up barricades. You don't trust me? Why can't he sleep in my bed? There's nothing wrong. There's nothing going on."

Author Victor Gutierrez

That night June received an $18,000 diamond-and-ruby bracelet personally delivered by a representative of Cartier's.

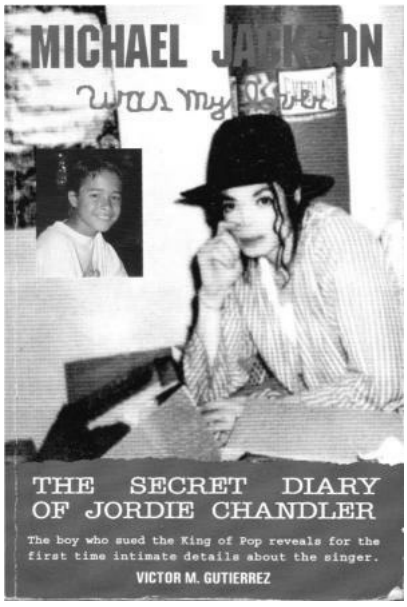
Michael's seduction of Jordie began gradually with slight protests. He didn't want Jordie to close the bathroom door when showering. "It's okay for us to be naked with each other," Michael assured the boy. These maneuvers graduated to hugs and long, lingering kisses on the cheek.

Beginning with the incident that occurred with the screening of The Exorcist, Michael and Jordie would sleep together in beds from Monte Carlo to Orlando until their intimate relationship came crashing down in flames in July of 1993.

Soon, according to testimony later delivered by Jordie, it was mouth-tomouth kissing with tongue insertions. At first Jordie's protests brought tears to Michael. "Just because most people believe something is wrong with it doesn't make it so," Michael told the boy. In the nights to follow, again according to Jordie's testimony, both the man and boy took turns lying on top of each other with erections.

Jordie would later reveal some of Michael's private vocabulary-erection was "lights," cum was "duck butter."

In April of 1993 Michael stayed for one month at June's modest home in Santa Monica, sleeping in a bed with her son. Journalists who got news of Michael's relationships with June and Jordie at first misinterpreted it, speculating that Michael was trying to create a ready-made family by marrying June and adopting Jordie as his son. The National Enquirer even managed to run a picture of Michael with June, Lily, and Jordie under the banner: JACKO'S NEW FAMILY.



The infamous expose

When Evan Chandler dropped by to call on his ex-wife and visit with his son, he was surprised to find Michael in residence. During his visit, Evan snapped a now infamous picture of Michael sitting in Jordie's bedroom. In striped silk pajamas, Michael with stringy black hair is wearing a black hat. He'd coated his lips with a very bright ruby-red lipstick, and is in full pancake makeup with a Band-Aid on his nose. He'd applied a thick black eyeliner. The picture was later used as the cover photo on a notorious book, Michael Jackson Was My Lover: The Secret Diary of Jordie Chandler, written by Victor M. Gutierrez, an investigative journalist. Instead of white socks that day, Michael wore one sunflower yellow, the other as bright as a Christmas orange.

A bright, well-educated, and concerned parent, Evan was initially suspicious of Michael and the obsessive attention he was showing Jordie. In spite of that, Michael overcame Evan's doubts and for a very brief time the two men bonded. But the relationship almost ended before it had begun. The first time Evan was alone with Michael, the dentist bluntly asked the pop star: "Are you fucking my son up the ass?"

Raymond Chandler, Evan's brother, claimed that "Michael giggled like a schoolgirl, but never batted a false eyelash. `I never use that word,' he responded."

Michael bragged to Jordie about all the powerful people he knew and promised to introduce the boy to many of them, including Elizabeth Taylor. When he learned that Ronald Reagan was operating out of an office near his Century City condo, he called Reagan's office and solicited an invitation to come by. Ostensibly Michael wanted to welcome the former president to California and to thank him for the hospitality that Nancy and the President had shown to him during his visit to the White House in the 80s.

Surprisingly, Michael's request for a meeting was granted, although Reagan's aide warned Michael to "make the visit short."

Michael arrived at Reagan's office accompanied by Jordie, who sat close to him in the back of a limousine. After a security search by Reagan's Secret Service staff, Michael and Jordie were ushered into the office of the former leader of the Free World.

Jordie had expected to meet an old man and therefore wasn't surprised by Reagan's appearance. But Michael later claimed that, "I was devastated." This was not the leader of charm and grace that Michael had encountered on the White House lawn. Reagan seemed to have aged twenty years, not ten, and Michael was not at all certain that the former president knew who he was.

President Reagan

Reagan knew enough to realize that Michael was a singer, and he seemed to assume that Jordie was the star's son. "I have a son of my own," he informed Michael as if it was a revelation and not a fact known around the world. "He dances in the ballet, or at least I think he does. Maybe not."

The president spoke nostalgically of how Nancy and he would drive along the California coast listening to Michael's music. He claimed that he particularly liked "Surfin' U.S.A." and "Sweet Little Sixteen." Suddenly, Michael realized that Reagan was not talking about him, but The Beach Boys.

Raymond Chandler

To avoid embarrassment, Michael tried to change the subject. He noted a photograph of the White House placed on a shelf near Reagan. Michael picked it up and began to comment on his visit there, perhaps in the belief that it would refresh the president's memory.

Reagan asked to see the picture, staring at it for a long moment. "This house looks familiar," he said. "But I don't think Nancy and I would like to live there. It's too big, too impersonal."

Reagan's mind seemed to wander. To Michael's utter astonishment, he was left with the impression, as he'd later report to friends, that he felt that Reagan did not recognize the White House or even know that he had for eight years been the President of the United States.

After thanking Reagan, Michael retreated, holding the boy's hand as he made his way out of the building. When Michael later learned that Reagan suffered from Alzheimer's disease, he was not surprised.

The most spectacular trip that Michael ever took with Jordie and June, and one that attracted world attention, occurred in Monaco when Michael accepted an invitation to attend the World Music Awards, where he was to be honored as the "World's Best-selling Record Artist of the Era."

Michael's publicist, Bob Jones, related that on the plane from Los Angeles to Paris, "Michael and the young boy were hugging and very close. They held hands and Michael lovingly gazed into the boy's eyes much like a man would gaze into the eyes of a woman he's in love with. He'd kiss him on the cheek, rub his arms, pet him and inexplicably lick the boy's head."

After the plane landed in Nice, the Jackson party flew by helicopter to Monaco where a stretch limousine took them to their $2,500-a-night suite at the Hotel de Paris. Jordie was installed in Michael's quarters, called the Sir Winston Churchill Suite. The next day Michael took Jordie to meet Prince Albert at the palace, with its memories of Grace Kelly. A French newspaper tabloid, perhaps falsely, speculated that Michael asked to purchase some of the wardrobe left by the prince's mother, the late Grace Kelly who'd died in an auto accident in 1982. His offer was politely refused.

Throughout most of the trip, Michael stayed locked away in his hotel suite with Jordie. The staff at the Hotel de Paris referred to Michael and Jordie as "the honeymoon couple." Michael instructed his aides to take June on as many carte blanche shopping expeditions as she wanted.

The royals of Monaco: Caroline, Albert, and Stephanie

At the actual awards ceremony, Michael was to be seated between Prince Albert and the actress Linda Evans. At the last moment, Michael insisted that Linda be moved and Jordie given her seat. Actually Jordie didn't need a seat, as he spent most of the ceremony sitting on Michael's lap in front of 500 million TV viewers around the world. Michael planted frequent kisses on the boy's head. Bob Jones reported that at the actual awards ceremony he heard guests saying, "Did we miss the wedding?"

Reporters in Monaco claimed that Michael, even though in public view, could hardly keep his hands off young Jordan, even running his right hand up and down the boy's leg. An aide to Prince Albert found the "spectacle disgusting!" But Grace Kelly's son had seen it all and didn't indicate the least surprise, at least not publicly.

Princess Stephanie was overheard saying, "Jackson is out of his mind." As the world looked on, Michael and Jordie giggled; they nuzzled each other's noses, and Michael stroked the boy's hand. At one point Michael's hand moved dangerously close to the boy's crotch.

They were attired in matching outfits, both of them in Johnny Cash black with red armbands like Chinese soldiers. Not only that, but both of them wore mirrored sunglasses.

Jordie was thirteen at the time but looked no more than ten years old. If fans had been aware the boy was actually thirteen, and that he had at least a six-inch penis, Michael's behavior would have been beyond outrageous.

Princess Caroline invited Michael as the guest of honor at a banquet at the palace. Michael did not show up for the dinner, which infuriated her Royal Highness. The daughter of the late Princess Grace was not used to being treated with such lack of respect. At her royal banquet, Caroline vowed that "Michael Jackson is off my guest list forever!" She settled for entertaining Luciano Pavarotti, instead.

While this dinner was taking place, Michael and Jordie remained within their hotel suite. It was later learned that Michael bathed naked with Jordie. This was the first time that either of them had seen the other nude. "Michael Jackson named certain of his young friends who masturbated in front of him," Jordie later testified. "Michael Jackson then masturbated in front of me. He told me that when I was ready, he would do it for me. While we were in bed, Michael Jackson put his hand underneath my underpants. He then masturbated me to climax. After that, Michael Jackson masturbated me many times both with his hand and with his mouth. Michael Jackson told me that I should not tell anyone what had happened. He said this was a secret."

Jordie

According to Jordie's later testimony, Michael would orally copulate the boy. Or, in Jordie's words, "Michael masturbated me with his mouth." He also testified that Michael "ate my semen."

After Monaco, Michael and the Chandlers flew to Paris for a visit to Euro Disney. Not getting enough of Disney in France, they flew to Orlando, visiting The Magic Kingdom. Later Jordie reported that Michael asked him to "suck on one of his nipples and twist the other one while he masturbated."

In his later testimony, Jordie also claimed that Michael tried "to make me hate my mom and dad." Gradually Michael began to say to Jordie, "I love you." He got Jordie to reply, "I love you, too."

He also got the boy to recite vows such as "Live at Neverland with me forever." Another very revelatory "wish" that Michael got Jordie to recite was "never grow up."

Following June's divorce of Evan in 1985, she received custody of Jordie. Both June and Evan later remarried, not successfully. When Evan began hearing reports of Michael befriending his son, he at first was flattered. There were rumors that he "wanted in on the action," meaning he hoped to benefit financially from Jordie's involvement with Michael. Evan also had a secret wish that Michael, with his MJJ Productions, might help him in his fledgling screen career. Instead of extracting teeth, Evan wanted to write screenplays, as did many other people in Hollywood.

He'd already sold one script to Mel Brooks, the comedy director. Jordie had given his father the idea for Robin Hood: Men in Tights, which was filmed as a spoof of Errol Flynn's successful 1938 version of The Adventures of Robin Hood. The film that Evan wrote bombed at the box office, but nonetheless, the dentist still clung to his dream.

As stipulated within his custody arrangement with June, Jordie eventually showed up to spend a week with his father. To Evan's surprise, his son was accompanied by Michael.

Evan was shocked when Michael announced that he was going to share Jordie's bed. Against his better judgment, and although he found it troubling, the father did not object to this. He later said, "What father in his right mind wouldn't suspect something?"

During his visit, Evan quizzed his son when Michael went to take a shower, asking him if there had been any intimate contact between Michael and himself. Jordie denied that his relationship with the star was sexual, but Evan suspected that his son was concealing the truth.

On the morning of the third sleepover, Evan discovered his clothed son sleeping with a pajama-clad Michael whose left hand rested on his son's covered crotch.

That day Jordie and Michael, even in the presence of Evan, showed extreme familiarity with each other. Jordie had never been that affectionate with his own father. But Evan wondered if it were more than affection as he watched the man and boy play together like children. Evan asked himself a painful question: "Is Jordie in love with Michael?"

Even so, Evan did not move to put an end to the relationship, as he allegedly viewed Michael as a "cash cow." He even asked Michael to build an extension onto his home. When the zoning board would not allow that, Evan asked Michael to buy him a larger house. Michael indicated that he might do that.

But in the days and weeks that followed, Michael stopped showing up at Evan's house with Jordie. In fact, an entire month went by that Jordie did not even call his father.

Evan was growing despondent and troubled over Michael's intimate relationship with his son. In his diary he wrote that he felt "alienated, sad and frightened" about his son, especially when he learned that Jordie had made several unsupervised visits to Neverland.

Disturbing news reached Evan that June was going to withdraw Jordie from St. Matthew's School and allow him to accompany Michael on the second lap of the Dangerous tour that autumn. Feeling cut off from Michael, who had ceased to visit and call, as well as from Jordie, Evan decided to battle June for custody rights. Perhaps he hoped that would get Michael to pay him some attention and listen more attentively to his requests, especially about his screenwriting career.

Geraldine Hughes

Evan called a famous attorney in Century City, Los Angeles, Barry Rothman, who did not specialize in custody issues. A well-known entertainment lawyer, Rothman specialized in making deals for rock groups or even rock stars. His legal secretary, Geraldine Hughes, later wrote a pro-Michael Jackson book called Redemption, published in 1997. In her revelations, she was highly critical of her former boss. "Although I have never met a real-life demon straight out of the pits of hell," she wrote, "after encountering Mr. Rothman I knew what it would feel like."

In Redemption, Geraldine claims that Evan "admitted to hiring Mr. Rothman because of his unethical business dealings. He [meaning Dr. Chandler] needed someone that did not mind bending and/or breaking the rules."

Somehow Michael learned that Evan was consulting a lawyer. Michael knew of Rothman's reputation in the music industry, and feared having to deal with him on a confrontational basis.

Michael called his lawyer, Bert Fields, to alert him that there might be trouble ahead and to warn him to stand by "to put out brush fires." To an increasing degree, Michael was relying on this Harvard-educated celebrity attorney who had represented many stars, including The Beatles, Warren Beatty, Dustin Hoffman, John Travolta, and Tom Cruise.

After the warning, Fields did what many a movie star did when he or she gets into trouble. He hired the notorious Anthony Pellicano.

Pellicano had been L.A.'s favorite celebrity detective for years. "When the stars need a wise-guy to leave a dead fish and a rose on somebody's windshield, allegedly, they know who to call," wrote Bob Sheffield in L.A. Confidential. As a Sunset Boulevard gumshoe, no one came near topping the behind-the-scenes chicanery of Pellicano.

Michael viewed him as "just the man" to deal with Evan. Over the years Tom Cruise would call Pellicano for his services, as would Sylvester Stallone, Rosanne Barr, Kevin Costner, and Farrah Fawcett. Other clients would include "bloody glove" cop Mark Fuhrman of the O.J. Simpson murder case and Michael's future mother-in-law, Priscilla Presley.

Pellicano had been involved in everything from the investigation of the JFK assassination to Steven Seagal's alleged mob ties. He made a reputation for himself as one of Richard Nixon's tape experts during the Watergate trials. If someone in Hollywood threatened to sue a star, Pellicano was called in to dig up dirt on the accuser.

Anthony Pellicano

The son of Sicilian immigrants, he grew up in the seedy, criminal-laden Chicago suburb of Cicero in the 1950s.

Elizabeth Taylor had already endorsed Pellicano. In 1977, grave robbers dug up the body of Taylor's third husband, Mike Todd, ostensibly looking for a 10- carat diamond ring that was widely believed to have been buried with him. After a well-publicized search, Pellicano discovered the missing body in the Forest Park cemetery in Illinois, where it lay hidden under a canopy of dead leaves. After that, Elizabeth sang the praises of Pellicano and helped launch his career as a private investigator. In time, Pellicano's clients even included the National Enquirer.

Elizabeth Taylor, Mike Todd

When Michael and Pellicano came together, both were at the peak of their careers.

But in February of 2006, Pellicano would make national headlines when he, along with six others, was indicted on a charge of conspiring to wiretap, blackmail, and intimidate dozens of celebrities, including Sylvester Stallone. The 220-count federal indictment outlined a web of payoffs to police, hightech eavesdropping, and other skullduggery.

Before that, on November 21, 2002, FBI agents in Los Angeles raided Pellicano's offices, finding two practice grenades modified to function as homemade bombs as well as enough military grade C-4 plastic explosives to take down a passenger jet.

After his arrest, Pellicano pleaded guilty to illegal possession of dangerous materials and was sentenced to thirty months in federal prison. Theoretically, his release had been scheduled for February 4, 2006, but on February 3, based on a new indictment of charges of wiretapping and racketeering, he was transferred to the Los Angeles County Jail.

Meanwhile, during ongoing negotiations with Fields, Evan regained custody of his son for one week, beginning on July 12, 1993.

Fields had worked out this agreement, and it was endorsed by Michael. But, unknown to Michael, Evan wanted private time with his son to gather more information about his relationship with the pop star.

During the week Jordie lodged with his father, one of his teeth was extracted on July 16.

A pivotal moment in the drama came when Jordie sat in his dental chair. If later testimony is to be believed, Jordie revealed to Evan that Michael had touched his penis. Later Evan would be accused of "planting" the idea of molestation in Jordie's head while the boy was under anesthesia. Evan consistently denied this accusation.

"I know everything," Evan said, lying to his son. "I know about the kissing, the jerking off-and the blow jobs." He claimed that he'd bugged Jordie's bedroom on those nights he'd spent with Michael in Evan's house. Threatening his son, he warned him, "If you lie to me, I'm going to take Jackson down." Looking frightened, Jordie burst into tears. Between sobs, he admitted to having had sex with Michael.

When the charges against Michael were later made public, Jordie's visit to his dentist father became a media event. Writing in GQ magazine in October of 1995, Mary Fischer claimed, "In the presence of Dr. Chandler and Mark Torbiner, a dental anesthesiologist, the boy was administered the controversial drug, Sodium Amytal. It was after this session that the boy first made his charges against Jackson."

Doctors have claimed that patients are very liable to emotional manipulation after taking Sodium Amytal. Ray

Chandler, Jordie's uncle, would later claim that his nephew was not given Sodium Amytal that day. A search of Dr. Torbiner's records show that Jordie was administered doses of Robinul and Vistaril instead.

Since Jordie had been taken from him, Michael was seen once again with Brett Barnes, shopping the real estate market in Beverly Hills. In addition to Neverland, Michael said he wanted a "real house-not just a condo"-closer to his business interests in Los Angeles.

The real estate agent later reported that she had no idea at the time that Michael was in any kind of legal trouble. "He chased the young boy through the house and at one point they collapsed on each other in a pile on the floor, giggling and tickling each other's ribs. They seemed to be having a romp. But within days I heard of the child molestation charges. I just naturally assumed that the boy house-hunting with Michael was Jordie Chandler, only to learn later it was the Brett Barnes kid."

In spite of Michael's obsession with Jordie, which consumed his nights and most of his waking hours, his career continued. Free Willy was released into movie houses, depicting a boy's effort to free a whale from a theme park. This was the first release for Michael on his new MJJ Records label, featuring "Will You Be There," the film's theme song.

The song rose rapidly on Billboards charts, the film becoming a sleeper hit. Michael showed it to Jordie a dozen times, neither man nor boy tiring of it. Each night before Jordie fell asleep, Michael inserted his tongue into Jordie's ear, then sang the lyrics of the song to him.

In our darkest hour
In my deepest despair
Will you still care?
Will you be there?

Michael had decided to change the name of his record company from Nation Records to MJJ Records. He was furious when his sister released Janet Jackson's Rhythm Nation 1814, feeling Janet had "taken the word nation for herself."

Evan did not return Jordie to the care of his mother at the appointed time, and, through Rothman, demanded that June sign a stipulation which would forbid Jordie from any further communication with Michael. June signed the agreement. Even so, Evan refused to return the boy once he had June's signature on the agreement. Later, June claimed that she was cajoled and manipulated into signing.

Geraldine, Rothman's legal secretary, revealed that since August 16, 1993, Evan had been negotiating with Michael "for money in exchange for not going public with the suspicion of child molestation."

In court, June prevailed, and Evan was ordered to return Jordie to his mother. Increasingly desperate, Evan played a dangerous card, at least from Michael's point of view. Evan took the child not back home to his former wife but to see a psychiatrist, Dr. Mantis Abrams.

For Michael, as events subsequently revealed, this would become a fatal blow to his reputation.

Dr. Abrams became Jordie's psychiatrist. Their first session together on August 17, 1993 lasted for more than three hours. Under intensive questioning, Jordie admitted that Michael, in the words of the psychiatrist, "orally copulated" Jordie but "he did nothing oral to MJ and nothing anal happened."

In Florida, Jordie alleged that he protested sexual contact with Michael, but was threatened that if he ever told anyone "about what we did, you'll be sent to a juvenile hall for punishment." According to the psychiatrist's report, Michael revealed to Jordie the names of "other boys I've done this with."

After hearing Jordie's testimony, Abrams was bound by California law to report the boy's charges to the Los Angeles Department of Children's Services. Jordie was called in for intensive interviewing by staff member Ann T.

Rosato. After grilling him, Rosato was convinced that he was telling the truth, that Michael was committing sex acts with the boy.

The Los Angeles police were also called into the investigation. Officers known only as "E. Cateriano" and "J. Calams" arranged for Jordie to be interviewed by them as well. In their report to their superiors, the two officers concluded, "The boy is telling the truth."

Police and prosecutors in Santa Barbara began an investigation of Michael to determine if he were indeed a pedophile and had engaged in sexual activities with minors. If convicted of such charges, of course, a man could go to jail.

June's husband, David Schwartz, and Evan were on friendly terms, even though both men had married the same woman. Evan learned from Schwartz that his marriage to June was unraveling. "I rarely see her," Schwartz claimed. "She spends all her time with Michael."

Howard Weitzman and Anthony Pellicano

In a conversation taped by Schwartz, Evan is heard telling him, "Jackson is an evil guy. If I go through with this and blow the whole thing wide open, I win big time. I will get everything I want. She [meaning June] is going to lose Jordie, and Michael's career will be over. He has June in his pocket. She likes the glitzy life that he can provide for her too much to give it up. I'm convinced she'll allow Jackson sexual access to our son again. I will be granted custody and June will have no rights whatsoever."

In a further comment, Evan claimed that "Jackson is going to be humiliated beyond belief. He will not believe what will happen to him. It'll be beyond his worst nightmare. He will not sell one more record. The facts are so overwhelming. Everyone will be destroyed in the process."

Fields, Michael's attorney, helped June obtain a court order that demanded the return of her son.

But through his attorney, Evan countered with a court order of his own, forbidding June to allow Jordie to accompany Michael on the Dangerous tour. With Michael hovering in the background, the battle lines over Jordie were forming.

On August 4, 1993, Evan, with Jordie at his side, met Michael and Pellicano in a suite at the deluxe Westwood Marquis Hotel in Los Angeles. Evan later wrote, "Michael looked Jordie straight in the eyes, smiled, and denied charges of sexual molestation. It was a chilling smile-like the smile you see on a convicted serial killer who perpetually declares his innocence despite the mountains of evidence against him. I knew it right then. Michael Jackson had not only molested my son but he was a criminal! It was suddenly all so obvious-June had been fooled, Jordie had been fooled, I had been fooled-the ENTIRE WORLD has been fooled by this fragile, pitiful creature with an absolutely brilliant criminal mind."

For some mysterious reason, Evan's attorney, Rothman, did not attend the meeting, which lasted five minutes. But Evan reported to Rothman later, and, from all reports, the two men agreed to seek $20 million in punitive damages from Michael. Hearing of this offer, Pellicano presented a counter-offer: to purchase three of Evan's screenplays over a three-year period for $350,000 each. Evan rejected the offer as too little. When he delivered additional demands to Pellicano, the detective was astonished-"and I've seen it all."

Evan wanted a trust fund set up for Jordie for $20 million. But that wasn't all. He also demanded that Michael purchase four of his screenplays for $5 million each.

Michael told Pellicano that "I don't want to pay one cent to the Chandlers. If anybody pays, let it be my insurance company."

Based on his perception that Fields needed a back-up attorney, Michael hired Santa Monica lawyer Howard Weitzman, one of the most influential attorneys in America, to work with Fields. His list of celebrity clients included Marlon Brando, Magic Johnson, O.J. Simpson, and Arnold Schwarzenegger.

On August 20, 1993, at the debut of the most disastrous trip of his life, Michael flew to Bangkok for the second part of his Dangerous globetrotting. This time there would be no Jordie flying with him.

Two and a half weeks after the Westwood Marquis confrontation, Michael checked into a luxurious suite at the Hotel Oriental in Bangkok.

News of the child molestation allegations first reached the world when KNBS in Los Angeles broadcast the revelation of the police raids on Neverland and on Michael's Century City condo.

"Pop star Michael Jackson is the subject of a criminal investigation by the Los Angeles Police Department," came the startling news over the radio. At first listeners didn't know that the investigation was based on a charge of sexual molestation from a young boy. That tantalizing piece of news was actually revealed by Pellicano himself.

The detective went before television floodlights to deny all charges. He suggested it was part of an extortion attempt. He also noted that this was but one of some three dozen attempts that cropped up every year to extort money from Michael. He also claimed that the family of the young boy was attempting to milk $20 million from Michael.

Evan was furious, angrily denying he was a blackmailer. Instead he portrayed himself as a "morally offended parent" who wanted to protect his son from further sexual advances from Michael.

IS PETER PAN THE PIED PIPER IN DISGUISE? asked one headline. Newsweek raised another provocative question, IS HE DANGEROUS OR JUST OFF THE WALL?

Only hours before, the police had raided both Neverland and Michael's lavish condo in Century City. Armed with search warrants, the police were looking for evidence that he was a child molester. Accompanying the officers was a locksmith with instructions to break into Michael's secret playroom at Neverland where in most cases only his special friends-usually young white boys-were permitted to go.

Police seized evidence, including boxes of photographs and video tapes. Among the possessions the police hauled away was a picture book, The Boy: A Photographic Essay, featuring prepubescent boys with their undeveloped penises exposed.

Within his Bangkok suite, Michael's telephone was urgently ringing. It was his criminal attorney, Howard Weitzman, calling from Los Angeles with some very disturbing news.

Michael listened intently in stunned disbelief to the details of the raids on Neverland and his condo.

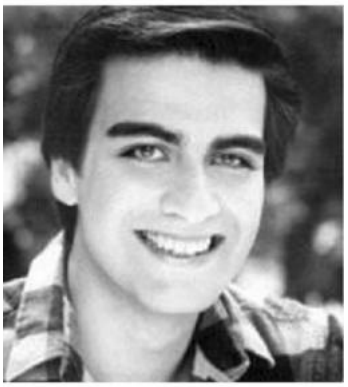
"I love children," Michael shouted into the phone at Weitzman. "The whole world knows that. How could they do this to me?"

After his discussion with Weitzman, Michael went on a rampage, breaking chandeliers and upturning and smashing furniture in his suite, even tossing vases of fresh flowers out the window.

"He came unglued," reported a staff member at the hotel. "When I was delivering a tray to the room, I spotted the American entertainer running screaming from room to room. He looked like a crazy man. I put down the tray and fled from the room. The entire suite was a wreck. I reported it to the manager so he could assess damages."

At first, reporters in Los Angeles rallied to Michael's defense when polls showed that only twelve percent of the public believed the accusations against Michael. Most TV viewers felt that he was the victim of extortion.

Shortly thereafter, a staff member of the television show Hard Copy claimed that a representative of Papa Joe, Michael's father, had approached the show and asked $150,000 for him to appear before the camera to talk about Michael's legal troubles. When Hard Copy turned that down, Papa Joe's staff made a counteroffer of $50,000. But negotiations broke down because the TV studio wanted Katherine to appear with her husband, and Papa Joe could not produce his wife.

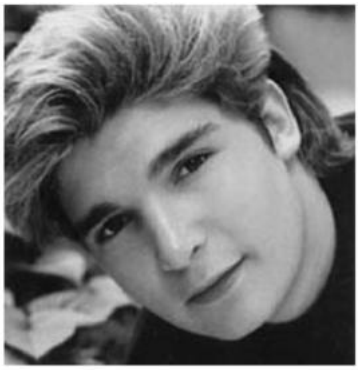


Eddie Reynoza

One staff member said, "Maybe old Joe could come on and tell how he used to frighten little Michael by telling him there were bad men in the audience with guns who would shoot him onstage if he didn't make the right moves. I don't know why my boss insisted on Katherine, who was known for sweeping everything under the rug and prevaricating."

Jordie's name was initially withheld from the media because he was a minor.

Even so, everybody who knew Michael Jackson, and many who didn't, seemed to take to the air waves to deliver their opinions on radio and TV about Jordie's accusations. The most sensational charges emerged from Eddie Reynoza, who charged that "Michael Jackson raped me when I was 16 years old." The boy claimed that he was auditioning for a music video when Michael spotted him. In his 1993 charges, Eddie claimed that he was "drugged, dumbed down with alcohol, and sexually assaulted."



Corey Feldman

Eddie went to the police and the press with charges of his rape, but some journalists attacked his credibility. Today, Eddie, an actor, is hoping to see a television movie made of his story, with his alleged rape by Michael being the centerpiece of the plot.

As a rising young child actor, Corey Feldman, who has appeared in more than 100 feature films, said that Michael befriended him when he was a young boy. Feldman claimed that the pop star never molested him or touched him inappropriately.

But he did reveal in an interview on 20/20 that he felt some of Michael's actions were questionable. He charged that Michael tried to persuade him to look at nude magazines.

In a sensational interview, Feldman revealed that he had been one of a group of child actors in Hollywood who were preyed upon and "molested by a gang of Hollywood pedophiles." He did not name Michael as part of that group. The former child star did admit to sleepovers with Michael, including one in a hotel room when Michael slept on a cot, giving Feldman the bed. "I was molested as a child but not by Jackson," Feldman said.

Known for his roles in such movies as Gremlins, Feldman ended his friendship with Michael in 2001. Later he released "Megalo-Man," a song highly critical of the pop star.

On the verge of a nervous breakdown, Michael managed to get through his first performance in Bangkok, but he had to lip-sync his way through the show, much to the disappointment of dozens of fans who realized what he was doing. "I could have stayed home and listened to my CD instead of seeing him live," said one disgruntled fan, who demanded that the box office return the hefty price he'd paid for a ticket.

Just hours before his scheduled second appearance on stage in Bangkok, Michael canceled the show. A doctor reported that Michael had succumbed to the heat and humidity prevalent in Thailand. The singer reportedly had become dehydrated. The doctor ignored the fact that Bangkok was experienc ing unseasonably cool weather, and that the auditorium where Michael was scheduled to appear was climate controlled.

Within his Thai hotel suite, Michael ingested inordinate amounts of Valium and Percodan, which were mixed with his regular painkillers. A maid reported to the press that she'd come upon the star in his bedroom. "He was crouched in a fetal position," she claimed. "He was actually sucking on his thumb like a little baby."

In a call to his mother, Katherine, Michael warned her that he'd commit suicide rather than face arrest. Michael's chief of security in Thailand, retired police officer, Bill Bray, placed a 24-hour suicide watch on Michael, taking his threat to kill himself very seriously.

On August 25, 1993, Michael placed a call to Elizabeth Taylor, pleading for her help. The star told him that she believed he was innocent and begged him to be strong and not harm himself. She promised to fly to his side. Significantly, Michael turned to Elizabeth instead of Katherine, his mother.

Having survived an emotionally turbulent relationship with actor Montgomery Clift, among countless others, Taylor was an old hand at playing Fairy Godmother and Maternal Savior, taking troubled young men, often homosexually oriented, and pressing them into the warmth of her ample and much-photographed bosom.

From Bangkok, Michael flew to Singapore for the continuation of his concert tour, arriving there in a fragile state.

Meanwhile, dressed in a white sweat suit, Larry Fortensky stood by the side of his bride, Elizabeth, as she spoke to journalists during her long flight to Singapore. Clad in a sweat suit herself-only hers was baby pinkElizabeth said, "This is the most awful thing that could happen to a man like Michael who loves children and would never harm one of them. I believe that Michael will be vindicated." She went on to claim that Michael was "the victim of extortion."

At the Singapore airport, at 2am, Larry and Elizabeth, "with a ton of luggage," were seen getting into a limousine which took them to a penthouse suite at the Raffles Hotel, one of the ten most famous in the world. Leaving Larry to sleep off the flight, Elizabeth went at once to see Michael across the hall.

Elizabeth arrived in Michael's suite at 3:30 that morning. She found him sucking his thumb "and curled up like a two-year-old boy in his bed."

She dismissed the guards, telling them that "the suicide watch is over. I'll take charge." She surmised that Michael had taken an overdose of painkillers, which had caused him to go berserk. He would not be the only friend of this Golden Age Hollywood star who had done that.

She urged him to fly to the Betty Ford Clinic, where she'd met her pres ent husband, Larry, then an inmate there, too. But Michael told her, "I have no intention of ever setting foot in Los Angeles again."

He seemed revitalized the following day, his birthday (August 29), when Elizabeth gave him a party to celebrate his turning thirty-five. She even got him to eat a piece of birthday cake, as he'd suffered a dramatic weight loss and was living on cups of vegetable broth.

That night, in front of his Singapore fans at the National Stadium, all 45,000 of them sang "Happy Birthday, Michael." His only reaction was to turn to one of his managers, "Isn't that song copyrighted? Will I have to pay royalties?"

The following night, he could not go on. Sobbing hysterically and threatening suicide, he fainted and the performance was canceled. In a local hospital, Michael underwent a brain scan to try to determine why he was suffering "from history's worst case of migraines." No physical cause could be determined by the presiding physicians.

After Singapore, Michael, along with Larry and Elizabeth, flew to Taiwan. Papa Joe and Katherine, along with Michael's brothers, each having flown in as a gesture of support for Michael, were waiting to greet their errant son.

Katherine hosted a family luncheon for Michael, to which she pointedly did not invite Elizabeth and Larry.

Perhaps feeling rebuffed, the Fortenskys flew back to Los Angeles. Elizabeth had been angered by remarks that Katherine allegedly told a reporter when boarding a plane in Los Angeles. "I'm his mother-not Elizabeth Taylor-and I'm flying to the side of my son, even though I'm not Cleopatra reincarnate."

Much of tout Hollywood continued to rally behind Michael, including Sharon Stone speaking at the MTV Awards in Los Angeles. "I firmly believe that if this family has-or ever hadevidence of abuse, it would have surfaced by now. All I know is that if a child of mine had been abused, I would not have been making deals."

Frank Cascio and MJ

Back in Los Angeles, Evan Chandler was working day and night to bring down Michael. Evan had obtained a high profile lawyer, the "fighting attorney," Gloria Allred, to represent Jordie. She immediately called a press conference, announcing that her thirteen-year-old client was "more than ready, more than willing, and more than able to confront his molester in court."

This ballsy attorney perhaps was too aggressive for the Chandlers. She really wanted a criminal suit against Michael, whereas the Chandlers preferred civil action so that damages could be claimed. The attorney charged that such a strategy would make the parents look too "money grubbing." Allred was removed from the case, and a more modest but also competent attorney, Larry Feldman, was hired instead.

On September 14, 1993, Feldman filed a civil suit for Jordie. He was in the eighth grade, aged thirteen.

In Jordie's civil complaint, Michael was charged with:

(1) sexual battery

(2) battery

(3) seduction

(4) willful misconduct

(5) intentional infliction of emotional distress

(6) fraud

(7) negligence

As this suit was being filed, Michael, in another part of the world, confronted soaking rain and large crowds as he marched with Russian soldiers in Red Square with the Kremlin in the background. A large banner (in English) was unfolded for his benefit: MICHAEL, RUSSIA LOVES YOU!

Flying to Tel Aviv, Michael met a different set of people. Although many citizens of Israel are as liberal as some of their counterparts in New York, others are staunchly conservative and almost violently anti-homosexual.

Flaunting convention, and under indictment on charges of child molestation, Michael landed in Israel with the Cascio brothers, Eddie, 9, and Frank, 13, in tow. When they went to visit the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem, angry protesters threw stones at them. The trio fled into a waiting limousine which was also pelted with stones as it made its get-away. En route to their hotel, signs greeted Michael: GO HOME, PERVERT. YOU'RE AN ABOMINATION!

Under pressure, the American Friends of the Hebrew University, originally planning to give Michael the Scopus Award for his humanitarian activities around the world, abruptly withdrew the honor they were about to bestow on him.

Not all the people of Israel agreed with these arch conservatives. It was estimated that some 85,000 fans filled a local auditorium at two sold-out concerts. One student outrageously proclaimed Michael as "our new Messiah. He's come back to Earth to save us!"

In Los Angeles, Michael's attorneys, Fields and Weitzman, denied that he was "in hiding" in the French Alps to avoid arrest in California. Actually, he was.

Desperately needing a rest, Michael, in a break on the Dangerous tour, accepted an invitation to fly to Geneva, where he was driven with the Cascio brothers to the chic enclave of Gstaad and Elizabeth Taylor's luxurious villa where she'd previously romped with Richard Burton, other husbands, and lovers.

Michael, Frank, and Eddie were guarded by Elizabeth's security force, each of whom earned one hundred dollars a day. At this point, Michael's addiction to painkillers reached dangerous levels. "He was a ticking time bomb," one of Elizabeth's security guards leaked to the press. "A male version of Marilyn Monroe flirting dangerously with death, almost inviting it."

In Gstaad, Michael was informed that his trusted aide, Norma Staikos, was being sought by the police for questioning. He demanded that she be given tickets to her native Greece. Staikos flew there and into exile, far from the authorities in Santa Barbara.

When queried about why a key witness, Norma Staikos, the duenna of Neverland, had flown away, Howard Weitzman said, "I know she's coming back, and I've told this to the police. To use the word `flee' is egregious."

The National Enquirer managed to obtain an exclusive interview with Jordie. The boy was quoted as saying, "I imagine Michael Jackson is pretty scared right now, really scared. And he should be, because what he did to me is a really bad thing."

When Michael left Elizabeth's villa in Gstaad, he was confronted with about a dozen angry mothers holding up signs. One read: SAVE OUR CHILDREN. Another in bold red letters demanded: PIED PIPER, LEAVE OUR BOYS ALONE! Yet another merely requested that Michael: GO HOME!

MJ and Norma Staikos

Abandoning Gstaad, Michael and the Cascio boys flew to Buenos Aires aboard a red-winged 747, a private jet, to continue the course of the Dangerous tour. They checked into a marble-clad mansion which Michael had rented for $12,000 a day. The villa, administered by the nearby Park Hyatt Hotel, was often reserved for visiting heads of state.

Daringly and provocatively, as if flaunting the charges against him, Michael appeared on the balcony of the mansion, in his pajama top, with Frank and Eddie. The brothers, "looking cuter than any two boys have the right to," in the words of one woman journalist, waved to the crowds.

Johnnie Cochran

A few moments later, after they'd retreated inside, Michael reappeared. At least his arm, still clad in pajamas, reappeared. He waved a copy of Child, a magazine for parents, at reporters who seemed shocked at such outrage.

Back in Los Angeles, because of the hysteria generated by his case, Jordie temporarily dropped out of school. He was grilled by psychiatrists, questioned by prosecutors, and "trial rehearsed" by his attorneys. Later, Evan discovered a picture that his son had drawn of himself. It depicted Jordie on the roof of a tall building ready to jump to his death. It was later reported that this was not necessarily a suicide drawing but an expression of fear on Jordie's part at being forced to testify against his formerly close sleepover buddy.

Michael's attorney, Bert Fields, antagonized authorities by firing off a letter to the police commission. He charged the police with using "scare tactics and intimidation" in the young boys they questioned. Not only Jordie, but Brett Barnes, Wade Robson, and Macaulay Culkin. The press reacted with astonishment to Fields' next move: He filed a motion in Santa Barbara, asking that the case against Michael Jackson be postponed for six years. At that time the statute of limitations would have run out, and the Chandlers would have no case, not even a criminal one.

Meanwhile, Michael's lawyers were concerned with more than just "little boys coming out from under rocks to tell nasty tales about Michael," as one member of Michael's legal team claimed. A business deal was concluded with EMI, which announced a five-year agreement to administer Michael's rich ATV publishing catalogue, which included all of those Beatles hits. The deal called for Michael to get $40 million upon signing what potentially could be a $100 million-plus-transaction.

Both Fields and Weitzman advised Michael to fly to Los Angeles to face charges. Michael reportedly "threw a fit" when neither Fields nor Weitzman could assure him that he would not be arrested if he set foot on American soil. Michael's trusted security aide, Bill Bray, denounced Fields for hiring Pellicano, who, according to Bray, "is far too notorious to put on this case." Bray urged Michael to hire Johnnie L. Cochran, "the best black lawyer in America when it comes to something criminal."

The next stop on the tour was Puerto Rico, a U.S. territory, of course, and there were genuine fears that Federal agents might come aboard the plane and remove Michael in handcuffs to be photographed before the world's paparazzi. "Even the New York Times would run that picture on its front page," Michael predicted.

Michael, deeply addicted to Codeine, Percodan, and Demerol, continued to call Fields daily with the same question: "Will I be arrested if I fly back to America?"

Instead of Puerto Rico, Michael opted instead to fly into Mexico City on October 24, ordering his attorneys, Fields and Weitzman, to join him there to plot strategy. Michael also requested that his dermatologist, Dr. Arnold Klein, join him in Mexico City as well.

As part of a tantalizing detail whose implications would extend deep into Michael's future, he also invited Dr. Klein's assistant to fly to Mexico too. A tough woman, known as a "biker babe" or "motorcycle mama," Debbie Rowe would become Michael's second wife and the bearer of two of his children.

Dr. Klein is an internationally renowned dermatologist. Michael could find no greater expert on skin disorders in America. In the early days of the AIDS crisis, Dr. Klein was the first physician to diagnose a case of Kaposi's sarcoma in Southern California, which marked the beginning of a life-long commitment to fighting the disease. This commitment established a dialogue with Dame Elizabeth. Klein eventually helped establish the Elizabeth Taylor Center for AIDS Research, Treatment and Education at UCLA.

Word was spreading that Jordie had identified "marks" on Michael's genitalia, and that the pop star wanted Klein to "disguise the evidence." Reportedly, Michael went into a "screaming rage" when he learned that the Santa Barbara police could force him to undergo a strip search.

On November 8, 1993, while the Jacksons were attending Samuel Jackson's funeral-he was Michael's grandfather-police raided Hayvenhurst in Encino. With a search warrant, more than a dozen officers fanned out through the premises, including Katherine's bedroom. But mainly their attention focused on Michael's bedroom which he no longer used, having more or less abandoned it and many of its contents.

Dermatologist Dr. Arnold Klein

All the dolls, fancily dressed mannequins, and expensive toys were left just as they were the day Michael moved to Neverland. Katherine had insisted on this. Before the raid ended, the police had rounded up seventy-five boxes of evidence, including videotapes, magazines, and photographs belonging to Michael.

Distraught and suicidal once again, Michael called Elizabeth at her home in Los Angeles, pleading with her to come to Mexico City "to rescue me." Within eleven hours, Elizabeth and her construction worker hunk, Larry Fortensky, were flying south. In Mexico, the Fortenskys discovered that Michael was suffering a complete nervous breakdown. The night before, Michael had overdosed on Percodan.

Sleeping in the room next to him, Elizabeth maintained a 24-hour suicide watch until Michael pulled through this latest crisis. Once again, she urged him to admit himself to the Betty Ford Clinic.

The hotel manager later told the press that he had to send three of the hotel's security guards to Michael's suite to subdue him. "He was threatening to jump out the window. He was butting his head against the stucco walls. There was blood on the walls. He'd vomited on the expensive Oriental rugs. The guards managed to hold him down as he struggled. `Let me kill myself,' he shouted. `I want to die!'"

Later, when he seemed under reasonable control, Michael took magic markers and began to write his initials, MJ, over all the walls and on every surface. One of the security guards called the manager, who said Michael should be allowed to continue. "If that will subdue him, let him go for it. I'll bill him-and bill him good-when he checks out of this hotel to the relief of everybody."

Somehow by November 12, Michael was able to perform at his final concert in Mexico City, delivering a lackluster performance and acknowledging the Fortenskys as his special guests of honor. But instead of going on to San Juan, which his hectic schedule called for, Michael greeted Elizabeth backstage. Then, in the dark of night and concealed in a blanket in a limousine, he was driven to the Mexico City airport. There, an MGM Grand 727 (a chartered jet) waited to take him to London.

Afraid of Heathrow and its paparazzi, the private charter landed at Luton Airport on the outskirts of London. After disembarking, Michael, along with the Fortenskys, was taken to the Charter Nightingale Clinic, an establishment originally founded by Florence Nightingale.

As the world asked, "Where's Michael?" an audio-taped message was released to the media:

`As I left on this tour I had been the target of an extortion attempt, and shortly thereafter was accused of horrifying and outrageous conduct. I was humiliated, embarrassed, hurt and suffering great pain in my heart. The pressure resulting from these false allegations coupled with the incredible energy necessary for me to perform caused so much distress that it left me physically and emotionally exhausted. I became increasingly more dependent on the painkillers to get me through the days of the tour. My friends and doctors advised me to seek professional guidance immediately in order to eliminate what has become an addiction. It is time for me to acknowledge my need for treatment in order to regain my health. I realize that completing the tour is no longer possible and I must cancel the remaining dates. I know I can overcome the problem and will be stronger from the experience. "

Later that night, Elizabeth and Larry, with a Michael Jackson look-alike, flew to Switzerland in a deliberate campaign to trick the media.

Meanwhile, federal marshals waited in vain at the San Juan airport for Michael's arrival. The plan was to hold him for questioning about the child molestation charges. When a plane arrived from Mexico City, Michael was not aboard, of course.

On the morning of November 12, Michael's publicist announced that the remainder of the Dangerous tour had been canceled, and that Michael's addiction to painkillers began when his hair caught fire in 1984 during the taping of a Pepsi-Cola commercial.

When confronted with the cancellation of the remainder of the tour, executives at Pepsi breathed a sign of relief. Some youth organizations were threatening a boycott of the soft drink. "When Michael canceled the tour we were sponsoring, we were off the hook," said an executive off the record. "There's no way that Pepsi wants a spokesman who's implicated as a child molester."

In contrast, at least publicly, executives at Sony stood by Michael, affirming their "unconditional and unwavering support."

Weitzman then called Michael with horrific news. The police had obtained a warrant for a strip search, although there was a fear that Michael had been out of the country long enough to "alter" the identifying markings on his genitals. "There is no way in hell I'm going through with a strip search," Michael shouted. "Get me out of this, or else find new employment. I'll hire a lawyer who can get me out of this. I've never heard of anything so humiliating!"

During all this turmoil, Michael had five bodyguards he trusted-Leroy Thomas, Donald Starks, Aaron White, Morris Williams, and Fred Hammond. However, by 1995 he turned on them and fired them. The men sued Michael for wrongful dismissal, claiming that the only reason they were fired was "because we knew too much." One security guard reported that Michael had called him, asking him to destroy a photograph of a nude boy, perhaps ten years old, that was in a bathroom in the family home at Encino. The bodyguards' case was thrown out of court in July of 1995.

Michael had been slated to perform the theme song and appear in a video for the film Addams Family Values. But he dropped out. Nevertheless, his image appeared in the final release. A kid sees a Michael Jackson poster and recoils in horror.

The November 29, 1993 cover of People magazine blared the headline: MICHAEL JACKSON CRACKS UP.

As part of a separate development, Fields made some indiscreet statements to Judge David Rothman of Santa Barbara County on November 23, 1993 when he was fighting for a delay in the trial. "You have a DA sitting up in Santa Barbara County about to indict, and if they do, we are going to have a criminal trial very soon." Judge Rothman rejected Fields' request for a delay, scheduling the trial for March 21, 1994.

Michael was infuriated that his attorney was even daring to suggest that a trial was imminent. Weitzman, recognizing potential damage, claimed that Fields had "misspoke." Hearing of this, it was reported that Elizabeth Taylor, working through her own lawyer, was behind the move to oust Fields. Michael abruptly fired him. With Fields removed from the case, so went the investigative skills of Pellicano.

Michael sensed that he needed a powerful figure on his legal team. As his security guard, Bill Bray, had recommended, Michael hired the high-profile lawyer, Johnnie Cochran, who would later be immortalized in 1995 for his role in the O.J. Simpson trial, "that great trash novel come to life." During the Simpson trial, even Margaret Thatcher and Boris Yeltsin dropped their busy schedules to watch its televised proceedings, especially the skill of Cochran in evading overwhelming evidence against Simpson.

Cochran's first assignment from Michael involved a confrontation with the insurance company, Transamerica. Michael wanted the company to pay for any cash that flowed to Jordie. When the executives there received Michael's outlandish demand, they went into an emergency huddle. Before the day was over, they had rejected Michael's claim. To retaliate, Cochran began to fire off threatening letters.

He warned the company that if they did not participate in the settlement, "Mr. Jackson will pursue all civil remedies available to him against Transamerica for a host of claims, including failure to pay defense costs, failure to contribute toward settlement costs, and/or for punitive damages for bad faith."

Russ Wardrip, a claims analyst at Transamerica, shot back that Michael Jackson's policy covered injuries in an accident-"not acts of sexual activity."

Although Transamerica officials had valued Michael as a client, executives privately expressed astonishment that any celebrity could possibly think that an insurance policy would cover a client's criminal child molestation. Cochran admitted privately to friends that he hated writing such a letter to Transamerica, knowing how spurious the claim was.

In his dossier, Wardrip also asserted that acts of child molestation are "inherently intentional, wrongful, and harmful,"-and hardly accidental.

In one of the most amazing stories ever recorded in the insurance industry, Transamerica under "heavy beating up" by Cochran agreed to pay an undisclosed amount. Even more amazingly, Michael rejected the offer. "I want them to pay every penny-not just part of the settlement to the kid."

Under Cochran's direction, Michael's camp upped the ante to nearly a million dollars, but that is only a fraction of what Evan was willing to settle for now, as he saw a vast fortune possible for Jordie and money for himself.

In addition to Cochran, Michael wanted John Branca back on his legal team, not for his defense in the child molestation case, but to handle his increasingly complicated business affairs. After three years in exile, Branca was back. Michael immediately demanded that the attorney ask for an even higher royalty rate from Sony than that which had previously been agreed upon.

Under the urging of his new attorney, Cochran, Michael agreed to return to Los Angeles. Shortly before dawn, he was smuggled out of the Charter Nightingale Clinic where he was driven in a "hearse-like" ambulance to Heathrow. There he boarded a 727, the property of one of his greatest admirers, the Sultan of Brunei, who was also the owner of London's very posh Dorchester Hotel, an address that Michael often used during stays in that city. As the richest man on the planet, the sultan could afford such indulgences. On the plane, Michael was accompanied by Frank and Eddie Cascio.

The jet set down in Boston for refueling before flying on to Billings, Montana. Fearing arrest on the ground, Michael refused to disembark to clear Customs. Consequently, a U.S. Customs official boarded the plane to check Michael's passport.

With the young boys, Michael landed at Santa Barbara where he concealed himself within a stretch limo that had been waiting to take him and his young charges to what he thought was the safety of Neverland. Outside the gates of the estate, reporters from magazines, newspapers, and TV waited feverishly.

On January 16, 1994, against the advice of both his attorneys and his mother, Katherine, Michael hosted his annual party for 250 underprivileged children at Neverland. Black Entertainment TV covered the event. But one newspaper asked, "Has Peter Pan become the Pied Piper?"

After the event, the Northridge earthquake struck across California, causing billions of dollars in property damage and even the loss of life.

The earthquake became oddly symbolic for Michael, as his Trophy Room at Encino, with all his platinum records, was severely shaken. And at the Hollywood Wax Museum, the head fell off the Michael Jackson effigy.

Within three days of his secret return, news people accurately surmised that Michael was once again in residence at Neverland. The circus lights were switched on within his own private theme park, and the carousel began grinding out the sounds of "Like a Virgin" once again. The song became oddly symbolic, since Michael had hired a team of psychiatrists to maintain-in court if necessary-that he was a virgin in spite of all the crotch-grabbing and simulated masturbation on stage.

Appearing on both Hard Copy and CNN, Katherine still continued her increasingly tired defense of her son as a straight shooter. "Sometimes you look at a person's face and you can say, `Oh, my God, that guy is gay.' Michael is not gay."

Such appearances inflamed the gay community. "Every time Katherine Jackson opens her mouth, she costs Michael thousands and thousands of gay fans," said an activist in Los Angeles.

In references to Michael's attackers, brother Jermaine claimed that "Michael is ready to kick some butt!"

Eventually, Michael met privately with Cochran. There were no minutes made of their confidential chat, but the end result was the ordering of Cochran "to buy Jordie Chandler's silence no matter what the cost." Cochran went on to inform Michael that all appeals had been exhausted. He would have to agree to be photographed in a strip search at Neverland on the morning of December 20, 1993.

Jordie later told police where "mottled pink spots" on Michael's scrotum and buttocks were, although mottled seems an odd word for a thirteen-yearold to use. Apparently, he also testified that there was "a dark splotch" at the base of Michael's penis, but it was underneath, where it was not immediately visible.

Jordie testified that the first time he saw Michael in the nude and noticed the spots, he mocked the star. "You look like a cow!" Michael was furious. Jordie had also drawn a detailed picture of a nude Michael.

Detail from the cover of the Dangerous album

The prosecutors in California threat ened to handcuff and arrest Michael and haul him to jail if he didn't agree to strip and have his nude body photographed. As Cochran told him, "You don't have much choice. In jail, they could strip you and photograph you any time they wanted."

Tom Sneddon, the Santa Barbara District Attorney who would become Michael's nemesis, was part of the entourage who descended on Neverland at 4:45 in the afternoon. Gary Spiegel was the office photographer for the sheriff's department.

Michael was forced to strip and have his genitals photographed. During the ordeal, Michael, in the nude, stood helplessly by, looking at a picture of Elizabeth Taylor at her most beautiful from the 1951 release of A Place in the Sun.

Also present was Michael's Beverly Hills dermatologist, Dr. Klein, as well as a personal doctor, David Forecast, who practiced medicine in London.

Although calling two detectives "assholes," Michael cooperated to a degree but only to a degree, refusing to submit to all the photographs authorized by the court. Later Michael issued a statement to the press:

It was the most humiliating ordeal of my life-one that no person should ever have to suffer. It was a nightmare, a horrifying nightmare. But if this is what I have to endure to prove my innocence, my complete innocence, then so be it. I shall not in this statement respond to all the false allegations being made against me, since my lawyers have advised me that this is not the proper forum in which to do that. I will say that I am particularly upset by the handling of this matter by the incredible and terrible mass media. At every opportunity, the media has dissected and manipulated these allegations to reach their own conclusions. I ask all of you to wait to hear the truth before you label or condemn me. Don't treat me like a criminal, because I am innocent.

His statement was met with skepticism in the press, and voice stress experts denounced the tape as "a pack of Jackson lies."

"The stress in his voice clearly goes off the chart," claimed Dr. Martin Markowitz from his offices in Atlanta.

Too many persons witnessed Michael posing nude to keep their mouths shut. An assistant in the photo lab where the films were processed claimed, "It's of normal size. There is very little pubic hair. It's light brown, not jet black. His penis is white but with a brown blotch or two. There are pink and brown patches on his testicles, which are not large."

Bob Jones later claimed, "The boy turned out to have an unerring eye for accuracy."

On the dawn of a civil trial, life wasn't going smoothly for the Chandlers either. Threats arrived daily, including a dead rat in a box. Evan Chandler's dental office was ransacked and subjected to bomb threats. After death threats came in for the Chandler attorney, Larry Feldman, a security force from the U.S. Justice Department was assigned to protect him.

After violent arguments from both parties, a settlement was agreed upon with the Chandlers, a sum so high it would have devastated the fortunes of most rich people.

According to the agreement, Michael pledged to place $15,331,250 to be held in trust by the minor's attorneys, plus another $2 million as an extra signing bonus. Both June and Evan were to receive an additional $1.5 million each, up front. There was more. Larry Feldman and his legal team were to be paid an extra $10 million. In all, financial advisers estimated that Michael's total cost from the case, including his own legal fees and lost revenues from Dangerous, amounted to more than $100 million, maybe a lot more.

Based on prevailing interest rates and if the funds in the trust were invested wisely, Jordie could make "multiple millions of dollars more as long as he and his parents and his attorneys kept their mouths shut," according to reporter Diane Dimond.

The final agreement was signed on January 25, 1994.

Both Larry Feldman, representing Jordie, and Cochran, representing Michael, spoke to the press. Feldman, referring to Jordie as "the boy," claimed that he "is very happy with the resolution of this matter." Still maintaining Michael's innocence, in spite of the huge pay-off, Cochran claimed, "The time has come for Michael Jackson to get on with his life." Privately he told colleagues that he detested child molesters and "despised" working on the case. He also told associates that "I feel Michael was completely in the wrong. The way he was carrying on, he was headed for big trouble." Cochran accurately predicted that there would be additional "Jordie Chandler cases in the future if Michael didn't reform. Personally, the way he was cavorting with those Cascio brothers, even as child molestation charges against him raged, I don't think he's learned his lesson ... even now!"

Michael waited months for the media circus to die down before speaking out about the settlement:

I asked my lawyer if he could guarantee me that justice would prevail. He said that he could not guarantee what a judge or jury would do. So I said that I have got to do something to get out of this nightmare ... all these people were coming forward to get paid on these tabloid TV shows. And its lies, lies, lies. So I got together with my advisors and they advised me in an unanimous decision to resolve the case. It could go on for seven years.

Although prosecutors in Santa Barbara didn't want Michael to escape from their clutches, their criminal investigation into Michael's alleged child molestation began to wind down.

Janet Reno

When word reached the prosecutors that the Chandlers were "making a deal" with Michael, they knew their criminal case against him was collapsing. At the time of the Chandler case, California law stated that a child could not be made to testify to confirm molestation charges. "Without Jordie, we've got no real case to present to a jury," a police officer said, "and then there's the question of Jackson's fame. What if everybody on the jury loved Thriller?"

Feldman denied that there had ever been a private understanding that Jordie would not testify in the event that criminal charges against Michael would be filed anytime in the future. But despite those denials, prosecutors suspected that an agreement had been established between Michael and Jordie's father. "Because Jordie has removed himself from the picture, our case has been shot full of holes," a staff member of the district attorney's office, who refused to allow his name to be printed, told a reporter in Los Angeles

Appearing on Nightline, a New York attorney, Raoul Felder, told America that "If people believe that Michael Jackson paid millions of dollars and didn't get a promise that the boy wouldn't testify, then they also believe in the tooth fairy. The settlement sends a terrible message. That statue on the courthouse should hang its head in shame that this could happen. If you're rich, you can buy justice-pure and simple."

Allegedly, Michael threatened a lawsuit, but most lawyers agreed that Felder was allowed to speak his mind under fair comment and criticism of a very public event.

The matter even went to the White House, where Bill and Hillary Clinton were now in residence. Within the very recent past, they had warmly welcomed Michael to Washington and considered him a friend. Attorney General Janet Reno met privately with both Bill and Hillary, reviewing the evidence that Michael had transported Jordie across state lines (Nevada and Florida, for example) and had even taken him abroad to such countries as Monaco and France. It was alleged that President Clinton was reluctant to intervene in a high-profile case against a black person, particularly in the wake of the 1992 L.A. riots over the arrest of Rodney King. "Leave it to those guys in Santa Barbara," Clinton told Reno. "We're not getting involved with this one. I have enough problems as it is without alienating the black community."

Michael was never forced to go into court. Neither was Jordie. In January of 1994, LAPD prosecutors announced that they were not moving forward with the case because of lack of evidence. They also announced, on January 24, that there wasn't enough evidence to charge Evan Chandler with extortion. Jordie dropped the charges against Michael.

Right at this time, Reuters News Service dropped a bombshell. A bulletin went out that the photographs of Michael's genitalia did not match Jordie's description of them. This was in total contradiction to other reports, including those made by police investigators who had minutely examined photographs of Michael's private parts.

"Money talks," said a police investigator who didn't want to be named. "Or, should I say, money silences. Millions can silence even the most talkative witness."

Terry White, once the Santa Clara, California, District Attorney, in his review of the evidence, claimed that there was "more than enough evidence" to indict Michael and probably convict him on charges of child molestation.

"Although it is hard to put a price on the emotional suffering of child abuse victims," one reporter wrote, "at least the young boy will not have to work another day of his life, and can live in the lap of luxury that he'd enjoyed as a twelve-year-old at Neverland."

Years later, Maureen Orth, writing in Vanity Fair, had a different spin. "Jordie Chandler's life has been completely broken by his association with Michael Jackson. He went to college, he manages his own money. He's a very attractive, bright kid but I don't think he really is able to have a normal life. He can't go anywhere without being identified as the Michael Jackson boy. People want to know all about Michael and how much money did Jordie get."

Many celeb friends, such as Elton John, wondered in public why Michael settled out of court if he were indeed not guilty. But the ever-steadfast Elizabeth Taylor, in a press release, stood by him. "As one of Michael's closest friends, who is convinced of his innocence, I agonized over the daily avalanche of lies, innuendos, and slurs, none of which Michael deserved. Michael's love of children is one of the purest things I have ever seen; it shines like an extra sun. In spite of the media's distorted lens, I was repeatedly touched by the faith that so many of Michael's friends and fans had in his complete innocence."

In the closing weeks of World War II, some Neapolitan women painted lipstick on the mouths of their young teenage sons and offered them for sale to U.S. servicemen for purposes of sodomy. "If that sounds amazing," said Lieutenant Jerry Grayson, "maybe you don't know what hunger tastes like in your gut."

After word leaked out to the world that Michael had paid millions to Jordie, dozens of women from around the world sent letters to Michael, including nude pictures of their young sons, offering their offspring "as a companion." Some of the letters were so explicit that authorities considered filing charges against the mothers.

Michael had been warned that prosecutors in California "were still watching him like Big Brother."

"But his habits didn't change," Bob Jones said. "He still paraded around the globe with little boys. These little boys were costing the King millions upon millions."

James Hahn, who was a city attorney (later mayor) of Los Angeles, privately said that "Michael Jackson had better be very, very careful because authorities are watching him."

Publicity about the Jordie Chandler case died down except for a scandalous book in 1995, but it forever tarnished Michael's image, in spite of the settlement or because of it.

Jordie was back in the news again in 2005 when Michael actually did go on trial, this time in a criminal case alleging child molestation of another young boy.

At the time of that trial, Jordie refused to testify against Michael. It was learned that he hadn't seen his mother, June, for the past eleven years.

Jordie, at the age of 26, was back in the news again in 2006 when he charged his father, Evan, with "life threatening physical abuse."

The former dentist was charged with striking Jordie on the head from behind with a 12 '/2 pound dumbbell. His father was also charged with "spraying my eyes with Mace and trying to choke me." The alleged incidents occurred in August of 2005, just two months after Michael's acquittal in another kiddie sex case. At the time of the alleged assault, Jordie was said to be living with his father "somewhere in New Jersey."

Jordie's uncle, Raymond Chandler, who practices law in Santa Barbara, wrote a shocking book, All That Glitters: The Crime and the Cover-Up, published in 2004. He was not bound by the confidentiality agreement signed by Michael and Evan Chandler on behalf of his son.

In this book, Raymond Chandler had this conclusion:

The difference between Michael Jackson and any ordinary pedophile is one of degree, not kind. Using his stardom and fantasy world he created at Neverland, Michael could entice a child in a way that no other pedophile could hope to match. But beneath the facade of fame and fortune lies a child molester no different from the one down the street. "Come to my house, I'll give you candy. " Its as old as the hills.

"Just think, nobody ever thought this would last. "

--Michael Jackson, 1994 On his marriage to Lisa Marie Presley

"In an insult to transvestite men everywhere-who can look pretty damn good in a dress and makeup and can project alluring female charm-when Mike does this, he doesn't even have the decency to stop grabbing his crotch every 1.0045 seconds and allowing that image for us. "

"All of Hollywood has plastic surgery! I don't know why the press points me out. It's just my nose, you know. "

--Michael Jackson

"I've seen this. I've seen it a lot. I have seen him with children. They don't let him go to the bathroom without running in. They won't let him out of their sight. They even go to bed with him.""

--Lisa Marie Presley, explaining Michael's relationship with children

"He's not gay, I really feel certain of that. Many times, a goodlooking girl would walk by and Mike would whisper, 'Hey, what do you think of her? She's somethin' else, isn't she?' His brothers are much more open in the way they pursue women, but Michael's discreet. He's a gentleman. "

--Tim Whitehead (Michael's First Cousin)

"Michael continues to be completely fucking insane ill flipped crazy out of his gourd lost his shit incomprehensible what the fuck got in that boy do you even remember back when he used to be cute and talented and oh my god. "

Chapter Thirteen

After lengthy delays and postponements, the taping of the Jackson Family Honors took place on February 19, 1994 in Las Vegas. The setting was the luxurious MGM Grand Garden before a crowd of 15,000, some of whom had to be virtually pulled in off the street to fill the seats.

Promoters handed out WE LOVE MICHAEL signs to teenagers. There was speculation that Michael would not even show up, but he did. Celine Dion and Smokey Robinson performed, as did Michael's discoverer, Gladys Knight, but the highlight of the evening was Janet Jackson singing "Alright." But despite the presence of these other five-star entertainers, the audience was eager to hear and see Michael on stage.

To hysterically cheering fans, the King of Pop suddenly appeared, looking incredibly thin in a black military jacket with a gold-leaf pattern. He'd come out on the stage to present an award, one of the Jackson Family Honors, to Motown's Berry Gordy Jr., with whom he'd had a troubled relationship, one that had even involved lawsuits. Michael went into his usual kiss blowing and "I love you!" pronouncements. For once, he took Katharine Hepburn's advice and left the sunglasses in his dressing room. After a suck-up speech praising Gordy, Michael welcomed the Motown mogul onstage to receive his honor.

Later, Michael returned to the stage to present another Jackson honor to Elizabeth Taylor, claiming that she was "one of the most celebrated women of the 20th century." He thanked her for her "unwavering strength and support" in the middle of all his "trials and tribulations."

Elizabeth came on, blasting the tabloids for their constant attacks on Michael. She even asked the public to "stop buying the garbage." She called Michael "the brightest star in the universe." Later, critics without evidence claimed that Michael must have paid Elizabeth two-million dollars for her glowing tribute.

Suddenly, things began going wrong at the lovefest. Elizabeth announced, "I know you'd like to hear Michael sing, but he doesn't have any music prepared." Boos went up from the audience. "Don't boo," Elizabeth admonished the audience, "it's an ugly sound."

Michael did, however, join family members and other guests onstage for the song, "If Only You Believe." Janet was not to be seen. She'd left word with the stage manager, "Tell them Janet Jackson has left the building."

The following morning, USA Today headlined the event: JACKSONS NO THRILLER WITHOUT MICHAEL SOLO. Some fans had paid as much as $1,000 per ticket hoping to see Michael sing. Many other headlines also appeared expressing the disappointment of loyal fans, whose numbers would fade year by year as their faith in Michael waned.

Instead of watching the lackluster Jackson Family Honors, most viewers tuned in to the Olympics instead. Whitney Houston suggested that attacks on Michael might be because he was black, although at this point he didn't look black. Louis Farrakhan, head of the Nation of Islam, agreed with Houston. On Arsenio Hall, he claimed that the King of Pop was being "treated like a slave on a plantation because of a charge that has yet to lead to a criminal charge." The controversial Muslim had attended the taping of the Jackson Family Honors.

After the show, Katherine Jackson was subpoened to testify against her son. Michael's attorney, Howard Weitzman, shot back in anger, denouncing the DA's office for trying "to humiliate Michael Jackson and harass him. In all the years of my experience, I've never before seen the mother of the target of an investigation called before the grand jury. It's just done in real poor taste."

In the aftermath of the Jackson Family Honors, Gary Smith, its co-producer, sued the Jacksons for $2.2 million, alleging that cast and crew had not been paid, including his own fee of $400,000. In a damaging report, it was revealed that the show had taken in $4.5 million, only $100,000 of which went to charity, although it had been billed as a charity event.

La Toya appeared in Las Vegas. But when Katherine told La Toya she wouldn't be allowed onstage without signing a gag order, she slammed down the phone on her mother and boarded a plane that night for Nashville with her husband, Jack Gordon. Arriving in a pair of cowboy boots in Tennessee, La Toya announced she was in Nashville to record an album of country songs. Gordon predicted, "La Toya Jackson will be the next country/western heartthrob." A Nashville music critic had another prediction: "Dolly Parton and Loretta Lynn can sleep peacefully with their boots on. They need not fear La Toya Jackson."

The Jackson Family Honors was an attempt at image building and spin control, but it failed to impress "Walt's Boys." Officials at Walt Disney World met in secret February 25, 1994, and decided to yank Captain EO from its Orlando theme park. Although Michael had not even been charged with child molestation, the suspicions and the publicity were just too much for Disney officials. They pulled the plug. The film was replaced with a 3-D movie, Honey, I Shrunk the Theater.

After the Jackson Family Honors, Michael met privately with Elizabeth to share a secret with her. He told her that he was going to get married, only the bride-to-be didn't know it yet. He declared-no doubt falsely that "I'm in love with Lisa Marie Presley."

Although Elizabeth had spurned Michael's offer of marriage, sources reported that she was clearly jealous of the much younger Lisa Marie. At one point the superstar was heard contemptuously referring to Lisa Marie as "a punk rocker." Elizabeth and Lisa Marie probably suspected that each of them had shouldered the responsibility of rescuing Michael from himself. Elizabeth was quoted as saying, "I've saved Michael countless times-and I can do it again. I will do just that!"

Privately, Lisa Marie agreed with members of the family that Katherine Jackson was mother enough for Michael. "He doesn't need another interfering mother image in his life," Lisa Marie is reported to have said, referring pointedly to Ms. Taylor. "He needs me. Someone young and vibrant, like he is. Someone who can cuss and get low. Like Michael, my future is ahead of me. His future is ahead of him. It's been a long time since Elizabeth had a hit with Cat on a Hot Tin Roof. And who is this Tennessee Williams anyway? I always thought his songs were pure cornpone. Elvis hated him."

No doubt Lisa Marie was confusing Tennessee Williams with the country singer, Tennessee Ernie Ford.

Separated from her husband, Danny Keough, whom she'd married in 1988, Lisa Marie was in Las Vegas during the taping of the Jackson Family Honors. With her, she'd brought her children, Danielle Riley, born in 1989, and Benjamin, born in 1992.

Prsicilla Presley, Lisa Marie (aged 3) and Elvis, circa 1971

She got a call from Michael inviting her for a date on February 2, 1994 at the Sheraton Desert Inn where The Temptations were performing. Normally, Michael would have slipped into the concert after the lights had been darkened. But he wanted to parade one of America's most famous daughters through the front door with the regular customers. Lisa Marie looked stunning in a low-cut black gown. During the performance, they were seen holding hands in a section called "King's Row," appropriate seats for the King of Pop and the daughter of the King of Rock 'n' Roll. Many observers referred to it as "the romance that never was," but at least the Jackson/Presley alliance had more of a reality bite than Michael's earlier "love affair" with Princess Di.

The outspoken La Toya, when she heard about the date, denounced it as a sham, claiming that Michael was "just kidding the public. It's an obvious public relations exercise aimed at portraying Michael in a more manly, heterosexual light. But girls are not part of Michael's life. He's not interested in them."

Back in California, Michael entertained Lisa Marie and her children at Neverland. He later told the press, "One of the things that most attracted me to Lisa is that she gets along swell with the animals in my own zoo."

Reportedly, staff members at Neverland were surprised at Michael's interest in Lisa Marie. "In all the months I've worked here," said one member of the staff, "I always saw him with young boys-never a gal, particularly one who looked hot-to-trot like that Presley gal."

Regardless of what he might have thought personally, the very hip Donald Trump invited the couple to visit his luxurious estate, Mar-a-Lago, in Palm Beach. He later told the press, "They looked like any other lovey-dovey couple to me."

J. Randy Taraborrelli, in his The Magic & the Madness, reported that the first time Michael made love to Lisa Marie was at Mar-a-Lago. Taraborrelli quotes an unnamed source, identified only as "another one of Lisa's confidantes":

She [Lisa] said it was intense, it took her breath away. I have no idea what they were doing, or what he was doing to her but since she gravitates to the unconventional, she was out of her mind over this guy. Maybe its hard for some to believe, but true, just the same.

The unnamed source was right on at least one point-"it's hard for some to believe."

Taraborrelli later wrote that Lisa Marie's "sexual chemistry" was so intense with Michael that she "wasn't about to give it up." The author, who would later write a biography of Elizabeth Taylor, found himself standing virtually alone in the world with that point of view.

Years previously, close to Lake Tahoe, a seven-year-old Lisa Marie Presley had first laid eyes on Michael Jackson during one of his performances with The Jackson 5.

She came back into Michael's life through the intervention of a mutual friend, an artist from Australia, Brett Livingston-Stone, who had painted a portrait of Michael that had sold for $2 million. Strong called Michael to ask him if he'd listen to a tape of Lisa Marie singing, hoping that he might produce an album for her. "Send it over," Michael said.

Lisa Marie did better than that. With her tape in hand, she showed up in person to see Michael. Accompanying her was her husband, Danny Keough.

After listening to the tape, Michael told Lisa Marie that she had "promise." During her meeting with Michael, the star is alleged to have told both Lisa Marie and her husband, "Listen, I'm not gay! Don't let these false eyelashes and red lipstick fool you."

Lisa Marie later admitted that she was impressed that "Michael could curse just as good as the rest of us cotton pickers." It has been alleged that Michael shared with her some indiscreet gossip he'd picked up when attending President Clinton's inaugural in Washington. They both acknowledged that the new president was a rabid Elvis fan. Clinton, or so it was rumored, once told some cronies that one of his greatest dreams in life "was to fuck Elvis's daughter."

"A lot of people have that fantasy," Lisa Marie was alleged to have said.

"Let them dream on," Danny interjected.

When Lisa Marie later confessed to Michael that her marriage to Danny was falling apart, Michael actively pursued her with flowers and presents. Privately she told friends that "even though Michael is a little bit cute, he's very immature compared to Danny. I still love Danny. I will always love Danny even though we might divorce."

Divorce Danny she did, rushing into a secret marriage to Michael Jackson. Far from the paparazzi and the ravenous tabloids, the wedding took place on May 26, 1994 in La Vega, an obscure village in the Dominican Republic. Two months would go by before the world learned of this bizarre marriage. None of the Jacksons had been invited.

Lisa Marie's divorce papers had arrived only on May 6. Seemingly she was rushing impulsively from one marriage into another.

Before flying to the Dominican Republic, Michael and Lisa Marie signed a prenuptial agreement.

Civil Judge Hugo Francisco Alvarez conducted the wedding in Spanish but with an interpreter.

Michael tried to use more flaming red lipstick than his bride, or so it was reported. His face was partially hidden under a wide-brimmed black hat, the type worn at ferias in Seville. His ponytail was slicked back, and his cowboy belt would have made John Wayne proud. Lisa Marie also wore a black hat evocative of a flamenco dancer.

"Michael looked like a little boy lost," said Judge Alvarez. "He stared at the floor throughout the ceremony."

Alvarez called the ceremony "surprisingly without any passion. When I asked him if he'd take Lisa Marie for his lawfully wedded wife, he turned to me and said, `Why not?' When I pronounced him and Lisa Marie man and wife, he was reluctant to kiss her. She had to pull his face to hers to kiss him on the lips. There were no tears of happiness-no joy, no laughter. I felt I was presiding over a funeral-not a wedding."

The only enthusiasm Michael showed was for the judge's tie which depicted Fred Flintstone. "It's a great tie," Michael told him. "I love Fred Flintstone."

"Although he complimented my tie, I never heard him say he loved Lisa Marie," the judge claimed. Judge Alvarez was "loose-lipped" and informed a Dominican newspaper about details associated with the wedding. However, his observations were dismissed by the press at the time as "some of the most ridiculous rumors ever spread about Michael Jackson."

For their honeymoon, the couple retired to Casa de Campo in the south, a resort built by the now-defunct Gulf + Western. On their honeymoon night, Michael stayed in a villa on the grounds of the resort, with Lisa Marie occupying a less opulent lodging, known locally as a casita, some five miles away.

During the course of his wedding night, away from any potential interference from his bride, according to the staff, he placed a call to Elizabeth Taylor, informing her of the marriage. For reasons known only to herself, Elizabeth was said to have broken into tears. Sobbing, she is alleged to have said, "Michael, how could you? Her, of all people. She'll ruin your life!"

MJ and Lisa Marie

When confronted by a reporter two days later in Los Angeles, Elizabeth snapped, "That's the most ridiculous rumor I've ever heard. Michael Jackson is a sane and reasonable man. Marrying Lisa Marie Presley would be an insane act. He is not crazy!"

After their "wedding night,"

Lisa Marie and her new groom were seen leaving the Punta Aguila airport (which was renamed in 2000 as La Romana International Airport) in a private jet. Their flight plan listed their final destination as Los Angeles.

Lisa Marie

But instead of California, they landed in Orlando where Michael, in a Fu Manchu disguise, was seen escorting his new bride around Disney World.

After that, they flew to New York where Donald Trump housed them in a luxurious twelve-room complex on the 65th floor of the Trump Tower. The apartment normally rented for $125,000 a month, but its occupancy was presented as a gift to the newly married Jacksons. Obviously, Trump knew about the secret marriage, but wasn't talking. "I know how to keep a secret," he later said.

At the Trump Tower, photographer Dick Zimmerman snapped pictures of the newlyweds. In his review of the body language of the two subjects, writer Nick Bishop said: "In the photos, Michael and Lisa Marie are draped all over each other, but Michael's eyes are always focused on the camera. He plays exclusively for the lens. He touches Lisa Marie when they're draped all over each other, but he does it lightly and tentatively. She, on the other hand, is obviously into it. She touches Michael with real enthusiasm. She throws herself toward him. He merely leans into her, holding back, watching the camera."

During their honeymoon in Budapest, Michael was working on shooting a video for his new album, HiStory. On many a night, Lisa Marie was said to have eaten Hungarian goulash on her own.

When asked months later to comment on her marriage, Lisa Marie ducked the question. "Elvis liked to wear uniforms, so does Michael. Elvis loved amusement parks. My Daddy used to rent out Memphis's Liberty Land. Michael has his own amusement park."

Back in Los Angeles, Lisa Marie began married life by going to her own plastic surgeon. Press reports claimed that her "breasts looked perkier" when she recovered. She may also have had her thighs trimmed. Earlier she'd complained that child birth had caused her breasts to sag. As for her thighs, she told friends that they "looked like two blobs of Jell-O that Elvis was so fond of eating." She may also have had some acne scars removed.

In the aftermath of the wedding, Elizabeth Taylor invited Lisa Marie and Michael to her lush home in Bel Air. While strolling with Lisa Marie through her luxuriant gardens, Elizabeth reportedly advised her "to go for the diamonds. I never turned down emeralds either." When Lisa Marie told her she didn't like expensive jewelry, the world-class gem collector informed her, "Then put the gems in your safe for your old age. As Marilyn sang, `These rocks don't lose their shape.'" She also gave Lisa Marie a fashion tip. "Always find out what outfit Michael is wearing when he takes you out. Top him! Dress even more glamorously than he does."

Lisa Marie later reported Elizabeth's comments to Michael. "How retro this woman is. She belongs back in my daddy's heyday."

On August 1, 1994, Lisa Marie herself, through a press agent, announced that she had become "Lisa Marie Presley-Jackson." She promised to "dedicate my life to being the wife of Michael Jackson. We both look forward to raising a family and living a happy, healthy life together."

In her statement, she claimed that she was very much in love with Michael. She said that news of their marriage was kept a secret to avoid turning the "happy occasion into a media circus."

"People wouldn't think I was so crazy marrying Michael if they saw who the hell he really is," she said. "That he drinks and curses and is funny and doesn't have that high voice all the time. I once had this romantic idea that I could save him and we could save the world. But then I realized Michael was constantly at work, calculating, manipulating. He scared me like that."

From New York, Lisa Marie called her mother, Priscilla, in Los Angeles to tell her she'd married Michael. "Yup, I did it!" Lisa Marie said. Her mother's screams could be heard all the way from Los Angeles to the Trump Tower in New York. "Are you crazy?" It cannot be confirmed, but Priscilla was said to have called Michael a "black faggot." She was also alleged to have said, "Elvis will rise from his grave. In a life of making stupid decisions, you win the prize for this one. I can't believe you've made me the mother-in-law of Michael Jackson. Weirdo. Wacko Jacko. Just don't have any kids with him, not that I have to worry about that!"

When Lisa Marie slammed down the phone on Priscilla, she told her new husband, "I gave her the finger in marrying you."

Priscilla was distraught at the news. "Picture this, the former wife of Elvis Presley, and now today the mother-in-law of Michael Jackson. What a Thriller!"

In the days and weeks to come, Michael and Lisa Marie would make even more headlines, including one within a tabloid that proclaimed: THE CENTURY'S ODD COUPLE MARRIAGE!

After charges of child molestation were leveled against Michael, and in the wake of his marriage to Lisa Marie, John Evans, a reporter, wrote: "Priscilla Presley should know all about child molestation from her own life. After all, she was only fourteen when Elvis became smitten with her when he was stationed in Germany. She should identify with her new son-in-law. She is reported to have regular chemical peels to get rid of wrinkles and unwanted brown spots. Maybe she can give Michael tips about how to get rid of that alleged brown spot on his dick."

The media responded in a frenzy of headlines, The London Times calling the secret wedding, "A Marriage from Mars!" TV talk show host David Letterman evoked riotous laughter when he told his audience, "If he comes home with lipstick on his collar, you can be pretty sure it's his own."

The astrologer for The New York Daily News told her readers that "according to the stars, the marriage has not been consummated."

Bulletins were flashed around the world: The King of Pop had taken as his bride the daughter of the King of Rock 'n' Roll. "It wasn't really an interracial marriage," said a TV commentator (in Spanish) in Santo Domingo. "By now, all of us know that Michael Jackson is white."

One journalist went even further. "It could happen only in America. Michael Jackson was born a black boy. Now he's become a white woman. Does that make Lisa Marie a lesbian for marrying him?"

Bob Jones, Michael's publicist, alleged that, "the poor girl seemed genuinely smitten with Michael before she realized that she had been the victim of a heartless scam." He alleged that Michael's real intent in marrying Lisa Marie involved not only adding a "testosterone boost" to his soiled image, but a desire to gain control of the Elvis Presley songbook, evocative of the way he had secured copyrights to The Beatles' songs.

Michael, of course, would never own the complete Presley catalogue. However, unknown to many of Elvis's fans, Michael did own several of the Presley songs as part of his Sony/ATV Music Publishing Company.

Jones faced a public relations nightmare. Even though the press was not fully aware of all of Michael's activities, as they became in the years ahead, reporters knew enough to realize that this bizarre wedding smacked of a publicity stunt. Jones, fending off the vultures, said privately that he knew that Michael "had no desire for a woman-not the natural desires that straight men have."

As the press inquired deeper into how the pop star came to marry Lisa Marie, Michael said, "We were in my living room at Neverland having a glass of wine after we'd watched that old film All About Eve, with Bette Davis. We both love that movie. I just walked over to her, reached into my pocket, and pulled out a knock-you-dead diamond ring. `You wanna?' I asked her. Other than that, I never popped the question or got down on my knees."

When Michael was asked about the interracial aspects of his marriage to Lisa Marie, he said, "Somehow it seems appropriate. When Elvis was first heard on radio, listeners initially thought he was black."

The marriage was greeted with cynicism in the press, some commentators even suggesting that it was a business move to unite the music houses of Graceland and Neverland. A lavender marriage was suggested: That is, a marriage of convenience wherein one or both of the parties is trying to conceal the fact that one or both of them is gay.

Journalist Nick Bishop claimed that Michael entered into a marriage to Lisa Marie to combat charges of homosexuality with young boys. "Because Michael Jackson settled with the Chandlers, the perception of him on the street among many people is that he is a compulsive pedophile, a sexual addict in a way that most people find repellent. People these days often turn up their noses at the mention of his name. He is reviled by many and seen as decadent and deeply troubled. He didn't take his own marriage seriously and neither did anyone else with an IQ in the double digits. This move was clearly the old wedding bells as the ultimate sexual bearding trick, and of course it didn't work."

A PR agent privately said, "Michael Jackson married Elvis's daughter just to publicize his greatest hits album." He was referring to HiStory. "He needs all the help he can get with that album. I think most of his fans will desert him."

Jack Gordon, La Toya's husband, said that Michael had promised Lisa Marie a music career as a condition of her marrying him. He would never deliver on that promise. Gordon had other comments to make. "It's one thing to get married, but to Elvis's daughter was totally absurd. Something went wrong in that marriage, and Lisa Marie will soon be telling all. Michael will be destroyed."

Graceland

Comedian Dennis Miller cited the wedding as conclusive evidence that Elvis was not alive. "If Elvis were alive, he would have put the kibosh on it."

Weeks after news of Michael's marriage was made public, fans sent letters to him claiming, "You married the wrong Lisa Marie Presley. The woman you married is an imposter."

Had only one such letter arrived, it would have been ignored. But hundreds of letters had to be reckoned with. Some of Michael's aides set out to discover what the fuss was about and came up with the startling news that a young Swedish girl, Lisa Johansen, was filing claims that she was the real daughter of Elvis and Priscilla Presley.

Not only that, she was detailing her story within an autobiography, I, Lisa Marie: The True Story of Elvis Presley's Real Daughter. Her so-called memoirs would eventually be published in 1998 in China. Perhaps fearing legal action from the Presley empire, copies were published underground but surreptitiously sold in the United States and Britain.

In her tome, Lisa Johansen makes it rather clear that the real Lisa Marie Presley would not have married Michael Jackson.

According to Johansen, after the untimely death of Elvis when she was nine years old, the aspirant Lisa Marie was "whisked from an idyllic life in America to the obscurity of a comfortable exile in Scandinavia." She claimed that family members arranged this exile for her own safety, because there had been reports of kidnapping attempts. In Sweden, she lived with a kindly family and assumed a new identity as Lisa Johansen. According to instructions, recited to her at Graceland, she was to live in Sweden until she came of age and could take her "rightful place as the sole heir of a huge estate."

After reaching maturity, the Lisa living in Sweden attempted to reach across the Atlantic to Tennessee to claim her legacy as Elvis's daughter. She naively states in her book that she expected to be received by "a loving mother and friends eagerly awaiting her return to Graceland."

It took no prophet to predict that such would not be the case. Lisa claimed that at every turn she was blocked by "powerful and sinister forces." Along the way, the Lisa living in Sweden reported that she had been shocked when pictures "began to appear of an imposter, a young woman claiming to be Lisa Marie."

"Her public high jinks and questionable antics, and a circus-like marriage to controversial entertainment legend and paparazzi favorite, Michael Jackson, led millions of loyal fans of the late Elvis to question whether this person could be his real daughter," she said.

It is not known if Lisa Johansen has ever submitted to a DNA test to prove that she is actually Elvis's biological daughter. The young woman's odyssey to reclaim what she views as "my estate" has taken her into the courts and even to Graceland. Once there, she charged that representatives at Graceland, including Priscilla, had tried "to vacuum up every photograph depicting me with my father."

In one of her more blatant accusations, she charged that as a young girl she had been forced to submit to plastic surgery, a procedure that left "scars behind my ears. No one had cut off my fingers; but instead, they surgically altered and disfigured me, to keep me from being identified."

Reportedly, the Lisa Marie in Sweden continues to fight to this day to reclaim what she feels is rightfully hers. She concludes, "It is really not important what has gone before, and no matter what else happens in the future, I am who I am. I am the real Lisa Marie."

Michael Jackson and Elvis's daughter remained hot copy in the tabloids for months, as former staff members came forward to reveal behind-thescenes insights into the marriage. A former maid, Adrian McManus, even testified that she used a media broker to sell stories to the tabloids, including one which claimed inside knowledge of the star's sex life, or lack thereof, with Lisa Marie. Several staff members said Michael and his bride never slept in the same room, alleging that intercourse was not part of this marriage. McManus maintained that she never saw Lisa Marie enter her husband's bedroom.

Maids reported that Michael often left out expensive lingerie in his bedroom to make it appear that he was sleeping with Lisa Marie. It was also alleged that he'd bugged her bedroom and monitored her phone calls, the way his role model, Howard Hughes, used to do with Ava Gardner.

Another maid at Neverland said, "I have no doubt that Michael was still a virgin-at least with women-on the day he married Lisa Marie Presley. I am firmly convinced that he remained a virgin throughout his short marriage to her. I don't think they ever touched, except for one big kiss at a public event."

The marriage became fodder for late-night comedians. Jay Leno proclaimed that Michael and Lisa Marie stopped off in Austria after a trip to Budapest. With a smirk, Leno said, "Lisa Marie bought Michael a beautiful, beautiful wedding gift-the Vienna Boys' Choir."

An army of other sources-named or unnamed-could probably be summoned to claim that Michael never had sex with Lisa Marie during their entire marriage. The obvious conclusion is that no one really knows for sureexcept Lisa Marie and Michael. But whatever evidence there is suggests that even though Lisa Marie may have been momentarily infatuated with Michael, sexual play wasn't part of the equation.

"His new bride inherited the famous Presley lip curl," said journalist Peter Godsend. "Perhaps when Michael kisses his new bride, if he ever does, he fantasizes that he's kissing a young and handsome Elvis before the bloat."

Unlike most of his extended family, whom he could control financially, Michael could not dominate Lisa Marie by tightening the purse strings. In time, she would have far more money than he did.

To make himself appear wealthier in front of his new bride, Michael had his publicists exaggerate the terms of his contracts. For example, one-million dollars on paper became fifteen or twenty million dollars when reported in the press.

If reports are to be believed, Michael might not have wanted Lisa Marie, but he wanted to adopt her children, Danielle Riley and Benjamin. It is alleged that he offered their father, Danny Keough, $1 million if he'd allow Michael to adopt the children, but the offer was rejected.

In fact, Danielle Riley didn't want Michael to adopt her. Shortly after she met him for the first time, she ran away, screaming. She later told Lisa Marie, "He's weird, mother. You warned me about men like him. You said they'd offer me candy to go with them. The first time I met Michael, he offered me candy. Just like you said."

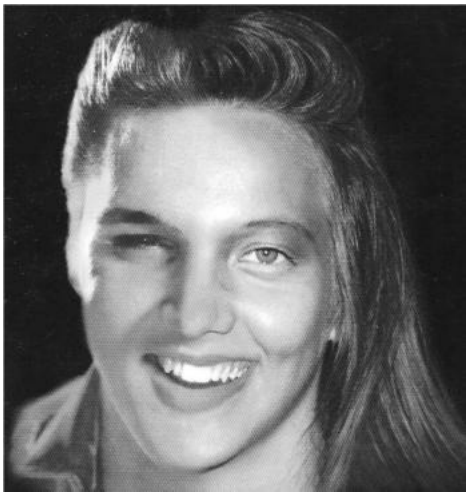
Michael resented Lisa Marie driving over to Encino without him to introduce herself to her in-laws at the Jackson compound. Lisa Marie became friends with Rebbie, the older sister, and also bonded with Janet. Michael told his staff that he didn't want Lisa Marie associating with her in-laws.

She and Michael couldn't agree on much, including food. Like her father, Lisa Marie preferred such soul food as collard greens in bacon fat, corn bread, Southern fried chicken, and sweet potato pie. Apparently, Michael preferred not to be reminded of his own humble origins, preferring a plate of steamed fresh organic vegetables from his own gardens at the ranch.

In one of their talks, according to a friend of Lisa Marie, Michael told her that "the ghost of Elvis haunts me. He's a white person with a black person's voice. I want to make films like he did-only good films, not bad films like he did. But I won't play Vegas. I'm offered millions but I won't perform in his old stamping ground. I'm bigger than Elvis. That's why I can't perform in Vegas."

Lisa Johansen: the real Lisa Marie Presley?

On another occasion, he told his wife, "Nobody in the music business understands me because I'm a genius. At least thousands of my fans understand that. But the people who control the industry don't give me my due because I'm black. So I decided to become white to get my due."



Lisa Johansen, in a photo montage, trying to prove her status as the daughter of Elvis Presley

Their first official appearance as man and wife came on September 8, 1994 at New York's Radio City Music Hall on the occasion of the 11th Annual MTV Video Music Awards. Before the world, Michael said, "Just think, nobody thought this would last." Then he grabbed Lisa Marie and gave her a lingering kiss in front of 250 million viewers on television. The next morning, one headline proclaimed: LIPLOCK PROVES MICHAEL JACKSON STRAIGHT SHOOTER.

An authority on body language, Maxine Fiel, claimed that it was "the performance of a lifetime." However, Fiel felt that Lisa Marie pursed her lips "like you do when you kiss your uncle, not your husband."

Lisa Marie had her own reaction. Before the applause died down, she walked off the stage and was seen wiping her mouth with the back of her hand. She later said, "I thought the kiss was stupid. I hated it. I felt used. All of a sudden, I've become part of a public relations campaign for Michael. What am I? Just some prop?"

From all reports, she felt that she'd been "callously used" to help her husband's seriously damaged public image. Her belief that she was being used for promotional purposes was soon reinforced. "It would be `come and meet me here,' and when I turned up there would be photographers everywhere."

Soon after, Michael asked Lisa Marie to join him in a video, entitled "You Are Not Alone" in which it would appear that Michael was genuinely attracted to women.

Within it appeared a provocative semi-nude scene of the two of them within a pink-and-lavender landscape inspired by the 1920s illustrator Maxfield Parrish. There have been many published reports that Michael showed his genitals in this video and that, prior to its release, a computer process blurred his privates.

That report was probably untrue. "There's no way that Michael's going to show his dick," said an employee of MTV who saw the original video. "He's spent a few million trying to get those nude pictures of himself returned from the Santa Barbara DA's safe to Neverland. He's never going to show the full monty to the world. Who do you think he is? Richard Gere?"

Eventually, writers Sean Kelly and Chris Kelly released a satirical parody of the Jackson/Presley union, entitled HERstory. Referring to them as "The Oz Couple," and configured as a faux diary that had supposedly been penned by Lisa Marie, it asked "How could a simple country girl hope to find happiness as the wife of a wealthy and talented extraterrestrial?"

Within the context of this so-called "diary," the Kellys have Lisa Marie writing:

Dear Diary,

I had an early call and we were on the set all day shooting the video for a song, You Are Not Alone. 'Here's a Polaroid." (Running immediately adjacent to the "diary entry" is a picture of the Jacksons semi-nude.) The contrived "diary" entry continues: Its supposed to be real and all so both of us were actually NAKED for hours rolling around on this bed in front of the cameras under these lights which made me hot in more ways than one (get it?). Although he was careful that I never got a real look at his famous Spotted Thing, I actually thought we might end up doing `it.' But at six o'clock Michael said cut, and I got up and put on my clothes and left.

The famous kiss

Security guards at Neverland reported that whenever Lisa Marie came to visit, she always left the property before midnight to drive her children back to their own $4 million home in Hidden Hills.

Even after the passage of many weeks, reporters continued to speculate about the state of the marriage. One particularly outrageous rumor making the rounds asserted that Michael wanted a child with Lisa Marie, and that he had a candidate in mind as the secret father. That candidate was Michael's long-time friend and traveling companion, Frank Cascio. Michael, according to the rumors, was committed to witnessing the moment of conception wherein Frank, without a condom, would penetrate Lisa Marie. Neither Lisa nor Michael ever commented on this outrageous rumor.

According to the staff member, Michael was "filled with anxiety and tension whenever Lisa Marie came to visit. He was particularly irritable on those days, and obviously didn't welcome her presence, especially when he was keeping boys in his room, which he continued to do even after the Jordie Chandler fiasco."

Occasionally they would talk, usually in the presence of others, as it seemed that Michael sometimes didn't want to be alone with his new wife.

He warned her that if she attempted a musical career, she would inevitably be compared to her father, perhaps unfavorably. "I think that there is that huge mountain to climb," she told him. "Oh, people always think about him when they think about me. There will always be some of that, and I must embrace it and understand it. I have to find a good balance between my own identity and the role of always being the daughter of Elvis Presley."

In one bizarre story that may have only the slimmest basis in truth, Michael was said to have promised Lisa Marie that he'd build a replica of Graceland in the greater Santa Barbara area. But then the pop star changed his mind. He came up with the idea of moving into the actual Graceland. To do that, however, he would have to get the approval of his mother-in-law, Priscilla, who runs the board that controls Graceland. "She would never have gone for that," reported a publicist.

When the married couple traveled to Memphis for a Pay-Per-View tribute concert to Elvis on October 8, 1994, they stayed at the Adam's Mark Hotel, but in separate suites. Michael even refused to visit Graceland, where he once said he wanted to live. When Priscilla asked him to perform as part of the evening's entertainment, reports say that he refused, declaring, "I'm not appearing on a bill with other singers, especially one called Dwight Yoakam." Priscilla later told friends in Memphis, "Lisa Marie is married to a jerk."

Within Michael's presence, Lisa Marie once spoke candidly about her role as one of the most famous offspring in music history. "I could capitalize off Elvis in a zillion cheesy ways. Just look at Natalie Cole for example. She raised daddy from the grave for a hit song. I might not be the greatest of singers, certainly no female Elvis, but I plan to bring a sense of my own identity to my music. I'm not going to go through life singing `Hound Dog' to a bunch of drunks at a night club in Memphis."

She also revealed that she and Michael talked about how hard it had been "growing up in a fish bowl. I'm not someone who desires or wants attention, and that's why I'm different from you," she told him. "I became famous the day I was born. But I've never been one of those people who run around, you know, walking every red carpet and going to every opening of every envelope, touting Presley perfumes and singing Elvis cover songs. I don't want attention."

Michael and Lisa Marie agreed to a joint appearance on ABC Television just before the release of his HiStory album. The host was a very friendly Diane Sawyer, who didn't ask the really tough questions. At the appointed time, Michael and Lisa Marie showed up at ABC with a phalanx of attendants, including attorney Johnnie Cochran.

"You Are Not Alone" video, Lisa Marie, left, and MJ

Eventually aired on June 14, 1995, the Sawyer interview took place on the old MGM set on the Sony Pictures lot in Culver City.

The world was watching as Michael and Lisa Marie faced Diana Sawyer on Prime Time Live. "I was seventeen," Michael said in a voice evocative of a little girl, "when I first met Lisa Marie. And she was seven."

It was obvious that they hadn't rehearsed their stories enough, since there were contradictions. Michael claimed that he'd kept in touch with her over the years. Lisa Marie said they had not been in contact.

At one point she said that children "won't leave him alone-they follow him into the bathroom." As claimed by some members of Michael's staff at Neverland, that even included young boys taking off their underwear and joining Michael in the shower. "Didn't it ever occur to Michael Jackson to lock the bathroom door if he wanted privacy from young kids?" a commentator asked after viewing the show.

Cynics had their tongue in their cheek when the couple discussed their dream of having children-something that would never happen. They even talked about leaving America, possibly moving to Switzerland. Lisa Marie denied that her marriage to Michael was one of convenience. "Why would I marry somebody I didn't love? I admire him, I respect him, and I love him. He's in the studio, I'm in the kitchen. We run around the same house and we're normal people. And we don't sleep in separate bedrooms." Actually, Lisa Marie was not being truthful. Michael's staff leaked news to the press that they not only slept in separate bedrooms, but in separate houses.

Michael also denied that the drawings made by Jordie Chandler matched police photographs of his genitalia. "There was nothing that matched me to those charges," Michael alleged. He was backed up by Lisa Marie, who said, "There was nothing."

When Michael told Sawyer that "The whole thing is a lie," he breached his confidential settlement with Jordie Chandler.

At one point the question-and-answer session went like this:

SAWYER: What is a thirty-six-year-old man doing sleeping with a twelve year-old boy or a series of them?

MICHAEL: Okay, when you say "boy, " its not just boys. I never invite just boys to come in my room. Thats ridiculous. And thats a ridiculous question. (The question was not ridiculous but rather pertinent, and Michael's answer was an obvious lie.)

MICHAEL: I guess you want to hear it, the answer I'll be happy to answer it. (He obviously was anything but happy.)

MICHAEL: I have never invited anyone into my bed, ever Children love me, I love them. They follow me, they want to be with me. But anyone can come in my bed-a child can come in my bed if they want. " (Critics, who mocked Jackson, later cracked, "I bet many a kid has cum in Michael's bed.")

Observers who had expected Sawyer to be confrontational later asserted that "she had all the fierceness of the Stay Puft Marshmallow Man."

A hesitant Sawyer was edging up to the big question of the night. "I didn't spend my life as a serious journalist to ask these kinds of questions, but I'm not oblivious to the fact that your fans have one question they most want ..."

With defiance on her face and disgust in her voice, Lisa Marie interrupted, "Do we have sex? Okay. Go ahead. Is that what you were going to ask? Yes! YES! Yes!"

Sawyer was called a "wimp" by Brad Dilford, a journalist, who later said that "Sawyer did not challenge Michael on any of his more questionable claims." Sawyer was also accused of several misstatements, including that Michael had been cleared on child molestation charges. Actually, the DA was officially keeping the case open until the statute of limitations would take effect in 1999.

On the show, Michael denied that the police in their raid on Neverland and on his secret condo had seized books with pictures of nude boys. The police, however, maintained that they did confiscate such materials.

United they stood

Actually, Michael left himself an out. When Sawyer asked if material depicting young, undressed boys had been found among his personal effects,

Michael replied, "No, not that I know of, unless people sent me things that I haven't opened."

In a review of the show, journalist Julene Snyder said, "Putting the two on live TV may have seemed like a good idea at the time, but it's hard to say which came across worse on camera. Lisa Marie quickly established herself as a tough, if inarticulate, cookie, who'd fit right in at a rundown trailer park. She is not now, nor has she ever been, a brain surgeon. Her quote in the current issue of Vibe magazine, which sports a nearly life-size headshot of hubby on the cover, starts off sweetly enough but quickly degenerates into a convoluted hiss of rage: `Michael is a true artist in every fact of his natureextremely aesthetic and very, very romantic. This is who he truly is despite degrading comments made in the past by certain larva. I can't wait for the day when all the snakes who have tried to take him out get to eat their own lunch and crawl back in the holes from which they came. We know who they are and their bluff is about to be called.'"

After the interview was aired, Tom Sneddon, the Santa Barbara DA who had been involved in the Jordie Chandler controversy, claimed that Michael had lied. "His statement on TV is untrue and incorrect and not consistent with the evidence in the case."

An enraged Evan Chandler witnessed the interview in which his son was virtually called a liar. Michael also claimed that the settlement is "not about all this crazy, outlandish money. No, it's not at all." There was no suggestion that the settlement was in the millions.

In the aftermath of the airing of the interview, Evan Chandler filed a $60 million lawsuit against Michael. In the suit he named not only Michael, but Lisa Marie Presley, Diane Sawyer, and ABC News. Attorneys for Lisa Marie eventually got her dropped from the suit, claiming that she had never been a party to the Chandler settlement. And eventually, a judge dismissed charges against Sawyer and ABC.

Matters were settled privately between Evan and Michael's lawyers. The terms would never be made public, but as regards the Chandler affair, Michael would never again utter a statement such as "the whole thing was a lie."

During the Sawyer interview, Lisa Marie had burst into anger when questioned about whether her Church of Scientology may have urged her to marry Michael, perhaps as a means of gaining a rich convert. "This is crap," she said. "I'm sorry. It's, like ridiculous. It's the most ridiculous thing I've ever heard. I'm not going to marry somebody for any reasons other than the fact that I've fallen in love with them. Period. And they can eat it if they want to think anything different!"

She has admitted that she was expelled from boarding school because of illegal drug abuse, especially cocaine. She later claimed "I got off drugs because of my religious conversion." When she was ten years old, she had a crush on the actor John Travolta. When meeting him for the first time, they developed a friendship in spite of their age differences. The actor is credited with encouraging her membership in the Church of Scientology, an organization to which her mother was already devoted.

Lisa Marie with her son, Benjamin, 2001

Lisa Marie did make an attempt to convert Michael to her cult religion, though he found some of her conspiracy theories bizarre, including the church's attempt to link Adolf Hitler to the psychiatric profession. Tom Cruise might have fallen for that, but not Michael.

Lisa Marie's attempts to convert Michael to Scientology failed miserably, in ways that reflected Priscilla's earlier (failed) attempts to involve Elvis. Lamar Fike, one of Elvis's cronies, claimed that he was with Elvis when he visited the Scientology Center in Los Angeles. Elvis went in and talked to church leaders. When he came out, Elvis said, "Fuck those people! There's no way I'll ever get involved with that son-of-a-bitchin' group. All they want is my money." According to Fike, "Elvis stayed away from Scientology like it was a cobra. He'd shit a brick to see how far Lisa Marie's gotten into it."

On the Sawyer show, Lisa Marie claimed she was sharing Michael's bed at Neverland. Actually, following the show, she left for Hawaii and a family vacation with her ex-husband Danny and her two children. They shared a suite on the Big Island. Her publicist maintained that Lisa Marie was involved in a "family reunion trip. They're the best of friends."

That was evident to guests of the 3,200-room Mauna Lani Bay Resort who saw her walking about the gardens, holding hands with Danny and kissing.

Whenever Lisa Marie came back to Neverland, she inevitably got into an argument with Michael. It became obvious that this surreal marriage was heading for the divorce courts. Michael went "ballistic" when little Benjamin accidentally pulled off his wig. In anger, Lisa Marie took her children and fled from Neverland, vowing never to return.

In August of 1995, when Lisa Marie was spilling her woes to Priscilla, her mother urged her to "Dump the jerk! You should never have married the selfish bastard in the first place. Come to your senses and kick this freak out before these allegations of child molestation taint you too." For a change, Lisa Marie decided to take her mother's advice, even though it would take her a few months.

It was obvious to the entire staff that Lisa Marie's days at Neverland were numbered. She was particularly incensed when she learned that Michael was planning to build a villa on the grounds of Neverland to house Macaulay Culkin. Her patience with Michael and his obsessions with boys was running out. Constantly she complained that she was living in a zoo, with screaming children racing about with no one to discipline them.

Michael confronted her with evidence from a private investigator he'd hired to tail her. The detective reported on "many liaisons with Danny" which had taken place throughout the course of her marriage to Michael. Lisa Marie allegedly screamed back at him, "I had to get it from somebody."

In anger, Michael deserted his "fairytale marriage" and flew to Europenot with Lisa Marie but with his eternal favorites, Eddie Cascio, now 11, and Frank Cascio, a ripe 15. The trio was seen at Euro Disney.

Lisa Marie had also flown out of Los Angeles, heading for another reunion with Danny in Hawaii and another "family vacation." All she would say to reporters was, "I'm a chip off the old block. Elvis liked Hawaii too." Privately she told friends, "Danny and I are soul-mates who should never have split. He's the father of my children."

Holding hands with Danny once again right in the lobby of their hotel in front of other guests, they were talking about getting back together again, discussing Lisa Marie's upcoming divorce from her "non-husband." A plan was set into motion in Hawaii.

At the release of HiStory, Michael made a number of commitments, which for reasons of his own he decided not to honor. One involved an HBO special, One Night Only, that had promised to rope in a global audience of some two-hundred-fifty million viewers.

During rehearsals for the HBO event, Michael collapsed. By ambulance he was rushed to Beth-Israel Medical Center where doctors reportedly found an "irregular heartbeat and dehydration."A newspaper the next morning asked a provocative question-"Dehydration? Doesn't he drink enough Pepsi?" The answer to that was that he drank no soft drinks at all.

Michael, however, resisted his advisers when they urged him to allow Lisa Marie into his hospital room. He relented when told that his refusal to see her would be a disastrous public relations move. Among the other visitors rally ing to his side was Diana Ross.

Consequently, Lisa Marie was allowed to call on Michael at the hospital to discuss the terms of their impending divorce. Michael agreed to a payment of $15 million, but in exchange for that, he wanted some sort of guarantee that Lisa Marie would not speak about their marriage. . .ever. He most definitely didn't want her writing a tell-all autobiography. "I'm far too young to record my life," she responded. In addition, she asked for ten percent of the royalties on Michael's HIStory album, which he conceded.

The actual terms of the divorce would be ridiculed across America. On the Tonight Show, host Jay Leno quipped, "This is going to get ugly. According to divorce lawyers, you know, Lisa Marie is entitled to half of all the noses Michael acquired."

According to a nurse, who overheard the famous pair fighting, part of their argument involved their continuing debate over Danny. Michael, apparently, still had his private investigator following them. Not only that, but having bugged her private quarters at Neverland, where she stayed only during daylight hours, he claimed that on several occasions he had heard her having "phone sex" with Danny. He confronted her with this, and she responded in fury, enraged not so much by the fact that Michael knew details associated with her involvement with her former husband, but because of the fact that her phone had been bugged.

Lisa Marie denounced Michael in his hospital bed, accusing him of having spent their marriage "locked up in his bedrooms with young boys," instead of trying to be a husband to her. Often when Lisa Marie had called Neverland, he refused to take her calls. But she learned from the maid, Adrian McManus, that if Frank Cascio called, he was to be connected immediately.

At some point during that dialogue at the hospital, Michael ordered Lisa Marie from his room. In the corridor, a nurse overheard her shouting, "I'm outta here. And I'm not coming back."

In the wake of her split from Michael, Lisa Marie began to get her life together again. She spent more time with her children and saw a lot more of Danny. There was talk of a remarriage after her divorce from Michael. Danielle and Benjamin were happy to have daddy back home again. But impulsively Lisa Marie fell for her tall, blond bodyguard, Luke Watson, and Danny was out the door once again.

Lisa Marie made an appearance at the 12th annual MTV Awards on September 7, 1995 at Radio City Music Hall, the setting of their infamous kiss a year before. This time she sat through her husband's appearance. She'd not seen him in two months. She watched him grab his crotch and seemed disgust ed. "Elvis would never have been so tasteless," she later said. Before the curtain went down, she'd mysteriously exited the theater to avoid paparazzi and her husband.

Lisa Marie later said that "the last straw" in her marriage to Michael came when he gave an interview to TV Guide, claiming that she'd told him that Elvis had had a nose job. "This is bullshit!" his daughter charged. "And all this from a guy who claims he's had only two nose jobs."

On January 18, 1996, in Los Angeles Superior Court, citing "irreconcilable differences," Lisa Marie at the age of 27 filed for divorce from her husband, Michael, who had turned 37. In her petition, Lisa Marie Presley-Jackson also called for the restoration of her original name, dropping the Jackson from it. A sexless, loveless marriage of twenty troubled months was coming to a notoriously publicized ending.

"The divorce was more predictable than the marriage," said Memphis music critic Stanley Booth.

Journalist Karen Schoemer summed it up: "No more strangely unwarm hand-holdings, no more endless speculation over whether they did or whether they didn't. No more prime time TV interviews with the two of them sitting stiff and pretty as alabaster statues, trying to convince the world of their deep love for one another when they barely seemed able to make eye contact. It wasn't the romance of the century, but it was the kind of twisted royal wedding our celebrity-glutted minds deserved."

On January 19, The New York Post said it all: JACKO GETS THE SACKO!

When the news of the divorce was reported in the press, it was revealed that Lisa Marie's petition to the court was a "basic, boilerplate, bare-bones document that leaves virtually all options open," at least according to her Beverly Hills attorney, Douglas Bagby. "She reserved the right to address community property issues and other asset concerns at a later date, to ask that Jackson pay her attorney fees, and to state her assets at a later time," said journalist Janet Gilmore.

"The marriage was a mere publicity stunt," said a member of Michael's staff, who refused to be named. "On Michael's part, he was trying to distract attention from the child abuse allegation. As for Lisa Marie, what was she thinking? She must have been `All Shook Up.'"

Lisa Marie, in calling it quits, admitted that her marriage to Michael occurred during "a moment of madness." The world agreed with her, especially Priscilla.

Staff members at Neverland reported that they had heard Michael screaming at Lisa Marie, "Your fame comes from DNA. I'm the genuine star."

In public, at least, Lisa Marie had steadfastly maintained Michael's inno cence in child molestation. Yet Rick Stanley, the stepbrother of Elvis, claimed that she confessed to him that she'd come upon videotapes at Neverland that "caused me great distress." She refused to discuss the exact nature of those tapes, but Stanley alleged that she learned "the sick truth about Michael and did indeed know that her husband had an unusual interest in young boys."

Lisa Marie later told a friend, "I feel deep guilt over my marriage to Michael. I brought shame on my father. I suppose that's why I'm having these awful dreams."

The story of Lisa Marie's involvement with the Jackson family did not end with her divorce from Michael. Gossips began speculating about the intriguing possibilities when Lisa Marie in 1998 began "dating" Janet Jackson. They were spotted at such New York clubs as Life, allegedly embracing and even kissing. This does not necessarily prove a lesbian involvement. Janet, for years, has been known for what some have termed her excessive embracing and loving "fondling" of her friends, and Lisa Marie was no exception. A waiter at one club claimed that the famous pair had been spotted "with their tongues down each other's throats," but this is only heresay and can't be verified.

When asked about her emerging new friendship with Janet, Lisa Marie, according to some reports, claimed that she was helping Janet get back into shape for her Velvet Rope road tour. It's true that Janet's weight at the time had ballooned by forty-five pounds. Although on most occasions she has a "sex kitten" figure, she could, during bouts of depression, become bloated, much to the delight of the paparazzi who seemed to know whatever fast-food hamburger joint she happened to have patronized during the previous week.

On many occasions during their joint forays into the world at large, Lisa Marie and Janet wore disguises, but they were often recognized in spite of their efforts to conceal their identities. They were seen shopping on Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills and on Fifth Avenue in New York. They went to offBroadway plays together, and "like two ladies who lunch," according to a waiter, were seen together at a swank Manhattan eatery. Their club nights were much wilder, particularly as the evening moved toward the early morning hours.

Lisa Marie was the star guest at Janet's launch party for her seventh album, The Velvet Rope.

Elvis's daughter warmly embraced Janet when she seemed near tears after one of Michael's fans thrust a review at her. In the review, a music critic claimed, "Janet Jackson is a failed cloning experiment, with all of Michael's foibles and bizarre personal quirks but none of the musical or visual talent."

Lisa Marie not only consoled her former sister-in-law, but accepted her invitation to be her "date" at the upcoming MTV Awards.

When reports of this strange friendship reached Michael, he was furious, fearing that Lisa Marie was using these occasions to gossip about him to his sister. "Who knows the tales she'll tell about me," Michael was reported to have said.

Lisa Marie sent word to Michael, via Janet, that as a devotee of Scientology she had been taught "not to hold anger in my heart." In a card to her former husband, she scribbled, "All is forgiven." A friend of Lisa Marie's claimed that she once told her, "Who wouldn't want to hang out with Frank Cascio-that's one hot man." That alleged quote cannot be verified.

After their divorce, Michael tried to mend his broken friendship with Lisa Marie, and she eventually accepted an invitation to join him on his HiStory tour in both London and South Africa.

In Johannesburg, Lisa Marie told friends that she hoped to spend some quality time with Michael as a means of re-establishing a relationship with him-"strictly as friends," she hastened to add.

But in South Africa, she was disappointed to find Michael spending all his free time with a young boy from Norway, who appeared to be only thirteen years old if that. "All I remember about the kid is that he was cute and was never seen without a red baseball cap, a gift from Michael," Lisa Marie said. At the time the press was unaware of the identity of this boy. In time both photographs and his real name would be revealed. In South Africa, Michael-and only when forced to do so-introduced him as his "nephew."

Once again Lisa Marie allowed herself to become a "prop" in a photo opt for Michael when she accepted an invitation to be photographed with him, along with her two children, at a tribal ceremony that took place in the seedy town of Phokeng, some ninety miles to the north of Johannesburg. At the time he was deep into his second marriage, and Michael shocked the world when he appeared with Lisa Marie on his arm. That naturally led to press speculation that the ill-fated duo were getting back together.

Back in Los Angeles, Debbie Rowe, Michael's new wife, reportedly said, "If Michael Jackson [she always referred to him by his full name] wants to date his ex-wife, and I want to date my ex-boyfriend, that is nobody's business but our own."

Under the shade of a red-and-white umbrella at least five feet wide, Michael arrived at the tribal ceremony like a king for his induction into a tribe known as the Bafokeng Ka Bakwena ("People of the Crocodile"). With some 325,000 members, the tribe was not among the poor and needy of Africa, as they owned the second-largest platinum reserve on earth.

On hearing of Lisa Marie's adventures in South Africa with her ex-husband, one underground columnist in Hollywood wrote: "Lisa Marie is back with Michael while still dating Janet. The next thing you'll read in this column is that Elvis's daughter is having a three-way with Jermaine and La Toya. I wouldn't put it past this `Hound Dog!'"

Even after her friendships with Janet and Michael had cooled, throughout the rest of her life Lisa Marie would be plagued with probing questions about her marriage to Michael.

On The Howard Stern Show, the host asked her to describe Michael's genitalia. She refused. She did answer Stern's question about whether she had "dabbled with chicks?"

"Just one," she said. "It's not like I haven't had an urge, but I just . . . I like to keep it at bay."

In a candid conversation with Playboy, she claimed that her preference in sex was "porn style-I am a little dark on the subject. I like it rough, the way they do things in porn movies."

In trying to explain her association with Michael to Playboy-of all magazines-Lisa Marie said, "Yes, there was a physical attraction. He's not sexually seductive, but there is something riveting about him."

If attorney Johnnie Cochran is to be believed-and after the O.J. Simpson trial there remains much doubt as to his veracity-Lisa Marie made an astonishing call to him one night. Reached in New York, he came to the phone to hear the distraught young woman pleading for his intervention in getting Michael back.

"I don't want him gone from my life," Cochran later quoted Lisa Marie as saying. "I know the marriage didn't work out. But we didn't give it a chance. I think I could make him love me. But to do that, you've got to prevent his marriage to that nurse."

Cochran promised to intervene on her behalf. But he told friends in New York that there was really nothing he could do. "Michael wanted someone to make babies for him, and Debbie Rowe seems willing. Lisa Marie wanted romance. Something, in my opinion, I believe she would never have gotten from Michael. I can't believe that after completely ignoring her during the marriage that she could even entertain the idea of wanting him back. She never had him in the first place. Personally, I think it was just one of those crazy ideas that occurs to young people in the middle of the night. Lisa Marie is smart enough to know that the marriage was doomed from the start. Or was she? I know why Michael married her. The reasons were selfish. The question remains, why did she marry him? She's got all the money in the world. Everyone who surrounded Michael wanted his money, Lisa Marie could buy and sell her husband. Surely she didn't want Michael for sex? Not that! Oh, please, never that!"

In 2003, six years after Lisa Marie filed for divorce, stories about the Jackson/Presley relationship were still generating headlines. It was reported that Michael was trying to reunite with Lisa Marie as a means of retaining custody of his three children.

After divorcing Michael, Lisa Marie drifted from relationship to relationship until she finally fell in love with actor Nicolas Cage, marrying him on August 10, 2002. Michael learned that their relationship was tempestuous, even though they would not finally divorce until May 26, 2004. In the months that preceded Lisa Marie's divorce from Cage, it was reported that Michael wanted to reactivate the Jackson/Presley alliance.

As reported in the press at the time: "Jackson wants to re-marry Lisa Marie, who divorced her husband, actor Nicolas Cage," one account stated. "Jackson apparently believes he has a better chance of evading an investigation into his suitability as a father-promoted by his dangling of baby Prince Michael II over the balcony of a German hotel last month-if he is in a stable relationship."

It is not known if Michael actually proposed to Lisa Marie again. But when hearing reports of this potential offer, she was alleged to have said, "I won't be used again!"

In March of 2003, during the course of a particularly candid interview , Lisa Marie-rather unconvincingly-maintained that she did have sex with the pop king. She said that "he was just a normal guy" underneath his eccentric exterior. Reporter Phil Blackman said that "surely Lisa Marie is putting us on with that comment."

She also said that she was "smitten with Michael until the relationship turned ugly at the end. I absolutely fell in love with him. He was just a typical man when I began to date him." Again Blackman found her statement difficult to swallow. "How, even on the darkest night, could she really believe that Michael Jackson by any stretch of the imagination was a typical man? Maybe after having Elvis for a father, Michael Jackson might have been typical but I doubt that."

When Lisa Marie eventually got around to releasing her debut album on April 8, 2003, on Capitol Records, she did it on her own without Michael's help. Bought mostly by Elvis fans, To Whom It May Concern reached number 5 on Billboards Top 200 albums chart. When Michael first heard her album, he referred to it as having been sung by "a brawny collection of Sheryl Crowish pop rockers."

During her promotion of her album, in references to her previous marriage, Lisa Marie said that she felt "powerless." "I was part of a machine. I saw things going on that I couldn't do anything about. Don't ask me what sort of things, because I'm not going to answer. But just stuff."

In an interview with Rolling Stone, she claimed that "I never thought for a moment that someone like him could actually use me for a reason like that. It never crossed my mind, and I don't know why-I'm sure it crossed everybody else's."

At the same time, she admitted that she was "terrified" when her husband kissed her on the mouth at the opening of the 1994 MTV Video Music Awards. "That was not my idea, by the way." When asked if Michael was trying to prove that he was straight by kissing her, she said, "Yeah, but again, I wasn't looking at it like that. See, if I had been, that wouldn't have happened."

When asked in 2004 how she felt about Michael, she claimed, "It's really bizarre. I feel nothing."

Her second album, Now What? in 2005 reached number 9 on Billboard's pop charts and was certified gold. Unlike her first album, Now What? included a parental advisory sticker.

In March of 2005, as a means of promoting her album, Lisa Marie appeared on The Oprah Winfrey Show. "Do you think that he loved you as much as he could?" the talk show diva asked Elvis's daughter in regards to Michael.

"Yes, as much as he was capable of loving somebody," she said. Oprah then asked if Lisa Marie felt that Michael had used her. "All signs point to yes on that. I can't answer for him." On the show she admitted that she felt uncomfortable talking about Michael. "This seat is hot!" she said. Later she told the Associated Press that Michael was the "most toxic" of her many relationships. "I don't want to bash him. I don't hate him. I don't have any of that going on."

No great fan of her former son-in-law, Priscilla also spoke to Oprah on camera, suggesting that Michael may have used her daughter in the hopes that Lisa Marie would have his children. "That would ensure his connection to Elvis's legacy," she claimed. "There's something very calculating and manipulative about how he does things."

For reasons known only to herself, Lisa Marie continued to issue bizarre statements about Michael that "the whole world knows aren't true," in the words of one reporter. He was referring to her comment about her ex-husband's second marriage to Debbie Rowe. "With me, Michael did redeem himself in the end and things are better between us now. It was not a fun time for either of us. He's happily married and has a baby coming now, which is great!" Lisa Marie's claims of Michael's "happy" second marriage brought ridicule in press offices around the country.

As Elvis's only recognized child, she inherited his entire estate when she turned thirty. In August of 2005, she sold 85 percent of the estate's business holdings to CKX, Inc., excluding Graceland itself.

Although long since divorced, Michael still followed the career and activities of Lisa Marie, learning that in February of 2006 she had married Michael Lockwood in a ceremony in Kyoto, Japan. She was thirty-eight at the time. It was her fourth marriage. The best man was Lisa Marie's first husband, Danny Keough. Michael was not invited to the wedding.

Lisa Marie's final word on both her marriage to Michael and to "hothead" Nicolas Cage was, "I was really into this lioness thing with Michael and wanted to protect him," she claimed. "How could I be so naive? One needs to protect oneself from Michael."

"As for Nick, we're both so dramatic and dynamic that when it was good, it was unbelievably good, and when it was bad, it was just a fucking bloody nightmare for everybody," she said. "If you lined up all the men I've been with in a row, you'd think that I was completely psychotic."

Neither Nicholas Cage nor Michael had any comment about Lisa Marie's remarks.

On the website, "NNDB: Tracking the Entire World," the sexual orientation of Lisa Marie is listed as "bisexual," her occupation, "relative."

During the course of his marriage to Lisa Marie, in the wake of the Jordie Chandler out-of-court settlement, Michael found himself embroiled in yet another lawsuit. In December of 1994, in a "wrongful termination" suit, five former employees, including Michael's maid, Adrian McManus, filed a lawsuit against the star and seven members of his staff. The suit charged that the employees were repeatedly subjected to retribution for their agreeing to help Santa Barbara authorities with the criminal investigation of Michael and for their testimony before a grand jury.

Joining McManus in the suit were security officers Kassim Abdool and his assistants, Ralph Chacon and Melanie Bagnall, one of the few women who worked in security. The final plaintiff was longtime office manager, Sandy Domz.

In Michael's opinion, his staff "had been only too willing to cooperate with the grand jury." For doing that, the former Neverland employees cited "a pattern of intentional, willful, and malicious conduct designed to threaten and intimidate" them. The plaintiffs also charged that they had been threatened with bodily injury, even subjected to death threats. It was also revealed that Neverland security forces had installed an elaborate "Gestapo-like" system of wiretapping, and that Michael himself often eavesdropped on the personal calls of his employees.

One Neverland employee charged that the "surveillance equipment at Neverland was so intricate, as was the telephone-tapping system, that the CIA should hire Jackson's OSS officers," a reference to the special force-known within Neverland as the Office of Special Services-that Bill Bray, Michael's most devoted employee, had brought to Neverland to "protect Michael from all harm."

All three of the female plaintiffs charged that the OSS officers had subjected them to sexual harassment. McManus also claimed that one of the officers "threatened to slice my throat if I ever revealed Michael's private life to the press."

The plaintiffs never revealed exactly what they told the grand jury, but their testimony was believed to have been devastating in the Chandler vs. Jackson case. Abdool said that he, along with his aide, Ralph Chacon, delivered a jar of Vaseline to Michael's suite. It was not explained why Abdool's assistant, Chacon, delivered that one jar of Vaseline. Chacon reported that he saw "two young boys" in the room with Michael, before he took the jar and slammed the door in their faces.

Sandy Domz had gone so far as to call the Santa Barbara County Sheriff's Department to reveal that "illegal wiretaps" were being carried out at Neverland. In September of 1994, the employees, claiming they could no longer tolerate the harassment and intimidation at the ranch, quit their jobs.

It wasn't until shortly before Christmas of 1994 that they found an attorney, Michael Ring, in Santa Barbara who would take their case. In the suit, Michael was charged along with his employees, specifically Bill Bray, but also James Van Norman, Jerome Johnson, Tony Coleman, Andrew Merritt, Bettye Bailey, and Marcus Johnson (no relation to Jerome).

In his defense of the Neverland employees, Ring faced a battery of the highest paid attorneys in California, the firm of Katten Muchin Zavis & Weitzman.

Their case may have been lost shortly after it began, when Judge Zel Canter ruled that any evidence from the Jordie Chandler civil case would not be permitted in court. Since the plaintiff's entire case depended on the harassment they were allegedly subjected to during the Chandler case, the die was cast. The trial, which was a disaster from the beginning, would slog onward from September 15, 1996 to March 17, 1997.

Lisa Marie on Oprah's infamous couch

Michael's defense team suffered a near-mortal blow when Jerome Johnson, one of the co-defendants, seemingly switched sides during pre-trial hearings, claiming that he backed up the allegations of the former Neverland employees. As an elite member of the OSS, Johnson said that his sole job was to apply "pressure on the staff by harassing them." Johnson filed an official decla ration with the court, backing up the allegations of the "Neverland Five," even though they were suing him. Privately, he told a reporter that he was deeply religious and "I can no longer participate in the lies of Michael Jackson. I can't sleep at night thinking about what I have done for Jackson."

In April of 1995, Jerome Johnson, for "his act of betrayal," was terminated at Neverland after seven years of employment there. In addition, Michael's lawyers cut Johnson loose from the case, leaving him with no lawyer until he hired the defense attorney, Charles Matthews.

On January 24, 1996, a blackmail note was delivered to Michael's business office, demanding that $7 million be wired to a bank account in San Francisco. Each plaintiff was quizzed to see if he or she had sent the note. All of them testified that they did not. Judge Zel Canter ordered that a DNA swab be taken from each participant in the case. According to court reporter Diane Dimond, a match came back. Apparently, the envelope that contained the note had been licked by the wife of Jerome Johnson.

In 1996, when Johnson appeared at the trial, something akin to despair showed on the faces of the plaintiffs. Apparently because of the incriminating note, Johnson pleaded the Fifth Amendment and refused to repeat or validate any of his earlier testimony-testimony that had verified the claims of the plaintiffs. After this setback, it became increasingly obvious that the plaintiffs' case against Michael Jackson was lost.

Even so, reporters were astonished at the verdict. Michael was found innocent of all charges. But in a countersuit the star had filed against these employees, they were ordered by the court to pay one and a half million dollars to Michael for various transgressions. McManus, for example, was charged with "stealing souvenirs from the ranch for resale to Jackson fans." Having no money to pay the judgment, the plaintiffs filed for bankruptcy.

After the case, one juror, who refused to give his name, said, "Most of us on the jury, with one notable exception, were very impressed with Michael's talent and his stardom. It was hard to throw the book against him. Some of us felt that he'd suffered enough humiliation-not to mention losing millionsin that Jordie Chandler case we'd all heard about. Most of the plaintiffs struck us as disgruntled former employees hoping to catch a free ride on the gravy train."

Disgruntled employees at Neverland were not the only ones hoping to catch a ride on the MJ gravy train. Victor M. Gutierrez, an investigative journalist living in Los Angeles in 1995, wrote the most sensational book ever written about Michael. It was called Michael Jackson Was My Lover, and it was reported to be The Secret Diary ofJordie Chandler.

The story came to the attention of America when Gutierrez appeared that year on Hard Copy, the TV show. On the air, he claimed that he knew of a videotape containing footage of Michael Jackson molesting a boy.

Nicolas Cage with Lisa Marie, circa 2001

His source allegedly was "the mother" (unnamed) of the young boy. It was rumored that the child was Jason Francia, the son of Michael's former maid, Blanca Francia. Later Gutierrez reportedly told the National Enquirer that his source had been Margaret Maldonado, who had been married to Jermaine. On hearing of the rumor that her son, Jeremy, was filmed having sex with Michael, Maldonado threatened to bring a lawsuit against the National Enquirer if the paper ran the story. "I will end up owning the paper," she threatened.

Hard Copy correspondent Diane Dimond did report the allegations, though the National Enquirer never published the story. Gutierrez had told Dimond that he'd seen a "27-minute video of the King of Pop in a compromising position with a boy." The Hard Copy reporter later repeated those allegations on a Los Angeles TV station.

In retaliation, Michael issued a $100 million slander suit against both Gutierrez and Hard Copy. An investigation into the matter revealed no copy of the video to back up the journalist's claim.

At one point the writer claimed that Elizabeth Taylor and Gil Garcetti, the Los Angeles County District Attorney, could verify the existence of the videotape. Of course, they could not and did not. On October 15, Judge Reginald Dunn ruled that the story was false and that Gutierrez had "acted with malice" and was therefore liable for presumed and punitive damages. On October 15, 1996, the jury awarded Michael $2.7 million in the slander suit, and Gutierrez filed for bankruptcy in October of 1997.

"Jurors told us that they not only wanted to compensate Mr. Jackson and punish Victor Gutierrez, but to send a message that they are tired of tabloids lying about celebrities for money," Michael's attorney, Zia Modabber, told the Associated Press.

In April 14, 1999, Modabber spoke to the press once again. "Unfortunately, anybody can walk into a courthouse with a couple of hundred dollars and file a lawsuit. It doesn't take any more than that. And if you hap pen to be suing Michael Jackson or any other celebrity for that matter, you are going to find yourself all over TV. You can tell the whole world about your scandalous accusations and people are going to listen to you."

Gutierrez fled to Chile and wrote his book Michael Jackson Was My Lover. It was published in Santiago, Chile, in March of 1996, with a subsequent second edition printed in January of 1997. It was subsequently banned from sale in the United States, and as such, the "tell all" has become a highpriced collector's item.

The book was illustrated with very intimate private photographs of young Jordie, even of the bed where Evan Chandler found his son sleeping with Michael in a sexual position. Candid photographs of Jordie's naked torso were also published under the caption, "Jackson's Taste." One photograph displays what are purported to be five pairs of underwear worn by Jordie, both boxer and jockey shorts. Gutierrez alleges that "the singer kept these in his room, including some with shit and urine stains."

In the book, private documents not previously available to the public were also published, even the drawing that Jordie drew during the sexual abuse scandal that depicted the boy committing suicide by jumping off a building. It is not known how Gutierrez obtained these documents, which included some of Evan Chandler's handwritten notes to his attorney, Barry Rothman. The authenticity of these documents has never been challenged.

The most controversial diagram is a sketch of Michael's penis which was drawn by Jordie and presented to his father on October 24, 1993 at 11:45pm. The boy, staying up late that night, even dated the time of submission. The following morning, after studying the sketch, which included notes about "spots and marks" on Michael's body, Evan Chandler turned his son's document over to the police. It is not known how this secret document became available to Gutierrez, but it did, and he subsequently published a replica of it in his book.

In his author's acknowledgements, Gutierrez thanks many people whom he alleges contributed to the book, including two of Michael's former maids, Blanca Francia and Adrian MacManus. He also thanks such formerly intimate friends of Michael as Wade Robson and even detectives of the Sheriff's Department of Santa Barbara and officials and detectives of the Child Abuse Unit of the LAPD.

Despite the controversy raging around them, Gutierrez's book and its illustrations are far too detailed and "insiderish" to be easily dismissed. It is obvious that Gutierrez had inside knowledge culled from many sources. It's also obvious that he secured documents and illustrations not available to other journalists and biographers.

In the book Gutierrez draws some shocking conclusions:

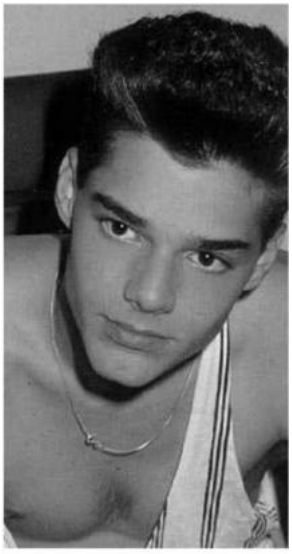
Jackson loved Jordie. The King of Pop had had sexual relations with many children, but Jordie was special. Jordie was his lover his companion. He desired him physically and couldn't be separated from him. He was his top priority, his life, the only person he wanted close to him. Thats why he told Jordie "I've never gone so far sexually with a boy as I have with you. " Jordie felt the same. He was attracted to his friend, his idol, and lost his virginity, so to speak, with him. He enjoyed sex with his fiend. He received his friend's attention, care and gifts.

As late as April of 2005, Michael Jackson Was My Lover: The Secret Diary ofJordie Chandler was still making news. Karma Longworth reported that Fenton Bailey and Randy Barbato of "World of Wonder," the production company behind films that included Inside Deep Throat and The Eyes of Tammy Faye, had optioned Gutierrez's book for the movies.

The Spanish language edition of the book, unlike the English version, contained a description of Michael's "alleged inappropriate dalliance with singer Ricky Martin," according to Longworth.

Months after the event, it was revealed that the raid on Neverland had turned up two trunks filled with pictures of young Ricky Martin.

In the Spanish language version appears a statement that was translated into English as follows: "Amongst the photographs confiscated by the police during the raid [a reference to the first raid on Neverland], the detectives found some of an unidentifiable Hispanic boy. Later they discovered that they were of Ricky Martin, the singer and ex-member of the band, Menudo, who is now an actor on the North American soap opera General Hospital. Even though the photographs of the now-actor were taken from magazines and promotional stills, they sufficiently indicate a liking towards the exmember of Menudo."



Ricky Martin

There is no evidence that Ricky Martin, as a member of Menudo or as a successful solo singer of such hits as "Livia' La Vida Loca," ever had a relationship of any kind with Michael.

Rumors about Martin's sexual preference have appeared frequently in the press, but Martin has denied charges of homosexuality.

Martin joined the Latin boy group, Menudo, in 1984 at the tender age of twelve, when he first came to Michael's attention.

The police concluded that the then-minor, Martin, "never reached the point of knowing Jackson." In an interview, the singer was asked about the photographs found at Neverland. He indicated his surprise but admitted that he had always thought "that the King of Pop had a platonic liking towards me." At one point Michael invited the Menudo boys for some photographs but Martin claimed that he was not a member of the group yet. "When I did join the group, I was fully aware that Jackson liked Menudo. But I never would have thought that this man would have kept photographs of me when I was a young boy. The police never contacted me, because I never knew Jackson."

Although no one has successfully linked Martin sexually with Michael, the Puerto Rican singer did shock his fans in December of 2005 when he bluntly told American Blender magazine that he "loved giving the golden shower" to his partners. Martin later posted a message on his website, claiming that he "regretted his frankness and wished I had kept quiet."

As Michael's looks deteriorated after 2000, Martin was named by People magazine as one of the "Fifty Most Beautiful People in the World." In 2006 People en Espanol bestowed the same honor upon this handsome man.

One of his most ardent fans posted this message on a website: "Ricky baby, you can piss on me in the early morning, before lunch, twice in the afternoon, and all night long. But why waste it down the bathtub drain? It's my favorite cocktail. Better than cerveza."

In a startling report in La Cuarta Diario, under the head (translated into English) VICTOR GUTIERREZ PLANS HIS REVENGE, the journalist is quoted as saying, "This time, the Neverland ranch will be mine." It is not clear how Gutierrez planned to take over as the chatelain of Neverland. Perhaps by counter-suing Michael?

Despite these legal woes, Michael continued to plan public appearances, the release of a new album, and a major upheaval in his private life ... and not one that revolved around a boy.

During the declining months of his relationship with Lisa Marie, Michael seemed less concerned with his wife than he was with his latest album.

Released in the summer of 1995, HiStory: Past Present and Future, was divided into two different segments-HiStory Begins and HiStory Continues. The first collection featured Michael's all-time hits such as "Billie Jean," "Beat It," "Bad," and "Black Or White." The songs on HiStory Continues were new, including "Scream," "Smile," and "Tabloid Junkie." Some of these songs were autobiographical, a musical and poetic record of what had overtaken him during the previous two years. Executives at Sony were clearly worried about sales during the week leading up to the release of the album.

Michael launched his HiStory world tour in Prague in the Czech Republic on September 7, 1996, ending it in Durham, South Africa, on October 15, 1997. He performed a total of 82 concerts to some four and a half million fans in 58 cities, 35 countries, and 5 continents. This was the first album in which Michael showcased his instrumental talent, playing keyboard and synthesizer, guitar, drums, and percussion on the album.

Fans who bought his HiStory album confronted a more aggressive Michael, especially in the single, "They Don't Care About Us." In the song, Michael laments, "I'm tired of being the victim of shame, you're throwing me in a class with a bad name, I can't believe this is the land from which I came."

One of his finest compositions, "Strangers in Moscow," was also on the album. The first single from the album, "Scream," was a duet with the other successful sibling in the family, Janet. In "Scream," Michael laments, "Stop pressuring me, stop pressuring me." Janet also made an award-winning video of the song with her by now-notorious brother.

The most controversial song from the album, "They Don't Care About Us," brought angry protests from the Anti-Defamation League because of its anti-Semitic lyrics. "Michael Jackson has an anti-Semitic streak," claimed Abraham Foxman, the director of the Anti-Defamation League. "It seems every time he has a problem in his life, he blames it on Jews."

"Jew me, sue me, everybody do me, kick me, kike me," Michael sang.

The reaction of Jews was so hostile that it forced Michael to apologize. He changed the lyrics, claiming most unconvincingly that "the song was intended to fight prejudice." Considering the original lyrics, virtually no one bought the defense. Michael would later solicit but not receive-Louis Farrakhan's support following the outcry raised by his song.

Privately, Michael wanted the Islamic minister to launch a "holy war" against Jewish music executives in the industry.

Astonishingly, Michael claimed that Jews objecting to his anti-Semitic lyrics were, in fact, "persecuting me" for his tirades. This showed an amazing lack of sensitivity on his part. The Jewish community, of course, had a legitimate right to attack the anti-Semitic lyrics. But nonetheless, Michael seemed to want revenge for the Anti-Defamation League's attacks on his lyrics.

Farrakhan wisely opted to sit out this dispute. "If Jackson wants to take on the Jews, let him," the minister said. "I'll battle them in my own way, without getting involved in Jackson's music wars." On October 16, 1995, Farrakhan had denounced Jews as "financial bloodsuckers" at his "Million Man March."

With HiStory, Michael-at least in initial sales-showed that he could still "cut it" at the age of 40. The album sold 18 million copies before tumbling from the charts. It appeared that the mind-boggling sales associated with his Thriller days during the 1980s were over.

Much of the reaction from the press was unfavorable. Julene Snyder, a San Francisco based freelance writer said. "Thus far, outrageously expensive promotion (a reported $30 million) for HiStory: Past, Present and Future, Book I,' has been characterized by remarkably poor judgment by people who really should know better. The deeply disturbing neo-fascist trailer for HiStory-rife with screaming children, fainting girls, marching soldiers, helicopters and explosions-climaxes with the unveiling of a huge statue of the singer, and a young blond boy's dewy look as he shouts, `Michael, I love you!' As if that weren't peculiarly creepy enough, the next shot follows a helicopter as it flies through straddled-apart legs of the statue-fairly ambiguous imagery, given the circumstances. Jackson, who clearly craves adulation as much as any junkie needs a fix, has announced a tour of 40-foot statues of himself, starting with one floating down the Thames in London. Can you say overkill?"

Many other artists would have considered HiStory a smashing success, but Michael was bitterly disappointed in its sales, hoping again for another Thriller. Critics in the music industry said that Michael's most loyal fans already owned the hits on the album and didn't want to buy the same music twice. "Not only that, but the new songs weren't strong enough to offset the added cost of the album," or so wrote critic Bob Griffith.

Michael faced yet another disappointment when he learned that Eagles: Their Greatest Hits 1971-1975 was threatening to catch up with Thriller's record-breaking sales.

An American rock music group formed in Los Angeles in the early 70s, The Eagles, were among the most successful recording artists of that decade. Two of their albums, Eagles. Their Greatest Hits 1971-1975 and Hotel California, rank among the ten best-selling albums of all time. On December 7, 1999, the Recording Industry of America honored the group with an award for the "Best Selling Album of the Century" for their Greatest Hits album, which chronicled the high-flying 70s with what they called "life in the fast lane" and the pursuit and unraveling of the American dream.

While touring with HiStory, Michael released a mini-movie, Ghosts, a horror story. In the plot, Michael is appropriately cast as a "weird man" who's living in a haunted house on the hill. Directed by Stan Winston, Ghosts had a mixed reaction. As one reviewer noted, "I think commercially his best days were behind him but this is still an excellent video and far exceeds a lot of crap put out there today."

In 1997 he also released a "remix" album, Blood on the Dance FloorHIStory in the Mix, featuring five new songs, two of which had heard featured in Ghosts. The other eight songs were remixes from the HiStory album. Ironically, even though many of its songs were re-releases from earlier albums, Blood became one of the biggest remix albums ever, selling seven million copies globally.

Michael's onstage behavior, meanwhile, had become increasingly imperial and in some cases, bizarre, so much so that Michael sometimes suffered from the outrage these acts seemed to catalyze in the minds of competitors. In 1996, in London at the Brit Awards, Michael selected "Earth Song," as his big number. At the end of "Earth Song," Michael in dazzling white was hoisted over the stage in a crucifixion pose and was then surrounded onstage by children and a rabbi yearning to touch him. As one former fan put it, "Jackson rose to Grace amidst the steaming pile of sub-Disney doodoo."

Jarvis Cocker

The quasi-religious assumptions of the choreography proved to be too much for Jarvis Cocker, the outspoken lead singer of the British band, Pulp, who immediately raced onto the stage and in front of millions of onlookers, shook his ass derisively at Michael. Michael did not conceal the look of shock on his face when he registered that his "big number," in front of millions of onlookers, wasn't going off as had been previously planned. At no point did Cocker ever threaten Michael. But in a rock-hooligan kind of prank that was permeated with comic, or absurdist, relief, Cocker, who was joined at some point onstage by his friend, Peter Mansell, made it abundantly clear that he did not wholeheartedly approve of Michael's act. In quick reaction, Michael's security forces chased Cocker across the stage and eventually, out of the range of the cameras.

Cocker later admitted that the prank had been conceived as a protest against Michael's "quasi-religious pretensions." Cocker went on to say that because of the accusations of child abuse still swirling around Michael, he found Michael's inclusion of under-aged performers "distasteful."

Later, Michael's guards falsely asserted that Cocker had injured a child dancer during his on-camera escapade. Partly as a result of that, Cocker was hauled to a nearby police station where he was questioned in an hours-long interrogation that began at lam. Subsequently, Cocker was released, and no charges were filed against him.

Pulp

Michael later told the press that he felt "sickened, saddened, shocked, upset, cheated, and angry" at the caper, calling Cocker's behavior "disgusting and cowardly." On hearing that, Cocker countered, "My actions were a protest at the way Michael Jackson sees himself as some kind of Christ-like figure with the power of healing. The music industry allows him to indulge his fantasies because of his wealth and power. People go along with it even though they know it's a bit sick. I just couldn't go along with it anymore. It was a spur-of-the-moment decision brought on by boredom and frustration. But also, I find it very insulting to be accused of assaulting children."

Ironically, the protest generated headlines worldwide. Sales of Michael's single, "Earth Song," soared, as did the Cocker album, Different Class. And despite the somewhat childish way in which Cocker had protested Michael's self-portrayal as an object of religious veneration, Cocker had a point. A video later showed that in their denunciations of Cocker's protest, Michael's staff had lied. "It was the bouncer's arm, not Cocker's, that went up and accidentally thumped a child in the face," a report concluded. The March edition of Melody Maker even suggested that Cocker should be knighted.

Just when it seemed that Michael had run out of surprises for the press, a new woman, a "motorcycle mama" who was anything but demure, entered his life.

Michael had known her for some time, ever since as an assistant to Michael's dermatologist, she had applied Benoquin, a bleaching cream, to his scrotum, trying to make the pink spots on dark skin even out into a harmonious whole.

Chapter Fourteen

"Who the hell is Debbie Rowe?" Madonna asked a roomful of her cohorts. One of her hairdressers responded that she was a "motorcycle mama" and that he'd dated one of her biker boyfriends.

Madonna wasn't alone in asking that question. If news of Michael's marriage to Lisa Marie had electrified the world, the pop star's second marriage came as a shock, catching the hound dogs of press and paparazzi unaware.

On November 15, 1996, about a year after his divorce from Lisa Marie, Michael took Debbie Rowe, a nurse, as his second bride. This time the bride didn't have fame, beauty, or money.

The zaftig blonde, thanks to her role as the assistant to Michael's dermatologist, Dr. Arnold Klein, is credited with "making Michael white."

She had known Michael for fifteen years, and reportedly is the only woman, other than his mother Katherine, who ever saw him completely undressed.

Debbie Rowe

Rowe, accompanying Dr. Klein, had flown across the world to minister to Michael during his tours, and she had reportedly given him massages and rubdowns. "I'm familiar with his body, and I can identify any markings on his buttocks," she said, supporting a claim that a biopsy of Michael's scalp revealed that he was suffering from Discoid Lupus, an autoimmune disease causing hyper-pigmentation, which either darkened or lightened the skin. If he did indeed suffer from Discoid Lupus, as Dr. Klein was rumored to have diagnosed, Michael would have to avoid all exposure to the sun throughout the rest of his life. People suffering from Discoid Lupus, especially those with prolonged exposure to direct sunlight, often develop coin-sized red bumps upon the skin, the surface of these lesions looking "warty."

At the time of his marriage, Michael falsely claimed that "Debbie and I love each other. I fell for this beautiful, unpretentious, giving person that she is, and she fell for me."

Her first attempt at childbirth had miscarried, but Rowe was several months' pregnant when at the age of 37 she married Michael in his suite at the Sheraton on the Park Hotel in Sydney, Australia, where he was on the second lap of his HiStory tour. Rowe related stories about romantic evenings, wherein Michael filled her bedroom with exotic fragrances, but technically, those romantic interludes didn't occur on their wedding night. As the continuation of a pattern that Michael had established with his first wife, wife number 2 also spent her wedding night alone.

As part of the ceremony, her husband presented her with a 2V2 carat diamond, set into platinum, but all she got from him physically was a peck on the cheek, not "the big kiss I'd been expecting." As she lay alone in a $3,000-a-night suite, she cried herself to sleep, or so she said. Later she told friends that "my honeymoon night was the most disappointing of my life."

Accompanying Michael during his honeymoon was an eight-year-old boy, his origin unknown, nicknamed "Tony." Michael claimed that the good-looking boy was his nephew, although that wasn't true. While Rowe was confined to her hotel suite, Michael and Tony were photographed attending the opening night of the film, Ghosts, and also paying a visit to Sydney's Taronga Zoo.

"The marriage and the entire setup with Debbie Rowe was nothing more than a sham," Michael's former publicist, Bob Jones, claimed. "Michael Jackson wasn't the least bit interested in Debbie Rowe. He was only interested in her churning out those blond-haired, blue-eyed babies." Jones added a provocative comment to the effect that Michael didn't want to have a "splaboo," the pop star's standard reference for a black child.

Debbie Rowe with MJ

During their marriage, Michael and Rowe never lived together.

Nick Bishop, in The National Enquirer, reported that Rowe had been "passionately in love" with Michael for 15 years and was his most ardent fan, claim ing that "he broke my heart when he married that Lisa Marie." She reported that he was distraught when he and Lisa Marie could not have a child and that she volunteered, "Let me try to get pregnant with you." She also said that Michael burst into tears of joy, as they went to his bedroom "and started to make love-he was fantastic, once he got started."

She reported that as a kind of foreplay to their lovemaking, Michael sometimes dressed up, once donning a suit of armor "so he could be a knight conquering a peasant girl. Another time he dressed as a pirate." It cannot be ascertained if these were mere fantasies on Rowe's part, the equivalent of stories of humans being abducted and then "violated" by aliens aboard space ships.

Bishop reported these fantasies, but as a good reporter he also wrote, "Few will believe this rigamarole when subsequent events are factored into the equation. Debbie sounds like an intelligent and well-paid shill, and yet another sexual beard, but this one was assigned the role of breeder as well."

Privately, associates of Michael said that he wanted to have children of his own, and that he was "shopping for a breeder," who would agree to be artificially inseminated. He found such a candidate right under his nose: Debbie Rowe, who originally came from Australia and had formerly been married to a so-called "computer wiz."

Rowe must have realized at the very beginning that her marriage to Michael would be a sham. In complaints to her friends back in California, she was already predicting divorce only weeks after her marriage. Perhaps she longed for the days when, as a biker chick-comfortable in the seat of a Harley-Davidson-she rode like a Hell's Angel.

She was said to "curse like a sailor and swill tequila like a Mexican bandit." In the media she's been portrayed as a dumb blonde. Yet others have called her "cool and calculating, a show-me-the-money type of woman with a womb for rent if one put millions of dollars on the table."

During her marriage to Michael, Rowe was said to have dated former biker boyfriends.

In 1996, the year he married Rowe, Michael launched another special friendship. Omar Bhatti, a young man from Norway but with a Pakistani background, lived intermittently at Neverland. Michael told the staff that Bhatti was his biological son, but absolutely no one believed him.

The world first heard of Bhatti in 1996 when the 12-year-old amazed Michael with his talents as an imitator outside his hotel in Tunis in Tunisia. Bhatti was invited into Michael's suite and a friendship emerged when Bhatti brought him a beautiful rose. Soon the young boy and Michael were traveling the world together, with Bhatti on stage performing as "The Mini-Jackson."

The relationship became so close that Bhatti and his family sold their home in Holmlia, outside Oslo, and moved to Neverland. During the months that followed, Bhatti lived with Michael, whom he proclaimed as "my idol."

The friendship would continue for years. Bhatti was even seen later in Colorado visiting with Michael and his children, Prince, 7, and Paris, 5. Bhatti is said to have remained extremely loyal to Michael, and supported him when he went into drug rehab. Ironically, in 2004, eight years after their initial meeting, the then-20-year-old Bhatti, by now a dance artist in his own right, was arrested in Oslo for possession of drugs. The arrest occurred only ten days before he was scheduled to perform at the anti-drug event, Norway Cup, the world's largest soccer tournament for young people.

Bhatti and two of his teenage friends were visiting Neverland at the time of its second police raid. In the aftermath of the raid, Bhatti refused to speak to the press after tabloids ran a front-page photo of Michael and him.

During the raid, Bhatti was questioned by police about Michael's activities. Jeffrey Ellis, a police investigator, later claimed that when he broached the subject of pornography to Bhatti, the boy "became nervous and seemed to have trouble forming a sentence. It was almost like a stutter." From Bhatti, prosecutors got no case. Ellis reported that when the boy was asked about the consumption of wine and alcohol, referring to Michael's now famous "Jesus Juice," Bhatti displayed "that same type of uneasiness that I noticed when I started talking to him about Michael's pornography."

With an unknown father donating the sperm, Prince Michael Jackson was born on February 13, 1997 at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center. After delivery, Michael took the baby from Rowe, because "I don't want you to become too attached to it." Obviously there had been some agreement between them for him to do that. Reportedly there was a contract, establishing "ownership" of the baby and also promising to award her with millions if she stayed married to him and bore him yet another child.

After the birth of her baby, Rowe was banished from Neverland, showing up soon thereafter on the streets of Phoenix.

Omar Bhatti

Reports of artificial insemination were consistently denied by both Jacksons in spite of surface evidence to the contrary. Gordon Rowe, grandfather to the children, publicly stated that his daughter had privately told him that the birth was by artificial insemination. Rowe allegedly told friends that "I'm just the vehicle carrying Michael's babies."

Taken from his mother, the newborn was deposited into the back seat of a stretch limo and driven to Neverland, where a professional nurse had been hired to care for the infant. In the weeks ahead, even though Michael would hire a bevy of nurses and nannies to look after the newborn, he insisted on overseeing most of the child's care himself.

Omar Bhatti with MJ

One could almost imagine a derisive hoot coming from Madonna after she read Rowe's quote: "I have married and had a baby with a man I will always love. And I am on top of the world." Even if those sentiments had been true, Debbie was slated to slide off the top of that world very soon.

Michael often insisted on changing his son's diapers himself. And although Prince Michael's name was elegant and regal, he nonetheless had to endure the nickname his father bestowed upon him: Baby Doo-Doo.

"Being called Baby Doo Doo by Dada is the kind of thing that could scar a kid for life," said writer Marcus Errico in 1997. "We just hope Jacko isn't a literalist."

Most reports indicate that Michael designated Dr. Klein as the godfather of his son, with Elizabeth Taylor appointed as his godmother. Other reports relay that instead of Dr. Klein, Macaulay Culkin had been named as the godfather of Prince Michael.

After Michael named his first son Prince Michael, Jermaine responded more or less in kind by naming his own son, "Jermajesty."

In 1997, Rowe and Michael released a joint statement to the press that virtually no one believed. It read: "Deborah is adamant about setting the record straight that Michael is the father of the child [a reference to Prince Michael], the pregnancy is not the result of artificial means, that she has not been paid to have Michael's baby, and that she is not seeking or filing for divorce."

Whereas in the past Michael had faked illnesses to avoid unpleasantness, it now became obvious that he wasn't opposed to the use of Prince Michael as a means of avoiding an engagement. As its date approached, he decided that he did not want to fly to Modena, Italy, to perform with Luciano Pavarotti at a charity concert. In a press release that attempted to justify his non-appearance at the event, he claimed that his son "had suffered a seizure and nearly died." That later turned out to be completely untrue, although Rowe was said to have "gone into a frenzy" when she heard the news for the first time as it was broadcast over television.

As Michael was celebrating becoming a father, the press recalled that in the early 90s Jordie Chandler had been "the apple of Michael's eye."

Meanwhile, Jordie Chandler, having turned seventeen in 1997, was a rich young man worth millions of dollars in bonds and shares. Reportedly, he frequently dabbled in the stock market with the help of a financial guru, Jeffrey Hahn, vice president of the Santa Monica Bank. Jordie had even acquired a partial ownership of the Bank of New York. He'd instructed his financial aides to buy the Crossroads School when he noticed how much the annual fees were.

He was known to pop up at ski resorts in Tahoe and Vail, and to depart spontaneously on scuba-diving trips to The Bahamas and surfing excursions in Florida.

At the time of the birth of Michael's first child, Jordie was still awaiting the final installment of Michael's payments to him, due in June of 1999. As Michael's lawyers had cleverly planned it, that coincided with the date when Michael could no longer be prosecuted over sex abuse allegations.

Jordie, reportedly, was said to have abandoned watching TV broadcasts on the day Debbie gave birth to a son. "I can't bear to watch," he said. Instead he donned a pair of Armani pants and played roller hockey outside his home with his half-brother, Nikki.

In a surprise move, also in 1997, Michael fired his long-time personal managers, turning his career over instead to Prince Alwaleed, a member of the Saudi royal family. He'd met Michael in 1994 at Euro Disney in Paris. With the prince, Michael established Kingdom Entertainment as a development vehicle for film projects, theme parks, hotels, and restaurants. The prince would also be charged with the development and organization of Michael's future world tours. The union of the unlikely pair would be short lived and not meet its expectations.

MJ with Omar Bhatti

Again through the participation of an unknown father, another child, Paris-Michael Katherine Jackson, was born to Rowe on April 3, 1998 at the Spalding Medical Clinic in Beverly Hills. Ironically, when his son had been born, Michael had rented the VIP floor at Cedars-Sinai and hired ten security guards to protect the security of his son. However, when Paris came along, she was assigned only one security guard and her room at Spalding was decidedly modest. Rumors began to circulate that Michael was "hurting financially," and these stories with specific details would mushroom in the months ahead.

According to reports at the time, Michael was so eager to take this child to Neverland that he went to the hospital and removed her at once, even with placenta still covering her body. He wrapped her in a towel and waited to give her a bath when he got her home.

One employee reported that when she brought the baby to Michael at Neverland, she had to pass under life-size mannequins of a Boy and a Girl Scout. Once inside the room, she saw a large painting of Jesus Christ, with blonde hair and blue eyes, complete with a Sacred Heart.

Even as late as the birth of his second child, the press was still publishing ridiculous headlines such as MICHAEL STILL PINES FOR LISA MARIE. That report may have originated when a maid saw a picture of a pre-school Lisa Marie with Elvis resting on the pop star's nightstand.

In 2004, J. Randy Taraborrelli, in a revised edition of his biography of Michael Jackson, The Magic & the Madness, wrote that even though Michael had remarried, Lisa Marie Presley was "still the one who had his heart."

In a review of the book in England, Howard Turner addressed that assertion. "Yeah, right! Anyone who believes that also believes that we have a fairy godmother, that Grace Kelly was a virgin, that John Grisham is the world's greatest writer, that Iraq possessed an arsenal of nuclear bombs, and that George W. Bush will go down in history as America's greatest president. And, finally, they also believe that Michael Jackson, unlike the rest of us, never had a homosexual desire in his life."

In the wake of the birth of two children, Michael was still plagued with financial difficulties. His family was even worse off.

In 1999 both Janet and Michael came in for unwanted headlines claiming that the two multi-millionaires were standing by as their own family faced financial ruin. In March, both Joe and Katherine filed for bankruptcy, claiming debts of nearly $35 million.

Neither Michael nor Janet, according to reports, offered financial assistance. To raise immediate cash, Katherine auctioned off a Rolls-Royce given to her by Michael. Katherine asked the court to exempt her two mink coats from being seized. Michael had bailed out his parents in the past, but seemed immune to helping them out of their latest difficulties. In 1995, he'd already written Joe and La Toya out of his will.

But as the century came to an end, Michael was reported to be avoiding bill collectors. He wanted to keep his children from view as well. When seen in public, they were veiled. But in the autumn of 2000, the children were playing in a limousine outside their hotel waiting for their "father" to appear. Prince Michael stuck his head out the window and was photographed by a paparazzo. "There's no way in hell that child could have been fathered by Michael," said a Los Angeles pediatrician off the record. "The kid has light blond hair and is whiter than the Queen of England. He looks exactly like Macaulay Culkin at that age."

In a rare statement about his children, Michael said, "I've never had so much fun in all my life. That's the truth. Because I'm this big kid, and now I get to see the world through the eyes of the really young ones. I learn more from them than they learn from me. Children are always the best judges to monitor something."

In the future, Michael would provide a devastating look into his private world and admit sleeping with young boys in Martin Bashir's now notorious TV documentary, aired in 2003. In that future expose of his private life, he would claim that the two children born to Rowe were biologically his. Both children have white skin and light complexions. Michael's claim on TV would be met with derision in the press.

In legal papers filed later, Rowe claimed that she'd agreed to refrain from sex for six months to "avoid any possibility of semen being introduced into my body other than by way of surgical artificial insemination."

It was reported that Dr. Hal Danzer, a Beverly Hills specialist, performed the insemination which led to the births of both of the Rowe-Jackson children. Rowe claimed that for her services she received a payoff of $3 million from Michael.

After contradictory statements in the 1990s, Rowe in 2006 allegedly told an Irish newspaper that Michael was not the father of their two children, Prince Michael and Paris. She claimed that both children were conceived using anonymous semen purchased from a sperm bank. To the Sunday World, Rowe said, "Michael knows the truth-that he is not the natural father. He has to come clean. I have no information whatsoever about the identity of the donor for either child. There was an agreement of confidentiality with the sperm bank."

Then, to confuse matters even more, Rowe attacked the Sunday World, denying that she ever gave such an interview. In putting a spin on the situation, her lawyer, Iris Finsilver, declared that Rowe would "never make a press deal that might risk her visitation rights-she never spoke to any newspaper." The Sunday World, however, stood by its story.

As could have been predicted, Debbie eventually asked for a divorce, and she got her wish on October 9, 1999.

In 2006 when Rowe took Michael to court in a custody battle, legal doc uments revealed details of their divorce settlement. According to these documents, Rowe was to be paid $900,000 a year in "hush money" after she split from Michael. The ex-Mrs. Michael Jackson also picked up a $2.5 million mansion in Beverly Hills and a lump sum of $4 million.

In her court filing, Rowe said, "I have just been advised by Michael's inner circle that he is abusing drugs, and I was even given the name of a physician that is prescribing all of Michael's medications, which I fear is dangerous not only to Michael but also to my children."

Having deserted her small apartment, Rowe had moved into a lavish million-dollar home in Beverly Hills. There was no question where she got the money to pay for this upgrade in lifestyle.

Despite the fact that her contract called for her to remain married to Michael for six years, Rowe told her friends, "I can't take it anymore. That's why I had to file for divorce."

Myung-Ho Lee, Michael's former business manager, claimed that Rowe had threatened that if Michael didn't pay $10 million as part of their divorce settlement that she would "spill the beans" on family secrets. Ironically, Rowe had surrendered her parental rights at the time of the divorce. And later, during Michael's trial for child molestation, Rowe revealed that she had never met her own children until they were three or four years old. She also revealed that during that period, she was never presented to her children as their mother, but as "a friend of your Daddy's." Michael later told a friend, "I bought all rights to my kids."

As the terms of the divorce were released to wire services around the world, weird speculation arose. The most outlandish rumor was that the former King of Pop had sought help from scientists in the hopes that he could clone both male and female versions of himself. Reporter Nick Bishop even speculated that "the two children could even be a kind of Victor/Victoria experiment in artificial breeding."

While Katherine and nannies minded the children, and while Rowe pined for "my lost love," videotapes revealed that Michael was entertaining three, and sometimes four, adolescent boys at Neverland. He filmed these videotapes himself, always asking the boys to remove their shirts as part of the filming process.

As a means of settling his divorce payments, and to meet mounting millions in other obligations, Michael borrowed $140 million in a loan from Union Finance and Investment Corporation.

Myung-Ho Lee arranged the loan, but later sued Michael, charging that the star failed to fulfill a number of commitments that Michael had made to him as a reward for having secured those millions. In June of 2003, Michael settled the lawsuit with Myung-Ho Lee, the terms of which were not divulged.

Lee's lawsuit was one of about a hundred such lawsuits filed over a two year period during the late 1990s. Marcel Avram, who handled details associated with Michael's tours during the 90s, also sued when the star cancelled "Millennium Concerts" in Honolulu and Sydney, respectively.

Avram sued for $25 million, winning his case, but subsequently receiving only $6 million to make up for lost profits. It was during Michael's testimony in this trial that photographs of his bandaged nose were splashed in media around the world. For perhaps the first time, Michael's fans and enemies alike could witness firsthand the disastrous results of "just one nose job too many."

At the debut of the 21st century, Michael continued a pattern of involvement in other lawsuits as well, both minor and major. Most of them weren't associated with charges of child molestation, but with demands from merchants who asserted that Michael had reneged on previous purchases. One of the more spectacular examples included Michael's alleged promise of $1.6 million to Sotheby's for the acquisition of two 19th-century paintings-one of a cupid and the other of a woman holding a boy and a sheep.

Although Rowe had been restrained by a gag order, she continued to issue statements about Michael, including one she revealed in February of 2003. She said that if "Michael called me tonight and said he wants to have five more, I'd do it in a heartbeat." Michael had enlisted Rowe's help, asking her to appear on a TV documentary to counter the damaging portrayal of British journalist Martin Bashir, who exposed Michael on the air in 2003.

Fox won the bidding war to air the two-hour TV special, The Michael Jackson Interview: The Footage You Were Never Meant to See, narrated by Maury Povich. In the special, Rowe said, "My kids don't call me mom because I don't want them to. They are Michael's children."

Within the televised tell-all, Rowe also claimed that it was her decisionnot Michael's-to cover the faces of her two children with scarves whenever they appeared in public, citing a possible kidnapping threat. "I don't want a Lindbergh baby," Michael had previously said.

Although Rowe had formally relinquished her parental rights in 2001, she was pursuing a lawsuit late in 2005 that requested the immediate return of their children from the Middle East. In that lawsuit, she accused Michael of "abducting" Prince and Paris. In legal documents she filed with the court, Rowe went on to assert that she had seen the children only once since the summer of 2005, when she won limited visitation rights.

But as events unfolded, Rowe's lawsuit would face many hurdles. And in the interim, as lawyers for both sides wangled, Prince and Paris remained in the Middle East, held in check by the gloved clutches of Michael himself.

Attorney Raoul Felder claimed that "Even if Rowe got Jackson back into court, it could be opening a can of worms that would get them both into trouble. Maybe the law will do what it should have done in the first place and take custody away from both of these two."

A presupposition of the legal system of both Bahrain and Dubai, as endorsed by Islamic tradition and according to many legal experts, maintained that a court order originating in Los Angeles would not be enforceable.

Felder went on to say that if the case indeed ever came to court, a judge might justifiably confront Rowe with, "How did you ever allow your children to be with Michael Jackson in the first place? It's a tough Rowe to hoe."

In spite of the legal muddle and disagreement emanating from these issues, in 2005, a judge decided that proper court procedures had not been observed in 2001 when Rowe was denied custody rights, even though she had volunteered to give them up at the time.

Rowe apparently changed her mind about abandoning her rights as a parent after Michael was charged with child molestation and began associating with the Nation of Islam, which espouses anti-Semitic causes. Rowe, who is Jewish, was deeply offended by this association.

In 2005, Tom Sneddon, the Santa Barbara County District Attorney and a figure who would emerge as one of Michael's most aggressive nemeses, subpoenaed Rowe for an appearance in court. Sneddon's motivation involved his belief that her testimony would damage Michael in front of a Santa Barbara jury, where he was facing charges of child molestation in the Gavin Arvizo case.

On the stand, Rowe appeared to want to get back into Michael's good graces, despite that fact that she had, in a separate legal maneuver, inaugurated a lawsuit to reinstate her custody rights over her children.

The prosecution hoped that Rowe would depict Michael "as a coercive cad and lousy dad." To everyone's surprise, she did the opposite, presenting instead a lively defense of her former husband. During a full three hours on the stand, she praised Michael repeatedly. She ended her largely favorable testimony by blaming Michael's associates for the pop star's troubles and claiming, "I've always considered him a friend. . .generous to a fault and a brilliant businessman." She denounced the un-indicted co-conspirators as "opportunistic vultures."

Earlier sheriff's deputies had claimed that she'd called Michael a "sociopath" who referred to their children as "my possessions." But she didn't repeat or admit those charges on the witness stand.

Later, Detective Sergeant Steve Robel took the stand to repeat Rowe's original damning testimony. "But it was too little, too late," said a source on Michael's defense team.

At the end of the day, her favorable testimony about her ex-husband's character was defined as a startling setback for the prosecution. On the stand, however, Rowe did admit that "Michael's henchmen" had promised her visitation rights with her kids if she agreed to "gush" about the pop star in a video made to counter the damaging effect of the Bashir documentary.

In court documents filed in July of 2006, Rowe asserted that she was flat broke and that Michael owed her hundreds of thousands of dollars in attorney fees and other costs. She claimed that her legal fees and mortgage, plus other expenses, had left her with only $173,000 in the bank, all her other monies from Michael having been spent.

Five years after divorcing Michael, Rowe said, "If you fall in love onceand if you're lucky enough-it's forever. I'm not one of the lucky ones." At her Beverly Hills estate, she burst into tears three times during an exclusive interview with Entertainment Tonight. She claimed that she was studying to become a forensic psychologist and had been breeding prize-winning horses. "I don't know that it would be fair to me to have a relationship with anyone because I'm trying to figure out what I want," she said.

It was later revealed that Rowe was indeed owed $1 million in back alimony from Michael and that she had been forced to sell her 21/2-carat diamond wedding ring on eBay. The star's attorneys countered with the charge that Rowe had "violated a confidentiality agreement by appearing on Entertainment Tonight."

After much bickering, a secret deal between Michael's lawyers and Rowe was concluded in late September of 2006. The terms were not announced. "We're still dealing with the details but it addresses all of the disputes between the parties," said Marta Almli, the lawyer who represented Rowe. The attorney refused to say what the settlement involved. It was rumored that Rowe received both a "large monetary payment" and was granted visitation rights with her two children, Prince Michael and Paris.

Debbie Rowe

In spite of mounting financial difficulties, continuing lawsuits, and payouts to Debbie Rowe, Michael still seemed to think he had the funds to pursue whatever whim came into his head. In June of 1999, he spent $1.54 million to purchase the statuette associated with the Oscar Best Picture award that David O. Selznick had won for Gone With the Wind in 1939. The former King of Pop was spending far more money than he generated.

Not since the days of Woolworth heiress Barbara Hutton, who seemed obsessed with spending herself into the poorhouse, has a media headliner wasted so much money or owed so much. His bestseller album, Thriller, for which he was paid $100 million, should have set him up for life.

Fans were asking, "Where did all the money go?" After all, Michael had made the most successful album of all time and had amassed a fabulous fortune. How could he end up in debt, his life in ruins?

To pay for his mounting debts, Michael went to Bank of America, initially taking out a loan for $70 million, which was followed by another loan for a staggering $200 million. These were in addition to loans from Union Finance and Investment Corporation. For collateral Michael put up his ATV catalogue, including dozens of Beatles' songs, which he owned jointly with Sony. His other assets included not only Neverland, but royalties from his own music, such as "Billie Jean" or "Beat It." His music is estimated to have a market value ranging from $75 to $90 million.

In reviewing Michael's assets, a former Bank of America official, who did not want his name used, said, "We were shocked to find out just how many songs Michael owned. Of course, everybody knew about The Beatles' catalogue. But I was unaware that he owned some of the songs of Elvis Presley, even Madonna. When we drew up an estimate of his publishing rights, it came to $450 million, which we thought would more than guarantee a loan in the millions. A singer who had earned at least half a billion in his lifetime was turning to the songs of other artists such as John Lennon and Elvis to save his financial hide."

In 2001, as a means of securing the loan from Bank of America, Michael offered as collateral his two most valuable assets-a fifty percent stake in his Sony partnership and the rights to his own music library.

This was not the first time Michael had used The Beatles' catalogue to raise much-needed cash. After the lukewarm reception of his HiStory album, he had set up a joint ownership of his ATV Music with Sony, for which he was paid an astonishing $95 million. "Hot damn and save the Queen," Paul McCartney reportedly said when hearing of this fabulous outflow of cash. There was a certain irony in this deal. Signing the agreement was Sony honcho Richard Rowe, the son of the late but not lamented Dick Rowe. Originally Dick Rowe, a senior Decca Records A&R executive, had turned down The Beatles, claiming "they just aren't commercial."

Martin Bashir

Michael had long been infamous for his choice of sometimes bizarre pals he hung out with. In December of 2003, he was linked with another in a long list of "strange bedfellows," in this case the flamboyant Alvin Malnik, no stranger to scandal himself. Michael later claimed that he was taken to Malnik's house in Miami Beach by Brett Ratner, the film director, who had promised to show him a "house so beautiful it will make you catatonic."

The multi-millionaire Malnik has been "fodder" for federal files since the 1960s and has been called the successor to mob moneyman Meyer Lansky.

In 1966, the U.S. attorney in New York indicted Malnik on charges of using the mail to defraud investors, but in 1971 prosecutors dropped the case.

In 1993, a New Jersey Gaming Commission linked Malnik to organized crime figures, a charge he has denied. The commission in its report concluded, "The evidence establishes that Mr. Malnik associated with persons engaged in organized criminal activities, and that he himself participated in transactions that were clearly illegitimate and illegal."

Malnik was the owner of The Forge, the trendy South Beach hot spot to which he took Michael on a "date" (no homosexual reference intended). It was reported that Michael and Malnik "bonded at the hip," becoming such fast friends that Malnik offered the pop star the use of his lavish mansion in Ocean Ridge, Florida. Later, from a base in Miami Beach, Michael even hosted a 70th birthday party for Malnik at The Forge, inviting such glitterati as Smokey Robinson, B.B. King, and even the famous attorney, F. Lee Bailey.

Rush & Malloy in the New York Daily News reported that guests "were surprised to see how openly affectionate the 44-year-old musician was toward several boys who appeared to be in their teens." A Miami headline asked the question: IS JACKO MARRIED TO THE MOB?

The Forge had actually opened in 1969, attracting everybody from Richard Nixon to his shady pal, financier

Bebe Rebozo. In previous years, even Richard Burton and Frank Sinatra had patronized the club.

Malnik also owns Title Loans of America, a national chain lending money legally at high percentage rates, sometimes as much as 22%.

Michael was said to have turned to Malnik for help in paying off millions of dollars of debts. Malnik began giving Michael financial advice, something he also has supplied to the ruling family of Saudi Arabia. To reporters, Malnik denied that he lent Michael the $3 million needed for him to post bail when he was charged in 2003 with molesting a 12-year-old, cancer-ridden boy.

In February of 2004, a $70 million loan came due from the Bank of America, and Michael had no money to repay it. Through the aid of Malnik, Michael got the loan extended. Advisers to Michael told the press that the star's links to the Nation of Islam, the black separatist group, has "scared banks off and hurt Jackson's ability to make more money." Two groups of investors, each prepared to make business deals with Michael, had backed away when criminal charges were filed against him for child molestation.

Financial sources disclosed that in the late 90s and post-millennium, Michael was spending about $20 to $30 million annually-more than he earned. "The result is an ongoing cash crisis," Duross O'Bryan, a forensic accountant, testified at Michael's child molestation trial in 2005. The accountant also testified that Michael has long-term liabilities of about $415 million. According to that estimate, the $475 million (plus) value of his assets outweighs the value of his liabilities by at least $60 million.

After being fired by Michael, publicist Bob Jones later commented on Michael's financial woes. "Look, when you spend $2 million a month, you run into these problems. This guy has been unable to face the fact that he no longer brings in income to support his spending habits. Buying expensive gifts for Elizabeth Taylor, Marlon Brando, Liza Minnelli, and other so-called friends, along with the millions he's had to pay these boys, their attorneys, his lawyers, and others-all of this has caught up with him."

By now hundreds of incidents associated with Michael's reckless spending had seeped into press reports. On his way to visit Elizabeth Taylor at the Bellagio in Las Vegas, Michael made an impromptu stop to pick up a $10,000 bottle of perfume as a gift. Speaking privately, the store owner said, "I sure was glad to unload that bottle although I wondered what Elizabeth Taylor, of all people, needed with another bottle of expensive perfume. Surely she has enough scent."

At one point, faced with $10 million in legal fees on child molestation charges, Michael defaulted on his Bank of America repayment loans once again. Bank of America sold his debt to a New York company, Fortress Investment Group, which specializes in "distressed debt."

Over the next several months, Michael failed to make payments on the loan, giving Fortress the right to foreclose. In a last-ditch effort on the part of Michael's attorneys, the star won the right to extend the loan, allowing Michael more time to accumulate funds.

The refinancing saved Michael from bankruptcy but deprived him of part of his share of the music catalogue.

Fortress also held a $70 million loan on Neverland.

In October of 2005, Michael defaulted on loan payments to Fortress. Ominously December 20, 2005, was to have been the deadline for foreclosure on the assets Michael had posted as collateral when he'd secured loans.

In August of 2006, it was revealed how Michael may have bailed himself out of his massive debt. In papers filed in Manhattan, a financial group, Prescient Acquisition Group, claimed that it helped Michael refinance $272.5 million owed to Fortress and arranged a $537.5 million loan related to his ownership interest with Sony in The Beatles' song library.

The court statement contained the first news of how Michael had escaped but only temporarily-a debt load deemed "almost impossible." But although Prescient had maneuvered adroitly to set up those remarkable loans, they now faced another problem, and that's why they were taking the singer to court. According to officials at Prescient, Michael owed them $48 million in administrative fees for their role in having arranged the refinancing.

Until the day he died, Michael's finances would remain in disarray. Some attorneys have asserted that lawsuits will keep those finances in chaos long after his burial.

Taking time off from his financial woes, Michael flew to New York to attend a gala.

As Bill Clinton was leaving office, Michael agreed to attend the annual New York Charity Ball of his friend, Denise Rich, whose billionaire husband, Marc Rich, was pardoned in an 11th hour decision by Clinton. Denise had wanted Paul McCartney to be the headline act. But he cancelled for "private reasons." He was replaced by Michael himself, who welcomed the opportunity to sit alongside President Clinton and his first lady, Hillary.

Denise staged her annual Angel Ball for her G&P Charitable Foundation for Cancer Research in November of 2000. Michael showed up at the grand ballroom of the Marriott Marquis Hotel in New York, where he greeted, among others, Goldie Hawn and Kurt Russell, Stevie Wonder, Rod Stewart, Dionne Warwick, Natalie Cole, and Gladys Knight, who had been instrumental in her initial "discovery" of The Jackson 5. The gala went off without a hitch, allowing Michael to forget his troubles, at least momentarily. But once he returned to Los Angeles, he began the compilation of an enemies list evocative of Richard Nixon during his ill-fated final term. The pop star wanted revenge.

"I'd rather receive praise from my fans than think about the people on my enemy list," Michael said as he flew to New York in March of 2001 for his induction into the Rock 'n' Roll Hall of Fame, making him the youngest solo artist to achieve that coveted award. The ceremony was conducted in New York at the Waldorf Astoria.

Michael put in an appearance, but arrogantly refused to perform. To get away with that, he arrived on crutches, claiming a leg injury that was faked. Rumors were flying that night that the star was "too high" to perform even though those charges may have been unfounded. Nonetheless, he was inducted into the Hall of Fame before the evening ended, an honor he richly deserved, of course.

That same month he flew to England for one of his most bizarre public appearances. At the Oxford Union in Oxford, he broke down in front of the audience, sobbing for his lost youth.

He claimed that he had wanted to be a typical little boy, building tree houses and having water balloon fights. "But my father had it otherwise and all I could do was envy the laughter and playtime that seemed to be going on all around me." Still sobbing, he went on to say that he wanted "the weight of my past lifted from my shoulders."

He was in Oxford to launch his charity, "Heal the Kids," aimed at bringing parents closer to their children.

A reporter for The Mirror in London, Sue Carroll, was at the gathering and filed this report: "The one thing that Jackson did not look like last night was a dad. There was a distinct resemblance to Liz Taylor, perhaps a touch of Pinocchio, his sister Janet even ... but an old-fashioned father, hope. He hobbled on stage with an injured right foot, bearing crutches but looking as though he had just stepped out of a Chanel boutique. His black hair was glossy and beautifully blow-dried, his lips were a fetching pink, and there was eyeliner to emphasize his dark eyes. From where I was sitting in the gallery, it was impossible not to be fascinated by that nose, which looked so small and manufactured. It was hard not to see this as some bizarre freak show."

"All of us are products of our childhoods," he told the audience. "But I am the product of a lack of childhood. An absence of that precious and wondrous age where we frolic playfully without a care in the world." In a very revealing statement, he claimed, "If you don't have the memory of being loved, you are condemned to search the world for something to fill you up."

At New York's Madison Square Garden, on September 7 and 10 in 2001, just prior to the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, two special concerts were staged by Michael in celebration of his 30-year career as a solo artist. Nearly fifty million viewers would later watch one of the concerts when it was broadcast on November 13, as a CBS Television special. Celebrities appeared onstage to pay tribute to Michael, including his rival, Ricky Martin.

Liza Minnelli put in an appearance, as did Britney Spears, Gloria Estefan, and Ray Charles.

Michael also showcased songs from his new album, Invincible. The first single off the new album, "You Rock My World," was accompanied by a video that starred Marlon Brando and actor/comedian Chris Tucker.

Tucker and Michael were friends. Once they were seen together in Las Vegas, leaving their separate hotel suites to emerge onto the gaming floor. "People had to touch me," Michael told Tucker. "Everywhere I turned, I felt hands on me. Other than the Pope and the Queen of England, I'm the most recognizable man on the planet."

Justin Timberlake and `N Sync also were billed on the 30th anniversary TV special. The pop heartthrob's girlfriend at the time, Britney Spears, also appeared on the anniversary program, performing "The Way You Make Me Feel" with Michael. But that footage was later cut from the broadcast. "Too damn bad," said Spears. "Just too fucking damn bad!" her sometimes friend Paris Hilton echoed.

At Madison Square Garden, in one of the most bizarre appearances in a lifetime of bizarre appearances, Marlon Brando-who had been paid a million dollars for his involvement-came onstage to confront a mostly youthful audience, some of whom weren't necessarily aware of who he was. Gigantically overweight and aging, Brando took a seat and introduced himself, "You may be thinking, who is that old fat fart sitting there." He then removed his watch and informed the audience, "In the last minute, 100,000 children have been hacked to death with a machete." After rambling on for ten minutes, the 77-year-old Oscar winner was booed off the stage. "He played a madman in Apocalypse Now," said a witness. "Now I know Brando wasn't acting."

Brando's appearance was considered so boring that it had to be cut from the final televised show.

Following the Brando debacle, the show peaked when The Jackson 5 reunited with their performance of such bubblegum former hits as "ABC."

Bob Jones revealed that a reunion with Michael's brothers "was purely a money move on his part. The last thing in the world Michael wanted was to perform with his brothers. He made it clear to all who worked with and for him that his family was to be kept as far away as possible. This is a man whose dressing room was off limits to his parents. He would have only little boys in his dressing room."

During the historic early-morning events of September 11, 2001, Michael was still asleep. Most Americans learned of the attacks on the World Trade Center and The Pentagon by watching the dramas unfold on television. Michael was awakened by a mysterious call from a friend in Saudi Arabia, telling him of the attacks. He immediately panicked and wanted to flee New York. But he was also concerned for his friends, Elizabeth Taylor and Marlon Brando, who were still in New York at the time.

Immediately, Michael placed several emergency calls seeking an underground shelter for himself, for Elizabeth, and for Brando. He did not seem concerned about members of the Jackson family, who at the time were also in New York.

In an interview with Vibe magazine, Michael said that "Marlon Brando was on one end of the hotel, his security was on the other end, and Elizabeth Taylor was at another hotel." In the wake of the attacks, after vehicular traffic was once again allowed in and out of Manhattan, instead of heading for an underground shelter, Elizabeth and Brando were hauled by Michael to a "secure location" somewhere in New Jersey.

It was sister Janet who eventually rescued those members of the Jackson clan remaining in New York. Since airplane transit in and out of the city had been disrupted, she rented Winnebagos to drive them back to California.

Later, Michael asked other major stars to join him in a post 9/11 tribute. Reporter Clay Risen revealed their reaction to Michael's request. He was turned down. "It couldn't have happened to a freakier guy," Risen wrote. "The King of Pop is a star pariah. Michael Jackson's invitation to sing on a September 11 tribute was turned down by a platoon of big-name stars."

Only weeks after the attack on the World Trade Center, Michael's lackluster Invincible album was released. He was hoping that income it generated would save him financially. But in eight months, it sold just six million copies worldwide, a poor return on the $40 million spent to produce it, and the $25 million Sony had spent to promote it.

By now, it appeared that Sony had lost its patience with Michael. As long as the pop star made money, they could overlook his eccentricities. When it appeared that he couldn't, one Sony executive confided, "Michael Jackson is a drain, a money pit."

"For a guy who sold Thriller, this can only be an indication of his diminishing popularity," said Tom Vickers, the music consultant. "Jackson is the last person to realize his fan base no longer exists," Vickers said. "For most people, he's the car wreck we slow down to rubber-neck. People have a ghoulish fascination that has little to do with his singing or dancing abilities and everything to do with his freakish looks and behavior. A shrinking core of devotees may continue to buy his music, but they can't sustain his lavish lifestyle. Mainstream interest in Michael Jackson as an artist is over!"

Craig Marks, editor of Blender, the music magazine, echoed similar sentiments. "I don't think he has earning potential on the music side anymore. He has it on the TV side, on the rubbernecking freak-show side. People will tune in to watch him do anything, but they don't buy his records any more. It's almost impossible to hear his records and not conjure up that scary, weird guy."

Invincible

One music executive said, "Our customers prefer the oldies-the darker complexion and the big nose."

Increasing numbers of critics were reappraising Michael's phenomenal music career. American writer and soul expert, Ben Edmonds, didn't see him as a fallen genius. "Everything about Michael Jackson's career has been so managed and produced that it's really hard to tell where his collaborators end and where he begins. In Thriller and Off the Wall, you don't really know how much of it is Michael and how much is Quincy Jones, the producer. We don't see him as a human being, but he might not see himself that way either. He may be like Andy Warhol: A completely empty vessel apart from his own fame. We just don't know, because we're never allowed to see beyond the surgically altered face."

Despite his legal troubles and declining record sales, Michael's ego, from all reports, had expanded greatly. Associates, even if speaking off the record, began to weigh in with informed opinions. One executive claimed that "Jackson wants to be in that pantheon that includes Mozart, Walt Disney, Elvis Presley-and let's throw in Fred Astaire and Gene Kelly for good measure."

Michael was reported to have said, "The rules that apply to common folk don't apply to me. I can get away with whatever I want because I'm Michael Jackson. I not only walk forward, but I can walk backward as well."

In December, after the September 11 attacks, National Enquirer reported that, "A bizarre-acting Michael Jackson is hooked on drugs and booze and his frightened family flew across the country to save his life." It was then reported that Michael had rejected his family's plea for him to seek treatment in a clinic such as Betty Ford that Elizabeth Taylor had previously recommended. "Michael is succumbing to drugs and alcohol," one source reported. He was hooked on Demerol and "drinking vast bottles of Jesus Juice," (i.e., wine). Demerol was said to have made him so mentally sluggish that he was "walking around his hotel suite like a zombie."

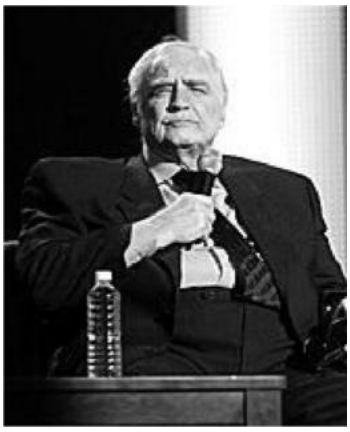
When Bob Jones was told that one can't believe what one reads in National Enquirer, the publicist said, "Well, that is just not the case. Over the years, so-called insiders and Jackson family members themselves sold stories to the Enquirer. Michael Jackson even sold pictures to the tabloid."



Marlon Brando, three years before his death

As a good friend, Marlon Brando tried to intervene to help Michael, asserting that Michael's appearance as a high-profile film actor could generate millions, thereby resolving many of his financial woes. As a means of improving his acting technique, Brando invited Michael to attend an acting workshop that he was teaching.

Critics have chastised, or ridiculed, Michael for "cross dressing," but he learned what cross dressing really was when he, along with Sean Penn, went to an acting class in Los Angeles presided over by Brando, who was holding private invitation-only acting workshops for special VIPs in Hollywood.

On the first day of class, the curtain opened to reveal the corpulent star dressed as a woman. Under a long blonde wig with the kind of scarlet lipstick Betty Grable and Lana Turner wore in World War II movies, Brando conducted the improvisation class. "I didn't want my acting classes to be a drag!" Brando later quipped to Sean Penn.

Driving his teacher home in a limo, Michael confessed to what he called "some astonishing news." He shared with Brando the fact that he was about to become a father for the third time, and presumably told Brando how he'd come to acquire a second son in his life.

Mysteriously Michael presented this other son to the world in February of 2002. The world learned that the child's name was Prince Michael II. Against overwhelming evidence, Michael still insisted that his first two children had been born "the natural way"-that is, his having had sex with Debbie Rowe. But insofar as this new child was concerned, he confessed that Prince Michael II was the result of artificial insemination, although in one interview he contradicted himself, stating that "I had a personal relationship with the mother."

Changing that testimony, a few weeks later he said that his own sperm cells were used with a surrogate mother. At one point he claimed that the mother was black, later stating that he didn't know the identity of the mother. It is highly unlikely that Prince Michael II is black, as the child is very blond, like a possible clone of Macaulay Culkin. Debbie Rowe testified that she didn't give birth to Michael's second son and that she doesn't know who his mother is.

MJ

The child became world famous in November of 2002 when Michael suspended the nine-month-old infant over the edge of a fiftyfoot balcony at the legendary (and massively restored) Adlon Hotel in Berlin, where, during the 1920s, Greta Garbo and Marlene Dietrich had carried on a torrid affair.

Stunned fans watched in horror as Michael precariously held the baby with only one hand and lifted him over the railing. Clad only in a romper suit, "Blanket"-his nickname-struggled to break free. A white cloth had been placed over his head to prevent the paparazzi and "crazed fans" from photographing him. Fortunately, Michael pulled the infant back to safety before he accidentally plunged to his death.

Responding to worldwide protests, Michael claimed that he'd held Blanket very tightly and that the infant was never in any real danger. "I got caught up in the excitement of the moment. I would never intentionally endanger the lives of my children."

Uri Geller, the psychic and Michael's friend, told the press that he suspected that Blanket wasn't really Blanket at all, but a fake child made of plastic. "Michael would never do such a thing like dangling a real child over that railing."

Liza Minnelli also rushed to Michael's defense. "I don't see a picture where he is dangling the child nervously. I see him holding him up above a railing for the press to say hello to the kid."

In California, child protection officers held secret talks to decide whether to inaugurate proceedings to determine if Michael were a fit father. They even debated the launch of a formal investigation. "Why on earth," reporter Alison Boshoff asked, "has this obviously disturbed man been allowed to father a brood of three `motherless' children in the first place?"

At the time he was dangling "Blanket," over the edge of the balcony in Berlin, The Independent Sunday in London concluded "The last decade of Michael Jackson's life has hardly been the most glorious phase of his career, but the events of the last six months have seen him slide downwards at unprecedented speed. If Jackson was ever the `King of Pop,' there seems little doubt that his crown has now been broken into small pieces."

On March 16, 2002, Michael stashed Blanket, along with his other two children, with nannies while he attended the most bizarre wedding of the year, the nuptials of his faithful friend, Liza Minnelli, who at the age of 55 was marrying David Gest, 48, another close friend of Michael's. Michael shared best man honors with his brother Tito. Elizabeth Taylor was matron of honor, sharing the position with Marisa Berenson.

The whole world knew who Minnelli was, of course, but Gest, the American TV producer and concert promoter, was little known outside the entertainment industry until his marriage to the great diva.

The couple met when Gest produced the 30th anniversary concert for Michael in New York in September of 2001. Three months later, and despite her track record in marriage, which had included an ill-fated union with the brilliant homosexual entertainer, Peter Allen, Minnelli was talking marriage once again.

Liza called Michael to tell him that, "I'm the happiest I've ever been. I nearly died, but I'm alive and dancing my buns off. Fuck encephalitis. Fuck hip replacements. Everything I've been through was worth it to find David."

Gest had known Michael since he was a teenager, and had even picked up memorabilia from the pop star, including a rhinestone-studded glove which "Mr. Minnelli" two years later offered for sale on eBay for $250,000. In an interview he gave Dateline NBC, Gest revealed that he grew up in Encino with the Jackson family as his neighbors. He claimed that "we played together and did everything normal kids do."

Not only was Gest a close friend of Michael's brother, Tito, he'd even dated La Toya, or so he claimed. As teenagers, Gest, Michael, and some of the Jacksons used to go to DuPars on Ventura Boulevard in Los Angeles to eat pancakes. In the back seat, Michael would take a squirt gun and shoot at Gest.

Michael and Gest shared at least one love in common. It was reported that one entire section of Gest's New York apartment was devoted to Shirley Temple memorabilia, evoking Michael's special room for the moppet star at Neverland.

Many friends intervened to try to prevent Minnelli from marrying Gest, but Michael reportedly approved of the marriage of "my two best friends." A close friend of Minnelli claimed, "Gest is forever courting old-time actresses like Jane Russell and Janet Leigh. We hope that Liza won't be used to satisfy David's desire for stardom."

At the time of his marriage to Minnelli, the press speculated about Gest's sexual orientation, but he always maintained that he was straight, citing that he had at one time been romantically linked to Ruth Warrick. Ms. Warrick, a 1940s film actress and soap opera diva, died in 2005 at the age of 89. An intimate friend of the author of this biography, she confided that there was and had never been a romance between Gest and herself-and that privately, "I knew he was gay."

The website, "NNDB-Tracking the Entire World," lists Gest's sexual orientation as a "matter of dispute."

The timing of the Minnelli/Gest wedding at New York's Marble Collegiate Church on Fifth Avenue was held up by Elizabeth, who forgot her shoes. She arrived at the wedding without makeup and wearing slippers. The wedding ceremony was delayed because Elizabeth had to send for her shoes back at her hotel, refusing to take part in the ceremonies until she had the proper footwear.

MJ dangling his child over a balcony in Berlin

After that, the ceremony went off with few hitches, even though Elizabeth seemed to struggle with the wedding rings until best man Michael intervened to help her.

Before entering the church, Michael, Elizabeth, and the other invited guests were searched for hidden cameras. Apparently, Gest and Liza had left word to search all guests, failing to provide an exemption for the famous best man and matron of honor. A full unit security team blanketed the wedding.

Hundreds of rubber-neckers lined Fifth Avenue to watch fleets of black limousines arriving with such guests as Gina Lollobrigida, Petula Clark, Tony Franciosa, Robert Wagner, Joan Collins, Carol Charming, Lauren Bacall, Janet Leigh, Mia Farrow, Patricia Neal, and Diana Ross. Turning down Liza's invitation were Elton John, Michael Douglas, and Liam Neeson.

"As long as David and Liza keep trying, they will make it," said actor Mickey Rooney, a long-time friend of Liza's mother, Judy Garland. "I wish them the best of luck." The bride walked down the aisle to the sounds of "Unforgettable," sung by Natalie Cole.

Liza had seventeen bridesmaids, Gest making do with only fifteen groomsmen. Performers at the reception ranged from an aging Tony Bennett to a troubled Whitney Houston.

The private planes rented, the hairdressers, the champagne, and buckets of Beluga caviar were paid for by a $600,000 offer from National Enquirer for exclusive photo coverage and a deal struck with a British tabloid. One source was quoted as saying, "Tabloid star darlings may poo-poo the supermarket rags, but their checks never bounce!"

As predicted, the Gest/Minnelli marriage didn't survive long, lasting a year and a half. In October of 2003, Gest sued his former wife for $10 million, claiming that she had "been violent and physically abusive" during their marriage, blaming it on her "persistent alcoholism," according to his affidavit. Minnelli denied the accusations, claiming that Gest was simply after money.

During the breakup of the Minnelli/Gest marriage, Michael was torn in his loyalties between his two friends, listening patiently to both sides of their stories. Gest returned that loyalty to Michael, maintaining his faith in Michael during the pop star's child molestation trial in 2005. Gest even wanted to produce yet another documentary, a TV special showing the accused child molester's "world." The estranged husband of Minnelli also vowed to be a friend to Michael whatever the outcome of his trial. "I can't just turn on him," Gest told the press. "I would feel very sad if Michael is convicted. I'm not gonna turn my back on him-that's not my style. Never has been."

But by May of 2006, Gest might have been wavering in his loyalty, as he announced that he was going to expose "some shocking revelations" about Michael in a forthcoming autobiography. He announced that among his upcoming "bombshell revelations," he knew "where the skeletons of the past are buried."

In his tell-all Gest promised to reveal "secrets regarding Michael Jackson's sex life." Gest's co-author, Mark Bego, told the press that Gest is going to reveal such tidbits as Joe Jackson paying a prostitute to have sex with his son and young Michael being propositioned for sex by a male record executive. After some of the other international headlines and revelations about Michael, these so-called "revelations" seemed Sunday school tame.

As for Minnelli, Gest said, "I know stories, but I don't know what will make it into print."

A wacko story released by the New York Post on July 12, 2006, was headlined GEST'S BED IS STRAIGHT. In it, Gest's burly British bodyguard, Imad Handi, claimed that his boss likes African-American women. "He would talk about what he did with women, and that he likes to use whipped cream and cherries," Handi told Post reporter Dareh Gregorian.

Handi issued these statements in reaction to a lawsuit filed by Charles Beyer in federal court. Beyer claimed that Gest and Handi sexually harassed him, charging Gest with making crude comments about his manhood: "I bet you have a small penis." Beyer also charged that Gest sent him lewd written communications which included the words: "Shake my penis, make sure it feels good, wash it in hot water and dip it in chocolate fudge." Beyer also charged that "Mr. Minnelli" grabbed "my rear end on several occasions and once grabbed my crotch." In spite of the Post headline, the story did little to convince New Yorkers that Gest was indeed as straight as he has claimed.

When Michael returned to New York later that summer, it was not to attend a wedding but to launch "the press war of 2002." Bitterly disappointed over his declining record sales, he took on Sony in a counteroffensive. First, he made the false accusations that Sony had demanded $200 million "to pay them back for marketing costs." Sony had done no such thing-in fact, Sony had invested millions of its own funds in what could only be called a disappointing comeback for Michael.

Stewing in his juices, Michael struck back a few weeks later, viciously attacking Sony mogul, Tommy Mottola.

Earlier in the day, in Harlem, Michael had denounced Tommy Mottola as a racist. "He's very, very devilish," he charged. Michael brandished a poster of Mottola with horns superimposed on his head, a tail on his posterior, and a pitchfork in hand. He also claimed that Sony had not "done enough" to back Invincible because Michael was black. "That's the first time I ever heard Michael call himself black," said a music critic for Rolling Stone magazine.

Many singers who had previously signed with Sony, including Ricky Martin and Mariah Carey, defended Mottola. But members of the Jackson clan backed Michael, claiming that racism had ended their professional relationship with Sony.

The charges of racism were ridiculously false. Mottola had previously been married to Mariah Carey, who is part black.

For support Michael picked up such heavyweights as the Rev. Al Sharpton and his former attorney, Johnnie Cochran. The pop star was demanding that a commission be set up to investigate all record companies-not just Sony-to see if they were exploiting black recording artists.

Sharpton later said that when he made the appearance with Michael, he didn't know the pop star would attack Mottola as racist. Privately Sharpton didn't seem to agree with Michael's slander. Sharpton claimed that Mottola had "always been supportive of the black music industry."

"Music moguls are liars," Michael claimed. "They manipulate history. If you go to the record store at the corner, you won't see one black face. You'll see Elvis Presley and The Rolling Stones. The attack on me began after I broke Elvis's sales and The Beatles's sales. It's a conspiracy. I was called a freak, a homosexual, and a child molester."

Only 150 rag-tag but diehard fans in New York joined Michael in his pathetic protest. At one point Michael falsely accused Mottola of using "the N-word."

Sony shot back, calling Michael's remarks, "ludicrous, spiteful and hurtful." Nonetheless, allegations of racism by Michael put pressure on Sony to sever ties with Mottola. By January of 2003, he was no longer head of Sony Music Entertainment.

After attacking Sony, Michael decided to pitch a sequel of Moonwalk to a group of publishers meeting in Stamford, Connecticut. In a new autobiography he was envisioning, he would "set the record straight," perhaps another one of his Freudian slips.

He bitterly attacked the interview Diane Sawyer had done with him for ABCs Primetime. This startled the publishers, because Sawyer had herself been attacked for a "candy ass" interview in which she'd "sucked up" to Michael, allowing him to deliver his version of the child molestation questions.

The wedding party: David Gest, Liza, MJ, & Liz

One of her rivals, who didn't want to be named, accused Sawyer of "ass-kissing. For an exclusive interview, Sawyer sacrificed her journalistic integrity. I didn't believe a word Michael said. He should have paid ABC and put Sawyer on his payroll."

"How could Sawyer do that to me?" Michael asked the assembled publishers. "She should have categorically denied that I was a pedophile on nationwide TV." What was not asked was how could Sawyer know if Michael were a pedophile or not?

Before the publishers departed from his hotel suite, Michael assured them, "I'm just a regular all-American guy. Nothing more, nothing less." The stunned publishers filed out, heading for the hotel bar.

The next day Michael told an executive at Simon & Schuster that he was considering retiring from the music world and devoting the rest of his life to writing children's books. The publisher assured him that S&S would be delighted to look at any children's book that he might write.

After the Stamford meeting, no publisher got back to Michael with an offer to print his second installment of memoirs. Michael was shocked by the lack of interest, having told associates that "my new memoirs will make millions." The project died.

Michael felt humiliated at the rejection. Later that summer, on August 29, 2002, more embarrassments were on the way, some of them exhibited and played out in public. At MTV's Annual Video Music Awards, Britney Spears presented Michael with a birthday cake, making an offhand remark that he was "The Artist of the Millennium."

In a rambling acceptance speech, Michael accepted a trophy that was meaningless. Everyone on stage received the same trophy. Nonetheless, Michael seemed to assume that he was actually being honored as "Artist of the Millennium." In a subsequent remark allegedly delivered by Spears, she may have said, "Michael Jackson should be singing `Fly Me to the Moon.' He's already on Jupiter."

Michael faced more rejection and ridicule when writers filed their reports of the event. MTV quickly announced that Michael was mistaken, claiming that the channel had "merely wanted to wish him many returns on his birthday." More media attacks were on the way.

Forbes called his career "a franchise in demise." Soon his critics were calling him "Pop's Lost Boy." Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, on CNN, said, "My criticism of Michael is his self-absorption. The whole celebrity thing, where he needs to feel like he's worshipped." As one former fan on the web said, "Michael Jackson loves fairy tales. He's become a fairy tale and even Neverland can't contain him as he wanders over the rainbow. Sorry, Michael, but that pot of gold has eluded you now."

Michael's troubled year of 2002 concluded on a sour note. The magazine, People, named him "the biggest loser" of 2002. The pop star beat out George Michael (arrested in a men's toilet) and Robert Blake (charged with the murder of his wife) as the winner of that dubious honor.

People wasn't the only magazine causing trouble for Michael. Unknown to him, additional revelations about his private activities were being investigated for publication in Vanity Fair.

Just when the world thought it had heard every bizarre story ever associated with Michael Jackson, along came "Michael watcher" Maureen Orth. Vanity Fair's April, 2003 issue contained an article she had authored. In it, she revealed that Michael had paid $150,000 for the activation of a "voodoo curse" to kill former friends-now "A-list enemies"-Steven Spielberg and David Geffen.

The actual voodoo ceremony, according to Orth, occurred in 2000. In Switzerland Michael was said to have undergone a "blood bath" as part of the ritual. Presumably "blood bath" meant that Michael had actually bathed in blood. One can only speculate in wonder at that claim. In a separate lawsuit that Myung-Ho Lee, the star's former business manager, filed it was revealed that Michael ordered him to wire the $150,000 to a bank in Mali, into an account controlled by a voodoo chief named "Baba." Baba was expected to sacrifice forty-two cows as part of an extended ceremony, Vanity Fair reported.

The story left a lot of unanswered questions. What was the link between Switzerland and the voodoo priest in Mali? Where did the killing of the cows take place? Presumably in Mali. Or one might ask an even more provocative question. Is this widely published story really true?

The witch doctor was said to have intoned a series of chants during the massacre of the cows. The individual name of each recipient of the curse was articulated before a cow's head was chopped off. "David Geffen be gone! Steven Spielberg be gone!"

In the Vanity Fair article, it was revealed that twenty-five persons made Michael's list of people he wanted dead. He was assured by the voodoo witch doctor that everyone whose name appeared on the list would "soon be dead." An immediate mass demise of everyone on the list never happened, according to reports, but we can't be sure about the long-term affects of the blood-drenched voodoo ceremony. After all, only the names of Geffen and Spielberg were revealed in the article. It is not known who the other 23 intended victims were, but surely it included some prosecutors in the Santa Barbara area.

Tommy Mottola

Shortly thereafter appeared yet another bizarre story in Vanity Fair, alleging that Michael, in addition to placing curses on perceived enemies, had made several serious (at least for him) attempts to create money "out of thin air." A mysterious Egyptian woman, claiming links to the ruling elite of Saudi Arabia, appeared in Michael's life.

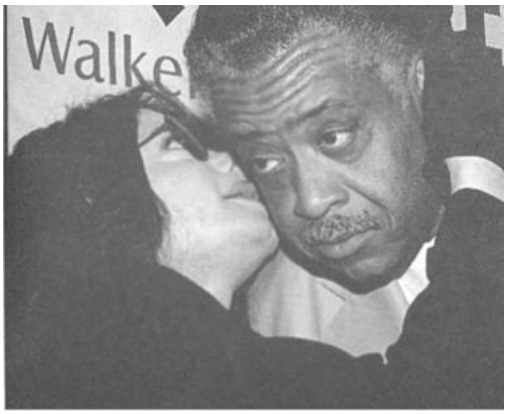
The Egyptian woman, once called "a modern-day Cleopatra," was identified only as "Samia." She is alleged to have escorted Michael to a basement apartment in the Swiss city of Geneva where she reportedly showed him $300 million in cash. She promised him that he could have the money and a multimillion-dollar yacht stashed at a port on the French Riviera, plus a spectacular European villa "if you do what I ask."

Her demands were articulated in detail when three of her male associates flew into Los Angeles where they were driven to Neverland for a private meeting with Michael to discuss the deal. At the meeting, according to Myung-Ho Lee, Michael was ordered to produce one million dollars in cash. Lee also testified that he paid $20,000 to an armored truck company to deliver the million dollars. Of course, if someone had $300 million in a bathtub, stashed away, why would they need a million from Michael? It seems insane that someone would give Michael $300 million, plus a yacht and villa, in exchange for a million in cash.

It is not known if Michael turned over the money that day or not. According to Lee, he was flown by Michael back to Geneva to consult yet another voodoo doctor who put on a "show of sound, lights, and pigeons" before opening the door to reveal a bathtub filled with $50 million. According to testimony, this new voodoo man said that the money would disappear unless Michael paid "thousands of dollars for the slaughter of poultry and other animals." Again, this story raises far more questions than it answers. It, in fact, makes no sense at all.



MJ whispering to the Rev. Al Sharpton

Perhaps the voodoo story would never have surfaced if Lee hadn't brought a lawsuit against his former employer. Lee's lawsuit was inaugurated at the same time that approximately fifty legal procedures were being filed against the pop star annually. By 2000, Michael had become the most frequently sued performer in the history of the entertainment industry. Aside from child molestation charges, most persons suing Michael charged him with unpaid bills.

In an interview on The O'Reilly Factor for Fox News Network, Bill O'Reilly questioned Maureen Orth. After reviewing, on camera, the voodoo charges she had raised in Vanity Fair, she then cast doubt on Michael's muchlauded charity work. "I think he's manipulating his own image," Orth said. "He's declaring he's a champion of children and children's charities, but the charities aren't raising any money. There's $100,000 that was given to one charity, shuffled over to another, that is now being investigated for not being reported properly."

More and more people, not just Vanity Fair, were realizing there was money to be made in exposing the private life of Michael.

Within the passenger compartment of a private jet flying from Las Vegas to Santa Barbara, two "buggers" filmed and recorded Michael during private conversations, perhaps hoping to sell the footage to the tabloids. It was revealed that the owner of XtraJet, Jeffrey Borer, had instructed Arvel Jett Reeves, owner of Executive Aviation which provided maintenance for the fleet, to install the secret video equipment.

It is not clear how the secret recording came to the attention of law enforcement officials. Perhaps an employee of the airline tipped off authorities, who investigated and found that indeed an illegal recording device was used. In March of 2006, within a Los Angeles courtroom, each of them pleaded guilty to one felony count of conspiracy. Borer was sentenced to six months of home detention and fined $10,000. Reeves was sentenced to eight months in prison and ordered to spend six additional months in a halfway house-and to pay a $1,000 fine.

Michael's biggest expose was yet to come, this time on television.

On February 6, 2003, ABC broadcast a two-hour documentary produced by Britain's Granada Television, featuring correspondent Martin Bashir, the British television journalist known for a notorious interview he had inaugurated with Princess Diana. In that interview, Di had spoken of her lover, James Hewitt, and her husband's mistress, Camilla Parker Bowles.

MJ presented with an award by Britney Spears

Bashir's interview with Michael was one of the most controversial TV shows ever aired and it would have devastating effects on the pop star's personal life. In one of the most foolish decisions of Michael's life, he granted Bashir "unfettered access" to many aspects of his private life for an astonishing total of eight months. After watching the broadcast in horror, Michael immediately filed complaints with the Broadcasting Standards Commission and Britain's Independent Television Commission.

When the TV show was aired in Britain in February of 2003, some 15 million Brits had tuned in. To be granted air rights Stateside, ABC paid anywhere from $4 to $5 million.

In tears, Michael confessed that the raw wound of his father's alleged sadism made Michael "regurgitate" whenever he saw him.

Bashir went on to question Michael about plastic surgery. In an astonishing statement and in spite of overwhelming evidence to the contrary, Michael still insisted that he'd had only two operations on his nose to help him breathe better so that he could hit the high notes of his vocal range.

Teresa Wiltz, writing in The Washington Post, said, "Perhaps the most poignant is the scene where Michael sits with Bashir in his movie screening room, watching old television of himself performing `I Want You Back' with The Jackson 5. The camera jumps from the young Michael-cute, brown, innocent to the middle-aged Michael-ravaged, white, and clinging to the illusion of innocence, and that moment says more than nearly two hours of shock TV that comprises Living With Michael Jackson."

Michael admitted that he'd wanted children so badly that he often walked compulsively around Neverland, playing with baby dolls.

But, like any other parent, he also showed that he could become annoyed with his child. When Blanket cried, Michael brusquely shoved a baby bottle in the veiled infant's mouth to shut him up.

In the interviews with Bashir, Michael freely admitted that he slept with young boys in his bed. As an afterthought, he added that "little girls were also included." According to staff members at Neverland, there is no evidence that Michael ever slept with young girls.

One of MJ's victims?

In the most astonishing of the interview's footage, Gavin Arvizo, a 12-year-old cancer survivor who would later bring charges against him, sits cuddling with Michael, his head nuzzling against the star's shoulder. Gavin clutches Michael's hand, relaying testimony about spending many a night in Michael's bed, and seemingly not aware at the time of how damning these revelations were.

"Why can't you share your bed?" Michael asked on the program. "The most loving thing is to share your bed with someone. I am Peter Pan."

Bashir reminded him that "you're Michael Jackson." "I'm Peter Pan in my heart," Michael countered.

On camera, Bashir also documented Michael's big-spending habits that showed very few signs of slowing down, despite his dwindling cash reserves. On camera, Michael was shown spending $100,000 in two hours on clothing in a New York store. But the most astonishing footage showed him spending $6 million in Las Vegas on art objects which included antique urns, vases, and a marble chess set.

The broadcast was seen by 27 million viewers around the world. Later, Michael claimed that the footage was deliberately edited to portray him in a bad light.

This set off a feeding frenzy among the media, Fox alone offering $5 million to broadcast out-takes. The out-takes were eventually shown, with Marc Schaffel, the gay porn producer, emerging as the orchestrator of the deal. On that show, Michael claimed-once again-only two trips to the plastic surgeon, but later, on NBC's Dateline, partly in reaction to that statement, a plastic surgeon was interviewed, insisting that the star had had as many as 50 separate operations on his face.

In November of 2003, Michael needed money, but seemed to be in no shape to release an all-new album. He was not above cannibalizing his past when he agreed to release his Number Ones album of previous hits.

The album recycled such by-now-familiar songs as "Beat It," "Billie Jean," and "Don't Stop 'Til You Get Enough." It also included the previously unreleased R. Kelly ballad, "One More Chance," which was sung by Michael. One of Michael's fans posted his reaction to this new release on the web. "R. Kelly should have kept the song to himself."

R. Kelly, of course, was one of the biggest-selling male vocal artists of the 1990s. Like Michael himself, Kelly frequently wears a mask, a Zorro mask. And also like Michael, he's had his problems with child molestation issues. In 1994, when he was in his 20s, he married R&B singer/actress Aaliyah, who was only 15 at the time, but the marriage was subsequently annulled. On August 25, 2001, Aaliyah and eight other people died when their plane crashed in The Bahamas.

Maureen Orth

In June of 2002, Kelly was arrested in Winter Haven, Florida, after prosecutors in Chicago indicted him on 21 felony counts of child pornography. The soul star was led away in handcuffs as fans gathered to shout "We love you," in much the same way they'd reacted to Michael. Kelly was eventually acquitted of the charges. Had he not been, he might have faced up to 15 years in prison.

Of course, Kelly's arrest had nothing to do with the sales of Michael's Number Ones album. It was Michael's own arrest that may have hurt sales. From reports, it appeared that Michael was too weak to produce an entire new album and was forced to cancel the announced Resurrection, which was to be the follow-up album to Invincible. Wanting to get something on the market, he released Number Ones instead, filled with recycled songs from his previous all-too-familiar repertoire.

Even though the songs it contained were recycled from earlier albums, the Number Ones album sold six million copies worldwide. Michael, who had predicted that at least forty million copies would be sold, defined this figure a great disappointment.

On November 16, 2003, Joe Jackson gave a now-infamous TV interview with Louis Theroux in which the father-often called a "ruthless Svengali"became furious at the suggestion that his famous son might be homosexual. "I can't stand gays!" Joe shouted. He was also asked if he'd like to see Michael settle down with a partner. Joe shot back, "What do you mean by `partner?"'

"A boyfriend or a girlfriend," Theroux replied.

The question seemed to infuriate Majestik Magnificent, Michael's former personal magician, who'd accompanied Joe to the interview. "He is Michael's father and you're going to sit there and say he has got a boyfriend. How much more disrespectful can you be? You should just say a girlfriend or wife, not insult Mr. Jackson."

When Theroux, on camera, asked why the question was disrespectful, Joe interrupted him. "Because we don't believe in gays. I'm sitting here saying right now, he's not with no boys. OK?"

Majestik then continued to object, on camera, protesting loudly, "Michael's not gay...You have to be gay to have a boyfriend and I'm telling you, Michael is not gay!"

Before walking angrily off the set, prior to the scheduled end of the interview, Joe claimed that he had never beaten his son. "You beat someone with a stick. I whipped him with a switch and a belt."

Two days after his father's interview, Michael was at the Mirage Hotel and Casino in Las Vegas, where he'd gone to shoot the video for R. Kelly's "One More Chance."

For nearly a month, Michael had been holed up at the hotel where a waiter reported that nearly three dozen boys, some of them "German or Austrian" were seen coming and going at all hours of the day and night. Inside his lavish suite, Michael was said to be drunk or drugged and hadn't dressed for three weeks, appearing in a long dashiki robe dyed a deep, almost purplish scarlet.

On the morning of November 18, 2003, an assistant manager of the hotel sent Michael an urgent message, asking him to evacuate the hotel that night. The other, usually affluent, residents of the hotel had lodged several complaints about the noise level, especially the blasting rap music heard day and night.

R. Kelly

"Somebody on Michael's staff seemed to be recruiting good-looking boys from the Strip," claimed a waiter. "All of them looked to be around sixteen, maybe older-none really very, very young."

Michael had demanded that food from room service be left at the door. But the assistant manager wanted to see firsthand the condition of Michael's suite to assess damages before evicting him from the hotel. Using a pass key he entered the suite to witness a scene of devastation. "It looked like a hurricane had blown through," he later said.

Elegant sofas and armchairs had been burned by cigarette butts. Liquor bottles were scattered everywhere. And since room service waiters weren't allowed in, rotting food had never been removed. Broken glasses with stale booze were seen everywhere. At first glance, it appeared that Michael would have to pay at least $50,000 in damages, maybe more. About seven young boys, some in jockey shorts, were sprawled about the suite.

From the bedroom, the assistant manager heard Michael's whispery voice. He appeared to be sobbing. "Oh, God, no!" Finally, he raised his voice in a bellowing rage. "Not again!"

It was only later that the assistant manager learned the news that Michael was hearing on the phone. Once again, Federal authorities had raided Neverland, based on allegations made by the 12-year-old boy, Gavin Arvizo, who had appeared all cuddly with Michael on the Martin Bashir TV documentary. Soon radio and television stations were carrying the news that an arrest warrant for Michael had been issued based on multiple charges of child molestation.

"Here we go again," Bob Jones said. "Only this time Michael may not escape the noose tightening around his neck."

"He loves genres that emphasize mutable identities, carefree cartoons and horror tales. And it's mutability that makes his dancing so special. That ability to turn a lames Brown funky chicken smoothly into Josephine Baker's knock-kneed Charleston. He has the ability to be liquid and percussive all at once, to create an aura of suspense and improvisation. "

--Michael Jackson Responding to a TV movie about his family's troubles

"Given Mr. Jackson's having shared his bedroom with boys, while not illegal in itself, was deeply troubling. Given the fact he was acquitted, but still highly suspected by many adversaries, he must never again submit himself to the appearance of wrongdoing. He really has to make that modification-and substantially so-and I think he will. I don't know any of his fans who would not advise him now to please avoid the appearance of impropriety. "

Chapter Fifteen

On November 18, 2003, some 70 investigators from the Santa Barbara County sheriff's and district attorney's offices stormed Neverland. A cabal of 20 officers were assigned to search the 2,700-acre ranch as part of an ongoing criminal investigation. No immediate arrests were made, and Michael remained in seclusion in Las Vegas. In case Michael had actually been in residence at Neverland, police also had an arrest warrant in addition to a search warrant.

Police officers spent two full days crawling over the ranch, looking for videos and photographic evidence. In Santa Barbara, Tom Sneddon, the district attorney, urged Michael to "get over here and get checked in." At the time, Michael was still in Las Vegas.

Michael charged that the raid on Neverland was deliberately timed to sabotage the release of his new album, Number Ones. Sneddon claimed he knew nothing about the release of any album. "Like the sheriff and I are into that kind of music," he said sarcastically.

Sneddon, who had failed to build a case against Michael in the Jordie Chandler scandal, seemed determined not to let that happen again. He told associates that "Jackson won't be able to moonwalk his way clear of the long arm of the law this time." Since 1993, California law had changed, and it was now permissible for prosecutors to force alleged child abuse victims to testify against their accused molesters. "The Jordies of the future can't be silenced with millions," Sneddon said.

Michael faced a formidable foe in Sneddon, who was serving his sixth term as the county district attorney. Sneddon had such a reputation for tenacity that he was called "Mad Dog" by his associates.

Michael had even written a song about the prosecutor calling it "D.S.," changing Sneddon's name to Dom Sheldon. The lyrics of Michael's song said he was being sought "dead or alive."

You know he really tried to take me
Down by surprise
I bet he missioned with the C.I.A.
He don't do half what he say
Dom Sheldon is a cold man
He out shock in every single way
He'll stop at nothing just to get his political way.

As news of the latest allegations of child molestation were leaked to the press, Stuart Backerman, spokesman for Michael, blasted them as "outrageous, false, and scurrilous. When the evidence is presented and the allegations proven to be malicious and wholly unfounded, Michael will be able to put this nightmare behind him."

Most of Michael's celebrity friends ran for cover when charges of child molestation were once again leveled against him. Not so 71-year-old Elizabeth Taylor, who slammed the media for acting "abominably" toward the entertainer. "I thought the law was `innocent until proven guilty.' I know he is innocent, and I hope the media all eat crow. I believe Michael will be vindicated."

Earlier in 2003, Elizabeth's friendship with Michael had been shaken when he didn't turn up for a date with her at Neverland. In anger, she refused to invite him to her star-studded birthday bash. But he repaired the fractured relationship when he sent her 1,000 sterling silver roses.

MJ's mugshot from the Santa Barbara County jail

The question on everybody's lips was, "Is it possible for a grown man to share his bed with pre-pubescent boys and not be guilty of something?" Oliver James, a psychologist, weighed in with his opinion: "It's quite clear that he has a kind of pedophile personality. The idea that he is regressed and is arrested in his development is one way of thinking about it, but if you want to know why he repeatedly has young boys in his home, that doesn't explain it. You have to look at the trauma that he suffered-physical abuse, being beaten up in a really vicious way, combined with some kind of sexual abuse."

Although some press reports main tamed that Michael's cohorts had placed him on "a suicide watch," he managed to pull himself together and fly on a leased Gulfstream IV plane from Las Vegas to Santa Barbara, where he was driven to the county jail.

On November 20, Michael, his hands cuffed behind his back, was led into the county jail and booked on charges of child molestation. Inside the Inmate Reception Center, he was fingerprinted and photographed. Later, before a field of microphones, he referred to the allegations against him as "a big lie."

Before his release, Michael posted $3 million bail and surrendered his passport. An arraignment was set for January 9, 2004, before a judge in the Santa Barbara Superior Court.

After the sheriff's department posted Michael's booking photograph on its website, Michael's dilemma became the most famous celebrity arrest in the history of entertainment, even more so than the time police arrested Frank Sinatra.

In the mug shot, Michael's heavily made up head tips to the right and his eyebrows are sharply arched. His wide-open eyes were later compared to those of Joan Crawford. He'd painted his thin lips a scarlet red, and his nose looked chiseled, the result of countless plastic surgeries.

Specific charges against Michael were not defined with any specific detail or legalese at the time, but police revealed that they would include multiple counts of "lewd and lascivious acts with a child under the age of 14."

Emerging from the jail after his booking, Michael waved and flashed a Vfor-victory sign at screaming fans. He blew a kiss to photographers before stepping into a dark Chevrolet Suburban with opaque windows. He was then driven to the airport for his return to Las Vegas.

Back in Las Vegas, he moved into the penthouse suite of the Regency Tower at the Las Vegas Country Club, the same building where sister La Toya has a condo. En route to Nevada, Michael dressed in drag-black flowing clothes and a dark hat as well as a veil.

MJ's fans with gestures of support

Katherine Jackson angrily responded to the charges, claiming that "there are two sets of rules in this country-one for the white people and the other for the black people."

His mother wasn't the only family member weighing in on the side of Michael's defense. In an interview with CNN, Jermaine proclaimed Michael's innocence. "I'm sick and fucking tired of people," he angrily said. "This is nothing but a modern-day lynching."

In the wake of his arrest, the damage to Michael's singing career was immediate. In February of 2003, ABC, NBC, and Fox had each won huge ratings by exposing bizarre aspects of Michael's private lifestyle to the world at large. But in November of the same year, following the latest police raid on Neverland, intense pressure was put on CBS to cancel a music special which had been scheduled for airing on November 26 and linked to Michael's latest album, Number Ones, his collection of previous hits.

In an article that appeared in The New York Times, Alessandra Stanley predicted that if CBS had actually gone ahead and shown the program, "many millions would certainly watch. His fans aside, people watch Mr. Jackson for the same reasons they watched O.J. Simpson's Bronco ride, forest fires in California, and the finale of The Bachelor. It's scary, grotesque, and fascinating."

As his defense attorney, Michael hired Mark Geragos, the son of an Armenian-American lawyer, who was at the time also handling the Scott Peterson murder case. Geragos insisted that he could easily juggle the two cases. Geragos had previously won two high-profile acquittals-one for Whitewater scandal figure Susan McDougal and another for Roger Clinton, Bill's half-brother, on a drunken driving charge. He'd also defended stickyfingered actress Winona Ryder during her shoplifting trial.

In response to Michael's detractors, Geragos said, "What we have here is an intersection between a shakedown-someone who's looking for moneywith somebody doing an investigation who has an ax to grind."

He was referring, of course, to Tom Sneddon's "ax." Geragos claimed that the boy fabricated the kiddie sex story in the hopes of a payoff that was equivalent to the $25 million that was paid out to Jordie Chandler in 1993.

Paul Barresi

With the exception of Elizabeth, most celebrities, including Lisa Marie, issued a "No comment!" to the press, Virtually everybody else who had worked for Michael or been employed by him weighed in with an opinion as to his guilt or innocence.

Paul Barresi, a former legman for the controversial private investigator Anthony Pellicano, who at the time was in prison, revealed Michael's "modus operandi for entertaining children. First, he wins the parents over. They become just as mesmerized as the kids. Then he puts the parents in separate buildings. He naps all day intermittently with the kids in the tepee or different places so that kids are well rested. Then he frolics and plays with the kids all through the night while the parents are sleeping."

At first the name of Michael's teenaged accuser, charging him with sexual molestation, was either not known to the press or else known but not revealed by the media because of his age.

But soon his name would become a household word. Gavin Arvizo was born in 1989 to David Arvizo and Janet Ventura-Arvizo in California. He had an older sister, Davellin, and a younger brother named Star. Ironically, Gavin's mother, who eventually would acrimoniously divorce her 37-year-old truck driver husband, David, would become "Janet Jackson" because of her marriage in 2004 to U.S. Army major Jay Jackson.

Born into a poor Latino family, Gavin lived with his parents, his brother, and his sister, in a rough urban neighborhood in East Los Angeles. Their home was a box-like studio apartment. At one point they were so poor they'd lived in a horse stable.

The question repeatedly asked by the media was how Gavin came to meet Michael in the first place. The Arvizos had read countless stories about Michael's involvement with Jordie Chandler, which could have alerted them to the potential danger associated with having their underage son hang out with the pop superstar.

Eventually the story of how Michael met Gavin came to light: In 2002, Gavin lay in a hospital bed in Hollywood suffering from a cancerous tumor in his stomach. He was befriended by Jaime Masada, the owner of the Los Angeles comedy club, Laugh Factory, who also ran a summer camp for underprivileged kids. Masada promised Gavin that if he'd start eating and building up his strength, he'd introduce him to any star he wished to meet. Gavin listed Chris Tucker, Adam Sandler, and Michael Jackson in that order.

Jaime Masada

Masada managed to get Tucker and Sandler to visit Gavin, and eventually he even contacted Michael himself. Masada later expressed his regrets for having introduced Gavin to Michael. "You hate to think you may have brought the boy to the lion."

Michael called the hospital and spoke to Gavin when he was only 10 years old, shortly after he'd had a 16-pound tumor removed from his stomach. The pair became friends and Michael invited Gavin, with his family, to Neverland. But the friendship did not last and calls from Michael eventually ceased. However, in 2002 Michael called Gavin again. "You want to be an actor, right? I'm going to put you in the movies." The "part," it turned out, was in the Bashir TV documentary. After appearing within the documentary, Gavin became Michael's beloved "Doo Doo Head," the star's nickname for his new pet.

Neverland staff member Talia Mandel reported on Gavin's appearance during his first visit to Neverland. "He was really sick-looking and pale. He was little and skinny and had no hair and no eyebrows as a result of cancer treatments. He told me that Michael was helping him recover from cancer, but I don't know exactly what he was doing."

According to Gavin's claims, Michael did not begin to abuse him until after his appearance in the Bashir TV documentary. The show was filmed in 2002 and was not aired until 2003.

During the very few months when Michael got to know his future enemies, Janet and her son, Gavin, they had the run of Neverland. As poor people from the ghetto, Gavin and Janet felt they'd arrived at paradise on earth. Just as Michael had seduced Jordie Chandler's family, so he set out to woo the Arvizos with a lavish lifestyle and expensive presents.

He paid for Gavin's mounting medical expenses, and he hired a limousine to take him to and from chemotherapy sessions. When Janet separated from her husband, David, Michael even leased an apartment in Los Angeles for her new boyfriend. Janet asked all her children to call Michael "Daddy" when "Sugar Daddy" might have been a more appropriate term.

Gavin Arvizo

The honeymoon ended after Gavin revealed during his statements on the Bashir TV documentary that he was sharing Michael's bed at night. Massive criticism, exacerbated by Gavin's cuddly appearance, followed in the wake of the program. Janet claimed that Michael had not secured permission from her for Gavin to appear on the show.

Later, Michael came to Janet and got her permission to allow Gavin to appear on Michael's own TV show, which was being produced as a formal "rebuttal" to the Bashir documentary. Consequently, Michael dispatched his videographer to tape an interview with the Arvizos, during which they would insist that Michael's relationship with Gavin was innocent and pure.

During that taped interview, Janet issued a statement that would later be used against her at Michael's trial in 2005. "I'm appalled at the way my son has been exploited by Martin Bashir. The relationship that Michael has with my children is a beautiful, loving, father-sons-and-daughter one. To my children and me, Michael is part of my family."

In front of cameras, Janet went on to claim that Michael was "good to us-in no way were we unhappy with anything he has said or done."

"If Michael knew at the time that they were going to make these accusations, making this tape was obviously a crafty thing to do," Michael's personal videographer, Hamid Moslehi, later said.

At the time, Janet also signed an affidavit clearing the pop star of any wrongdoing. However, in November of 2003 she claimed that she was "confused and coerced" when she put her signature on the document.

On February 18, 2003, after being besieged with complaints from all over the country, the Santa Barbara Sheriff's Office began a formal investigation. The Santa Barbara District Attorney, Tom Sneddon, seemed only too willing to endorse a child molestation case against Michael again, having failed to inaugurate a trial in the Jordie Chandler case after the boy was bought off.

It has never been determined what went wrong between Michael and the Arvizos. One day they were singing his praises to authorities, but within weeks they turned on him. Janet consulted with attorney Larry Feldman, the lawyer who had represented Jordie Chandler in his case against Michael in 1993.

Then Feldman arranged for Gavin to be interviewed by Dr. Stan Katz, a psychologist. Gradually, during a series of interviews with the psychologist, Gavin related incidents of alleged child molestation by Michael. The case heated up when Katz, in compliance with the laws of California, was obligated to turn his reports over to state authorities.

Janet Arvizo Jackson

Katz told authorities that he believed that the Arvizo family had not been honest in their previous testimony and now were coming forward with the truth.

In April of 2003, the Santa Barbara County Sheriff's Department had more or less concluded its investigation without unearthing any really damaging evidence against Michael. But in June of that year, the Sheriff's Department received Katz's damaging report, in which allegations were made that child molestation had indeed taken place despite previous denials of wrongdoing from the boy's family. After the receipt of the Katz conclusions, members of the Sheriff's Department began interviewing family members, especially Janet and Gavin, for inconsistencies in their previous stories.

It was learned that the relationship between Janet and Michael had soured when she blew up after being told that he had served her cancer-stricken son wine, which she maintained "might have killed Gavin." Later, she would learn about more serious charges, including claims that Michael had masturbated her son and even taken nude pictures of him at Neverland.

During the course of their own pre-trial investigation, Michael's defense members discovered a scandal involving the Arvizo family. On August 27, 1998, they had been caught in a shoplifting sting in a JC Penney store in West Covina, California.

Both boys had been sent out of the store with concealed clothing which hadn't been paid for. Janet would later claim that her sons were modeling clothes for the chain, although there was absolutely no evidence of this.

Security detained both the father and mother, plus their two sons, including Gavin, age 8, charging them with stealing clothing. Both the Arvizos were arrested and charged with theft and battery, for allegedly hitting the security guards. The charges were dismissed on March 11, 1999 in Los Angeles Municipal Court.

In a counter offensive, Janet then filed a $3 million civil complaint against the store, charging that their boys were "beaten, battered, falsely arrested, falsely imprisoned and falsely accused of criminal conduct" by store personnel.

Two years later she added a new charge to her original complaint, claiming that during her arrest by two male security guards she was "sexually fondled on my breasts and pelvic area." A psychiatrist hired by the store claimed that she'd rehearsed her sons to back up this outrageous story that seemed "suddenly remembered" at the last moment.

Gavin Arvizo with MJ

In yet another outrageous claim, she charged that she'd suffered broken bones during the fray. Not only that, but that both Star and Gavin had also suffered broken bones during the incident, although there was no medical record at the time to support such a charge. David Arvizo seemingly didn't want to get involved with the charges. He was having his own problems with Janet, as they headed for the divorce courts.

In an out-of-court settlement, JC Penney agreed to give the Arvizos $137,500 to avoid the expense of litigation and possibly an even larger and more damaging award from a jury.

During the period when the Arvizos were filing charges against Michael, David, because of his ongoing feud with his former wife, had had no contact with Gavin or his other children during the previous 18 months. But he defended Michael as "a class act whose parenting skills always seemed good when I was around. When my son was very sick and had not eaten for 18 days, Michael got on the phone and prayed for him. When Gavin lost his hair from the chemotherapy, Michael was the one who told him he was still handsome. Michael took him out and showed him the stars in the sky."

Ironically, as David was praising Michael's parenting skills, his own were coming under fire. On September 29, 2001, he had been charged with inflicting bodily injury on a current spouse. He pleaded no contest to spousal abuse and was sentenced to 60 days in jail, plus three years probation.

David, or so it was claimed, kept his daughter a prisoner in his car for 2'/z hours threatening "to kill your mom and your whole family." The teenage girl, at the time aged 15, told the police that the incident happened outside her school on November 13, 2001. Consequently, the judge issued a restraining order, stating that David was not to come within 100 yards of his former wife, Janet, or any of their three children.

On November 13, 2001, David violated the restraining order and allegedly beat all three of his children, including Gavin. On June 25, 2002 he pleaded no contest to one count of child abuse-one that involved his daughterand consequently, the other charges were dropped. He was sentenced to one year in prison and also ordered to enroll in one year of parenting classes.

The local press also joined in the attempt to discredit the Arvizos, especially Janet. News broke that Janet had falsely solicited funds for Gavin's medical bills during his treatment for cancer, even though, according to Celebrity Justice, medical bills had been paid in full by Gavin's father. "Janet Arvizo is after money," charged Connie Keenan, editor of the Mid Valley News in Southern California. On a TV talk show, Keenan charged, "my gut level-she's a shark!"

In the months before the trial, as Michael's legal team dug up whatever dirt they could on the Arvizos, Santa Barbara prosecutors were also busy hunting witnesses-in all cases young boys-who might testify that Michael had molested them. The office cast a wide net.

One boy of "special interest" to the DA was found to be living in El Salvador, another in South Africa. Police were also said to be quizzing the son of a professional athlete in England. Sneddon, the prosecutor, was going over all the evidence seized in raids very carefully, including explicit letters and poems said to have been written by Michael to Gavin.

The Jackson family was outraged when Jeremy Jackson, the son of Michael's oldest brother, Jermaine, was questioned by police. The boy was asked, "Did your uncle ever have an improper contact with you?" The nephew denied that any impropriety had ever taken place.

On December 18, 2003 Michael was charged with molesting Gavin seven times and subjecting the boy to "substantial sexual conduct." The allegations appeared in a nine-count complaint.

Michael was hit with charges of committing a lewd act on a child and two counts of plying the boy with an "intoxicating agent." The incidents, according to court documents, occurred in February and March of 2003.

On Christmas night of 2003, Michael sat down with correspondent Ed Bradley, giving his first interview since his arrest to the 60 Minutes reporter.

"Before I would hurt a child, I would slit my wrists," Michael insisted to Bradley. He restated his belief that "it's fine to sleep with children why not? If you're going to be a pedophile, if you're going to be Jack the Ripper, if you're going to be a murderer, it's not a good idea. That I'm not."

He also claimed that "I won't live at Neverland ever again. It's a house now it's not a home anymore. I'll only visit." He also told 60 Minutes that police "manhandled me" at the time of his arrest, and he claimed that "I'm still in pain it's hurting me very badly. I'm in pain all the time." He said he suffered a dislocated shoulder from the way he was cuffed and handled during his arrest.

He also charged that he was locked in a toilet for 45 minutes after he asked to use the facilities. He said the room was smelly because feces were thrown all over.

The Santa Barbara County Sheriff's Department refuted Michael's charges, claiming he was "treated with courtesy and professionalism throughout the arrest and booking process."

Michael wasn't the only Jackson family member involved in scandals. La Toya had created nationwide sensations when she'd posed in a state of partial undress for Playboy in March of 1989 and again in November of 1991. On February 1, 2004 sister Janet was involved in "Nipplegate" at Super Bowl XXXVIII in Houston, Texas.

During the Super Bowl's halftime show, Justin Timberlake and Janet reached the final line of their suggestive song, singing "I'm gonna have you naked by the end of this song." Timberlake theatrically, and unexpectedly, pulled off a strategic part of Janet's costume, revealing a view of her right breast to millions of viewers on live TV. The rather ample breast was adorned with a large, sun-shaped nipple shield, a piece of jewelry worn to accentuate the appearance of a nipple piercing. In horror, CBS producers immediately ordered their cameramen to cut to an aerial view of the stadium. But Janet's breast had already been broadcast around the world. In the aftermath, a record-breaking 200,000 Americans lodged complaints against CBS.

Both Janet and Timberlake stated that the exposure was a case of "wardrobe malfunction." No one believed them.

Reporter Keith Olbermann wrote, "Well, look at it this way. In an incredible role reversal, a Jackson is accused of having their clothes intentionally ripped off them by a boy."

Michael was reported to be either "horrified" at the incident, or else "amused." Take your pick.

Michael's friend, Marlon Brando, wasn't one of the 200,000 people complaining. He told friends that "Janet had balls" to pull a stunt like that, revealing that one of his favorite pastimes when he was her age was "mooning."

Janet, apres nipplegate

Former friends had deserted Michael in the wake of his scandal, and he was sorry to hear that his sister's career had also been damaged. It was reported that soon after the incident, Lena Horne cancelled a project wherein Janet would have portrayed her in a filmed retrospective of her life. But, like Elizabeth Taylor, Brando remained a faithful friend to Michael until the very end.

Early in 2004, when Brando ventured out of his house for the last time, it was to visit Michael at Neverland and to sympathize with his plight. Reportedly, Brando warned Michael not to press the charge of police brutality too strongly because if he couldn't prove it, it might hurt his credibility later on as a witness in his own defense.

Apparently he said nothing to Michael about child molestation, but later expressed misgivings about Michael's relationships with young boys.

Whatever "misgivings" Brando might have had about Michael might have been revealed to confidants, but they were never revealed to California's legal authorities.

As part of what was referred to as "the biggest witch hunt since the Spanish Inquisition," the Los Angeles D.A.'s office called in Marlon Brando for questioning about what he knew of the sexual abuse charges leveled against Michael. Officers questioned the corpulent star for an astonishing seven hours before letting him go.

Michael was known to place long late-night calls to Brando, from whom he sought advice on personal matters. An officer in the D.A.'s office claimed, "We wanted to know just how personal those matters were and did they concern boy love." Reportedly, Brando denied knowing anything about Michael's sex life and claimed that the pop star had never confided "anything pertinent in the abuse case."

While at the D.A.'s office, Brando learned that Brooke Shields, who had "dated" Michael, had also been subpoenaed. Why she was called was not made clear, but she duly appeared without counsel, although there was no information that she had that was pertinent to the Arvizo case.

The final conversation between Brando and Michael was strictly private, but sources close to Brando reported that the actor made Michael a final promise. "If any of those child molestation charges ever stick to you, I'll get you out of the country and get you a safe refuge in Tahiti. Don't worry. I can do it!"

This was no idle promise on Brando's part. On June 5, 2003, the actor granted Michael sanctuary on one of the Pacific islands he owned "for the rest of Jackson's natural life." Brando transferred unrestricted use of a half-acre on the islet of Onetahi in the French Polynesian atoll of Tetiaroa to Michael.

Brando died of lung failure at the age of 80 on July 1, 2004. Some of the star's ashes, along with those of his long-time lover, Wally Cox, who had died in 1973, were scattered in Death Valley. The rest of Brando's ashes were spread in Tahiti where he maintained several real estate investments and a private island.

Michael was reported to have "cried for three days and nights" upon learning of the death of his beloved mentor.

After the actor's death, when news of Brando's "misgivings" about Michael's involvement with young boys was leaked to the press, some friends wondered if Brando's criticism of Michael wasn't a case of the pot calling the kettle black.

A former business manager for Brando, Joan Corrales, weighed in with an opinion. She'd been fired by "The Godfather" as co-executor of his will only 12 days before he died. Subsequently, she filed a $5 million wrongful termination suit in Los Angeles. She not only charged him with sexual harassment for exposing his genitals to her, but she claimed that he had a "disturbing" attraction to underage girls and vividly described his "terrible fixation" on minors.

"Brando derived pleasure from sharing his stories of sexual exploitation-including his sexual escapades with minors," Corrales charged.

In her testimony, she confirmed that the rotund recluse had deeded a Polynesian island sanctuary to Michael.

"Brando and Jackson were birds of a feather," said a source close to both men. "Both of them had an unnatural fixation on minors."

Michael kept his promise not to live at Neverland. In January of 2004, he moved out of the ranch and rented a nine-bedroom mansion built in 1991 in Beverly Hills, complete with a 36,000-square-foot ballroom and theater and two regulation-size bowling lanes. Owned by a Chinese painter, it was on the market for $20 million. When there were no takers, Michael rented the property for $70,000 a month as part of a one-year lease. The mansion was allegedly secured for him by Leonard Muhammad, the advisor of the Nation of Islam. Reporters couldn't help but note that the rented mansion overlooked a children's park and playground.

A few days later, on January 16, 2004, Michael, aged 45, arrived late for his arraignment in Santa Maria, California on child molestation charges. In a whispery voice, he pleaded "Not Guilty." Inside, the courtroom was packed, and outside, some 3000 people, including hundreds of hysterical fans, waited shoulder-to-shoulder with news media from as far away as Norway and Japan. Some fans had crossed the deserts of Nevada in cars called the "Caravan of Love."

Jermaine

When Michael had arrived in a black sports utility vehicle, a roar had gone up for him. A huge black umbrella shielded his white skin from the California sun. One news reporter said he looked "like a cross between Mary Poppins and Mary Tyler Moore." He wore a silk armband and rhinestone-studded boots for his arraignment. Making a surprise appearance was his superstar sister, Janet, who only smiled as Michael repeatedly claimed, "I love my fans!" Brother Jermaine, Joe Jackson, and mother Katherine were part of his entourage.

Upon Michael's arrival, stern men in dark suits with walkie talkies were posted every few feet, forming a wall around Michael. These radical Muslims were from Louis Farrakhan's Nation of Islam.

Reporters worked overtime, investigating and subsequently filing stories about Michael's new link with the Nation of Islam and Louis Farrakhan.

During its turbulent history, the controversial black militant group has issued statements claiming that "whites are devils who must be destroyed." The group, whose membership is estimated at 20,000, has referred to Jews as "bloodsuckers" and campaigned aggressively for a separate African-American state.

Journalist Geoffrey Wansell asked, "So has the androgynous former child star from Gary, Indiana, who spent years undergoing plastic surgery apparently designed to make him look white, suddenly decided to return to his roots? Or is it a final, desperate effort to stave off the long arm of the law? Michael will do anything-anything-that will keep him out of prison, one former colleague told me this week. He clearly hopes the Nation can help him do that."

Unlike his brother Jermaine, Michael had not become a Muslim. It was reported that he was still a Jehovah's Witness, but despite that detail, Farrakhan had stationed Leonard Muhammad, his son-in-law and chief of staff, within the Los Angeles office of Michael's lawyer, Mark Geragos.

In reaction to this, a member of Michael's staff, who refused to be named, resigned in protest at the Nation's increasing control over Michael. "These people are basically brainwashing him," the former employee charged. "They tried to do the same thing with Whitney Houston. They offer a false sense that they can control everything. Everybody is afraid of them. They pretty much keep Jackson semi-captive."

It has been suggested by Michael's worst critics that he wanted to align himself with Farrakhan-sometimes called "the black man's Hitler"-as a politically correct anti-racism stance, perhaps a last-minute attempt to win the support of black Americans, whom he'd frequently shunned. O.J. Simpson, who had courted white women throughout most of his life, had also solicited the Nation for support when he faced criminal charges of murder.

Michael was said to have prayed with Farrakhan and to have been fascinated by his story of being swept up into a UFO and taken to the larger mother ship. Michael wanted to know if these extraterrestrials looked like E.T. Farrakhan reportedly told Michael that the UFO "mother wheel" was piloted by a dozen young men who were in perpetual orbit above the Earth, prepared for a signal from Elijah Muhammad to unleash total destruction on all the "white devils" of Earth, but rescuing all people with black skin. The question is, does Michael still believe the words of his former hit single where he famously sang, "It don't matter if you're black or white"?

"With friends like Farrakhan and those boys from the Nation of Islam, Michael Jackson doesn't need enemies," or so claimed reporter David Keller, reportedly writing a book on the black militant group.

Back at the courthouse, as members of the Nation of Islam guard gazed ominously at the proceedings, Judge Rodney Melville fumed at the sight of Michael buzzing theatrically into the courtroom 21 minutes late. "Mr. Jackson, you have started out on the wrong foot with me," the judge said. "I will not put up with that. It's an insult to the court."

After leaving the courtroom, Michael headed for his SUV, hoisting himself up onto its roof. In doing so, he gave no indication of the shoulder injury he'd claimed to have received from police "manhandling." In the background, music blared from boom boxes. From his perch on top of the SUV and from under an umbrella, he blew kisses into the air and even performed a few dance moves, whipping the crowd into a frenzy.

Members of the Nation of Islam distributed invitations to fans, inviting them on the following day to a bash at Neverland "in a spirit of love and togetherness." Hundreds of fans showed up the next day for fried chicken, turkey dogs, and ice cream, but Michael was a no-show. His fans rode the Ferris wheel and stared in awe at the snakes. But their hope that Michael would appear was never realized.

MJ on top of the SUV

At the arraignment, news leaked that Gavin Arvizo, the accuser, was in poor health. He'd lost a kidney, his spleen, and an adrenal gland in surgery to remove a large, cancerous tumor. Gavin was reported to "be in hiding." A spokesperson claimed, "The boy and his family are very private people."

Even though Judge Melville had imposed a gag order, news still leaked from the courtyard to the press. It was learned that Gavin had supplied police with drawings of Michael's genitals, just as Jordie Chandler had done in 1993. The boy also claimed that Michael stole his underwear during his visits to Neverland. It was also rumored that the star kept the underwear of many of his overnight guests, presumably as souvenirs, especially if they were urine-stained.

At the end of January, some details about Maureen Orth's upcoming piece in Vanity Fair was released to the press. In the article, she revealed that Michael allegedly seduced boys by giving them a Coca Cola can filled with white wine, calling it "Jesus Juice." Red wine was named "Jesus Blood."

In March, 2004 the grand jury convened to hear the child molestation charges against Michael. The key witness was, of course, 14-year-old Gavin Arvizo. The proceedings were secret, but many of the details of Gavin's testimony were revealed. The boy told the grand jury that he had been molested by Michael at least seven times early in 2003. Gavin said that Michael "loosened me up with Jesus Juice and showed me pictures of naked women before sexually molesting me at Neverland." Obviously this was a different Gavin from the boy who had appeared on the Bashir TV documentary cuddling with and praising Michael. The accuser's psychologist, Stan J. Katz, was also brought forward to testify.

In the months preceding the trial, as prosecutors worked day and night trying to secure young boys to testify that Michael had molested them during visits to Neverland, it was a 45-year-old man who leaked the news of a sexual relationship with Michael.

Scott Thorson had been the former lover of Liberace. He announced to the press that he'd also had an affair with Michael shortly before he split with the flamboyant piano player in the early 80s. The staff at the National Enquirer reported that Thorson had passed a polygraph test and was ready to testify in the singer's child molestation case. The former male model claimed that he could prove useful to prosecutors if Michael's attorneys claimed that he was thoroughly straight and had no interest in boys.

Judge Rodney Melville

According to Thorson, he said that he'd met Michael in 1979 in Las Vegas, but that the two didn't have their first sexual encounter until a while later in an apartment in London. In his testimony, he charged that he was trying on some new clothes when "Michael motioned me over to the bed where he was lounging." Thorson said that they also had another sexual tryst the following evening after a dinner party.

"Michael felt comfortable enough to make the first move on me, and I didn't resist," Thorson claimed. "Michael begged me to leave Liberace, but I had to say no."

An attorney for Michael, Steve Cochran, claimed that Thorson's account is "total trash."

Thorson was evicted in 1982 from Liberace's home in Los Angeles after he became addicted to painkillers and other drugs. The former model later sued Liberace for palimony.

No sooner had headlines about Liberace's former lover faded than new headlines blared on April 22, 2004: GRAND JURY INDICTS JACKSON. There was no immediate official confirmation. The grand jury had spent three weeks hearing from witnesses.

Four days later, it was revealed that Michael had decided to replace his legal team. One of Michael's lawyers, Benjamin Brafman, a New York criminal defense lawyer, said that "serious conflicts had been brewing for weeks" among Michael's legal team, the members of which had also conflicted with Jackson family members. "Mark Geragos and I are stepping down-or, as the Jackson camp suggests, being replaced," said Braftnan.

Still representing Scott Peterson for allegedly killing his pregnant wife, Laci, in late 2002, Geragos also claimed that "I will no longer represent Mr. Jackson."

A new defense team would be led by white-maned Thomas Mesereau Jr., a Los Angeles lawyer whose best-known recent client had been the actor Robert Blake, who had been charged with murdering his wife, Bonny Lee Bakley, three years previously. A 53-year-old, 6-foot-3-inch bruiser, Mesereau had boxed and played football at Harvard, and had also represented Mike Tyson during a 2001 California rape investigation.

Liberace with Scott Thorson

Assuming control of Michael's defense, Mesereau flew to Orlando to meet privately with Michael, who at the time was visiting Disney World with his three children.

On April 30, 2004, in Santa Maria, Michael arrived in an SUV to greet a diminished crowd of only 150 fans. Facing new charges, he entered the courtyard flanked by his new lawyer. Gone were the Nation of Islam bodyguards, who had been supplanted by a small cadre of security guards.

He pleaded "Not Guilty!" to all 10 felony charges.

Count one was for conspiracy involving abduction, false imprisonment, and extortion, alleged to have occurred between February 1 and March 31, 2003. Counts two to five charged lewd acts upon a child under the age of 14. Counts four and five also alleged that a third person, "James Doe," witnessed the acts. This was an obvious reference to Gavin's younger brother, Star. Count six cited an "attempt to commit a lewd act upon a child under the age of 14," and counts 7 to 10 charged Michael with "administering an intoxicating agent" to Gavin to assist in the commission of child molestation.

Mesereau, in a brief statement, told reporters that the case was about "the innocence and the complete vindication of a wonderful human being named Michael Jackson." Before driving away in his SUV, Michael waved and flashed a peace sign.

In May of 2004, Michael's defense team sought for the reduction of his $3 million bail, claiming it was excessive and that it violated Santa Barbara County standards for bail. The prosecutor objected, arguing that the star might choose to live the rest of his life as "a wealthy absconder" rather than face a life term in a California prison. It was pointed out that Michael was known and "adored" in many countries in the Middle East and Africa, countries that had no extradition treaties with the United States. In June of 2004, Judge Melville refused to lower Michael's $3 million bail.

During this time, some reporters inaugurated a policy of posting daily bulletins about the Michael Jackson case. In lieu of hard news, rumors were printed, none more bizarre than stories circulating that Michael was dead.

These rumors grew and grew until Raymone Bain, Michael's new spokeswoman, was forced to declare, "My client is not dead. Michael Jackson is doing just fine." Bain wrote a "Michael Jackson Is Not Dead" press release. "I had been up since 3 in the morning getting phone calls from reporters all over the world! The rumors were rampant! It's my job to correct the record."

A Hollywood publicist told the New York Daily News, "When you have a client who is clearly three sandwiches short of a picnic, you need to protect him with grace and dignity. And a press release that announces to the world that your client is not dead certainly reinforces the notion that he's a total nut bar."

The sudden appearance of Bain as a spokesperson raised the question of "Whatever happened to Bob Jones?" Michael's long-time publicist. After 17 years of brilliant service, Jones had been dismissed by Michael. Two bodyguards showed up at Jones's residence to retrieve Jackson memorabilia. "He never betrayed Jackson," one source claimed, "although he easily could have, as he was the keeper of many secrets."

Jones was said to be "dismayed and shocked" at Michael's abrupt firing of him. Since Jones never signed a confidentiality agreement with MJJ Productions, that left him free to write a memoir of what it was like representing Michael.

One by one, most of the Hollywood elite during the summer of 2004 began to avoid Michael, not accepting his calls and not returning his urgent messages.

In the past, Michael had succeeded in getting a superstar like Madonna to go out on a "date" with him for publicity purposes. But in July of 2004, he struck out with another superstar, Nicole Kidman, 37. He called her and asked if she'd be his date at the upcoming MTV Awards, but the former wife of Tom Cruise politely declined.

"I had never even met him," Kidman told the press. "It was a little strange. I did decline but, hey, the way my love life is going I took it as a great compliment. I keep thinking of those photographs of Michael in a shocking wig at Disneyland looking ridiculous. So call me crazy, but it just didn't tempt me to want to accept." Some Hollywood wag facetiously suggested that Michael would have had better luck if he'd called Tom Cruise instead.

In August of 2004, the state attorney general's office concluded that Michael had not been "manhandled" by the sheriff's deputies who took him into custody. The findings were contained in a three-page letter which Martin A. Ryan, chief of the attorney general's California Bureau of Investigation, sent to Santa Barbara County sheriff Jim Anderson. Ryan's office had assigned a dozen people to investigate Michael's charges, and collectively, they spent more than 2,500 hours looking into them. A spokesperson in Ryan's office, who refused to be named, claimed, "It's pure and simple. Michael Jackson lied. He was treated with dignity and respect, something not always accorded to child molesters, especially when they go to prison, where they are often attacked by fellow inmates."

Nicole Kidman

On August 16, 2004, Michael, dressed completely in white and accompanied by La Toya, Janet, Randy, Jackie, and Jermaine, watched prosecutor Tom Sneddon get grilled. During court proceedings, the district attorney lost his temper twice and was consequently rebuked twice by the judge. Watching it all, Michael giggled both times.

Michael was not required to attend the grilling, but apparently wanted to see his nemesis questioned. Michael believed that Sneddon nurtured "a vendetta against me."

As Michael emerged from his double-decker bus, he was greeted by cheering fans. He read a sign: IF MICHAEL JACKSON IS PETER PAN, THEN TOM SNEDDON IS CAPTAIN HOOK.

In a series of legal maneuvers, Mesereau was trying to get evidence that had been previously accumulated by private eye Bradley Miller tossed out of court. Mesereau claimed that in November of 2003, Sneddon had violated lawyer/client privilege when his men smashed their way into Miller's office, confiscating computers, documents, and papers pertaining to Michael. At the time, Miller had been a private investigator working for Geragos, who was Michael's original lawyer in the case.

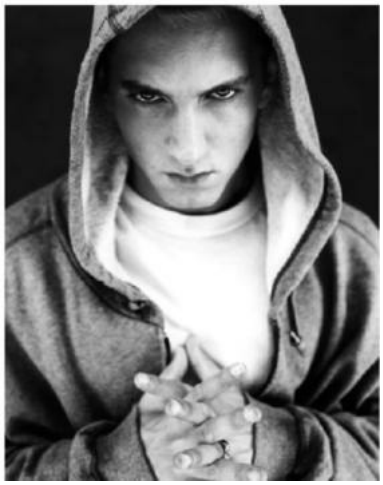
During his 31/2 hours on the witness stand, Sneddon clung to his claims that he was unaware of a professional relationship between Michael's former lawyer, Geragos, and the private dick, Miller.

During his interrogation on the stand, it was learned that Sneddon, in his search for damaging evidence on Michael, had also videotaped testimony from Janet Arvizo. Her testimony was recorded in the summer of 2003 in the wake of the disastrous fallout from the Bashir TV documentary. In front of investigators from the sheriff's department, Janet claimed that "Michael's henchmen" had pressured her family to relocate to a new home in Brazil, all at Michael's expense "because there was people that were gonna kill the children and me-um, mostly my children." On public TV in September of 2004, Janet appeared again to make more claims, asserting that she and her children "were chosen by God" to take on Michael. In a police video obtained by The Insider, Janet was shown telling people that "God knew that we weren't gonna fall for any of their money. That it was gonna be justice more than anything."

Even before the trial began, Michael had become the butt of jokes-in magazines, on talk radio, on television, and definitely in newspaper cartoons. He rarely responded to attacks. But in October of 2004, derision by a fellow performer made the pop star "hip-hoppin mad." In response, he issued a public attack, slamming Eminem's new music video, the controversial "Just Lose It."

In the music video, Eminem mocks Michael about the child sexual abuse allegations he was facing. In one scene Eminem is dressed up like Michael, sitting on a bed with little boys jumping up in the background. The lyrics say, "Come here little kiddie, on my lap. Guess who's back with a brand new rap? And I don't mean rap, as in the case of child molestation." Other scenes in the video mock Michael's nasal plastic surgery and hair-burning incident during the filming of the Pepsi commercial.

"I am very angry at Eminem's depiction of me in his video," Michael told radio host Steve Harvey. "I feel that it is outrageous and disrespectful. It is one thing to spoof, but it is another to be demeaning and insensitive."



Eminem

Of course, Michael had far more than Eminem to worry about. Michael's attorneys had been desperately trying to get Judge Melville to dismiss charges or else throw out evidence. In his ruling of October 16, 2004, the judge refused, claiming that the police had acted properly when they'd searched Bradley Miller's office.

As Michael neared his trial date, more suspicions were aired about his past activities with young boys-many of them anonymous, but some of them minor celebrities in their own right. One such case involving "names" surfaced in November of 2004.

It was revealed that teen pop singer Aaron Carter had spent an unsupervised night with Michael, "my idol," at Neverland. Aaron was only 15 years old at the time. He'd gone to Michael's 45th birthday bash at Neverland with his older brother, former Backstreet Boy Nick Carter. The next day, Nick told his mother, Jane Carter, that Aaron refused to leave Neverland, so he left his younger brother there.

His mother claimed she was in panic until Aaron came home about 24 hours later, never giving his mother an explanation of what went on during his absence. "I don't know if he was alone with Michael," June claimed to celebrity interviewer Daphne Barak on Access Hollywood. June later said that prosecutors grilled Aaron about his time at Neverland. "I have no idea what he told them," June said.

Aaron did admit spending time in Michael's bedroom but mostly "we had innocent, fun-like dance lessons and rode around the ranch." Aaron reportedly also told his mother that Michael gave him a Bentley, but he never brought the vehicle home. Later Michael denied giving the teenager the expensive car.

When June called Michael, he reportedly told her, "Nothing happened. Absolutely nothing happened. All we did was hang out."

Michael's show-biz involvements were ground to a virtual halt as police grilled one boy after another. His upcoming trial dominated the headlines, which is why the world took little notice of the November 16, 2004 release of Michael Jackson, The Ultimate Collection Box Set, a flashy-looking assortment of five separate CDs. It contained 13 previously un-issued recordings dating back to as early as 1969 and forward to the post-millennium. It also presented an unreleased 1992 live concert and contained 57 tracks of hit singles. But the glory days of Thriller sales were long gone.

On December 3, 2004, just weeks before Michael was scheduled to go on trial, police-armed with a search warrant-once again raided Neverland. Investigators entered the estate at 9 a.m., remaining there for three hours, but issued no statement as to the reason for the raid. Michael was leaving Neverland at the time of the raid, but did not stick around to see what the police were doing. When he heard about the raid, Mesereau raced more than 150 miles from Los Angeles to the Los Olivos ranch to monitor the search.

Within days, Mesereau filed a motion to dismiss the child molestation charges on the grounds of "vindictive prosecution and outrageous government conduct." The defense also asked Judge Melville to suppress all evidence seized at Neverland under the latest search warrants. According to reporters, Michael's lawyers even wanted a DNA sample taken from the star destroyed.

Around Christmas in 2004, private videos of Michael went on the market. The footage was shot in 1996 by Dr. Allan Metzger, who taped scenes from the HiStory tour as well as scenes from Michael's wedding to Rowe. Although in the wedding scenes Rowe looks more attractive than she usually does, Michael allegedly looks like a freakish goon. As for what the film contained, a source who'd seen the footage claimed, "You see Michael bitching and moaning about his fans. He says he doesn't like them to touch him and gets really upset when they storm his limo."

Metzger did not release the tapes himself and was "shocked and aghast" to find the video being peddled. He said he thought the tapes were locked in a safe. It was reported that an estranged member of Metzger's family managed to procure the damaging tapes.

More damaging video was on the way.

Brothers, Aaron and Nick Carter

Directed by Helen Littleboy and narrated by Mark Strong, Michael Jackson's Boys aired on television in 2005. It used interviews with friends, family, journalists, and many young boys who had been involved with Michael over the years. Boys included Frank Cascio, playing himself. Jordie Chandler in archive footage also appeared as himself, as did the array of the "usual suspects," including Macaulay Culkin, Terry George, Emmanuel Lewis, Jimmy Safechuck, and others. Archival footage was also used of Lisa Marie and Brooke Shields.

Some fans immediately attacked the film as "very dangerous, one of the most biased pieces of television I've seen in a long time." The show clearly left the impression that Michael "grooms" young boys for a relationship but "rejects them once puberty hits."

The impending trial had all the elements for a great show business special. The defendant was arguably the most famous personality in show business, the only performer who rivaled Elvis Presley and The Beatles in worldwide name recognition. Charges of child molestation were expected to bring lurid testimony from shady accusers. Over-the-top courtroom histrionics could be expected. For defense witnesses there was talk of an all-star cast, including Dame Elizabeth herself.

In a perceptive article, journalist Amy Sohn wrote that Michael might as well be on trial for much more than child molestation, citing "body dysmor- phia, bizarre wardrobe, narcissism, racial-identity disorder, transgenderism, makeup wearing, and poor parenting. Jackson is a walking set of contradictions between male and female, gay and straight, man and boy, abused and abuser."

Even as charges swirled around Michael, many parents defended the pop star, claiming the accusations were lies and asserting that it was still safe for their kids to visit Neverland if invited.

In Los Angeles, Gaynor Morgan told the press that she had no objection to her ten-year-old son, Alex, visiting Michael. "It'd be fine for him to stay and spend time ... and you know, confident," Morgan said in a slightly awkward statement.

Sally Thomas of Dallas defended Michael, claiming that her five-year-old son, Travis, had visited Neverland as a participant in a Make-a-Wish Grant. "I don't think Michael sees himself as a middle-aged man when he's with these children, because he's out there playing just like they are," said Thomas.

One reporter concluded, "That leaves some to complain that Michael Jackson may be Peter Pan-but it's the parents who are in Neverland."

As defenders came forward to praise him, Michael saw his hopes dashed on January 31, 2005. His lawyers had been working feverishly behind the scenes to have charges against their client dropped, but 4,000 summonses had been mailed out to county residents. Jury selection had begun, as court officials hoped to find a dozen "impartial" jurors. Because of so much pre-trial publicity, nearly every prospective juror had already formed an opinion, and most of them seemingly believed that Michael was a child molester.

During the jury selection, everyone who was even remotely connected with Michael real or fantasy wise-talked to the press. A resident of Phoenix, Hans Schmidt, came forward, claiming he had tapes in which Michael asserted that he pined for "a woman to love." Schmidt maintained that these tapes would prove that Michael was straight.

On the tapes, the singer allegedly expresses his dislike for his nappy hair, calling it "nigger hair." He also mentioned his battle with anorexia. Even so, during the filming of these tapes, he was reported to have shared a dessert with a beautiful blond-haired boy. In the New York Daily News, columnists provocatively speculated: "Let's hope it wasn't the English dessert Jackson mentions a fondness for in another conversation: Spotted Dick."

Finally, the court selected 12 jurors, each of whom claimed that they wouldn't allow Michael's celebrity to affect their final decision as to his guilt or innocence. The jury of four men and eight women was made up mostly of whites. No jurors were black, but at least three appeared to be Hispanic and another Asian.

Some of the final jurors, ranging in age from 20 to 79, were Michael's fans; four parents of young children; a woman whose grandson had been convicted of a sexual offense, and a man who had visited Michael at Neverland when he was a child. Eight alternates were selected-four men and four women ranging in age from 19 to 81.

The trial that would last for 73 days began on March 1, 2005, and would involve the state calling 90 witnesses, the defense 50. Some 700 pieces of evidence, including pornography, would be introduced into the official record. But perhaps none of these exhibits was as bizarre as a collection of barebreasted plastic "Barbies" in S&M gear.

The perils of plastic surgery

As a means of demonstrating Michael's attraction to young boys, the prosecution introduced two books featuring nude prepubescent boys. The books had been seized during the 1993 raid on Neverland and never returned. The pictures were of boys who took part in the 1963 film adaptation of Lord of the Flies. One book, The Boy: A Photographic Essay featured many photos of nude boys, including some explicit depictions of genitalia.

In TV coverage, reporters Diane Dimond and Nancy Grace emerged collectively as Michael's bete noire. Each of them would later insist that Michael got away with some serious charges of child molestation, all of it coming at great cost to his music career and personal reputation.

Judge Rodney Melville ruled that witnesses, including young men, could be summoned to court to testify if Michael had ever sexually abused them. In most cases, evidence of past behavior had not been admissible against a defendant. However, in 1995, the California Legislature changed that, passing a law that in cases of child molestation, testimony from the past could be allowed. The judge cleared the way for the prosecution to introduce testimony that Michael had made moves on five other boys, including Macaulay Culkin. However, even before his appearance in court, Culkin had consistently denied that Michael ever molested him.

In pressing for the introduction of boys from Michael's past, Sneddon told the judge that Michael's actions with these youths were inappropriate, including "kissing, hugging, and inserting his hands into their pants." He also claimed that "there was a pattern of grooming," or preparing the boys for molestation, but did not elaborate.

Sneddon wanted testimony from Jordie Chandler, but the boy had refused to appear, reportedly fleeing the country. Nonetheless, the DA wanted the jurors to see the cute young boy with his dark hair and doe eyes. A larger-thanlife photograph of Jordie was shown to jurors on an overhead projection screen. Attorney Larry Feldman, who previously had brokered Jordie's $25 million settlement with Michael, claimed that Jordie was much better looking than this photograph revealed. "I can tell you, at that age he was adorable," Feldman said. When the picture was shown in court, Michael did not look up at it but stared straight ahead.

Michael's critics suggested that both Jordie and Gavin represented a type, in that each had dark eyes, dark skin, short dark hair, and what was called a "pixieish look." Perhaps Sneddon was indeed hoping to prove that Michael had a type, although the dark looks of Gavin and Jordie wouldn't account for the blond-haired Home Alone allure of Macaulay Culkin.

The most crucial day was March 10 when the jury got a look at Gavin Arvizo for the first time. All courtroom observers agreed that the case against Michael would hinge on this teenager's testimony. At the time of his court appearance, Gavin was 15 years old.

Astonishingly, the defendant himself did not show up on this crucial day, as noted by Judge Melville who took the bench at 8:35 a.m.

Michael's attorney, Tom Mesereau, explained that he was in Cottage Hospital in Santa Ynez being treated for a serious back injury. Melville came down harshly. "I'm going to issue a warrant for his arrest. I'm forfeiting the bail."

Michael got the message loud and clear. His motorcade came screaming up to the courtyard. Getting out, Michael shuffled in slowly, wearing designer pajamas. Seated in the courtroom in these pajamas, he had to face Gavin accusing him of taking him to bed. Without emotion he sat rigidly, listening to Gavin claim that Michael had told him it was necessary to masturbate or else he "might rape a girl."

As Gavin sat across from Michael, the boy was being carefully screened by the jury. With his closely cropped hair, he looked older, bolder, and stronger than in previous pictures. In all, he cut a sympathetic figure and had a pleasing demeanor.

He stared straight at Michael as he made his charges, explaining that "I was kind of hypnotized by Michael and Neverland when we met in 2000."

Michael set ramrod straight as he stared back at the teen. Gavin testified that on his first night at Neverland he was invited to sleep in Michael's bedroom with both Michael and Frank Cascio.

He testified that Cascio, now calling himself "Frank Tyson," surfed the web for porn that featured women between the ages of 15 and 25. Gavin testified that Michael masturbated him and tried to get him to touch his genitals. "He grabbed my hand but I pulled my hand away because I didn't want to do it," Gavin claimed.

Adult materials found at Neverland included some 75 magazines of straight porn, as well as four gay-themed books. Some of these publications had the fingerprints of the two Arvizo brothers on them, both Star and Gavin. Both boys claimed that Michael showed them these adult materials, alleging it was for the purpose of lowering inhibitions to sexual behavior, a charge Michael denied, but not on the stand.

MJ arriving at his trial in pajamas

Allegedly, Michael showed the boys pictures of topless women while asking, "Got milk?" He was also said to have leaned in and whispered to Prince Michael II, who was sleeping nearby, "Prince, you're missing some pussy."

Gavin also charged that Michael not only showed him porn, but got him intoxicated on wine as a prelude to seduction.

During police investigation into the case, Gavin had initially claimed that he'd been molested "five to seven times." But on the witness stand, he could only describe in detail two occasions where he claimed that the pop star had molested him.

Under cross-examination, he grew argumentative with the defense, especially when he was painted as a juvenile delinquent with behavioral problems, who had been schooled by his mother to lie under oath for financial gain and to pester celebrities for money. The jury seemed to waiver between sympathy for Gavin as a cancer victim and exasperation at the venality of the entire Arvizo clan.

His sister, Davellin, 18, had stubbornly denied that Gavin had disciplinary trouble at his school. Yet nine teachers, according to school records, claimed he was a "classroom nightmare," citing such offenses as fighting, disrupting class, refusing to obey teachers' orders, and being defiant. Gavin did admit that he often misbehaved in class and never did his homework.

Gavin was forced to admit that he had twice told a school official that the King of Pop never molested him. Wincing, Gavin was forced to recount a conversation he'd had with Dean Jeffrey Alpert at his school in the spring of 2003. "I told Dean Alpert he didn't do anything to me," Gavin admitted.

In another coup for the defense, the boy admitted that many of the glowing things the Arvizos had said about Michael in a 90-minute rebuttal video, filmed on February 19, 2003, were true. Then both Star and his sister claimed that the family was coerced into making the rebuttal video. News accounts carried on March 15 said that Gavin "lost his halo" in court.

In rebuttal, Gavin claimed that "I didn't spill my guts" to the dean because "I feared cruel taunts from my classmates if word got out."

Under questioning by Sneddon, Gavin claimed that after the Bashir documentary was aired, showing him holding hands with and nuzzling the pop star, he was "mercilessly ridiculed by schoolmates. Kids would laugh at me and say, `That's the kid who got raped by Michael Jackson.'" According to testimony, Gavin was repeatedly called "a faggot" by his classmates.

Mesereau was successful in getting Gavin to acknowledge that he and his family came and went at their leisure from Neverland, refuting his mother's previous claims that they had been held at the ranch against their will.

After 13 hours on the stand, Gavin was asked how he felt about Michael today. "I don't really like him anymore. I don't think he's deserving of the respect I was giving him as the coolest guy in the world."

The prosecutor, Sneddon, attacked Mesereau in his defense of Michael, calling it "a scorched-earth, take-no-prisoners approach." Sneddon alleged that Mesereau was particularly caustic in his cross-examination of Gavin. "He left the boy bewildered and stammering contradictions over three days of testimony. Mr. Mesereau was as abusive, as mean, as obnoxious as you could be to a child witness," Sneddon told the judge. "Victims don't want to show up because they don't want to go through what the accuser experienced."

After Gavin's testimony, Michael made a rare appearance on the Rev. Jesse Jackson's Sunday TV show. The star claimed that he was a victim of conspiracy "just like other black luminaries," citing Nelson Mandela as an example. He noted that some of the press had noticed that he was crying when hearing Gavin's testimony about child molestation. "I was in a great deal of pain," Michael said. "I was coming out of the shower and I fell and all my body weight, I'm pretty fragile, all my body weight fell against my rib cage." It was physical pain, not emotional pain, that caused him to tear, he claimed.

In April of 2005, in the midst of the trial, Michael managed to attend the funeral of attorney Johnnie Cochran Jr.

Michael joined O.J. Simpson, along with other celebrities who included the Rev. Jackson, in paying tribute to the controversial lawyer. It is not known what words O.J. Simpson and Michael exchanged with each other, but both Michael and O.J. could thank Cochran for extricating them from sticky mess- es-O.J. for an alleged double murder, and Michael for getting Jordie Chandler and that earlier issue about child molestation off his back. Cochran died on March 29, 2005, at his home in Los Angeles, where he'd been suffering from an inoperable brain tumor.

The Rev. Calvin Butts, pastor of the Abyssinian Baptist Church in Harlem, referred to Cochran "a great warrior for justice." In a dissenting voice, writer Paul Stefani in 2006 said, "I guess he was all that if you call helping a wife murderer and a child molester beat the rap."

Back at the trial, Davellin Arvizo testified that she saw Michael kissing her brother on the cheek and head while her family lived at Neverland during February and March of 2003. "When I was in his bedroom one time, he had his arm around Gavin and they were hugging over and over, and kissing over and over," she charged.

Gavin's younger brother, Star, was also called to the witness stand. While on the stand jurors learned that Michael had nicknamed him "Blowhead." Star told the court that on two occasions he'd seen Michael lying on his bed at Neverland, groping Gavin with his free hand while Michael played with himself. On yet another occasion, Star claimed that he and Gavin were on Michael's bed watching TV when Michael walked in with a full erection. "It's natural," Michael was alleged to have told the two brothers.

At one point, Star claimed, Michael grabbed the mannequin of a little girl and pretended to hump her in front of the brothers.

Star indicated that when he saw Michael fondling Gavin, both his brother and Michael were unaware of his presence. "I saw directly into the bedroom, and my brother was on top of the covers," Star claimed. "I saw Michael's left hand in my brother's underwears and his right hand in his underwears." He said he saw the alleged molestation as he climbed a stairwell leading to the pop star's bedroom.

Prosecutors bolstered Star's account by proving that the boy would have had a line of sight to Michael's bed from the top of the stairs.

On the stand, Star also testified that Michael had shown Gavin and him copies of such porn as Barely Legal and Juicy, Ripe and Ready.

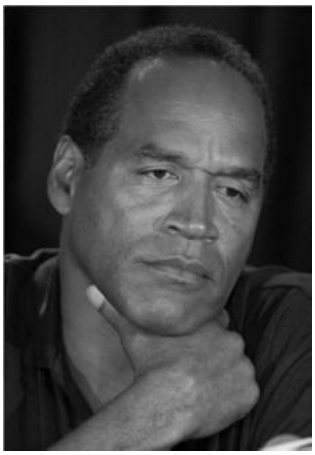
When Mesereau cross-examined Star, the attorney scored points by revealing that the magazine, Barely Legal, seized in a raid on Neverland, was actually published in August of 2003, months after Michael allegedly had "shown" it to Gavin and Star. The teen also couldn't explain why the door to Michael's bedroom had been left unlocked or why no alarm had been triggered by his secret approach. Previously he had claimed that there was a system of keypad locks and a warning bell in the hallway leading to this very private master bedroom.

Star testified that for amusement Michael, acting like an overgrown teenager, made obscene crank calls to anonymous people. When one woman answered her phone, Michael, according to Star, asked her about the size of her genitals.

The boy was forced to admit that he'd lied during previous depositions, including one taken in 2000 as part of a lawsuit the Arvizos filed against JC Penney. Star claimed that his father never hit him and that his parents never fought. Under Mesereau's stern questioning, the boy was forced to concede that he'd committed perjury.

The teen was also forced to admit that he'd given conflicting accounts in previous statements to a psychologist. Very forcefully, Mesereau pointed out that Star had given three different versions of what he claimed he witnessed Michael doing to Gavin's body. The attorney said, "In one version, Mr. Jackson's hand was outside the boy's clothes; in another, it was inside, and in a third Mr. Jackson was `rubbing his penis' against the boy's buttocks."

If Star appeared to be an inconsistent witness, his mother, Janet, was even worse on the stand. In retrospect, some court observers claimed that her appearance on April 3 lost the case for the Arvizos. Even before she appeared in court, the defense had sought to portray both her and her family as "gold diggers who saw Mr. Jackson as a celebrity fall guy to be milked for cash."



O.J. Simpson

On the stand, Janet was a loose cannon and, thanks to her erratic courtroom outbursts, the most explosive witness in the case. A mercurial character, she rarely gave a straight answer to any of the defense team's questions. She repeatedly said, "It's burned inside my memory" or "money doesn't buy happiness." It was also claimed that she exploited her cancer-stricken son for money and at one time spent $7,000 shopping and dining out at the same time she alleged that Michael was keeping both her and her family "captive."

In five days on the stand, the mother "ranted, raved, and refused to answer questions." Many of her replies were nonsensical. The 36-year-old woman kicked off her testimony by invoking her Fifth Amendment right against selfincrimination on questions about alleged welfare fraud. She admitted that she'd lied under oath in an unrelated court case.

Dressed in pink, Janet was often sarcastic in court but at one time she broke down on the witness stand, asking those in the courtroom, "Please don't judge me." In her testimony she claimed that she'd seen Michael lick her son's forehead like a cat. She alleged that the head-licking incident occurred on a charter flight from Miami to California in February of 2003.

At the time, she did not intervene to stop it. "I thought I was seeing things."

She also testified that Michael and his "henchmen" told her that there were unnamed "killers" out to get both her and her children in the wake of the damaging Bashir TV documentary in 2003.

Mesereau was known for trying to box accusers in with "yes" or "no" answers. Defiantly, Janet made rambling speeches to the jury instead. At one point she looked at Michael across the courtroom and said, "He managed to fool the world. Now, because of this criminal case, people know who he really is. He really doesn't care about children. He cares about what he was doing with children."

In a combative day on the stand, she was forced to admit that she'd once told sheriff's deputies that she feared Michael had a plan for her and her family to "disappear from his Neverland ranch in a hot air balloon."

There were times such as this when the court erupted in derisive laughter at her answers.

Thomas Mesereau

Janet had claimed that she was being held against her will at Neverland, but defense witness Angel Vivanco, a chef, claimed that Janet got a deluxe body wax at a spa and sipped champagne with one of her "captors." Vivanco charged that Janet was a "flirtatious mom," who downed bubbly with Michael's "henchman," Dieter Wiesner, at the kitchen bar at Neverland. According to Vivanco, the pair left together "for parts unknown." Vivanco's charge of Janet's cozy session with Wiesner flew in the face of her previous testimony when she described Wiesner as one of the two threatening men she called "Germans," who made "my life hell at Neverland."

To help the defense's case, an employee, Kate Bernard, asserted on the stand that she drove Janet to the Bare Skin Aromatherapy Day Spa in Los Olivos for a deluxe body wax. It was suggested that if Janet were indeed being held "captive," she could have escaped at any time.

Joe Marcus, ranch manager at Neverland, also countered Janet's testimony, stating that the Arvizos were "happy" to be at Neverland. When he would take Janet out on a shopping trip, he claimed that she was always anxious to get back to Neverland. Marcus also said that Janet and Gavin "never complained about anything." Marcus was part of a string of current and former Neverland employees called by the defense to counter disgruntled former staff members who testified against Michael for the prosecution.

Prone to emotional outbursts wherein she would snap her fingers at jurors, Janet could not explain why, if held hostage at Neverland, she didn't call the police, since it was shown that she had unrestricted access to a telephone. She also couldn't give a reason why she never called for help when Michael's aides took her to public places such as restaurants, beauty salons, stores, and even government offices where she repeatedly encountered law enforcement officials and said nothing.

To counter charges of kidnapping, defense attorney Robert Sanger produced the gate log at Neverland, naming Brian Barron as the guard on duty February 12, 2003, when the Arvizos left the property at 1:38 a.m.

A tall, red-haired cop, Barron moonlighted at Neverland for five years. He'd also noted that the Arvizo family returned voluntarily a few days later. In other tantalizing tidbits, not related to the case, Barron recorded a secret visit of the Rev. Al Sharpton on June 23, 2002, and from Ed Bradley, the 60 Minutes correspondent, on February 8, 2003. A visit by Elizabeth Taylor had been scheduled but she never showed up.

After these revelations, Sanger tore into the mother. "She lies for gain. She's lied and cheated her way through life-that's what she does."

Janet claimed that in the wake of repeated death threats, she'd become so afraid for herself and her children that the Arvizos escaped "in the dead of the night" in one of Michael's Rolls-Royces. They were not to see Neverland again and future encounters with Michael would occur in court.

Janet was the big loser at the trial. She not only lost her case against Michael but later faced charges of welfare fraud and perjury. A five-count felony indictment against her came down in October of 2005. She was charged with a single fraud count and four instances of lying to secure nearly $19,000 in welfare payments to which she was not entitled. During the Jackson trial, she'd refused to answer questions about how she'd obtained welfare payments despite having more than $30,000 in the bank.

On November 13, 2006, Janet, aged 38, was found guilty of welfare fraud. As part of a plea bargain, she agreed to repay $13,606 to the State of California.

She was ordered to repay the rest of the money she'd illegally acquired and to complete 154 hours of community service before April 27, 2007. If she complied, the felony charge would be reduced to a misdemeanor and she'd not have to go to prison.

After Janet's appearance, legal experts weighed in on Michael's trial, even before the prosecution had wound up its case. Michael Cardoza, a defense lawyer and former Alameda County (CA) prosecutor, predicted that "Jacko may moonwalk over the DA's weak case." At the worst, a hung jury was predicted. "I wouldn't have let her anywhere near my case," said Cardoza, referring to the accuser's wacky mom. "Her testimony hurt more than it helped."

It wasn't just Janet's testimony that came under fire. The defense called witnesses to counter some of Gavin's claims, especially a charge that Michael had supplied him with alcohol during a cross-country flight from Los Angeles to Miami.

The defense called a corporate flight attendant for Xtra-Jet International, Cynthia Ann Bell, to the stand. She disputed the accuser's claim that Michael had urged Gavin to "tank up on Jesus Juice" to shake off his fear of flying aboard a February 7, 2003 flight to Miami. She maintained that the King of Pop never shared his soda can of wine with Gavin, claiming that she'd kept an eye on both Michael and Gavin throughout the flight.

The pretty blond jet hostess did admit that Michael was a "very private drinker," who downed almost two bottles of white wine, hidden inside a diet Coke can, during the cross-country flight.

She also testified that she never saw Michael "inappropriately touch the accuser or any child." Gavin had testified that he had drunk "at least a whole can worth of wine from Jackson's Diet Coke container" during the flight. His sister also testified that she saw Michael pass the can to her brother. "They were sipping it back and forth."

Bell also attacked Gavin for being "a rude and discourteous loudmouth, who threw mashed potatoes and raised a ruckus when his chicken wasn't warm enough." In her testimony, she also said that Gavin showed off an expensive watch Michael had given him. She quoted the boy as bragging to her, "Jackson will buy me anything I want."

It had been announced that many big names would appear in court for the defense. Most of them, such as Elizabeth Taylor, were never summoned. Judge Melville barred "bombshell" testimony from CNN talk show host Larry King. With jurors out of earshot, the CNN host testified that the attorney, Larry Feldman, who at one time represented the accuser, told him that the boy's mother was a "wacko," a term most often used for Michael himselfand "that she was just in it for the money." Melville ruled that this was "hearsay" testimony and was inadmissible.

As a key witness for the prosecution, Dr. Stan Katz took the stand. He was the one who had transmitted Gavin's allegations against Michael to authorities in June of 2003 when the boy was only 13.

On the stand, the psychiatrist claimed that, "It would be highly unusual for a 12- to 13-year-old boy to make false accusations against a male," Katz claimed, although there is massive evidence to dispute that.

Katz was known to TV audiences for his appearances on the NBC-TV reality show, Starting Over.

Mesereau attacked Katz's credibility by citing a book he'd written, in which the psychiatrist claimed that forty percent of child abuse claims are false.

Surprisingly, when comedy club owner Jaime Masada took the stand, he bolstered the claim of Janet. He testified that the mother, in a hysterical phone call, claimed, "I can't leave Neverland Ranch. They're holding me and my kids against my will." He remembered the call as coming through early in 2003. He quoted Janet as shouting, "Oh my god, they're holding me here." As Masada remembered it, she was sobbing.

Masada claimed that it was not Janet but the father, David Arvizo, "who was the one who pestered me for cash when the boy had cancer in 2001 and 2002." According to Masada's testimony, David, then unemployed, often "hit me up for gasoline money or rent."

Masada is accredited with setting into motion the meeting between Michael and Gavin. In court he disputed the defense contention that the mother was a scam artist. Masada is the owner of the Laugh Factory Comedy Club on Sunset Strip. Arriving in America from Iran when he was 14 years old, Masada built a comedy empire in Los Angeles. He met Gavin in 1999 at a comedy camp he sponsored for disadvantaged children. At Gavin's request, Masada put him in touch with Michael.

George Lopez, the star of the ABC sitcom, George Lopez, was called as a witness for the prosecution. He recalled that he met Gavin's family in 1999 at a Sunset Strip comedy club and became close to them when he learned of the boy's illness. "I was invested in them," he testified, "and I saw a lot of myself in that family." But he said that the father kept calling him asking him for money. At one point, the father accused Lopez of stealing $300 from Gavin's wallet, which had been left behind at the comic's house. Obviously the relationship soured after that. "What am I supposed to tell my son?" David asked Lopez. The comedian curtly replied, "Tell him that his father is an extortion 1St."

A pivotal moment in the case came when the judge ordered Michael to remove his trademark surgical mask. For all the world to see, Michael was hardly ready for Norma Desmond's famous close-up. Photographs revealed scarred lips and a nose seemingly held together by Elastoplast. One reporter called the look one of a "borderline sci-fi scenario."

Throughout the trial Michael looked pale and frail under a pageboy haircut. He often wore military jackets with a red armband and a pocket crest. He always painted his mouth scarlet and wore dark sunglasses. As one juror later said, "If I was being charged with molesting a young boy, I would have left the tube of lipstick laying on my vanity table."

On May 11, jurors saw two videotaped interviews which described Michael's pure love of children, comparing himself to Princess Diana, the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Mohandas K. Gandhi, and Mother Teresa. "Since these figures are dead," Michael said, "there's not a voice for the voiceless, and I've been doing it for many years."

On May 18, Rijo Jackson, Michael's 12-year-old cousin, took the stand. His testimony cast grave doubt on the innocence of the Arvizo brothers. Rijo stated that he saw Gavin steal wine and money and secretly watch porn on TV while masturbating. Rijo also testified that Star took part in misbehaving during visits to Neverland. He said both brothers asked him to join them in masturbation as they watched an X-rated TV channel showing naked women cavorting. Rijo said that he went to tell Michael what the boys were doing. "But he didn't believe it," Rijo claimed.

Brushing aside tears, the doe-eyed boy described his X-rated encounter with complete believability as he told of Gavin and Star "doing nasty stuff." The pony-tailed cousin's account was important because Gavin had testified that he never looked at porn or engaged in sexual conduct unless Michael was there "to coach me."

The testimony of Jay Leno on May 23 was a disappointment. Michael's lawyers hoped that Leno would take the stand, accusing the Arvizos of trying to weasel money out of him. But he testified that he was never asked for money.

Headlines claimed that Leno had bombed and that the Tonight Show funnyman was no stand-up guy for Michael. His testimony appeared to contradict statements that he had made earlier to investigators for the Santa Barbara sheriff's department. During that session, the 55-year-old comedian claimed that the Arvizos were "sort of looking for money" and that he felt he'd been targeted as their next "mark."

The following day Michael's defense team concluded their case without bringing the pop star to the stand. The prosecution had two and a half months to summarize their case, the defense resting after less than three weeks. Michael did speak on videotape, referring to himself as "a childlike spirit surrounded by adults who have deceived and betrayed me."

Psychiatrist Dr. Stan Katz

The final witness for the defense was comedian Chris Tucker, who called the Arvizos "cunning and relentless in the pursuit of money, gifts, and free trips" from himself and other celebrities.

On May 26, prosecutors lost a bid to show the jury photos of the pop star's allegedly spotted penis. The bid had called for presentation of those photos alongside Jordie Chandler's illustration of a distinctively marked penis that was alleged at the time to have been inspired by Michael's penis. Judge Melville said, "I'm going to deny bringing in evidence of the blemished penis. I find the prejudicial effect would far outweigh the probative value."

In his argument for the prosecution, Ron Zonen claimed that Michael had a discolored spot on the underside of his penis which could only have been seen if the penis were erect.

The jury did not get to see pictures of Michael's penis, but a number of other curious parties did-but only if willing to pay big bucks for that dubious privilege. As early as October of 1994, The Amsterdam News in New York was reporting that photos of Michael's genitals were floating around Hollywood. "They're either duplicate photos of those held by the D.A., or fakes, according to our sources," claimed reporter Abiola Sinclair. One source, who requested anonymity, said that the pictures were smuggled out and that the negatives are on the market.

Another anonymous source, who had seen the actual photographs of the nude Michael and also the pictures being hawked as the real thing, claimed off the record that "They're the genuine article-that's Jackson's dick all right! But I don't know how copies became available. Just too many people have seen and dealt with these photos. After all, if Tom Sneddon had had his way, not only the jurors would have seen Michael's prick, but in time the entire world. As has been shown time and time again, it's hard to keep pictures private if a star poses nude or makes a sex video. It's going to get out. Take Paris Hilton, whomever."

In their closing arguments on May 27, prosecutors were allowed to show a 70-minute video of Gavin's first interview with the police on July 7, 2003. In denim shorts and wearing a blue shirt, Gavin claimed, "He put his hands in my pants. He started masturbating me. I told him I didn't want to do that and he kept on doing it. I told him no. He said he wanted to show me how to masturbate. I said no. Then he said he could do it for me. He grabbed me. My private area. He touched me for a long time."

George Lopez

On June 3, in closing arguments, Zonen, for the prosecution, once again dragged out Michael's porn collection, showing the jurors the cover of a book called A Sexual Study of Man. "It shows everything one man could possibly do to another man," Zonen told the panel of eight women and four men.

On June 3, during closing arguments, the defense claimed that the Arvizos were "con artists, actors, and liars." Prosecutors claimed that Michael had lured the vulnerable cancer survivor "into the world of the forbidden in his bedroom and molested him." Zonen charged, "The lion on the Serengeti doesn't go after the strongest antelope. The predator goes after the weakest."

On the dawn of the jury's verdict, journalist John M. Broder accurately predicted that regardless of the outcome Michael's "secrets have been laid bare and his psyche picked apart as if by carrion birds. Even if he is acquitted, many people will continue to believe that he harbors an unhealthy fondness for young boys."

En route to court on June 13 to hear the verdict, Michael rode with his family with a Bible open on his lap. He was rocking back and forth, saying, "They tried to do this to Job. Now they are trying to do it to me. Why me?"

On 2:25 p.m. that day, the jury of the Superior Court of the State of California determined that Michael was not guilty on all counts.

As he heard "not guilty" seemingly repeated endlessly, Michael sat motionless for five minutes as the possibility of nearly 20 years behind bars was finally lifted.

Judge Melville declared, "Mr. Jackson, your bail is exonerated and you are released." Wiping tears from his eyes, Michael walked out of the courtroom after exchanging joyous hugs and handshakes with his attorneys. Tom Mesereau said, "Justice was done. The man's innocent and always was."

Fans celebrated outside the courthouse, cheering and waving signs. Both the investigation and trial had lasted an astonishing 574 days.

Outside the courthouse Michael, weak and frail, walked slowly with a solemn face.

One loyal female fan released one white dove for each count on which Michael was acquitted. Confronting his fans, Michael blew kisses to them before disappearing into a black SUV for the trip back to his fantasyland estate. This time there were no dances of victory atop the van.

Foiled in his second attempt to bring Michael to "justice," Sneddon was clearly angered at the verdict. "No comment!" he snapped at reporters.

One woman juror said she was offended at Janet Arvizo "snapping her fingers at us. `Don't snap your fingers at me, lady,' I said to myself."

On the east coast, hundreds of people, both anti-Michael and pro-Michael, gathered in Times Square, where a giant screen heralded news of the star's acquittal.

Elizabeth Taylor issued a statement. "Thank God Michael is vindicated for all time. Now maybe people will leave him alone."

After Michael's victory, his attorney, Mesereau, told Barbara Walters in an ABC interview, "I may have saved Michael's life. I don't think he would have survived prison."

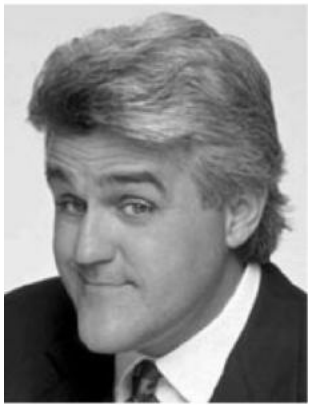
In yet another statement, the attorney went on to say that Michael had learned a valuable lesson. "He's not going to make himself vulnerable to this kind of thing anymore."

Robert M. Sanger, another defense lawyer, reported visiting Michael at Neverland a few hours after the verdict came in, finding him extremely grateful that the trial turned out as it did.

"There was a strong sense that the charges were preposterous and that it would be bizarre for a jury to believe these people were telling the truth, let alone beyond a reasonable doubt." Having represented Michael for 12 years, Sanger claimed that the trial was a "long, long battle for Michael to clear his name. He's finally gotten a resounding acquittal, an exoneration!"

As Michael was driven back to Neverland, loyal fans had gathered at the gates to greet him. ALL OF US HERE AND MILLIONS AROUND THE WORLD LOVE AND SUPPORT YOU.

The next day the number of fans had dwindled to only a few loyalists, but an estimated 200 members of the media lined the rural road, watching as cars came and went through the guarded gate. Everybody wanted to see Michael leaving Neverland but had to settle for Joe Jackson instead. He claimed that his son was "exhausted and resting" before his vehicle disappeared inside the gates.



Jay Leno

This may have been Joe Jackson's last visit to Neverland. For public relations purposes, Michael had wanted a show of solidarity from the Jackson family. But sources close to the pop star claimed that once the trial ended, he didn't want to see any of them. And in the wake of the trial, after he'd fled the country, it was claimed that he no longer accepted their phone calls, even those from his pleading mother, Katherine.

In a post-verdict interview, juror Raymond C. Hultman, a civil engineer, said, "I would tell him not to sleep with boys. It's not something that's normally acceptable in this society." Hultman said that he believed Michael might have molested boys in the early 90s, but that the "prosecution in the latest case had failed to provide sufficient evidence. I had what I thought were some valid reasons to believe this child had been molested, and his demeanor seemed genuine." But Hultman felt that the "prosecution's timetable did not make sense."

Even though he was found not guilty by a jury of his so-called peers, Michael seemed disgusted and even furious at what he'd been put through in America. He vowed never to set foot on American soil again. Two weeks after his acquittal, he flew to distant Bahrain, an island nation in the Persian Gulf, one linked to Saudi Arabia by a bridge.

If Michael thought interest in him had waned, he was mistaken. Beginning in the summer of 2005 and lasting through the year of 2006, he made more blaring headlines around the world than any other person in the entertainment business, exempting the fluffy coverage of the Brad Pitt/Angelina Jolie romance.

Almost everything Michael did-known or perceived merited a headline.

In Bahrain, Michael was the guest of the royal family, specifically Abdullah bin Hamad Al-Khalifa, the son of Bahrain's king, Sheik Hamad. His Majesty reportedly didn't welcome Michael and resented his son's fascination with the superstar. Unlike the prince, the ruler reportedly didn't like the media coverage and notoriety the disgraced pop star would bring to his tiny country.

Local news accounts reported that Michael's home in Bahrain was filled with "personal boy servants," and that he constantly had an "entourage of several young boys wherever he went." Michael was said to have been delighted to discover that Bahrain has a branch of Toys `R Us.

Michael's attorney, Tom Mesereau, refused to say if his client would relinquish his U.S. citizenship and seek immigrant status in Bahrain.

Rashid Bin Abdulrahman Al-Khalifa, an officer in the ministry of information, predicted that Michael would not be given citizenship. "Citizenship," he said, "is not easy to get here in Bahrain-even for Michael Jackson. But he may stay indefinitely as long as he owns property here."

The local press in Bahrain claimed that Michael had invested $1.5 million in two villas and a plot of land in the country's manmade Amwaj Islands.

The Amwaj Islands are popular with Bahrain's oil-rich set, many of whom maintain second homes here. It's a secluded area within eyesight of mainland Bahrain. There's even a posh private school for Michael's sheltered, veilwearing kids.

In 2005, papers were publishing stories about "the curse of the Jacksons," as newspaper reporters who included Patricia Shipp were updating the public on the famous and once-rich family. Much of the data had already been published and made known for the public, and the financial plight of Michael himself had been extensively written about. Of all the family members, Janet seemed in the best financial shape. Both Joe Jackson and Katherine Jackson were perceived as being in "financial peril."

It was reported that Marlon, at the age of 48, was having trouble keeping up the $9,000 monthly mortgage payment on his $2.2 million California mansion. Back in 2001, Randy, 44, admitted to bankruptcy fraud when he failed to list his ownership of a sports utility vehicle in filing his claim. After a string of flop solo albums, Jermaine at 51 had moved back into the Encino house but reportedly traveled to the Middle East to meet with leaders of the Muslim faith. Tito at 52 was appearing at small venues performing on his blues guitar. Jackie turned 54 in 2005 but had not appeared in public since 1989, when he released a solo album that bombed.

Even though he lived in exile in Bahrain, the lawsuits against Michael continued. The most bizarre and most high-profile of the lot was filed in Los Angeles by Marc Schaffel. It offered additional embarrassing insights into Michael's private life, much of which had already been laid bare during the Arvizo case.
